[9]The Crittenden-Johnson Resolution (not to be confused with the Crittenden Compromise mentioned on p. 709) stated that the purpose of the war was not to overthrow or interfere with "the rights of established institutions," meaning slavery. The resolution passed in both houses of Congress in July, but was then defeated in December as antislavery sentiment grew. — Eds.

[10]This article forbade the military from returning fugitive slaves to their owners. — Eds.

[11]Permitted the military to confiscate property used to support the Confederacy, including slaves. — Eds.

[12]Stated that any Confederate (military or civilian) who did not surrender would have his slaves freed via criminal proceedings. — Eds.

Time and time again, slaves forced Federal soldiers and officers to make the choice, a choice that became easier as the Union army's need for labor grew. Change did not come at once, but it came.

The lessons slaves taught soldiers and soldiers taught officers slowly ascended 15 the Union chain of command and in November 1861 reached Lincoln's cabinet for the first time. Secretary of War Simon Cameron publicly endorsed a proposal to arm slaves to fight for the Union and freedom.[13] Lincoln quieted Cameron and packed him off to Russia as minister, but the slaves continued undeterred to press their case.

The slow shift in Federal policy gained momentum as the Union army penetrated deeper into the Confederacy, where slaveholders were not reluctant Unionists but outright rebels. In these circumstances, some field commanders became quick learners. Their respect for the old order yielded to a willingness to challenge the rights of the master and finally to a firm determination to extirpate slavery. Others learned slowly, imperfectly, or not at all. However, before long, the most obdurate generals began to disappear from places of high command, and the quick studies rose to the top.

The broad outline of the story was always the same. Slaves forced the issue: what should be done with them? Deciding the matter was always difficult, for it required a choice between the contradictory interests of the master and of the slave. At first slaveholders held the upper hand, but in time the advantage slipped to the slaves. When the slaves' loyalty became more valuable than the masters' in the eyes of Federal authorities, the Federal army became the slaves' willing partner rather than its reluctant enemy. The process by which the Union army became an army of liberation was in its essence political and reveals how black people had been incorporated into American politics long before they had the vote, the right to petition, or independent standing at law. . . .

The lesson that slaves taught common soldiers, that common soldiers taught officers, that officers taught field commanders, that field commanders taught their desk-bound superiors in Washington, and that resonated in the North was not wasted on Abraham Lincoln. In many ways, Lincoln was a slow learner, but he learned.

Lincoln was no friend of slavery. He believed, as he said many times, that "if slavery is not wrong, nothing is wrong." But, as president, Lincoln also believed he had a constitutional obligation not to interfere with slavery where it existed. Shortly before his inauguration, he offered to support a proposed constitutional amendment that would have prohibited any subsequent amendment authorizing Congress "to abolish or interfere . . . with the domestic institutions" of any state, including slavery."[14] As wartime leader, he feared the disaffection of the loyal slave states, which he understood to be critical to the success of the Union. He crafted much of his wartime policy

---

[13]Edward McPherson, The Political History of the United States of America during the Great Rebellion, 1860–1865, 2d ed. (Washington, D.C.: Philip & Solomons, 1865), 249, 416.

[14]For the proposed amendment, see ibid., 59; Abraham Lincoln, Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln, ed. Roy P. Basler, 9 vols. (New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers Univ. Press, 1953–55), 4:421–41.

respecting slavery to avoid alienating loyal slaveholders, especially in Kentucky, Missouri, and Maryland. . . .

Where others led on emancipation, Lincoln followed. Lincoln responded slowly 20 to demands for emancipation as they rose through the military chain of command and as they echoed on the Northern home front. Even as pressure for emancipation grew in the spring of 1862, Lincoln continued to urge gradual, compensated emancipation. The compensation would be to slaveholders for property lost, not to slaves for labor stolen. In late September 1862, even while announcing that he would proclaim emancipation on January 1 if the rebellious states did not return to the Union, he again called for gradual, compensated emancipation in the border states and compensation for loyal slaveholders elsewhere. The preliminary emancipation proclamation also reiterated his support for colonizing freed slaves "upon this continent or elsewhere."[15] While some pressed for the enlistment of black soldiers, Lincoln doubted the capacity of black men for military service, fearing that former slaves would simply turn their guns over to their old masters.

As black laborers became essential to the Union war effort and as demands to enlist black men in the Federal army mounted, the pressure for emancipation became inexorable. By the summer of 1862, Lincoln understood the importance of the sable arm as well as any. On July 12, making yet another plea for gradual, compensated emancipation in the Union's own slave states, Lincoln bluntly warned border-state congressmen that slavery was doomed "by mere friction and abrasion — by the mere incidents of the war," and that it would be impossible to restore the Union with slavery in place.[16] Ignored once again, Lincoln acted on his own advice. In late July 1862, five days after signing the Second Confiscation and the Militia acts, he issued an executive order translating the new legislation into instructions for the Union army and navy. He authorized military commanders operating in the seceded states to "seize and use any property, real or personal, which may be necessary or convenient for . . . military purposes," and he instructed them to "employ as laborers . . . so many persons of African descent as can be advantageously used for military and naval purposes." Although he also reiterated the customary injunctions against wanton or malicious destruction of private property, there was no mistaking the import of Lincoln's order.[17]

Lincoln had decided to act. On July 22, he informed the cabinet of his intention to issue a proclamation of general emancipation. The slaves' determination had indeed made every policy short of emancipation untenable.[18] . . .

---

[15]U.S. Statutes at Large, 12 (Washington, D.C.: GPO, 1863): 1267–68.

[16]Lincoln, Collected Works, 5:317–19, quotation on p. 318.

[17]Lincoln's executive order, dated July 22, 1862, was promulgated to the armies in the field by a War Department order dated August 16. OR, ser. 3, 2:397.

[18]As Lincoln later put it, "No human power can subdue this rebellion without using the Emancipation lever as I have done." Lincoln, Collected Works, 7:499–502, 506–8, quotation on p. 507.

On January 1, 1863, Lincoln fulfilled his promise to free all slaves in the states still in rebellion. Had another Republican been in Lincoln's place, that person doubtless would have done the same. Without question, some would have acted more expeditiously and with greater bravado. Without question, some would have acted more cautiously and with lesser resolve. In the end, Lincoln did what needed to be done. Others might be left behind; Lincoln would not. It does no disservice to Lincoln — or to anyone else — to say that his claim to greatness rests upon his willingness to act when the moment was right.

When Lincoln finally acted, he moved with confidence and determination. He stripped the final Emancipation Proclamation of any reference to compensation for former slaveholders or colonization for former slaves.[19] He added provisions that allowed for the service of black men in the Union army and navy. The Proclamation opened the door to the eventual enlistment of more than 179,000 black men, most of them former slaves. More than anything else, the enlistment of black men, slave as well as free, transformed the Federal army into an army of liberation. At war's end, the number of black men in Federal uniform was larger than the number of soldiers in Lee's Army of Northern Virginia. Military enlistment became the surest solvent of slavery, extending to places the Emancipation Proclamation did not reach, especially the loyal slave states. Once slave men entered the Union army, they were free and they made it clear that they expected their families to be free as well. In March 1865, Congress confirmed this understanding and provided for the freedom of the immediate families of all black soldiers. Lincoln's actions, however tardy, gave force to all that the slaves had risked. The Emancipation Proclamation transformed the war in ways only the president could. After January 1, 1863, the Union army marched for freedom, and Lincoln was its commander.[20]

Lincoln understood the importance of his role, both politically and morally — just as the slaves had understood theirs.[21] Having determined to free the slaves, Lincoln declared he would not take back the Emancipation Proclamation even when military failure and political reversals threatened that policy. He repudiated his misgivings

---

[19]Lincoln, who had declared in his second annual message to Congress, "I cannot make it better known than it already is, that I strongly favor colonization," never made another public appeal for the scheme. Don E. Fehrenbacher, "Only His Stepchildren: Lincoln and the Negro," Civil War History 30 (1974): 308.

[20]At times, McPherson appears to argue that the preeminence of Lincoln's role in the process of emancipation derived from the simple fact that he was the Republican candidate, wartime president, and commander in chief of the Union army, for freedom could not be achieved without Southern secession, civil war, and Union victory. If that is the pith of the case, it is easy enough to concede. Indeed, the first sentence of The Black Military Experience asserts: "Freedom came to most American slaves only through force of arms."

[21]Although he makes no case for the slaves' role in emancipation, Don Fehrenbacher reaches a similar conclusion respecting Lincoln's role. "Emancipation itself, as [Lincoln] virtually acknowledged, came out of the logic of events, not his personal volition, but the time and manner of its coming were largely his choice." "Only His Stepchildren," 306.

about the military abilities of black soldiers and became one of their great supporters. Lincoln praised the role of black soldiers in preserving the Union and ending chattel bondage and vowed not to "betray" them. The growing presence of black men in the Union army deepened Lincoln's commitment to emancipation. "There have been men who proposed to me to return to slavery the black warriors of Port Hudson & Olustee to . . . conciliate the South," Lincoln reflected in August 1864. "I should be damned in time & in eternity for doing so."[22] Lincoln later suggested that black soldiers might have the vote, perhaps his greatest concession to racial equality.[23] To secure the freedom that his proclamation had promised, Lincoln pressed for the final liquidation of slavery in the Union's own slave states where diehards obstructed and delayed. To that end and to write freedom into the nation's highest charter, Lincoln promoted passage of the Thirteenth Amendment, although he did not live to see its ratification.

The Emancipation Proclamation's place in the drama of emancipation is thus secure — as is Lincoln's. To deny it is to ignore the intense struggle by which freedom arrived. It is to ignore the Union soldiers who sheltered slaves, the abolitionists who stumped for emancipation, and the thousands of men and women who, like Lincoln, changed their minds as slaves made the case for universal liberty. Reducing the Emancipation Proclamation to a nullity and Lincoln to a cipher denies human agency just as personifying emancipation in a larger-than-life Great Emancipator denies the agency of the slaves and many others, and trivializes the process by which the slaves were freed. And, as in many other cases, process is critical. . . .

Emphasizing that emancipation was not the work of one hand underscores the force of contingency, the crooked course by which universal freedom arrived. It captures the ebb and flow of events which, at times, placed Lincoln among the opponents of emancipation and then propelled him to the forefront of freedom's friends. It emphasizes the clash of wills that is the essence of politics, whether it involves enfranchised legislators or voteless slaves. Politics, perforce, necessitates an on-the-ground struggle among different interests, not the unfolding of a single idea or perspective, whether that of an individual or an age. Lincoln, no less than the meanest slave, acted upon changing possibilities as he understood them. The very same events — secession and war — that gave the slaves' actions new meaning also gave Lincoln's actions new meaning. To think that Lincoln could have anticipated these changes — or, more strangely still, somehow embodied them — imbues him with a power over the course of events that no human being has ever enjoyed. Lincoln was part of history, not above it. Whatever he believed about slavery in 1861, Lincoln did not see the war as an instrument of emancipation.[24] The slaves did. Lincoln's commitment to emancipation changed with time because it had to. The slaves' commitment to universal freedom never wavered because it could not.

---

[22]Lincoln, Collected Works, 7:499–502, 506–8, quotation on p. 507.

[23]"I barely suggest for your private consideration," Lincoln wrote to the Unionist governor of Louisiana in March 1864, "whether some of the colored people may not be let in [to the suffrage] — as, for instance, the very intelligent, and especially those who have fought gallantly in our ranks. They would probably help," he added, "in some trying times to come, to keep the jewel of liberty within the family of freedom." Lincoln, Collected Works, 7:243.

Complexity — contrary to McPherson — is not ambivalence or ambiguity. To tell the whole story, to follow that crooked course, does not diminish the clarity of an argument or mystify it into a maze of "nuance, paradox, or irony." Telling the entire tale is not a form of obfuscation. If done right, it clarifies precisely because it consolidates the mass of competing claims under a single head. Elegance or simplicity of argument is useful only when it encompasses all of the evidence, not when it excludes or narrows it.

In the perennial tests in which constituted authority searches for the voice of the people and when the people are testing the measure of their leaders, it is well to recall the relationship of both to securing freedom's greatest victory. In this sense, slaves were right in celebrating January 1, 1863, as the Day of Jubilee. As Loretta Hanes noted 130 years later, "It meant so much to people because it was a ray of light, the hope of a new day coming. And it gave them courage."[25] Indeed, the Emancipation Proclamation reminds all — both those viewing its faded pages and those studying it — that real change derives both from the actions of the people and from the imprimatur of constituted authority. It teaches that "social" history is no less political than "political" history, for it too rests upon the bending of wills, which is the essence of politics, and that no political process is determined by a single individual. If the Emancipation Proclamation speaks to the central role of constituted authority — in the person of Abraham Lincoln — in making history, it speaks no less loudly to the role of ordinary men and women, seizing the moment to make the world according to their own understanding of justice and human decency. The connection between the two should not be forgotten.

(1997)

---

[24]If there is a tendency in one brand of social history to emphasize the agency of the disfranchised, there is a similar tendency in one brand of political history to emphasize the omnipotence and clairvoyance of the great leader. The hero sees farthest, first. While combating the former fallacy, McPherson succumbs to the latter. From the beginning of the war, McPherson maintains, "Lincoln demurred from turning the war for Union into a war for slavery because the war for Union united Northern people while premature emancipation would divide them and lose the war." Lincoln, in other words, understood the Civil War as a struggle for emancipation from the beginning. He waited, however, for the right moment to spring the news on those not quite as farseeing. "With an acute sense of timing," McPherson continues, "Lincoln first proclaimed emancipation only as a means to win the war (to gain moderate and conservative support) and ultimately as an end — to give America 'a new birth of freedom,' as Lincoln said at Gettysburg."

[25]USA Today, Dec. 30, 1992.

Questions

1. How does Ira Berlin characterize Abraham Lincoln in the first four paragraphs of his piece?
2. Berlin writes, "The slaves' determination had indeed made every policy short of emancipation untenable" (par. 22). What is Berlin implying? What claim does this statement support?
3. Berlin quotes extensively from Lincoln. Select two direct quotations. How effectively does Berlin use them to support his position? Explain.
4. Analyze the argument that Berlin makes in paragraph 23. How convincing is it? Explain.
5. What is the relationship between footnotes 16 through 18 and the text of paragraphs 21 and 22? How do they contribute to Berlin's argument? Be specific.
6. What is the rhetorical purpose of paragraph 26? How does it relate to Berlin's overall argument? Explain.

The Gettysburg PowerPoint Presentation

Peter Norvig

A director of research at Google, Inc., Peter Norvig put together a PowerPoint version of the Gettysburg Address. It was published in the June/July 2003 issue of American Heritage magazine.

Permission is granted to use this presentation in any course or educational presentation.

Agenda

- Met on battlefield (great)
- Dedicate portion of field - fitting!
- Unfinished work (great tasks)

11/19/1863

Not on Agenda!

- Dedicate
- Consecrate
- Hallow
  (in narrow sense)
- Add or detract
- Note or remember what we say

11/19/1863

Review of Key Objectives & Critical Success Factors

- What makes nation unique
  - Conceived in Liberty
  - Men are equal
- Shared vision
  - New birth of freedom
  - Gov't of/for/by the people

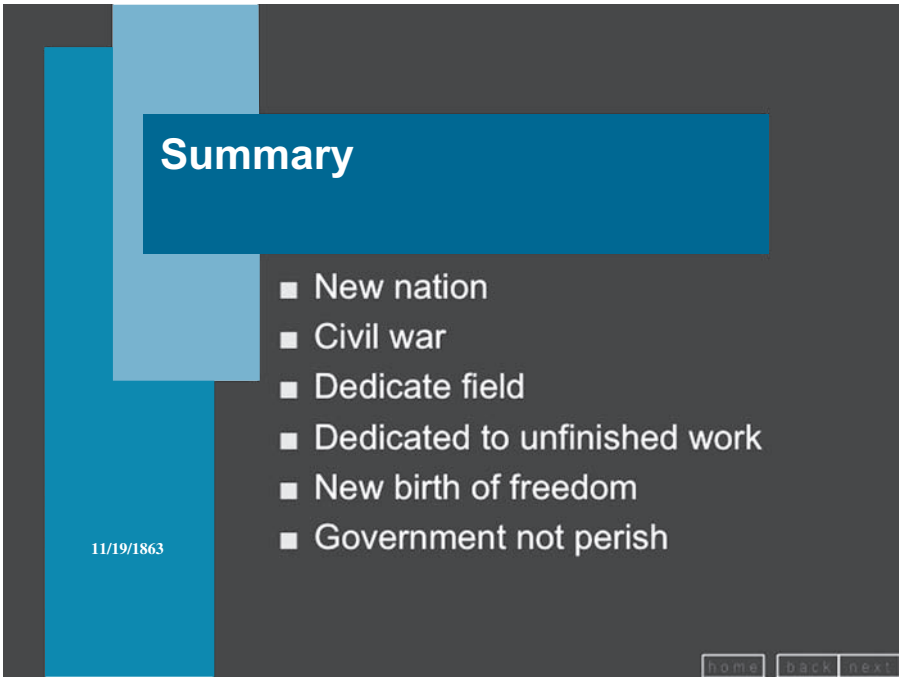
11/19/1863

home back next

Organizational Overview

11/19/1863

home back next



Questions

1. How would you describe Peter Norvig's tone in the text of Lincoln's introduction?
2. What is similar between the text of Lincoln's speech and that of Norvig's PowerPoint presentation? What is different?
3. What is your attitude toward Norvig's PowerPoint? What do you think is the attitude of the editors at American Heritage magazine? Explain.
4. Norvig describes the idea behind this text as follows: "How many of us have been frustrated at seeing too many presentations where PowerPoint or other visual aids obscure rather than enhance the point? After one too many bad presentations at a meeting in January 2000, I decided to see if I could do something about it. Back in my hotel room I imagined what Abe Lincoln might have done if he had used PowerPoint rather than the power of oratory at Gettysburg." Does he achieve his purpose? Does your experience with PowerPoint resemble Norvig's? Explain.

Making Connections

1. What themes and rhetorical features are shared by the four primary texts by Abraham Lincoln? How are they different? Which one is your favorite? Why?

2. Imagine that you are doing a presentation for your class (or for a middle-school class) about the Emancipation Proclamation and that you may include one visual as a slide. Which would you choose, the engraving by Henry W. Herrick (p. 697) or the sculpture by Thomas Ball (p. 698)? Compare and contrast the two and explain why you would choose one over the other.

3. This conversation includes two personal essays on Lincoln that were written more than a century apart, one by Frederick Douglass (p. 699), a former slave, and the other by Mario M. Cuomo (p. 703), then governor of New York State. Compare and contrast their views of Lincoln. Do they seem to be discussing the same man? Why or why not?

4. In his letter to Albert G. Hodges (p. 693), President Lincoln discusses his reasons for postponing emancipation. Ira Berlin (p. 715) discusses Lincoln's reasoning and criticizes his delay saying, "Where others led on emancipation, Lincoln followed" (par. 20). Considering what Lincoln himself says in his letter, evaluate Berlin's position.

5. Cuomo begins a number of his statements with words. Select two of those statements that appeal to you, and apply them to the texts that you have read by Lincoln. How does each of them serve as an illustration of Lincoln's words? Be specific as you explain.

6. Analyze and evaluate Berlin's argument in response to James McPherson's (p. 706). How might McPherson respond to Berlin if the exchange were to continue?

7. Imagine that Douglass, Cuomo, McPherson, Berlin, and Lincoln were sitting in an auditorium watching Peter Norvig's PowerPoint presentation. What would their responses be?

8. In his 1992 book, Lincoln at Gettysburg: The Words That Remade America, historian Garry Wills says of Lincoln's second inaugural address that it "complements and completes the Gettysburg Address" (which Wills regards as Lincoln's finest). He contends that the second inaugural "is the only speech worthy to stand with it." Historian Ronald C. White Jr., in his 2002 book, Lincoln's Greatest Speech, the Second Inaugural, claims that Lincoln himself considered the latter speech his best and writes, "For too long the Second Inaugural Address has lived within the shadow of the Gettysburg Address." Who is right? Do you agree with Wills or with White? Defend the position of one of these historians, using the texts of both speeches and your knowledge of American history.

Entering the Conversation

As you respond to each of the following prompts, support your position with appropriate evidence, including at least three sources in this Conversation on Abraham Lincoln, unless otherwise indicated.

1. In his annual remarks to Congress on December 1, 1862, a month before the Emancipation Proclamation, Abraham Lincoln said: "We know how to save the Union. The world knows we do know how to save it. We — even we here — hold the power, and bear the responsibility. In giving freedom to the slave, we assure freedom to the free, — honorable alike in what we give, and what we preserve. We shall nobly save, or meanly lose, the last best hope of earth." Write an essay that supports this claim.

In 1880 in the North American Review, James C. Welling wrote, "It was a day of elemental stir, and the ground is still quaking beneath our feet, under the throes and convulsions of that great social and political change which was first definitely foreshadowed to the world by the Emancipation Proclamation of Abraham Lincoln." It might be said that "the ground is still quaking" under our feet today. Write an essay that examines the extent to which Welling's statement still applies to our time.

2. Do you agree, as Cuomo (p. 703) states, that the work Lincoln inspires us to do is "unfinished"? Write an essay that explores Cuomo's idea.

3. View the 2012 film Lincoln, produced and directed by Steven Spielberg. Compare how Abraham Lincoln is depicted in the film with how he is depicted in the sources in this Conversation.

4. President Lincoln preserved the Union. President Lincoln freed the slaves. Was Abraham Lincoln a visionary who strove to ensure for all Americans, white and black alike, what the Declaration of Independence promised? Was he a great and dutiful statesman and politician who took the pragmatic route to save the Union at all costs? There are those who see Lincoln as the Great Emancipator (of slaves) and those who see him as the Great Preserver (of the Union). Write an essay that defends or qualifies one of those positions.

Read "O Captain! My Captain!" (p. 659), a poem about Abraham Lincoln by Walt Whitman. Write an essay that discusses and evaluates Whitman's view of Lincoln, referring to several texts in this Conversation. You might also read "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd," another Whitman poem about Lincoln.

5. In paragraph 9 of "Abraham Lincoln and Our 'Unfinished Work'" (p. 703), Cuomo writes, "The old bigotries seem to be dying." Do you agree? What are the "old bigotries"? Are there new bigotries as well? How can the example of Abraham Lincoln and his legacy help guide us past new bigotries as well as old?

Conversation

John Brown: Patriot or Terrorist?

John Brown (1800–1859) was born into a deeply religious family in Connecticut and moved to Ohio when he was five. He made his living variously as a farmer, tanner, and land speculator; he fathered six children with his first wife, who died in childbirth, and thirteen with his second. He was always a committed abolitionist who, despite significant financial difficulties, contributed to antislavery causes, gave land to fugitive slaves, and participated in the Underground Railroad. In his fifties, he and five of his sons went to Kansas to fight pro-slavery forces. During what became known as the Pottawatomie Massacre and the Battle of Osawatomie, Brown assumed the role of abolitionist leader and led violent attacks against proponents of slavery. When he returned from Kansas, he began raising money to support his plan to free slaves in Virginia. On October 16, 1859, at Harpers Ferry, Virginia, Brown led a raid on the federal arsenal, motivated by his belief that the system of slavery could only be overthrown by arming the slaves themselves. Many of the twenty-one men with him were captured or killed, including two of his sons, and Brown was imprisoned, tried, and hanged within a few months.

Whether the raid at Harpers Ferry can be said to have caused the Civil War is a matter of continuing debate, but there is strong agreement that it was a catalyst. John Brown's often-quoted last words predicted the brutal conflict that followed: "I, John Brown, am now quite certain that the crimes of this guilty land can never be purged away but with blood." From the beginning, responses to Brown have been polarized, from Southern denunciations of him as a deranged zealot to Northern endorsements of him as a heroic prophet. African American leaders, including Frederick Douglass, eulogized him; poets, such as Langston Hughes and Robert Hayden, memorialized him; and W. E. B. DuBois wrote a laudatory biography. Nonetheless, the violence of his methods — despite an indisputably noble cause — has been called into question, and the accusations, particularly after September 11, 2001, that he was a "terrorist" have intensified the controversy surrounding his reputation and legacy more than 150 years after his death.

Sources

John Brown, Last Speech (1859)
John Brown, Last Letter to His Family (1859)
Frances Ellen Watkins Harper, Letter to John Brown (1859)
Henry David Thoreau, from A Plea for Captain John Brown (1859)
Thomas Hovenden, The Last Moments of John Brown (c. 1882)
Ken Chowder, The Father of American Terrorism (2000)
Robert E. McGlone, The "Madness" of John Brown (2009)
David Reynolds, Freedom's Martyr (2009)
Tony Horowitz, The 9/11 of 1859 (2009)

Last Speech

John Brown

John Brown gave this speech at the conclusion of his trial, about a month before his execution in Charlestown, West Virginia.

I have, may it please the Court, a few words to say.

In the first place, I deny everything but what I have all along admitted, of a design on my part to free the slaves. I intended certainly to have made a clean thing of that matter, as I did last winter, when I went into Missouri and there took slaves without the snapping of a gun on either side, moved them through the country, and finally left them in Canada. I designed to have done the same thing again, on a larger scale. That was all I intended. I never did intend murder, or treason, or the destruction of property, or to excite or incite slaves to rebellion, or to make insurrection.

I have another objection; and that is, it is unjust that I should suffer such a penalty. Had I interfered in the manner which I admit, and which I admit has been fairly proved (for I admire the truthfulness and candor of the greater portion of the witnesses who have testified in this case), — had I so interfered in behalf of the rich, the powerful, the intelligent, the so-called great, or in behalf of any of their friends, — either father, mother, brother, sister, wife, or children, or any of that class, — and suffered and sacrificed what I have in this interference, it would have been all right; and every man in this court would have deemed it an act worthy of reward rather than punishment.

This court acknowledges, as I suppose, the validity of the law of God. I see a book kissed here which I suppose to be the Bible, or at least the New Testament. That teaches me that all things whatsoever I would that men should do to me, I should do even so to them. It teaches me, further, to "remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them." I endeavored to act up to that instruction. I say, I am yet too young to understand that God is any respecter of persons. I believe that to have interfered as I have done — in behalf of His despised poor, was not wrong, but right. Now, if it is deemed necessary that I should forfeit my life for the furtherance of the ends of justice, and mingle my blood further with the blood of my children and with the blood of millions in this slave country whose rights are disregarded by wicked, cruel, and unjust enactments, — I submit; so let it be done!

Let me say one word further. 5

I feel entirely satisfied with the treatment I have received on my trial. Considering all the circumstances, it has been more generous than I expected. But I feel no consciousness of guilt. I have stated from the first what was my intention, and what was not. I never have had any design against the life of any person, nor any disposition to commit treason, or excite slaves to rebel, or make any general insurrection. I never encouraged any man to do so, but always discouraged any idea of that kind.

Let me say, also, a word in regard to the statements made by some of those connected with me. I hear it has been stated by some of them that I have induced them to join me. But the contrary is true. I do not say this to injure them, but as regretting their weakness. There is not one of them but joined me of his own accord, and the greater part of them at their own expense. A number of them I never saw, and never had a word of conversation with, till the day they came to me; and that was for the purpose I have stated.

Now I have done.

(1859)

Questions

1. Clearly, John Brown knew his death sentence would not be changed; in fact, many argue that he wanted to die a martyr. What, then, is the chief purpose of this speech?
2. What does he mean by the phrase "a clean thing of that matter" (par. 2)?
3. In paragraph 3, Brown offers a series of qualifications ("Had I interfered . . . had I so interfered") to support an assertion. What is his point? Do you find his support sufficient for the claim?
4. In what ways does he call on religion? Does he refer to "the law of God" (par. 4) to justify his actions? Does he ask forgiveness from a higher power?
5. Which allegations does he admit to? Which does he deny?
6. What ethos does Brown establish in this speech? Cite specific words and images he uses to develop his persona.
7. How would you describe the tone of this speech?

Last Letter to His Family

John Brown

Brown wrote the following letter to his children and second wife from Charlestown Prison two days before his execution.

Charlestown, Prison, Jefferson Co. Va. 30th Nov. 1859

My Dearly beloved Wife, Sons: & Daughters, every one

As I now begin what is probably the last letter I shall ever write to any of you; I conclude to write you all at the same time. I will mentions [sic] some little matters particularly applicable to little property concerns in another place. I yesterday received a letter from my wife from near Philadelphia: dated Nov 27th, by which it would seem that she has about given up the idea of seeing me again. I had written her to come on; if she felt equal to the undertaking; but I do not know as she will get my letter in time. It was on her own account chiefly that I asked her to stay back at first. I had a most strong desire to see her again; but there appeared to be very serious objections; & should we never meet in this life; I trust she will in the end be satisfied it was for the best at least; if not most for her comfort. I enclosed in my last letter to her a Draft of $50, Fifty Dollars from John Jay made payable to her order. I have now another to send her from my excellent old friend Edward Harris of Woonsocket Rhode Island for $100, One Hundred Dollars; which I shall also make payable to her order. I am writing the hour of my public murder with great composure of mind, & cheerfulness; feeling the strongest assurance that in no other possible way could I be used to so much advance the cause of God; & of humanity; & that nothing that either I or all my family have sacrifised or suffered: will be lost. The reflection that a wise, & merciful, as well as Just, & holy God: rules not only the affairs of this world; but of all worlds; is a rock to set our feet upon; under all circumstances; even those more severely trying ones: into which our own follies; & [w]rongs have placed us. I have now no doubt but that our seeming disaster: will ultimately result in the most glorious success. So my dear shattered; & broken family; be of good cheer; & believe & trust in God; "with all your heart; & with all your soul; for he doeth All things well." Do not feel ashamed on my account; nor for one moment despair of the cause; or grow weary of well doing. I bless God; I never felt stronger confidence in the certain & near approach of a bright Morning; & glorious day; then I have felt; & do now feel; since my confinement here. I am endeavouring to "return" like a "poor Prodigal" as I am; to my Father: against whom I have always sined [sic]: in the hope; that he may kindly, & forgivingly "meet me: though; a verry [sic] great way off." Oh my dear Wife & Children would "to God" you could know how I have been "traveling in birth for you" all; that no one of you "may fail of the grace of God, through Jesus Christ": that no one of you may be blind to the truth: & glorious "light of his word"; in which Life; & Immortality; are brought to light." I beseech you every one to make the bible your dayly [sic] & Nightly study; with a childlike honest, candid, teachable spirit: out of love and respect for your Husband; & Father: & I beseech the God of my Fathers; to open all your eyes to a discovery of the truth. You cannot imagine how much you may soon need the consolations of the Christian religion.

Circumstances like my own; for more than a month past; convince me beyound [sic] all doubt of our great need: of something more to rest our hopes on; than merely our own vague theories framed up, while our prejudices are excited; or our Vanity worked up to its highest pitch. Oh do not trust your eternal all uppon [sic] the boisterous Ocean, without even a Helm; or Compass to aid you in steering. I do not ask any of you; to throw away your reason: I only ask you, to make a candid, & sober use of your reason: My dear younger children will you listen to this last poor admonition of one who can only love you? Oh be determined at once to give your whole hearts to God; & let nothing shake; or alter; that resolution. You need have no fear of REGRETING [sic] it. Do not be in vain; and thoughtless: but sober minded. And let me entreat you all to love the whole remnant of our once great family: "with a pure heart fervently." Try to build again: your broken walls: & to make the utmost of every stone that is left. Nothing can so tend to make life a blessing as the consciousness that you love; & are beloved: & "love ye the stranger" still. It is a ground of the utmost comfort to my mind: to know that so many of you as have had the opportunity; have given full proof of your fidelity to the great family of man. Be faithful until death. From the exercise of habitual love to man: it cannot be very hard: to learn to love his maker. I must yet insert a reason for my firm belief in the Divine inspiration of the Bible: notwithstanding I am (perhaps naturally) skeptical. (certainly not, credulous.) I wish you all to consider it most thoroughly; when you read that blessed book; & see whether you can not discover such evidence yourselves. It is the purity of heart, feeling, or motive: as well as word, & action which is every where insisted on; that distinguish it from all other teachings; that commends it to my conscience: whether my heart be "willing, & obedient" or not. The inducements that it holds out; are another reason of my conviction or its truth: & genuineness; that I cannot here omit; in this my last argument, for the Bible Eternal life: is that my soul is "panting after" this moment. I mention this; as reason for endeavouring to leave a valuable copy of the Bible to be carefully preserved in remembrance of me: to so many of my posterity; instead of some other thing: of equal cost. I beseech you all to live in habitual contentment with verry [sic] moderate circumstances: & gains, of worldly store: & most earnestly to teach this: to your children; & Childrens, Children; after you: by example: as well: as precept. Be determined to know by experience as soon as may be: whether bible instruction is of Divine origin or not; which says; "Owe no man anything but to love one another." John Rogers wrote to his children, "Abhor that arrant whore of Rome." John Brown writes to his children to abhor with undiing hatred, also: that "sum of all vilanies;" Slavery. Remember that "he that is slow to anger is better than the mighty: and he that ruleth his spirit; than he that taketh a city." Remember also: that "they that be wise shall shine: and they that turn many to righteousness: as the stars forever; & ever." And now dearly beloved Farewell To God & the word of his grace I comme[n]d you all.

Your Affectionate Husband & Father, John Brown
(1859)

Questions

1. In this letter, John Brown writes to his entire immediate family rather than to any one individual, even his wife. How does this collective audience influence the content of his letter?
2. What point is Brown making in this sentence: "Circumstances like my own; for more than a month past; convince me . . . Vanity worked up to its highest pitch" (par. 2)?
3. Brown frames much of this letter in terms of the teachings and "the consolations of the Christian religion" (par. 1). Which elements does he emphasize?
4. What practical advice does he impart in the letter?
5. What warnings does he make?
6. How would you define the legacy Brown wishes to pass on to his children?

Letter to John Brown

Frances Ellen Watkins Harper

Frances Ellen Watkins Harper (1825–1911) was the author of many poems, including "Bury Me in a Free Land" (1858), and the novel Iola Leroy (1892). Born to free parents in Baltimore, she taught at Union Seminary in Wilberforce, Ohio, and was a popular lecturer for the American Anti-Slavery Society. After the raid on Harpers Ferry, she wrote letters and raised money on behalf of the captured men and their families. The following open letter was published in a number of newspapers and was reputedly smuggled into Brown's prison cell.

Kendalville, Indiana, Nov. 25.

Dear Friend: Although the hands of Slavery throw a barrier between you and me, and it may not be my privilege to see you in your prison-house, Virginia has no bolts or bars through which I dread to send you my sympathy. In the name of the young girl sold from the warm clasp of a mother's arms to the clutches of a libertine or a profligate, — in the name of the slave mother, her heart rocked to and fro by the agony of her mournful separations, — I thank you, that you have been brave enough to reach out your hands to the crushed and blighted of my race. You have rocked the bloody Bastile; and I hope that from your sad fate great good may arise to the cause of freedom. Already from your prison has come a shout of triumph against the giant sin of our country. The hemlock is distilled with victory when it is pressed to the lips of Socrates. The Cross becomes a glorious ensign when Calvary's pale-browed sufferer yields up his life upon it. And, if Universal Freedom is ever to be the dominant power of the land, your bodies may be only her first stepping stones to dominion. I would prefer to see Slavery go down peaceably by men breaking off their sins by righteousness and their iniquities by showing justice and mercy to the poor; but we cannot tell what the future may bring forth. God writes national judgments upon national sins; and what may be slumbering in the storehouse of divine justice we do not know. We may earnestly hope that your fate will not be a vain lesson, that it will intensify our hatred of Slavery and love of freedom, and that your martyr grave will be a sacred altar upon which men will record their vows of undying hatred to that system which tramples on man and bids defiance to God. I have written to your dear wife, and sent her a few dollars, and I pledge myself to you that I will continue to assist her. May the ever-blessed God shield you and your fellow-prisoners in the darkest hours. Send my sympathy to your fellow-prisoners; tell them to be of good courage; to seek a refuge in the Eternal God, and lean upon His everlasting arms for a sure support. If any of them, like you, have a wife or children that I can help, let them send me word. . . .

Yours in the cause of freedom,

F. E. W.
(1859)

Questions

1. What ethos does Frances Ellen Watkins Harper establish in the first two sentences? Cite specific language and images to support your response.
2. What does she mean with her allusion to Socrates in this sentence: "The hemlock is distilled with victory when it is pressed to the lips of Socrates"?
3. What is the likely effect of Harper's religious references — both on Brown and on the readers at the time?
4. How does Harper characterize the violent methods of Brown's raid on Harpers Ferry?
5. What is (or are) the purpose(s) of Harper's letter?

from A Plea for Captain John Brown

Henry David Thoreau

Henry David Thoreau delivered this speech in Concord, Massachusetts, two weeks after the raid on Harpers Ferry in 1859. His unequivocal defense and admiration of Brown stood against popular opinion of the time, much of it mirroring the characterization by the abolitionist newspaper the Liberator as "a misguided, wild, and apparently insane effort." The following excerpt is the final third of the speech.

"All is quiet at Harper's Ferry," say the journals. What is the character of that calm which follows when the law and the slaveholder prevail? I regard this event as a touchstone designed to bring out, with glaring distinctness, the character of this government. We needed to be thus assisted to see it by the light of history. It needed to see itself. When a government puts forth its strength on the side of injustice, as ours to maintain Slavery and kill the liberators of the slave, it reveals itself a merely brute force, or worse, a demoniacal force. It is the head of the Plug Uglies. It is more manifest than ever that tyranny rules. I see this government to be effectually allied with France and Austria in oppressing mankind. There sits a tyrant holding fettered four millions of slaves; here comes their heroic liberator. This most hypocritical and diabolical government looks up from its seat on the gasping four millions, and inquires with an assumption of innocence, "What do you assault me for? Am I not an honest man? Cease agitation on this subject, or I will make a slave of you, too, or else hang you."

We talk about a representative government; but what a monster of a government is that where the noblest faculties of the mind, and the whole heart, are not represented. A semi-human tiger or ox, stalking over the earth, with its heart taken out and the top of its brain shot away. Heroes have fought well on their stumps when their legs were shot off, but I never heard of any good done by such a government as that.

The only government that I recognize, — and it matters not how few are at the head of it, or how small its army, — is that power that establishes justice in the land, never that which establishes injustice. What shall we think of a government to which all the truly brave and just men in the land are enemies, standing between it and those whom it oppresses? A government that pretends to be Christian and crucifies a million Christs every day!

Treason! Where does such treason take its rise? I cannot help thinking of you as you deserve, ye governments. Can you dry up the fountains of thought? High treason, when it is resistance to tyranny here below, has its origin in, and is first committed by the power that makes and forever recreates man. When you have caught and hung all these human rebels, you have accomplished nothing but your own guilt, for you have not struck at the fountain head. You presume to contend with a foe against whom West Point cadets and rifled cannon point not. Can all the art of the cannon-founder tempt matter to turn against its maker? Is the form in which the founder thinks he casts it more essential than the constitution of it and of himself?

The United States have a coffle[1] of four millions of slaves. They are determined to keep them in this condition; and Massachusetts is one of the confederated overseers to prevent their escape. Such are not all the inhabitants of Massachusetts, but such are they who rule and are obeyed here. It was Massachusetts, as well as Virginia, that put down this insurrection at Harper's Ferry. She sent the marines there, and she will have to pay the penalty of her sin. 5

Suppose that there is a society in this State that out of its own purse and magnanimity saves all the fugitive slaves that run to us, and protects our colored fellow-citizens, and leaves the other work to the Government, so-called. Is not that government fast losing its occupation, and becoming contemptible to mankind? If private men are obliged to perform the offices of government, to protect the weak and dispense justice, then the government becomes only a hired man, or clerk, to perform menial or indifferent services. Of course, that is but the shadow of a government whose existence necessitates a Vigilant Committee. What should we think of the oriental Cadi[2] even, behind whom worked in secret a vigilant committee? But such is the character of our Northern States generally; each has its Vigilant Committee. And, to a certain extent, these crazy governments recognize and accept this relation. They say, virtually, "We'll be glad to work for you on these terms, only don't make a noise about it." And thus the government, its salary being insured, withdraws into the back shop, taking the constitution with it, and bestows most of its labor on repairing that. When I hear it at work sometimes, as I go by, it reminds me, at best, of those farmers who in winter contrive to turn a penny by following the coopering business. And what kind of spirit is their barrel made to hold? They speculate in stocks, and bore holes in mountains, but they are not competent to lay out even a decent highway. The only free road, the Underground Railroad, is owned and managed by the Vigilant Committee. They have tunnelled under the whole breadth of the land. Such a government is losing its power and respectability as surely as water runs out of a leaky vessel, and is held by one that can contain it.

---

[1]A group chained in a line — usually referring to animals, prisoners, or slaves. — Eds.
[2]A Muslim judge who rules based on Islamic religious law. Also spelled Qadi. — Eds.

I hear many condemn these men because they were so few. When were the good and the brave ever in a majority? Would you have had him wait till that time came? — till you and I came over to him? The very fact that he had no rabble or troop of hirelings about him, would alone distinguish him from ordinary heroes. His company was small indeed, because few could be found worthy to pass muster. Each one who there laid down his life for the poor and oppressed was a picked man, culled out of many thousands, if not millions; apparently a man of principle, of rare courage and devoted humanity; ready to sacrifice his life at any moment for the benefit of his fellow-man. It may be doubted if there were as many more their equals in these respects in all the country — I speak of his followers only — for their leader, no doubt, scoured the land far and wide, seeking to swell his troop. These alone were ready to step between the oppressor and the oppressed. Surely they were the very best men you could select to be hung. That was the greatest compliment which this country could pay them. They were ripe for her gallows. She has tried a long time, she has hung a good many, but never found the right one before.

When I think of him, and his six sons, and his son-in-law, — not to enumerate the others, — enlisted for this fight, proceeding coolly, reverently, humanely to work, for months, if not years, sleeping and waking upon it, summering and wintering the thought, without expecting any reward but a good conscience, while almost all America stood ranked on the other side, I say again, that it affects me as a sublime spectacle. If he had had any journal advocating "his cause," any organ, as the phrase is, monotonously and wearisomely playing the same old tune, and then passing round the bat, it would have been fatal to his efficiency. If he had acted in any way so as to be let alone by the government, he might have been suspected. It was the fact that the tyrant must give place to him, or he to the tyrant, that distinguished him from all the reformers of the day that I know.

It was his peculiar doctrine that a man has a perfect right to interfere by force with the slaveholder, in order to rescue the slave. I agree with him. They who are continually shocked by slavery have some right to be shocked by the violent death of the slaveholder, but no others. Such will be more shocked by his life than by his death. I shall not be forward to think him mistaken in his method who quickest succeeds to liberate the slave. I speak for the slave when I say, that I prefer the philanthropy of Captain Brown to that philanthropy which neither shoots me nor liberates me. At any rate, I do not think it is quite sane for one to spend his whole life in talking or writing about this matter, unless he is continuously inspired, and I have not done so. A man may have other affairs to attend to. I do not wish to kill nor to be killed, but I can foresee circumstances in which both these things would be by me unavoidable. We preserve the so-called peace of our community by deeds of petty violence every day. Look at the policeman's billy and handcuffs! Look at the jail! Look at the gallows! Look at the chaplain of the regiment! We are hoping only to live safely on the outskirts of this provisional army. So we defend ourselves and our hen-roosts, and maintain slavery. I know that the mass of my countrymen think that the only righteous use that can be made of Sharpe's rifles and revolvers is to fight duels with them, when we are insulted by other nations, or to hunt Indians, or shoot fugitive slaves with them, or the like. I think that for once the Sharpe's rifles and the revolvers were employed in a righteous cause. The tools were in the hands of one who could use them.

The same indignation that is said to have cleared the temple once will clear it again. The question is not about the weapon, but the spirit in which you use it. No man has appeared in America, as yet, who loved his fellow-man so well, and treated him so tenderly. He lived for him. He took up his life and he laid it down for him. What sort of violence is that which is encouraged, not by soldiers but by peaceable citizens, not so much by laymen as by ministers of the gospel, not so much by the fighting sects as by the Quakers, and not so much by Quaker men as by Quaker women? 10

This event advertises me that there is such a fact as death — the possibility of a man's dying. It seems as if no man had ever died in America before, for in order to die you must first have lived. I don't believe in the hearses, and palls, and funerals that they have had. There was no death in the case, because there had been no life; they merely rotted or sloughed off, pretty much as they had rotted or sloughed along. No temple's vail was rent, only a hole dug somewhere. Let the dead bury their dead. The best of them fairly ran down like a clock. Franklin — Washington — they were let off without dying; they were merely missing one day. I hear a good many pretend that they are going to die; or that they have died, for aught that I know. Nonsense! I'll defy them to do it. They haven't got life enough in them. They'll deliquesce[3] like fungi, and keep a hundred eulogists mopping the spot where they left off. Only half a dozen or so have died since the world began. Do you think that you are going to die, sir? No! there's no hope of you. You haven't got your lesson yet. You've got to stay after school. We make a needless ado about capital punishment — taking lives, when there is no life to take. Memento mori![4] We don't understand that sublime sentence which some worthy got sculptured on his gravestone once. We've interpreted it in a grovelling and snivelling sense; we've wholly forgotten how to die.

But be sure you do die, nevertheless. Do your work, and finish it. If you know how to begin, you will know when to end.

These men, in teaching us how to die, have at the same time taught us how to live. If this man's acts and words do not create a revival, it will be the severest possible satire on the acts and words that do. It is the best news that America has ever heard. It has already quickened the feeble pulse of the North, and infused more and more generous blood into her veins and heart, than any number of years of what is called commercial and political prosperity could. How many a man who was lately contemplating suicide has now something to live for!

One writer says that Brown's peculiar monomania made him to be "dreaded by the Missourians as a supernatural being." Sure enough, a hero in the midst of us cowards is always so dreaded. He is just that thing. He shows himself superior to nature. He has a spark of divinity in him.

---

[3]Liquefy, specifically due to decomposition and decay. — Eds.

[4]Latin. "Remember you will die." An object or piece of art that reminds the audience of the inevitability of death. — Eds.

"Unless above himself he doth erect himself,
How poor a thing is man!"

Newspaper editors argue also that it is a proof of his insanity that he thought he 15 was appointed to do this work which he did — that he did not suspect himself for a moment! They talk as if it were impossible that a man could be "divinely appointed" in these days to do any work whatever; as if vows and religion were out of date as connected with any man's daily work, — as if the agent to abolish Slavery could only be somebody appointed by the President, or by some political party. They talk as if a man's death were a failure, and his continued life, be it of whatever character, were a success.

When I reflect to what a cause this man devoted himself, and how religiously, and then reflect to what cause his judges and all who condemn him so angrily and fluently devote themselves, I see that they are as far apart as the heavens and earth are asunder.

The amount of it is, our "leading men" are a harmless kind of folk, and they know well enough that they were not divinely appointed, but elected by the votes of their party.

Who is it whose safety requires that Captain Brown be hung? Is it indispensable to any Northern man? Is there no resource but to cast these men also to the Minotaur? If you do not wish it, say so distinctly. While these things are being done, beauty stands veiled and music is a screeching lie. Think of him — of his rare qualities! such a man as it takes ages to make, and ages to understand; no mock hero, nor the representative of any party. A man such as the sun may not rise upon again in this benighted land. To whose making went the costliest material, the finest adamant; sent to be the redeemer of those in captivity; and the only use to which you can put him is to hang him at the end of a rope! You who pretend to care for Christ crucified, consider what you are about to do to him who offered himself to be the saviour of four millions of men.

Any man knows when he is justified, and all the wits in the world cannot enlighten him on that point. The murderer always knows that he is justly punished; but when a government takes the life of a man without the consent of his conscience, it is an audacious government, and is taking a step towards its own dissolution. Is it not possible that an individual may be right and a government wrong? Are laws to be enforced simply because they were made? or declared by any number of men to be good, if they are not good? Is there any necessity for a man's being a tool to perform a deed of which his better nature disapproves? Is it the intention of law-makers that good men shall be hung ever? Are judges to interpret the law according to the letter, and not the spirit? What right have you to enter into a compact with yourself that you will do thus or so, against the light within you? Is it for you to make up your mind — to form any resolution whatever — and not accept the convictions that are forced upon you, and which ever pass your understanding? I do not believe in lawyers, in that mode of attacking or defending a man, because you descend to meet the judge on his own ground, and, in cases of the highest importance, it is of no consequence whether a man breaks a human law or not. Let lawyers decide trivial cases. Business men may arrange that among themselves. If they were the interpreters of the everlasting laws which rightfully bind man, that would be another thing. A counterfeiting law-factory, standing half in a slave land and half in a free! What kind of laws for free men can you expect from that?

I am here to plead his cause with you. I plead not for his life, but for his character — his immortal life; and so it becomes your cause wholly, and is not his in the least. Some eighteen hundred years ago Christ was crucified; this morning, perchance, Captain Brown was hung. These are the two ends of a chain which is not without its links. He is not Old Brown any longer; he is an angel of light.

I see now that it was necessary that the bravest and humanest man in all the country should be hung. Perhaps he saw it himself. I almost fear that I may yet hear of his deliverance, doubting if a prolonged life, if any life, can do as much good as his death.

"Misguided"! "Garrulous"! "Insane"! Vindictive"! So ye write in your easy chairs, and thus he wounded responds from the floor of the Armory, clear as a cloudless sky, true as the voice of nature is: "No man sent me here; it was my own prompting and that of my Maker. I acknowledge no master in human form."

And in what a sweet and noble strain he proceeds, addressing his captors, who stand over him: "I think, my friends, you are guilty of a great wrong against God and humanity, and it would be perfectly right for any one to interfere with you so far as to free those you wilfully and wickedly hold in bondage."

And referring to his movement: "It is, in my opinion, the greatest service a man can render to God."

"I pity the poor in bondage that have none to help them; that is why I am here; not to gratify any personal animosity, revenge, or vindictive spirit. It is my sympathy with the oppressed and the wronged, that are as good as you, and as precious in the sight of God."

You don't know your testament when you see it.

"I want you to understand that I respect the rights of the poorest and weakest of colored people, oppressed by the slave power, just as much as I do those of the most wealthy and powerful."

"I wish to say, furthermore, that you had better, all you people at the South, prepare yourselves for a settlement of that question, that must come up for settlement sooner than you are prepared for it. The sooner you are prepared the better. You may dispose of me very easily. I am nearly disposed of now; but this question is still to be settled — this negro question, I mean; the end of that is not yet."

I foresee the time when the painter will paint that scene, no longer going to Rome for a subject; the poet will sing it; the historian record it; and, with the Landing of the Pilgrims and the Declaration of Independence, it will be the ornament of some future national gallery, when at least the present form of Slavery shall be no more here. We shall then be at liberty to weep for Captain Brown. Then, and not till then, we will take our revenge.

(1859)

Questions

1. In the opening six paragraphs, how does Henry David Thoreau characterize the government? How does he lead to his final statement, "Such a government is losing its power and respectability as surely as water runs out of a leaky vessel, and is held by one that can contain it" (par. 6)?
2. Why does Thoreau assert that hanging the men, including Brown, for their part in the raid was "the greatest compliment which this country could pay them" (par. 7)?
3. What point is Thoreau trying to make when he states, "I speak for the slave when I say, that I prefer the philanthropy of Captain Brown to that philanthropy which neither shoots me nor liberates me" (par. 9)?
4. Thoreau makes extensive references to the New Testament in this speech. How would these references likely appeal to the audience of his time?
5. Identify three accusations that had been leveled at Brown. How does Thoreau respond to each? How effective is he in challenging each?
6. What does Thoreau mean by this statement: "I am here to plead his cause with you. I plead not for his life, but for his character—his immortal life; and so it becomes your cause wholly, and is not his in the least" (par. 20)?
7. What is the reasoning that leads Thoreau to conclude that Brown's execution was "necessary" (par. 21)?
8. What is the effect Thoreau achieves by quoting Brown's own words so extensively in the last section of the speech?

The Last Moments of John Brown

Thomas Hovenden

An influential Irish painter of everyday scenes and human figures, Thomas Hovenden (1840–1895) was commissioned by New York businessman Robbins Battell to paint what became known as The Last Moments of John Brown (1882). This work, which is currently in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, inaugurated a series of paintings by Hovenden dealing with American history and culture, including Breaking Home Ties (1890), considered his masterwork.

Questions

1. How is Brown depicted in this painting? As a viewer of his "last moments" in this work, how would you remember him? Cite specific details to support your response.
2. What visual allusions do you find in the painting? What do they add to your interpretation?
3. Some believe that Thomas Hovenden read the following account that appeared in the New York Tribune on December 5, 1859:

Copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Image source: Art Resource, NY.

THOMAS HOVENDEN, THE LAST MOMENTS OF JOHN BROWN, C. 1882, OIL ON CANVAS, 77" × 66", METROPOLITAN MUSEUM OF ART, NEW YORK.
(See color insert, Image 25.)

> On leaving the Jail, John Brown had on his face an expression of calmness and serenity characteristic of the patriot who is about to die with a living consciousness that he is laying his life down for the good of his fellow-creatures. . . . As he stepped out of the door a black woman, with her little child in arms, stood near his way. The twain were of the despised race, for whose emancipation and elevation to the dig> nity of children of God, he was about to lay down his life. . . . He stopped for a moment in his course, stooped over, and, with the tenderness of one whose love is as broad as the brotherhood of man, kissed [the child] affectionately.

Even though historians doubt that the account is accurate (for example, civilians, such as the woman and baby, were not allowed in the area of Brown's hanging because of rumored plans for escape), how does Hovenden's painting capture the tone of the description?

The Father of American Terrorism

Ken Chowder

Ken Chowder is an award-winning filmmaker who wrote the documentary John Brown's Holy War. This article appeared in American Heritage magazine (February/March 2000); the following excerpt is the final section, which focuses on the raid on Harpers Ferry.

But what about that Harpers Ferry plan — a tiny band attacking the U.S. government, hoping to concoct a revolution that would carry across the South? Clearly that was crazy.

Elements on both the far left and the far right are at this moment vitally interested in his story.

Yes and no. If it was crazy, it was not unique. Dozens of people, often bearing arms, had gone South to rescue slaves. Secret military societies flourished on both sides, plotting to expand or destroy the system of slavery by force. Far from being the product of a singular cracked mind, the plan was similar to a number of others, including one by a Boston attorney named Lysander Spooner. James Horton, a leading African American history scholar, offers an interesting scenario. "Was Brown crazy to assume he could encourage slave rebellion? . . . Think about the possibility of Nat Turner well-armed, well-equipped. . . . Nat Turner might have done some pretty amazing things," Horton says. "It was perfectly rational and reasonable for John Brown to believe he could encourage slaves to rebel."

But the question of Brown's sanity still provokes dissension among experts. Was he crazy? "He was obsessed," Bruce Olds says, "he was fanatical, he was monomaniacal, he was a zealot, and . . . psychologically unbalanced." Paul Finkelman disagrees: Brown "is a bad tactician, he's a bad strategist, he's a bad planner, he's not a very good general — but he's not crazy."

Some believe that there is a very particular reason why Brown's reputation as a madman has clung to him. Russell Banks and James Horton make the same argument. "The reason white people think he was mad," Banks says, "is because he was a white man and he was willing to sacrifice his life in order to liberate black Americans." "We should be very careful," Horton says, "about assuming that a white man who is willing to put his life on the line for black people is, of necessity, crazy." 5

Perhaps it is reasonable to say this: A society where slavery exists is by nature one where human values are skewed. America before the Civil War was a violent society, twisted by slavery. Even sober and eminent people became firebrands. John Brown had many peculiarities of his own, but he was not outside his society; to a great degree, he represented it, in its many excesses.

The past, as always, continues to change, and the spinning of John Brown's story goes on today. The same events — the raid on Harpers Ferry or the Pottawatomie Massacre — are still seen in totally different ways. What is perhaps most remarkable is that elements at both the left and right ends of American society are at this moment vitally interested in the story of John Brown.

On the left is a group of historical writers and teachers called Allies for Freedom. This group believes that the truth about the Harpers Ferry raid has been buried by the conventions of history. Its informal leader, Jean Libby, author of John Brown Mysteries, says, "What we think is that John Brown was a black nationalist. His ultimate goal was the creation of an independent black nation." The Allies for Freedom believes, too, that far from being the folly of a lunatic, Brown's plan was not totally unworkable, that it came much closer to succeeding than historians have pictured. Libby thinks that many slaves and free blacks did join the uprising — perhaps as many as fifty. Why would history conceal the fact of active black participation in Harpers Ferry? "The South was anxious to cover up any indication that the raid might have been successful," Libby says, "so slaves would never again be tempted to revolt."

Go a good deal farther to the left, and there has long been admiration for John Brown. In 1975 the Weather Underground put out a journal called Osawatomie. In the late 1970s a group calling itself the John Brown Brigade engaged in pitched battles with the Ku Klux Klan; in one confrontation in Greensboro, North Carolina, in 1979, five members of the John Brown Brigade were shot and killed. Writers also continue to draw parallels between John Brown and virtually any leftist who uses political violence, including the Symbionese Liberation Army (the kidnappers of Patty Hearst in the 1970s), the Islamic terrorists who allegedly set off a bomb in the World Trade Center in Manhattan, and Ted Kaczynski, the Unabomber.

At the same time, John Brown is frequently compared to those at the far opposite 10 end of the political spectrum. Right-to-life extremists have bombed abortion clinics and murdered doctors; they have, in short, killed for a cause they believed in, just as John Brown did. Paul Hill was convicted of murdering a doctor who performed abortions; it was, Hill said, the Lord's bidding: "There's no question in my mind that it was what the Lord wanted me to do, to shoot John Britton to prevent him from killing unborn children." If that sounds quite like John Brown, it was no accident. From death row Hill wrote to the historian Dan Stowell that Brown's "example has and continues to serve as a source of encouragement to me. . . . Both of us looked to the scriptures for direction, [and] the providential similarities between the oppressive circumstances we faced and our general understandings of the appropriate means to deliver the oppressed have resulted in my being encouraged to pursue a path which is in many ways similar to his." Shortly before his execution Hill wrote that "the political impact of Brown's actions continues to serve as a powerful paradigm in my understanding of the potential effects the use of defensive force may have for the unborn."

Nor was the murder Hill committed the only right-wing violence that has been compared to Brown's. The Oklahoma City bombing in 1995 was a frontal attack on a U.S. government building, just like the Harpers Ferry raid. Antiabortion murders, government bombings, anarchist bombs in the mail — nearly every time political violence surfaces, it gets described in the press as a part of a long American tradition of terrorism, with John Brown as a precursor and hero, a founding father of principled violence.

He gets compared to anarchists, leftist revolutionaries, and right-wing extremists. The spinning of John Brown, in short, is still going strong. But what does that make him? This much, at least, is certain: John Brown is a vital presence for all sorts of people today. In February PBS's The American Experience is broadcasting a ninety-minute documentary about him. Russell Banks's novel Cloudsplitter was a critical success and a bestseller as well. On the verge of his two hundredth birthday (this May 9), John Brown is oddly present. Perhaps there is one compelling reason for his revival in this new millennium: perhaps the violent, excessive, morally torn society John Brown represents so aptly was not just his own antebellum America but this land, now.

(2000)

Questions

1. In the opening paragraphs, Ken Chowder discusses the debate over John Brown's sanity. What conclusion does he reach?
2. According to Chowder, how does "the left" in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries view Brown? How does "the right" view him?
3. Ultimately, why does Chowder believe that, on his two-hundredth birthday, Brown remains "oddly present" in the American consciousness?

from The "Madness" of John Brown

Robert E. McGlone

Associate professor of history at the University of Hawaii, Robert McGlone is the author of the biography John Brown's War against Slavery (2009). The selection that appears here was taken from an article in the Civil War Times in October 2009.

[A]s Brown himself understood, the claim that he was "insane" threatened the very meaning of his life. Thus at his trial he emphatically rejected an insanity plea to spare him from the hangman. When an Akron newspaperman telegraphed Brown's court-appointed attorneys in Richmond that insanity was prevalent in Brown's maternal family, Brown declared in court that he was "perfectly unconscious of insanity" in himself.

As Brown understood it, the "greatest and principal object" of his life — his quest to destroy slavery — would be seen as delusional if he were declared insane. The sacrifices he and his supporters had made would count for nothing. The deaths of his men and the bereavement of his wife would be doubly tragic and the attack on Harpers Ferry robbed of heroism, its purpose discredited.

In letters to his wife and children, Brown acknowledged that his raid had ended in a "calamity" or a "seeming disaster." But he urged them all to have faith and to feel no shame over his impending fate.

While his half brother Jeremiah helped gather affidavits supposedly attesting to Brown's "monomania," or single minded fixation on eradicating slavery, John's brother Frederick went on a lecture tour in his support. Neither Jeremiah nor anyone else in John Brown's large family renounced the raid.

When it comes to Brown's war against slavery, the question of his mental balance must nevertheless be addressed. By the time of the Harpers Ferry raid, some of his contemporaries had already begun to question his sanity. As they insisted, was not the raid itself evidence of an "unhinged" mind? Wasn't Brown "crazy" to suppose he could overthrow American slavery by commencing a movement on so grand a scale with just 21 active fighters? 5

No one can doubt that Brown sought to elevate the status of African Americans. Throughout his adult life, he conceived projects to help them gain entry into the privileged world of whites. As a youth he helped fugitive slaves on the Underground Railroad; as a prospering farmer and town builder, he proposed adopting black children and founding schools for them. In 1849 he moved his family to North Elba, N.Y., to teach fugitives how to maintain a farm.

He held a two-day convention in Canada to secure the participation of fugitive American blacks in his planned war on slavery. He wrote a declaration of independence on their behalf. He respected and raised money for "General" Harriet Tubman and called his friend Frederick Douglass "the first great national Negro leader." Yet to the extent that in his projects he envisioned himself as a mentor, leader, or commander in chief, Brown's embrace of egalitarianism was, paradoxically, paternalistic. He solicited support from blacks for the war against slavery but not their counsel in shaping it.

Despite that, his black allies never called seizing Harpers Ferry crazy. Although Brown had been hanged for his actions, Douglass insisted the raid had lit the fire that consumed slavery. Brown chose to open his war against slavery at Harpers Ferry, W.E.B. Du Bois wrote in 1909, because the capture of a U.S. arsenal would create a "dramatic climax to the inception of his plan" and because it was the "safest natural entrance to the Great Black Way" through the mountains from slavery to freedom in the North.

Harpers Ferry wasn't Brown's first foray onto the national stage. In 1857 his band of men had killed several proslavery settlers in "Bleeding Kansas," hacking to death five men along Pottawatomie Creek with short, heavy swords. Scholars differ on whether the killings should be considered murders or acts of war following the pro-slavery sack of Lawrence just days before. I have found evidence that Brown and his sons saw their attack as a kind of preemptive strike against men who had threatened violence against freestaters. But to understand is not necessarily to justify or excuse. How a deeply religious man could commit such an act is a question one cannot ignore in assessing Brown's mind.

Du Bois understood that Brown's recourse to violence in killing "border ruffians" in Kansas and his attempt to seize the armory at Harpers Ferry in order to arm slaves had caused "bitter debate as to how far force and violence can bring peace and good will." 10

But Du Bois, a co-founder of the NAACP, did not think slavery could have been ended without the Civil War. He concluded that "the violence which John Brown led made Kansas a free state" and his plan to put arms in the hands of slaves hastened the end of slavery. Du Bois's book John Brown was a "tribute to the man who of all Americans has perhaps come nearest to touching the real souls of black folk." African-American historians, artists and activists have long eulogized Brown as an archetype of self-sacrifice. "If you are for me and my problems," Malcolm X declared in 1965, "then you have to be willing to do as old John Brown did."

Blacks' reverence for the memory of Brown has not inspired those mainstream historians uncomfortable with Brown's reliance on violence. The belief that he may have suffered from a degree of "madness" has echoed down through the decades in Brown biographical literature. In his popular 1959 narrative The Road to Harpers Ferry, J.C. Furnas argued that Brown was consumed by a widespread "Spartacus[1] complex."

But Furnas also found that "certain details of Old Brown's career" and writings evidenced psychiatric illness. Brown might have been "intermittently 'insane' . . . for years before Harpers Ferry," Furnas speculated, "sometimes able to cope with practicalities but eventually betrayed by his strange inconsistencies leading up to and during the raid — his disease then progressing into the egocentric exaltation that so edified millions between his capture and death."

Careful historians like David M. Potter reaffirmed the centrality of the slavery issue in his posthumously published synthesis The Impending Crisis, 1848–1861, but even Potter conceded that Brown "was not a well-adjusted man" — despite the fact many abolitionists shared his belief that the slaves were restive.

In 1970 historian Stephen B. Oates sought to bridge the rival biographical traditions by depicting Brown as a religious obsessive in an era of intense political conflict. Oates' Brown was not the Cromwellian warrior of early legend builders. Nor was he the greedy, self-deluded soldier of fortune of debunkers. 15

He was a curious, somewhat schizoid amalgam of the legend builders' martyr and his evil doppelganger. This Brown possessed courage, energy, compassion and indomitable faith in his call to free the slaves. He was also egotistical, inept, cruel, intolerant and self-righteous, "always exhibit[ing] a puritanical obsession with the wrongs of others."

---

[1]Spartacus (109–71 BCE) was a gladiator who led a slave uprising against the Roman Republic. — Eds.

Oates was doubtful that historians might ever persuasively identify psychosis in a subject they studied. He repudiated historian Allan Nevins's belief that Brown suffered from "reasoning insanity" and "ambitious paranoia," but he declared that Brown was not "normal," "well adjusted" or "sane" either (later dismissing these terms as meaningless).

But reference to Brown's "glittering eye"—a telltale mark of insanity in 19th-century popular culture—invited Oates' readers to conclude that Brown was touched with madness after all. Finding in Brown an "angry, messianic mind," Oates straddled the two biographical traditions. For three decades, his portrait of Brown has perpetuated the image of mental instability.

(2009)

Questions

1. Why did Brown address and deny the charges that he was "insane" rather than using insanity as a defense?
2. What arguments claiming that Brown was mentally unbalanced does Robert E. McGlone discuss?
3. How does he address and refute these?
4. How effective do you find prominent African Americans' testimony as evidence to establish Brown's sanity?
5. What are the "rival biographical traditions" (par. 15) historian Stephen B. Oates attempts to correct? How does his interpretation seek to "bridge" them?

Freedom's Martyr

David Reynolds

David Reynolds, professor of English and American studies at the City University of New York, is the author of the biography John Brown, Abolitionist: The Man Who Killed Slavery, Sparked the Civil War, and Seeded Civil Rights (2005). This essay appeared as an op-ed piece in the New York Times in 2009.

It's important for Americans to recognize our national heroes, even those who have been despised by history. Take John Brown.

Today is the 150th anniversary of Brown's hanging—the grim punishment for his raid weeks earlier on Harpers Ferry, Va. With a small band of abolitionists, Brown had seized the federal arsenal there and freed slaves in the area. His plan was to flee with them to nearby mountains and provoke rebellions in the South. But he stalled too long in the arsenal and was captured. He was brought to trial in a Virginia court, convicted of treason, murder, and inciting an insurrection, and hanged on December 2, 1859.

It's a date we should hold in reverence. Yes, I know the response: Why remember a misguided fanatic and his absurd plan for destroying slavery?

There are compelling reasons. First, the plan was not absurd. Brown reasonably saw the Appalachians, which stretch deep into the South, as an ideal base for a guerrilla war. He had studied the Maroon rebels of the West Indies, black fugitives who had used mountain camps to battle colonial powers on their islands. His plan was to create panic by arousing fears of a slave rebellion, leading Southerners to view slavery as dangerous and impractical.

Second, he was held in high esteem by many great men of his day. Ralph Waldo Emerson compared him to Jesus, declaring that Brown would "make the gallows as glorious as the cross." Henry David Thoreau placed Brown above the freedom fighters of the American Revolution. Frederick Douglass said that while he had lived for black people, John Brown had died for them. A later black reformer, W. E. B. Du Bois, called Brown the white American who had "come nearest to touching the real souls of black folk."

Du Bois was right. Unlike nearly all other Americans of his era, John Brown did not have a shred of racism. He had long lived among African Americans, trying to help them make a living, and he wanted blacks to be quickly integrated into American society. When Brown was told he could have a clergyman to accompany him to the gallows, he refused, saying he would be more honored to go with a slave woman and her children.

By the time of his hanging, John Brown was so respected in the North that bells tolled in many cities and towns in his honor. Within two years, the Union troops marched southward singing, "John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the grave, but his soul keeps marching on." Brown remained a hero to the North right up through Reconstruction.

However, he fell from grace during the long, dark period of Jim Crow. The attitude was, who cares about his progressive racial views, except a few blacks? His reputation improved a bit with the civil rights movement, but he is still widely dismissed as a deranged cultist. This is an injustice to a forward-thinking man dedicated to the freedom and political participation of African-Americans.

O.K., some might say, but how about the blotches on his record, especially the murders and bloody skirmishes in Kansas in the 1850s? Brown considered himself a soldier at war. His attacks on pro-slavery forces were part of an escalating cycle of pre-emptive and retaliatory violence that most historians now agree were in essence the first engagements of the Civil War.

Besides, none of the heroes from that period is unblemished. Lincoln was the Great Emancipator, but he shared the era's racial prejudices, and even after the war started thought that blacks should be shipped out of the country once they were freed. Andrew Jackson was the man of his age, but in addition to being a slaveholder, he has the extra infamy of his callous treatment of Native Americans, for which some hold him guilty of genocide. John Brown comes with "buts"—but in that he has plenty of company. He deserves to be honored today.

For starters, he should be pardoned. Technically, Gov. Tim Kaine of Virginia would have to do this, since Brown was tried on state charges and executed there. Such a posthumous pardon by a state occurred just this October, when South Carolina pardoned two black men who were executed 94 years ago for murdering a Confederate veteran.

A presidential pardon, however, would be more meaningful. Posthumous pardons are by definition symbolic. They're intended to remove stigma or correct injustice. While the president cannot grant pardons for state crimes, a strong argument can be made for a symbolic exception in Brown's case.

By today's standards, his crime was arguably of a federal nature, as his attack was on a federal arsenal in what is now West Virginia. His actions were prompted by federal slavery rulings he considered despicable, especially the Supreme Court's Dred Scott decision. Brown was captured by federal troops under Robert E. Lee. And the Virginia court convicted him of treason against Virginia even though he was not a resident. (He was tried in Virginia at the orders of its governor, probably to avert Northern political pressure on the federal government.)

There is precedent for presidential pardons of the deceased; in 1999, Bill Clinton pardoned Henry O. Flipper, an African-American lieutenant who was court-martialed in 1881 for misconduct. Last year, George W. Bush gave a posthumous pardon to Charles Winters, an American punished for supplying B-17 bombers to Israel in the late 1940s. In October, Senator John McCain and Representative Peter King petitioned President Obama to pardon Jack Johnson, the black boxing champion, who was convicted a century ago of transporting a white woman across state lines for immoral purposes.

Justice would be served, belatedly, if President Obama and Governor Kaine found a way to pardon a man whose heroic effort to free four million enslaved blacks helped start the war that ended slavery. Once and for all, rescue John Brown from the loony bin of history. 15

(2009)

Questions

1. What occasioned this essay?
2. David Reynolds asks, in paragraph 3, "Why remember a misguided fanatic and his absurd plan for destroying slavery?" What is his answer?
3. Reynolds asserts that Brown "did not have a shred of racism" (par. 6). To what extent do you find this an important defense of his actions?
4. Which counterarguments does Reynolds address? Identify two and discuss how effectively you believe he concedes and refutes them.
5. Why does Reynolds believe it is important to establish that "Brown considered himself a soldier at war" (par. 9)?
6. How does Reynolds support his claim that a posthumous presidential pardon for Brown would be appropriate and significant? To what extent do you agree?
7. Reynolds ends by calling for the "rescue" of Brown from the "loony bin of history." Does this characterization undermine or emphasize his argument? Explain your response.

The 9/11 of 1859

Tony Horowitz

Award-winning reporter Tony Horowitz has been a fellow at the Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study at Harvard University and a visiting scholar at Brown University. Midnight Rising, a biography of John Brown, won the 2012 William Henry Seward Award for Excellence in Civil War Biography. This essay appeared as an op-ed piece in the New York Times on the same day as the previous piece by David Reynolds. Horowitz is responding to the decision to try Khalid Shaikh Mohammed in a civilian rather than a military court; the decision was subsequently overturned.

Charles Town, West Virginia

One hundred and fifty years ago today, the most successful terrorist in American history was hanged at the edge of this Shenandoah Valley town. Before climbing atop his coffin for the wagon ride to the gallows, he handed a note to one of his jailers: "I, John Brown, am now quite certain that the crimes of this guilty land will never be purged away but with blood."

Eighteen months later, Americans went to war against each other, with soldiers marching into battle singing "John Brown's Body." More than 600,000 men died before the sin of slavery was purged.

Few if any Americans today would question the justness of John Brown's cause: the abolition of human bondage. But as the nation prepares to try Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who calls himself the architect of the 9/11 attacks, it may be worth pondering the parallels between John Brown's raid in 1859 and Al Qaeda's assault in 2001.

Brown was a bearded fundamentalist who believed himself chosen by God to destroy the institution of slavery. He hoped to launch his holy war by seizing the United States armory at Harpers Ferry, Va., and arming blacks for a campaign of liberation. Brown also chose his target for shock value and symbolic impact. The only federal armory in the South, Harpers Ferry was just 60 miles from the capital, where "our president and other leeches," Brown wrote, did the bidding of slave owners. The first slaves freed and armed by Brown belonged to George Washington's great-grandnephew.

Brown's strike force was similar in size and makeup to that of the 9/11 hijackers. 5
He led 21 men, all but two in their 20s, and many of them radicalized by guerrilla fighting in Bleeding Kansas, the abolitionists' Afghanistan. Brown also relied on covert backers — not oil-rich Saudis, but prominent Yankees known as the Secret Six. Brown used aliases and coded language and gathered his men at a mountain hideout. But, like the 9/11 bombers, Brown's men were indiscreet, disclosing their plan to family and sweethearts. A letter warning of the plot even reached the secretary of war. It arrived in August, the scheme seemed outlandish, and the warning was ignored.

Brown and his men were prepared to die, and most did, in what quickly became a suicide mission. Trapped in Harpers Ferry, the raiders fought for 24 hours until Robert E. Lee ordered marines to storm the building where the survivors had holed up. Ten raiders were killed, including two of Brown's sons, and seven more hanged. No slaves won their freedom. The first civilian casualty was a free black railroad worker, shot in the back while fleeing the raiders.

This fiasco might have been a footnote of history if Brown had died of his wounds or been immediately executed. Instead, he survived, and was tried under tight security in a civilian court in Charles Town, near Harpers Ferry. Rather than challenge the evidence, or let his lawyers plead insanity, Brown put the South on trial. Citing the biblical injunction to "remember them that are in bonds," he declared his action "was not wrong, but right."

"If it is deemed necessary that I should forfeit my life for the furtherance of the ends of justice," he said, "and mingle my blood further with the blood of my children and with the blood of millions in this slave country whose rights are disregarded by wicked, cruel and unjust enactments — I submit; so let it be done!" He was hanged a month later, before a crowd that included John Wilkes Booth, who later wrote of the "terroriser" with a mix of contempt and awe.

Brown's courage and eloquence made him a martyr-hero for many in the North. This canonization, in turn, deepened Southern rage and alarm over the raid. Though Brown occupied the far fringe of abolitionism — a "wild and absurd freak," The New York Times called him — Southern firebrands painted his raid as part of a broad conspiracy. An already polarized nation lurched closer to violent divorce. "The time for compromise was gone," Frederick Douglass later observed. "The armed hosts of freedom stood face to face over the chasm of a broken Union, and the clash of arms was at hand." This was exactly what Brown had predicted in his final note.

Khalid Shaikh Mohammed is no John Brown. The 9/11 attack caused mass, indiscriminate slaughter, for inscrutable ends. Brown fed breakfast to his hostages; the hijackers slit throats with box cutters. Any words Mr. Mohammed may offer in his own defense will likely strike Americans as hateful and unpersuasive. In any event, the judge probably won't grant him an ideological platform. 10

But perhaps he doesn't need one. In 1859, John Brown sought not only to free slaves in Virginia but to terrorize the South and incite a broad conflict. In this he triumphed: panicked whites soon mobilized, militarized and marched double-quick toward secession. Brown's raid didn't cause the Civil War, but it was certainly a catalyst.

It may be too early to say if 9/11 bred a similar overreaction. But last night President Obama vowed to increase our efforts in Afghanistan — one of two wars that, eight years on, have killed nearly twice as many Americans as the hijacked planes. The nation, beset by the wars' burden, will continue to find its domestic and foreign policy options hobbled.

Show trial or no trial, terrorists sometimes win.

(2009)

Questions

1. What is the effect of Tony Horowitz's characterization of Brown as "the most successful terrorist in American history" (par. 1) even before he states Brown's name? Do you think he assumes his readers would agree with him, or is he deliberately trying to provoke them?
2. What "parallels" (par. 3) does Horowitz claim between John Brown's raid in 1859 and Al Qaeda's assault in 2001? What differences does he acknowledge?
3. Why does Horowitz believe that the raid, which he calls a "fiasco," "might have been a footnote of history" (par. 7) if Brown had not had a public trial and execution?
4. Why do you think the reference to John Wilkes Booth (par. 8) strengthens or weakens Horowitz's argument?
5. Finally, what is the purpose of Horowitz's argument? Include consideration of the final sentence in your response. To what extent do you believe he achieved his purpose?

Making Connections

1. What evidence do you find in John Brown's final letter (p. 733) or final speech (p. 732) to support any claims of his mental instability that Robert E. McGlone presents (p. 747)?
2. What similarities do you find between Frances Ellen Watkins Harper's (p. 736) and Henry David Thoreau's (p. 737) views of Brown?
3. Do you think the image of Brown in Thomas Hovenden's painting (p. 743) is more similar to that presented by Thoreau or by David Reynolds (p. 750)? Cite specific details of both written and visual texts to support your response.
4. In what ways does Ken Chowder (p. 745) share Thoreau's view of American society?
5. What is the basic disagreement between Reynolds and Tony Horowitz (p. 753) in their op-ed columns? What common ground, if any, do they have?
6. How might Brown respond to the way Horowitz characterizes him?
7. What point(s) of agreement do you find among Chowder, Horowitz, and McGlone?

Entering the Conversation

As you respond to each of the following prompts, support your position with appropriate evidence, including at least three sources in this Conversation on John Brown, unless otherwise indicated.

1. Taken together, these sources present a survey of the controversy surrounding John Brown. Using a minimum of four of them, explain what the main points of contention and interpretations are and how each is supported.

2. In these source materials and others, Brown is referred to in numerous ways: "freedom's martyr," "an American hero," "noble abolitionist," "misguided fanatic," "anarchy incarnate," "heroic liberator," "deranged cultist," "cold-blooded terrorist," "angel of light." Using at least three of the sources, including one of the primary documents by Brown, develop and support your own characterization of John Brown.

3. In his Address at the Fourteenth Anniversary of Storer College in Harpers Ferry (May 30, 1881), Frederick Douglass described Brown as follows: "To the outward eye of men, John Brown was a criminal, but to their inward eye he was a just man and true. His deeds might be disowned, but the spirit which made those deeds possible was worthy [of] highest honor." Explain why you agree or disagree with Douglass's assessment; cite at least three sources to support your position.

4. Central to the controversy about John Brown is the extent to which violence can ever be justified. Explain when, if ever, you believe that violent actions are appropriate or necessary. Do you believe that "principled violence," as Ken Chowder describes it, exists?

5. The legend of John Brown, to some degree, was created by the popular images, poems, and songs about him. Research one of these and discuss how it supports or challenges at least three of the views of Brown presented in the sources here.

6. Nicole Etcheson, history professor at Ball State University, concludes her article "John Brown, Terrorist?" (American Nineteenth Century History, March 2009) with a comparison of Brown and Abraham Lincoln:

> While still a candidate for president, Abraham Lincoln repudiated Brown's attack on Harpers Ferry. He agreed with Brown "in thinking slavery wrong," but "that cannot excuse violence, bloodshed, and treason." Ironically, Lincoln would preside over a war that accomplished Brown's goals — the abolition of slavery — although by even greater violence. Lincoln's Second Inaugural, which warned that the war might continue "until every drop of blood drawn with the lash, shall be paid by another drawn with the sword," echoes Brown's own belief that the crimes of this guilty land would be purged with blood. And Lincoln agreed with Brown about the sinfulness of slavery, the awfulness of God's judgment on the nation, and the redemptive power of blood sacrifice. No one, however, characterizes Abraham Lincoln's views as terrorism. Instead, we acknowledge such views as those of a chief of state during a terrible and bloody civil conflict that liberated the nation from a heinous institution. Were Brown's aims so different from Lincoln's?

Write a response to Etcheson's final question, based on your knowledge of Lincoln and at least three sources in this Conversation.

6. The Quaker poet John Greenleaf Whittier wrote the following poem valorizing Brown three weeks after his death:

> John Brown of Ossawatomie spake on his dying day:
> "I will not have to shrive my soul a priest in Slavery's pay.
> But let some poor slave-mother whom I have striven to free,
> With her children, from the gallows-stair put up a prayer for me!"
>
> John Brown of Ossawatomie, they led him out to die;
> And lo! a poor slave-mother with her little child pressed nigh.
> Then the bold, blue eye grew tender, and the old harsh face grew mild,
> As he stooped between the jeering ranks and kissed the negro's child!
>
> The shadows of his stormy life that moment fell apart;
> And they who blamed the bloody hand forgave the loving heart.
> That kiss from all its guilty means redeemed the good intent,
> And round the grisly fighter's hair the martyr's aureole bent!
>
> Perish with him the folly that seeks through evil good!
> Long live the generous purpose unstained with human blood!
> Not the raid of midnight terror, but the thought which underlies;
> Not the borderer's pride of daring, but the Christian's sacrifice.
>
> Nevermore may yon Blue Ridges the Northern rifle hear,
> Nor see the light of blazing homes flash on the negro's spear.
> But let the free-winged angel Truth their guarded passes scale,
> To teach that right is more than might, and justice more than mail!
>
> So vainly shall Virginia set her battle in array;
> In vain her trampling squadrons knead the winter snow with clay.
> She may strike the pouncing eagle, but she dares not harm the dove;
> And every gate she bars to Hate shall open wide to Love!

The poem is based on the same newspaper account of Brown's final moments as Thomas Hovenden's painting is thought to have been. Discuss the similarities and differences between the two depictions of Brown in the painting and the poem, and explain how these depictions reflect attitudes toward Brown examined in two of the sources.

Conversation

The Legacy of Henry David Thoreau

Henry David Thoreau is one of the most important and influential writers and thinkers that America — if not the world — has produced. Brilliant, provocative, eccentric, independent, he left a legacy that is immense and might be described as fivefold. First, Thoreau exemplified personal independence and self-reliance. Some go so far as to suggest that what Ralph Waldo Emerson preached, Thoreau practiced. As contemporary historian Jay Parini says in his 2008 book, Promised Land: Thirteen Books That Changed America, "Henry David Thoreau defines American Independence."

Thoreau also exemplified political independence and integrity. He spoke out against slavery and the Mexican war — in fact he was jailed for refusing to pay taxes supporting those evils. (He had no objection to paying the highway tax, he humorously remarked.) It is this political independence that influenced so profoundly such figures as Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr., the counterculture movement of the 1960s, and many of those who speak "truth to power" today.

He was also a transcendentalist, one who, in Emerson's words, strove to discover "an original relation to the universe." For Thoreau, the pathway was through nature. "God exhibits himself to the walker in a frosted-bush today, as much as in a burning one to Moses of old," he wrote in his journal in January of 1853. His ideas and words live on in those who seek spiritual enlightenment in nature.

Thoreau's legacy is equally strong in the environmental movement. He was a naturalist, a keen observer of the natural world who believed in the renewing power of nature and in the importance of conservation. He wrote in his journal on October 15, 1859: "Each town should have a park, or rather a primitive forest, of five hundred or a thousand acres, where a stick should never be cut for fuel, a common possession forever, for instruction and recreation." It is not surprising that Thoreau's remark "in wilderness is the preservation of the world" would become a motto of the Sierra Club, one of the most prominent environmentalist groups today. Thoreau influenced the environmentalism of John Muir and Aldo Leopold and lives on today in the works of Wendell Berry, Barry Lopez, E. O. Wilson, Annie Dillard, Bill McKibben, Richard Louv, and countless others.

Finally, Thoreau has taken on new relevance as a visionary and a critic of contemporary reliance on technology. In any consideration of the effects of the rapid pace of modern life, it seems almost a requirement to refer to the ideas of and to quote passages from Thoreau. As we find ourselves careening down the information superhighway, plugged in to smartphones, voicemail, text messages, the Internet, video games, IMs, Facebook, Twitter (or the next thing beyond 2013, when this introduction was written) while bouncing between classes, homework, extracurricular activities, sports, clubs, and work, the message of this excerpt from Walden seems more timely than ever: "Simplify, simplify." While some of us may find Thoreau's positions extreme, we nonetheless find his attitudes appealing.

Five enduring legacies — not bad for a man who was born nearly two hundred years ago. In this Conversation, you will read excerpts from three essential chapters of Walden (but we recommend that you read the whole book on your own) and a selection of modern and contemporary sources — some by the voices mentioned above — that exemplify and discuss the living legacy of Henry David Thoreau.

Sources

Bill McKibben, from Walden: Living Deliberately (2008)
Henry David Thoreau, from Walden (1854)
E. B. White, from Walden (1939)
Robert Crumb, A Short History of America (1979)
Annie Dillard, Living like Weasels (1982)
E. O. Wilson, from The Future of Life (2002)
Sue Monk Kidd, Doing Nothing (2008)
William Powers, from Hamlet's BlackBerry (2010)
Crispin Sartwell, My Walden, My Walmart (2012)
Ken Ilgunas, from Walden on Wheels: On the Open Road from Debt to Freedom (2013)

from Walden
Living Deliberately

Bill McKibben

Most well-known for The End of Nature, published in 1989 and one of the first books to address global warming and climate change, environmentalist and essayist Bill McKibben is the editor of American Earth: Environmental Writing since Thoreau, published by the Library of America in 2008. The passage below, written as an introduction to an edition of Walden, also appeared in the Summer 2012 edition of Lapham's Quarterly.

Understanding the whole of Walden is a hopeless task. Its writing resembles nothing so much as Scripture; ideas are condensed to epigrams, four or five to a paragraph. Its magic density yields dozens of different readings: psychological, spiritual, literary, political, cultural. To my mind though, at the beginning of the twenty-first century, it is most crucial to read Walden as a practical environmentalist's volume and to search for Thoreau's heirs among those trying to change our relation to the planet. We need to understand that when Thoreau sat in the dooryard of his cabin "from sunrise till noon, rapt in a reverie, amidst the pines and hickories and sumachs, in undisturbed solitude and stillness, while the birds sang around or flitted noiseless through the house," he was offering counsel and example exactly suited for our critical moment in time.

Born in 1817, Thoreau studied at Harvard and then eventually returned to his native Concord in 1837. It was here that he fell in with Ralph Waldo Emerson and Bronson Alcott — and through them with the whole Transcendental world, including Margaret Fuller, editor of The Dial, the start-up Transcendentalist periodical that first put the young Thoreau in print. He worked odd jobs as a surveyor, a tutor, and in his family's pencil business until the spring of 1845, when he built the small cabin a mile and a half from his boyhood home on the shore of Walden Pond. Save for frequent trips back to town for dinner, a night in the Concord jail for nonpayment of taxes — the inspiration for his famous essay, "Civil Disobedience" — and a trip to the Maine woods to climb Mount Katahdin, he stayed in the cabin for two years, two months, and two days. But when he came to write his great book, he collapsed this stretch of time into a single year, resulting in one of the great American books, a volume that launched what would become the environmental idea. In it he tackled questions that had previously seemed obvious: How much do we need? How should we live? What were we built for? He was not an organizer, not an environmentalist — it is unlikely he would have joined the Sierra Club or the Audubon Society — but he sensed a century early the questions that would one day define the counterculture and the environmental era. . . .

And it is here that Thoreau comes to the rescue. He posed two intensely practical questions that must come to dominate this age if we're to make real change: How much is enough? How do I know what I want? For him, I repeat, those were not environmental questions; they were not even practical questions, exactly. If you could answer them you might improve your own life, but that was the extent of his concern. Simplicity, calmness, quiet — these were the preconditions for a moral life, a true life, a philosophic life. "He will live with the license of a higher order of beings in proportion as he simplifies his life." Thoreau believed in the same intense self-examination as any lotus-positioned wispy-bearded ascetic. Happily, though, he went about it in very American ways — he was Buddha with a receipt from the hardware store. And it is that prosaic streak that makes him indispensable now. . . .

If "How much is enough?" is the subversive question for the consumer society, "How do I know what I want?" is the key assault on the Information Age. How can I hear my own heart? What is my true desire?

To understand Thoreau's genius, remember that he raised this question in a time 5 and place that would seem to us almost unbelievably silent. The communications revolution had barely begun. Advertising was not yet a business, but the few shop signs in Concord, which we now preserve as quaint markers of a vanished age, appeared already to Thoreau as eyesores "hung out on all sides to allure him; some to catch him by the appetite, as the tavern and victualling cellar; some by the fancy, as the dry goods store and the jeweller's; and others by the hair or the feet or the skirts, as the barber, the shoemaker, or the tailor." No Internet, no television, no radio, no telephone, no phonograph; and yet somehow he sensed all that this would one day mean to us. He did not need to see someone babbling into a hands-free cell phone to sense that we'd gone too far. He was so hypersensitive, such an alert antenna, that he was worried before Alexander Graham Bell was eight years old. "We are in great haste to construct a magnetic telegraph from Maine to Texas," he writes. "But Maine and Texas, it may be, have nothing important to communicate." While in the Adirondack woods, Emerson wrote a laudatory poem upon the occasion of hearing the great news that the trans-Atlantic telegraph cable had at last been laid. Thoreau dryly quipped, "perchance the first news that will leak through into the broad, flapping American ear will be that the Princess Adelaide has the whooping cough." . . .

"Let us spend one day as deliberately as Nature, and not be thrown off the track by every nutshell and mosquito's wing that falls on the rails," writes Thoreau. "Let us settle ourselves, and work and wedge our feet downward through the mud and slush of opinion, and prejudice, and tradition, and delusion, and appearance . . . till we come to a hard bottom and rocks in place, which we can call reality, and say, 'This is, and no mistake.'" Only when we have some of that granite to stand on — that firm identity rooted in the reality of the natural world — only then can we distinguish between the things we're supposed to want and the things we actually do want. Only then can we say how much is enough and have some hope of really knowing.

In the 154 years since Walden, Thoreau has become ever more celebrated in theory and ever more ignored in practice. "Men think that it is essential that the Nation have commerce, and export ice, and talk through a telegraph, and ride thirty miles an hour," he writes. How sleepy that protest sounds to an age that thinks we must travel supersonically, communicate instantaneously, and trade globally. Then again, how sound it seems to an age when we are distracted, depressed, alienated, and over-rushed. He would have understood the jail sentence imposed hourly by the cascade of emails into the inbox or the backlog of messages on the voicemail.

He is the American incarnation in a line of crackpots and gurus from Buddha on. Jesus, St. Francis of Assisi, Gandhi, and the holy men and women of every branch of the ethical religious tradition share the same outlook: simplicity is good for the soul, good for the right relationship with God. In the Christian formulation: do not lay up treasure here on earth; you can't serve both God and money; give away all that you have and follow me. These are not injunctions we've tried very hard to put into practice. We've adopted the competing religious worldview, the one that worships an ever-growing economy. But such spiritual notions have not disappeared; they've flowed like a small but steady river through world history, never completely drying up.

Thoreau helped add a new tributary to that stream. His nature writing is raw, wild, and haunting. He comes to the marsh at night to hear the hooting owls: "All day the sun has shone on the surface of some savage swamp, where the single spruce stands hung with usnea lichens, and small hawks circulate above, and the chickadee lisps amid the evergreens, and the partridge and the rabbit skulk beneath; but now a more dismal and fitting day dawns, and a different race of creatures awakes to express the meaning of Nature there." In his wildness he harks back to the ancient pantheistic traditions, older by far than the Buddha and still alive in remnant form among some native peoples, traditions that might have understood his eagerness to eat a woodchuck raw. He presaged the twentieth-century American-led boom in his affection for nature, for its ability to provide a solid bottom. When he wrote, most of the civilized world still regarded the forest and the mountain with fear and trepidation. In his wake came Walt Whitman, John Burroughs, John Muir. Right behind them came a million people toting backpacks. If lakeshore cottages and the backcountry subdivision can be numbered among his legacies, so can the national parks and wildernesses. This stream grew even larger as the concern for the right relationship with God joined with a love for the physical world. It was still not large enough to jump its banks and flood the city where Economy sat enthroned, but more and more people could hear the roar of its rapids.

Now, quite suddenly, at the beginning of the twenty-first century, a whole new waterway of thought swells that countercultural river. The saints in their robes and the nature lovers in their Gore-Tex jackets are suddenly joined by men and women in lab coats clutching computer printouts. The students of the largest environmental changes taking place around us come with a message eerily similar to those we've heard before. When the International Panel on Climate Change reported in 2001 that humans were likely to raise the earth's surface temperature five degrees Fahrenheit this century, and that they had begun to alter the most basic forces of the planet's surface, the implication of their graphs and charts and data sets was: simplify, simplify, simplify. Not because it's good for your relationship with God, but because if you don't, the temperature of the planet will be higher by 2100 than it's been for hundreds of millions of years, which means crop-withering heat waves, daunting hurricanes, rising seas, and dying forests. They were calling for community — not because it's good for the soul but because without it there's little chance we'll become efficient enough in our use of energy or materials. The math is hard to argue with; business as usual and growth as usual spell an end to the world as usual. This is the one overwhelming fact of our lifetimes — Thoreau knew nothing of it, and yet he knew it all. 10

(2008)

Questions

1. In the second paragraph, Bill McKibben mentions three questions that Thoreau asks and then focuses on two of them. Why does he omit the third?
2. Describing Thoreau, McKibben writes that "he was Buddha with a receipt from the hardware store" (par. 3). What does that description suggest?
3. Why does McKibben say that "How much is enough?" (par. 4) is a subversive question? Why does he refer to "How do I know what I want?" as the "key assault on the Information Age" (par. 4)?
4. What, according to McKibben, is Thoreau's "genius" (par. 5)?
5. What is ironic about Thoreau's "legacies" that McKibben indicates (par. 9)?
6. McKibben concludes with a paradox: "Thoreau knew nothing of it, and yet he knew it all." What is McKibben suggesting about Thoreau and about Walden?

from Walden

Henry David Thoreau

from Economy

When I wrote the following pages, or rather the bulk of them, I lived alone, in the woods, a mile from any neighbor, in a house which I had built myself, on the shore of Walden Pond, in Concord, Massachusetts, and earned my living by the labor of my hands only. I lived there two years and two months. At present I am a sojourner in civilized life again.

I should not obtrude my affairs so much on the notice of my readers if very particular inquiries had not been made by my townsmen concerning my mode of life, which some would call impertinent, though they do not appear to me at all impertinent, but, considering the circumstances, very natural and pertinent. Some have asked what I got to eat; if I did not feel lonesome; if I was not afraid; and the like. Others have been curious to learn what portion of my income I devoted to charitable purposes; and some, who have large families, how many poor children I maintained. I will therefore ask those of my readers who feel no particular interest in me to pardon me if I undertake to answer some of these questions in this book. In most books, the I, or first person, is omitted; in this it will be retained; that, in respect to egotism, is the main difference. We commonly do not remember that it is, after all, always the first person that is speaking. I should not talk so much about myself if there were any body else whom I knew as well. Unfortunately, I am confined to this theme by the narrowness of my experience. Moreover, I, on my side, require of every writer, first or last, a simple and sincere account of his own life, and not merely what he has heard of other men's lives; some such account as he would send to his kindred from a distant land; for if he has lived sincerely, it must have been in a distant land to me. Perhaps these pages are more particularly addressed to poor students. As for the rest of my readers, they will accept such portions as apply to them. I trust that none will stretch the seams in putting on the coat, for it may do good service to him whom it fits.

I would fain say something, not so much concerning the Chinese and Sandwich Islanders[1] as you who read these pages, who are said to live in New England; something about your condition, especially your outward condition or circumstances in this world, in this town, what it is, whether it is necessary that it be as bad as it is, whether it cannot be improved as well as not. I have travelled a good deal in Concord; and every where, in shops, and offices, and fields, the inhabitants have appeared to me to be doing penance in a thousand remarkable ways. What I have heard of Bramins[2] sitting exposed to four fires and looking in the face of the sun; or hanging suspended, with their heads downward, over flames; or looking at the heavens over their shoulders

---

[1]Hawaiians. — Eds.

[2]The highest-ranking social caste in Hindu India, which traditionally is made up of priests. — Eds.

"until it becomes impossible for them to resume their natural position, while from the twist of the neck nothing but liquids can pass into the stomach"; or dwelling, chained for life, at the foot of a tree; or measuring with their bodies, like caterpillars, the breadth of vast empires; or standing on one leg on the tops of pillars, — even these forms of conscious penance are hardly more incredible and astonishing than the scenes which I daily witness. The twelve labors of Hercules were trifling in comparison with those which my neighbors have undertaken; for they were only twelve, and had an end; but I could never see that these men slew or captured any monster or finished any labor. They have no friend Iolas to burn with a hot iron the root of the hydra's head, but as soon as one head is crushed, two spring up.

I see young men, my townsmen, whose misfortune it is to have inherited farms, houses, barns, cattle, and farming tools; for these are more easily acquired than got rid of. Better if they had been born in the open pasture and suckled by a wolf, that they might have seen with clearer eyes what field they were called to labor in. Who made them serfs of the soil? Why should they eat their sixty acres, when man is condemned to eat only his peck of dirt? Why should they begin digging their graves as soon as they are born? They have got to live a man's life, pushing all these things before them, and get on as well as they can. How many a poor immortal soul have I met well nigh crushed and smothered under its load, creeping down the road of life, pushing before it a barn seventy-five feet by forty, its Augean stables never cleansed, and one hundred acres of land, tillage, mowing, pasture, and wood-lot! The portionless, who struggle with no such unnecessary inherited encumbrances, find it labor enough to subdue and cultivate a few cubic feet of flesh. . . .

The mass of men lead lives of quiet desperation. What is called resignation is 5 confirmed desperation. From the desperate city you go into the desperate country, and have to console yourself with the bravery of minks and muskrats. A stereotyped but unconscious despair is concealed even under what are called the games and amusements of mankind. There is no play in them, for this comes after work. But it is a characteristic of wisdom not to do desperate things. . . .

The greater part of what my neighbors call good I believe in my soul to be bad, and if I repent of any thing, it is very likely to be my good behavior. What demon possessed me that I behaved so well? You may say the wisest thing you can old man, — you who have lived seventy years, not without honor of a kind, — I hear an irresistible voice which invites me away from all that. One generation abandons the enterprises of another like stranded vessels.

I think that we may safely trust a good deal more than we do. We may waive just so much care of ourselves as we honestly bestow elsewhere. Nature is as well adapted to our weakness as to our strength. The incessant anxiety and strain of some is a well nigh incurable form of disease. We are made to exaggerate the importance of what work we do; and yet how much is not done by us! or, what if we had been taken sick? How vigilant we are! determined not to live by faith if we can avoid it; all the day long on the alert, at night we unwillingly say our prayers and commit ourselves to uncertainties. So thoroughly and sincerely are we compelled to live, reverencing our life, and denying the possibility of change. This is the only way, we say; but there are as many ways as there can be drawn radii from one centre. All change is a miracle to contemplate; but it is a miracle which is taking place every instant. Confucius said, "To know that we know what we know, and that we do not know what we do not know, that is true knowledge." When one man has reduced a fact of the imagination to be a fact to his understanding, I foresee that all men will at length establish their lives on that basis. . . .

Let us consider for a moment what most of the trouble and anxiety which I have referred to is about, and how much it is necessary that we be troubled, or, at least, careful. It would be some advantage to live a primitive and frontier life, though in the midst of an outward civilization, if only to learn what are the gross necessaries of life and what methods have been taken to obtain them; or even to look over the old day-books of the merchants, to see what it was that men most commonly bought at the stores, what they stored, that is, what are the grossest groceries. For the improvements of ages have had but little influence on the essential laws of man's existence; as our skeletons, probably, are not to be distinguished from those of our ancestors.

By the words, necessary of life, I mean whatever, of all that man obtains by his own exertions, has been from the first, or from long use has become, so important to human life that few, if any, whether from savageness, or poverty, or philosophy, ever attempt to do without it. To many creatures there is in this sense but one necessary of life, Food. To the bison of the prairie it is a few inches of palatable grass, with water to drink; unless he seeks the Shelter of the forest or the mountain's shadow. None of the brute creation requires more than Food and Shelter. The necessaries of life for man in this climate may, accurately enough, be distributed under the several heads of Food, Shelter, Clothing, and Fuel; for not till we have secured these are we prepared to entertain the true problems of life with freedom and a prospect of success. Man has invented, not only houses, but clothes and cooked food; and possibly from the accidental discovery of the warmth of fire, and the consequent use of it, at first a luxury, arose the present necessity to sit by it. We observe cats and dogs acquiring the same second nature. By proper Shelter and Clothing we legitimately retain our own internal heat; but with an excess of these, or of Fuel, that is, with an external heat greater than our own internal, may not cookery properly be said to begin? Darwin, the naturalist, says of the inhabitants of Tierra del Fuego,[3] that while his own party, who were well clothed and sitting close to a fire, were far from too warm, these naked savages, who were farther off, were observed, to his great surprise, "to be streaming with perspiration at undergoing such a roasting." So, we are told, the New Hollander goes naked with impunity, while the European shivers in his clothes. Is it impossible to combine the hardiness of these savages with the intellectualness of the civilized man? According to Liebig, man's body is a stove, and food the fuel which keeps up the internal combustion in the lungs. In cold weather we eat more, in warm less. The animal heat is the result of a slow combustion, and disease and death take place when this is too rapid; or for want of fuel, or from some defect in the draught, the fire goes out. Of course the vital heat is not to be confounded with fire; but so much for analogy. It appears, therefore, from the above list, that the expression, animal life, is nearly synonymous with the expression, animal heat; for while Food may be regarded as the Fuel which keeps up the fire within us, — and Fuel serves only to prepare that Food or to increase the warmth of our bodies by addition from without, — Shelter and Clothing also serve only to retain the heat thus generated and absorbed. . . .

[3]Spanish. "Land of Fire." The archipelago at the very southern tip of South America. — Eds.

Most of the luxuries, and many of the so called comforts of life, are not only not indispensable, but positive hinderances to the elevation of mankind. With respect to luxuries and comforts, the wisest have ever lived a more simple and meagre life than the poor. The ancient philosophers, Chinese, Hindoo, Persian, and Greek, were a class than which none has been poorer in outward riches, none so rich in inward. We know not much about them. It is remarkable that we know so much of them as we do. The same is true of the more modern reformers and benefactors of their race. None can be an impartial or wise observer of human life but from the vantage ground of what we should call voluntary poverty. Of a life of luxury the fruit is luxury, whether in agriculture, or commerce, or literature, or art. There are nowadays professors of philosophy, but not philosophers. Yet it is admirable to profess because it was once admirable to live. To be a philosopher is not merely to have subtle thoughts, nor even to found a school, but so to love wisdom as to live according to its dictates, a life of simplicity, independence, magnanimity, and trust. It is to solve some of the problems of life, not only theoretically, but practically. The success of great scholars and thinkers is commonly a courtier-like success, not kingly, not manly. They make shift to live merely by conformity, practically as their fathers did, and are in no sense the progenitors of a nobler race of men. But why do men degenerate ever? What makes families run out? What is the nature of the luxury which enervates and destroys nations? Are we sure that there is none of it in our own lives? The philosopher is in advance of his age even in the outward form of his life. He is not fed, sheltered, clothed, warmed, like his contemporaries. How can a man be a philosopher and not maintain his vital heat by better methods than other men? 10

When a man is warmed by the several modes which I have described, what does he want next? Surely not more warmth of the same kind, as more and richer food, larger and more splendid houses, finer and more abundant clothing, more numerous incessant and hotter fires, and the like. When he has obtained those things which are necessary to life, there is another alternative than to obtain the superfluities; and that is, to adventure on life now, his vacation from humbler toil having commenced. The soil, it appears, is suited to the seed, for it has sent its radicle downward, and it may now send its shoot upward also with confidence. Why has man rooted himself thus firmly in the earth, but that he may rise in the same proportion into the heavens above? — for the nobler plants are valued for the fruit they bear at last in the air and light, far from the ground, and are not treated like the humbler esculents, which, though they may be biennials, are cultivated only till they have perfected their root, and often cut down at top for this purpose, so that most would not know them in their flowering season.

I do not mean to prescribe rules to strong and valiant natures, who will mind their own affairs whether in heaven or hell, and perchance build more magnificently and spend more lavishly than the richest, without ever impoverishing themselves, not knowing how they live, — if, indeed, there are any such, as has been dreamed; nor to those who find their encouragement and inspiration in precisely the present condition of things, and cherish it with the fondness and enthusiasm of lovers, — and, to some extent, I reckon myself in this number; I do not speak to those who are well employed, in whatever circumstances, and they know whether they are well employed or not; — but mainly to the mass of men who are discontented, and idly complaining of the hardness of their lot or of the times, when they might improve them. There are some who complain most energetically and inconsolably of any, because they are, as they say, doing their duty. I also have in my mind that seemingly wealthy, but most terribly impoverished class of all, who have accumulated dross, but know not how to use it, or get rid of it, and thus have forged their own golden or silver fetters.

If I should attempt to tell how I have desired to spend my life in years past, it would probably surprise those of my readers who are somewhat acquainted with its actual history; it would certainly astonish those who know nothing about it. I will only hint at some of the enterprises which I have cherished.

In any weather, at any hour of the day or night, I have been anxious to improve the nick of time, and notch it on my stick too; to stand on the meeting of two eternities, the past and future, which is precisely the present moment; to toe that line. You will pardon some obscurities, for there are more secrets in my trade than in most men's, and yet not voluntarily kept, but inseparable from its very nature. I would gladly tell all that I know about it, and never paint "No Admittance" on my gate.

I long ago lost a hound, a bay horse, and a turtle-dove, and am still on their trail. 15
Many are the travellers I have spoken concerning them, describing their tracks and what calls they answered to. I have met one or two who had heard the hound, and the tramp of the horse, and even seen the dove disappear behind a cloud, and they seemed as anxious to recover them as if they had lost them themselves.

To anticipate, not the sunrise and the dawn merely, but, if possible, Nature herself! How many mornings, summer and winter, before yet any neighbor was stirring about his business, have I been about mine! No doubt, many of my townsmen have met me returning from this enterprise, farmers starting for Boston in the twilight, or woodchoppers going to their work. It is true, I never assisted the sun materially in his rising, but, doubt not, it was of the last importance only to be present at it.

So many autumn, ay, and winter days, spent outside the town, trying to hear what was in the wind, to hear and carry it express! I well-nigh sunk all my capital in it, and lost my own breath into the bargain, running in the face of it. If it had concerned either of the political parties, depend upon it, it would have appeared in the Gazette with the earliest intelligence. At other times watching from the observatory of some cliff or tree, to telegraph any new arrival; or waiting at evening on the hill-tops for the sky to fall, that I might catch something, though I never caught much, and that, manna-wise, would dissolve again in the sun.

For a long time I was reporter to a journal, of no very wide circulation, whose editor has never yet seen fit to print the bulk of my contributions, and, as is too common with writers, I got only my labor for my pains. However, in this case my pains were their own reward.

For many years I was self-appointed inspector of snow storms and rain storms, and did my duty faithfully; surveyor, if not of highways, then of forest paths and all across-lot routes, keeping them open, and ravines bridged and passable at all seasons, where the public heel had testified to their utility.

I have looked after the wild stock of the town, which give a faithful herdsman a good deal of trouble by leaping fences; and I have had an eye to the unfrequented nooks and corners of the farm; though I did not always know whether Jonas or Solomon worked in a particular field to-day; that was none of my business. I have watered the red huckleberry, the sand cherry and the nettle tree, the red pine and the black ash, the white grape and the yellow violet, which might have withered else in dry seasons.

In short, I went on thus for a long time, I may say it without boasting, faithfully minding my business, till it became more and more evident that my townsmen would not after all admit me into the list of town officers, nor make my place a sinecure with a moderate allowance. My accounts, which I can swear to have kept faithfully, I have, indeed, never got audited, still less accepted, still less paid and settled. However, I have not set my heart on that.

Not long since, a strolling Indian went to sell baskets at the house of a well-known lawyer in my neighborhood. "Do you wish to buy any baskets?" he asked. "No, we do not want any," was the reply. "What!" exclaimed the Indian as he went out the gate, "do you mean to starve us?" Having seen his industrious white neighbors so well off, — that the lawyer had only to weave arguments, and by some magic wealth and standing followed, he had said to himself; I will go into business; I will weave baskets; it is a thing which I can do. Thinking that when he had made the baskets he would have done his part, and then it would be the white man's to buy them. He had not discovered that it was necessary for him to make it worth the other's while to buy them, or at least make him think that it was so, or to make something else which it would be worth his while to buy. I too had woven a kind of basket of a delicate texture, but I had not made it worth any one's while to buy them. Yet not the less, in my case, did I think it worth my while to weave them, and instead of studying how to make it worth men's while to buy my baskets, I studied rather how to avoid the necessity of selling them. The life which men praise and regard as successful is but one kind. Why should we exaggerate any one kind at the expense of the others?

Finding that my fellow-citizens were not likely to offer me any room in the court house, or any curacy or living any where else, but I must shift for myself, I turned my face more exclusively than ever to the woods, where I was better known. I determined to go into business at once, and not wait to acquire the usual capital, using such slender means as I had already got. My purpose in going to Walden Pond was not to live cheaply nor to live dearly there, but to transact some private business with the fewest obstacles; to be hindered from accomplishing which for want of a little common sense, a little enterprise and business talent, appeared not so sad as foolish. . . .

Near the end of March, 1845, I borrowed an axe and went down to the woods by Walden Pond, nearest to where I intended to build my house, and began to cut down some tall arrowy white pines, still in their youth, for timber. It is difficult to begin without borrowing, but perhaps it is the most generous course thus to permit your fellow-men to have an interest in your enterprise. The owner of the axe, as he released his hold on it, said that it was the apple of his eye; but I returned it sharper than I received it. It was a pleasant hillside where I worked, covered with pine woods, through which I looked out on the pond, and a small open field in the woods where pines and hickories were springing up. The ice in the pond was not yet dissolved, though there were some open spaces, and it was all dark colored and saturated with water. There were some slight flurries of snow during the days that I worked there; but for the most part when I came out on to the railroad, on my way home, its yellow sand heap stretched away gleaming in the hazy atmosphere, and the rails shone in the spring sun, and I heard the lark and pewee and other birds already come to commence another year with us. They were pleasant spring days, in which the winter of man's discontent was thawing as well as the earth, and the life that had lain torpid began to stretch itself. One day, when my axe had come off and I had cut a green hickory for a wedge, driving it with a stone, and had placed the whole to soak in a pond hole in order to swell the wood, I saw a striped snake run into the water, and he lay on the bottom, apparently without inconvenience, as long as I staid there, or more than a quarter of an hour; perhaps because he had not yet fairly come out of the torpid state. It appeared to me that for a like reason men remain in their present low and primitive condition; but if they should feel the influence of the spring of springs arousing them, they would of necessity rise to a higher and more ethereal life. I had previously seen the snakes in frosty mornings in my path with portions of their bodies still numb and inflexible, waiting for the sun to thaw them. On the 1st of April it rained and melted the ice, and in the early part of the day, which was very foggy, I heard a stray goose groping about over the pond and cackling as if lost, or like the spirit of the fog.

So I went on for some days cutting and hewing timber, and also studs and rafters, 25 all with my narrow axe, not having many communicable or scholar-like thoughts, singing to myself,—

Men say they know many things;
But lo! they have taken wings,—
The arts and sciences,
And a thousand appliances;
The wind that blows
Is all that any body knows.

. . . At Cambridge College the mere rent of a student's room, which is only a little larger than my own, is thirty dollars each year, though the corporation had the advantage of building thirty-two side by side and under one roof, and the occupant suffers the inconvenience of many and noisy neighbors, and perhaps a residence in the fourth story. I cannot but think that if we had more true wisdom in these respects, not only less education would be needed, because, forsooth, more would already have been acquired, but the pecuniary expense of getting an education would in a great measure vanish. Those conveniences which the student requires at Cambridge or elsewhere cost him or somebody else ten times as great a sacrifice of life as they would with proper management on both sides. Those things for which the most money is demanded are never the things which the student most wants. Tuition, for instance, is an important item in the term bill, while for the far more valuable education which he gets by associating with the most cultivated of his contemporaries no charge is made. The mode of founding a college is, commonly, to get up a subscription of dollars and cents, and then following blindly the principles of a division of labor to its extreme, a principle which should never be followed but with circumspection, — to call in a contractor who makes this a subject of speculation, and he employs Irishmen or other operatives actually to lay the foundations, while the students that are to be are said to be fitting themselves for it; and for these oversights successive generations have to pay. I think that it would be better than this, for the students, or those who desire to be benefited by it, even to lay the foundation themselves. The student who secures his coveted leisure and retirement by systematically shirking any labor necessary to man obtains but an ignoble and unprofitable leisure, defrauding himself of the experience which alone can make leisure fruitful. "But," says one, "you do not mean that the students should go to work with their hands instead of their heads?" I do not mean that exactly, but I mean something which he might think a good deal like that; I mean that they should not play life, or study it merely, while the community supports them at this expensive game, but earnestly live it from beginning to end. How could youths better learn to live than by at once trying the experiment of living? Methinks this would exercise their minds as much as mathematics. If I wished a boy to know something about the arts and sciences, for instance, I would not pursue the common course, which is merely to send him into the neighborhood of some professor, where any thing is professed and practised but the art of life; — to survey the world through a telescope or a microscope, and never with his natural eye; to study chemistry, and not learn how his bread is made, or mechanics, and not learn how it is earned; to discover new satellites to Neptune, and not detect the motes in his eyes, or to what vagabond he is a satellite himself; or to be devoured by the monsters that swarm all around him, while contemplating the monsters in a drop of vinegar. Which would have advanced the most at the end of a month, — the boy who had made his own jackknife from the ore which he had dug and smelted, reading as much as would be necessary for this, — or the boy who had attended the lectures on metallurgy at the Institute in the mean while, and had received a Rogers' penknife from his father? Which would be most likely to cut his fingers? . . . To my astonishment I was informed on leaving college that I had studied navigation! — why, if I had taken one turn down the harbor I should have known more about it. Even the poor student studies and is taught only political economy, while that economy of living which is synonymous with philosophy is not even sincerely professed in our colleges. The consequence is, that while he is reading Adam Smith,[4] Ricardo,[5] and Say,[6] he runs his father in debt irretrievably.

---

[4]Adam Smith, eighteenth-century Scottish philosopher and economist. — Eds.

[5]David Ricardo, nineteenth-century British economist. — Eds.

[6]Jean-Baptiste Say, nineteenth-century French economist. — Eds.

As with our colleges, so with a hundred "modern improvements;" there is an illusion about them; there is not always a positive advance. The devil goes on exacting compound interest to the last for his early share and numerous succeeding investments in them. Our inventions are wont to be pretty toys, which distract our attention from serious things. They are but improved means to an unimproved end, an end which it was already but too easy to arrive at; as railroads lead to Boston or New York. We are in great haste to construct a magnetic telegraph from Maine to Texas; but Maine and Texas, it may be, have nothing important to communicate. Either is in such a predicament as the man who was earnest to be introduced to a distinguished deaf woman, but when he was presented, and one end of her ear trumpet was put into his hand, had nothing to say. As if the main object were to talk fast and not to talk sensibly. We are eager to tunnel under the Atlantic and bring the old world some weeks nearer to the new; but perchance the first news that will leak through into the broad, flapping American ear will be that the Princess Adelaide has the whooping cough. . . .

from Where I Lived, and What I Lived For

The present was my next experiment of this kind, which I purpose to describe more at length; for convenience, putting the experience of two years into one. As I have said, I do not propose to write an ode to dejection, but to brag as lustily as chanticleer in the morning, standing on his roost, if only to wake my neighbors up.

When first I took up my abode in the woods, that is, began to spend my nights as well as days there, which, by accident, was on Independence day, or the fourth of July, 1845, my house was not finished for winter, but was merely a defence against the rain, without plastering or chimney, the walls being of rough weather-stained boards, with wide chinks, which made it cool at night. The upright white hewn studs and freshly planed door and window casings gave it a clean and airy look, especially in the morning, when its timbers were saturated with dew, so that I fancied that by noon some sweet gum would exude from them. To my imagination it retained throughout the day more or less of this auroral character, reminding me of a certain house on a mountain which I had visited the year before. This was an airy and unplastered cabin, fit to entertain a travelling god, and where a goddess might trail her garments. The winds which passed over my dwelling were such as sweep over the ridges of mountains, bearing the broken strains, or celestial parts only, of terrestrial music. The morning wind forever blows, the poem of creation is uninterrupted; but few are the ears that hear it. Olympus is but the outside of the earth every where. . . .

I went to the woods because I wished to live deliberately, to front only the essen- 30
tial facts of life, and see if I could not learn what it had to teach, and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not lived. I did not wish to live what was not life, living is so dear; nor did I wish to practice resignation, unless it was quite necessary. I wanted to live deep and suck out all the marrow of life, to live so sturdily and Spartan-like as to put to rout all that was not life, to cut a broad swath and shave close, to drive life into a corner, and reduce it to its lowest terms, and, if it proved to be mean, why then to get the whole and genuine meanness of it, and publish its meanness to the world; or if it were sublime, to know it by experience, and be able to give a true account of it in my next excursion. For most men, it appears to me, are in a strange uncertainty about it, whether it is of the devil or of God, and have somewhat hastily concluded that it is the chief end of man here to "glorify God and enjoy him forever."[7]

Still we live meanly, like ants; though the fable tells us that we were long ago changed into men; like pygmies we fight with cranes;[8] it is error upon error, and clout upon clout, and our best virtue has for its occasion a superfluous and evitable wretchedness. Our life is frittered away by detail. An honest man has hardly need to count more than his ten fingers, or in extreme cases he may add his ten toes, and lump the rest. Simplicity, simplicity, simplicity! I say, let your affairs be as two or three, and not a hundred or a thousand; instead of a million count half a dozen, and keep your accounts on your thumb-nail. In the midst of this chopping sea of civilized life, such are the clouds and storms and quicksands and thousand-and-one items to be allowed for, that a man has to live, if he would not founder and go to the bottom and not make his port at all, by dead reckoning, and he must be a great calculator indeed who succeeds. Simplify, simplify. Instead of three meals a day, if it be necessary eat but one; instead of a hundred dishes, five; and reduce other things in proportion. Our life is like a German Confederacy, made up of petty states, with its boundary forever fluctuating, so that even a German cannot tell you how it is bounded at any moment. The nation itself, with all its so-called internal improvements, which, by the way are all external and superficial, is just such an unwieldy and overgrown establishment, cluttered with furniture and tripped up by its own traps, ruined by luxury and heedless expense, by want of calculation and a worthy aim, as the million households in the land; and the only cure for it, as for them, is in a rigid economy, a stern and more than Spartan simplicity of life and elevation of purpose. It lives too fast. Men think that it is essential that the Nation have commerce, and export ice, and talk through a telegraph, and ride thirty miles an hour, without a doubt, whether they do or not; but whether we should live like baboons or like men, is a little uncertain. If we do not get out sleepers,[9] and forge rails, and devote days and nights to the work, but go to tinkering upon our lives to improve them, who will build railroads? And if railroads are not built, how shall we get to heaven in season? But if we stay at home and mind our business, who will want railroads? We do not ride on the railroad; it rides upon us. Did you ever think what those sleepers are that underlie the railroad? Each one is a man, an Irishman, or a Yankee man. The rails are laid on them, and they are covered with sand, and the cars run smoothly over them. They are sound sleepers, I assure you. And every few years a new lot is laid down and run over, so that, if some have

---

[7]The first question and answer in the Westminster Catechism, a statement of religious doctrine that came out of the Protestant Reformation, is "Q: What is the chief end of man? A: To glorify God and enjoy him forever." — Eds.

[8]Allusions to the Greek fable of the Myrmidons (ant-people), and to Book III of the Iliad, respectively. The Iliad draws a parallel between the Trojan War and the mythological war between the cranes and the pygmies. — Eds.

[9]Here, sleepers means "railroad ties." — Eds.

the pleasure of riding on a rail, others have the misfortune to be ridden upon. And when they run over a man that is walking in his sleep, a supernumerary sleeper in the wrong position, and wake him up, they suddenly stop the cars, and make a hue and cry about it, as if this were an exception. I am glad to know that it takes a gang of men for every five miles to keep the sleepers down and level in their beds as it is, for this is a sign that they may sometimes get up again.

Why should we live with such hurry and waste of life? We are determined to be starved before we are hungry. Men say that a stitch in time saves nine, and so they take a thousand stitches today to save nine tomorrow. As for work, we haven't any of any consequence. We have the Saint Vitus' dance,[10] and cannot possibly keep our heads still. If I should only give a few pulls at the parish bell-rope, as for a fire, that is, without setting the bell, there is hardly a man on his farm in the outskirts of Concord, notwithstanding that press of engagements which was his excuse so many times this morning, nor a boy, nor a woman, I might almost say, but would foresake all and follow that sound, not mainly to save property from the flames, but, if we will confess the truth, much more to see it burn, since burn it must, and we, be it known, did not set it on fire — or to see it put out, and have a hand in it, if that is done as handsomely; yes, even if it were the parish church itself. Hardly a man takes a half-hour's nap after dinner, but when he wakes he holds up his head and asks, "What's the news?" as if the rest of mankind had stood his sentinels. Some give directions to be waked every half-hour, doubtless for no other purpose; and then, to pay for it, they tell what they have dreamed. After a night's sleep the news is as indispensable as the breakfast. "Pray tell me anything new that has happened to a man anywhere on this globe" — and he reads it over his coffee and rolls, that a man has had his eyes gouged out this morning on the Wachito River; never dreaming the while that he lives in the dark unfathomed mammoth cave of this world, and has but the rudiment of an eye himself.

For my part, I could easily do without the post-office. I think that there are very few important communications made through it. To speak critically, I never received more than one or two letters in my life — I wrote this some years ago — that were worth the postage. The penny-post is, commonly, an institution through which you seriously offer a man that penny for his thoughts which is so often safely offered in jest. And I am sure that I never read any memorable news in a newspaper. If we read of one man robbed, or murdered, or killed by accident, or one house burned, or one vessel wrecked or one steamboat blown up, or one cow run over on the Western Railroad, or one mad dog killed, or one lot of grasshoppers in the winter — we never need read of another. One is enough. If you are acquainted with the principle, what do you care for a myriad instances and applications? To a philosopher all news, as it is called, is gossip, and they who edit and read it are old women over their tea. Yet not a few are greedy after this gossip. There was such a rush, as I hear, the other day at one of the offices to learn the foreign news by the last arrival, that several large squares of plate glass belonging to the establishment were broken by the pressure — news which I seriously think a ready wit might write a twelvemonth, or twelve years, beforehand with sufficient accuracy. As for Spain, for instance, if you know how to throw in Don Carlos and the Infanta, and Don Pedro and Seville and Granada, from time to time in the right proportions — they may have changed the names a little since I saw the papers — and serve up a bullfight when other entertainments fail, it will be true to the letter, and give us as good an idea of the exact state or ruin of things in Spain as the most succinct and lucid reports under this head in the newspapers; and as for England, almost the last significant scrap of news from that quarter was the revolution of 1649; and if you have learned the history of her crops for an average year, you never need attend to that thing again, unless your speculations are of a merely pecuniary character. If one may judge who rarely looks into the newspapers, nothing new does ever happen in foreign parts, a French revolution not excepted.

[10] A disease that causes the victim to twitch uncontrollably. St. Vitus is the patron saint of dancers. — Eds.

What news! how much more important to know what that is which was never old! "Kieou-pe-yu (great dignitary of the state of Wei) sent a man to Khoung-tseu to know his news. Khoung-tseu caused the messenger to be seated near him, and questioned him in these terms: What is your master doing? The messenger answered with respect: My master desires to diminish the number of his faults, but he cannot come to the end of them. The messenger being gone, the philosopher remarked: What a worthy messenger! What a worthy messenger!" The preacher, instead of vexing the ears of drowsy farmers on their day of rest at the end of the week — for Sunday is the fit conclusion of an ill-spent week, and not the fresh and brave beginning of a new one — with this one other draggle-tail of a sermon, should shout with thundering voice, "Pause! Avast! Why so seeming fast, but deadly slow?"

Shams and delusions are esteemed for soundless truths, while reality is fabulous. 35
If men would steadily observe realities only, and not allow themselves to be deluded, life, to compare it with such things as we know, would be like a fairy tale and the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. If we respected only what is inevitable and has a right to be, music and poetry would resound along the streets. When we are unhurried and wise, we perceive that only great and worthy things have any permanent and absolute existence, that petty fears and petty pleasures are but the shadow of the reality. This is always exhilarating and sublime. . . .

If you stand right fronting and face to face to a fact, you will see the sun glimmer on both its surfaces, as if it were a cimeter,[11] and feel its sweet edge dividing you through the heart and marrow, and so you will happily conclude your mortal career. Be it life or death, we crave only reality. If we are really dying, let us hear the rattle in our throats and feel cold in the extremities; if we are alive, let us go about our business.

Time is but the stream I go afishing in. I drink at it; but while I drink I see the sandy bottom and detect how shallow it is. Its thin current slides away but eternity remains. I would drink deeper; fish in the sky, whose bottom is pebbly with stars. I cannot count one. I know not the first letter of the alphabet. I have always been regretting that I was not as wise as the day I was born. The intellect is a cleaver; it discerns and rifts its way into the secret of things. I do not wish to be any more busy with my hands than is necessary. My head is hands and feet. I feel all my best faculties concentrated in it. My instinct tells me that my head is an organ for burrowing, as some creatures use their snout and fore paws, and with it I would mine and burrow my way through these hills. I think that the richest vein is somewhere hereabouts, so by the divining-rod and thin rising vapors, I judge; and here I will begin to mine.

[11]Also known as a scimeter or scimitar, a curved-blade sword traditionally used in the Middle East. — Eds.

from Conclusion

I left the woods for as good a reason as I went there. Perhaps it seemed to me that I had several more lives to live, and could not spare any more time for that one. It is remarkable how easily and insensibly we fall into a particular route, and make a beaten track for ourselves. I had not lived there a week before my feet wore a path from my door to the pond-side; and though it is five or six years since I trod it, it is still quite distinct. It is true, I fear that others may have fallen into it, and so helped to keep it open. The surface of the earth is soft and impressible by the feet of men; and so with the paths which the mind travels. How worn and dusty, then, must be the highways of the world, how deep the ruts of tradition and conformity! I did not wish to take a cabin passage, but rather to go before the mast and on the deck of the world, for there I could best see the moonlight amid the mountains. I do not wish to go below now.

I learned this, at least, by my experiment; that if one advances confidently in the direction of his dreams, and endeavors to live the life which he has imagined, he will meet with success unexpected in common hours. He will put some things behind, will pass an invisible boundary; new, universal, and more liberal laws will begin to establish themselves around and within him; or the old laws be expanded, and interpreted in his favor in a more liberal sense, and he will live with the license of a higher order of beings. In proportion as he simplifies his life, the laws of the universe will appear less complex, and solitude will not be solitude, nor poverty poverty, nor weakness weakness. If you have built castles in the air, your work need not be lost; that is where they should be. Now put the foundations under them.

It is a ridiculous demand which England and America make, that you shall speak 40 so that they can understand you. Neither men nor toad-stools grow so. As if that were important, and there were not enough to understand you without them. As if Nature could support but one order of understandings, could not sustain birds as well as quadrupeds, flying as well as creeping things, and hush and who, which Bright can understand, were the best English. As if there were safety in stupidity alone. I fear chiefly lest my expression may not be extra-vagant enough, may not wander far enough beyond the narrow limits of my daily experience, so as to be adequate to the truth of which I have been convinced. Extra vagance! it depends on how you are yarded. The migrating buffalo, which seeks new pastures in another latitude, is not extravagant like the cow which kicks over the pail, leaps the cow-yard fence, and runs after her calf, in milking time. I desire to speak somewhere without bounds; like a man in a waking moment, to men in their waking moments; for I am convinced that I cannot exaggerate enough even to lay the foundation of a true expression. Who that has heard a strain of music feared then lest he should speak extravagantly any more forever? In view of the future or possible, we should live quite laxly and undefined in front, our outlines dim and misty on that side; as our shadows reveal an insensible perspiration toward the sun. The volatile truth of our words should continually betray the inadequacy of the residual statement. Their truth is instantly translated; its literal monument alone remains. The words which express our faith and piety are not definite; yet they are significant and fragrant like frankincense to superior natures.

Why level downward to our dullest perception always, and praise that as common sense? The commonest sense is the sense of men asleep, which they express by snoring. Sometimes we are inclined to class those who are once-and-a-half witted with the half-witted, because we appreciate only a third part of their wit. Some would find fault with the morning-red, if they ever got up early enough. "They pretend," as I hear, "that the verses of Kabir have four different senses; illusion, spirit, intellect, and the exoteric doctrine of the Vedas," but in this part of the world it is considered a ground for complaint if a man's writings admit of more than one interpretation. While England endeavors to cure the potato-rot, will not any endeavor to cure the brain-rot, which prevails so much more widely and fatally?

I do not suppose that I have attained to obscurity, but I should be proud if no more fatal fault were found with my pages on this score than was found with the Walden ice. Southern customers objected to its blue color, which is the evidence of its purity, as if it were muddy, and preferred the Cambridge ice, which is white, but tastes of weeds. The purity men love is like the mists which envelop the earth, and not like the azure ether beyond.

Some are dinning in our ears that we Americans, and moderns generally, are intellectual dwarfs compared with the ancients, or even the Elizabethan men. But what is that to the purpose? A living dog is better than a dead lion.[12] Shall a man go and hang himself because he belongs to the race of pygmies, and not be the biggest pygmy that he can? Let every one mind his own business, and endeavor to be what he was made.

Why should we be in such desperate haste to succeed, and in such desperate enterprises? If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer. Let him step to the music which he hears, however measured or far away. It is not important that he should mature as soon as an apple-tree or an oak. Shall he turn his spring into summer? If the condition of things which we were made for is not yet, what were any reality which we can substitute? We will not be shipwrecked on a vain reality. Shall we with pains erect a heaven of blue glass over ourselves, though when it is done we shall be sure to gaze still at the true ethereal heaven far above, as if the former were not? . . .

Rather than love, than money, than fame, give me truth. I sat at a table where were 45 rich food and wine in abundance, and obsequious attendance, but sincerity and truth were not; and I went away hungry from the inhospitable board. The hospitality was as cold as the ices. I thought that there was no need of ice to freeze them. They talked to me of the age of the wine and the fame of the vintage; but I thought of an older, a newer, and purer wine, of a more glorious vintage, which they had not got, and could not buy. The style, the house and grounds and "entertainment" pass for nothing with me. I called on the king, but he made me wait in his hall, and conducted like a man incapacitated for hospitality. There was a man in my neighborhood who lived in a hollow tree. His manners were truly regal. I should have done better had I called on him. . . .

[12]Ecclesiastes 9:4.

There is an incessant influx of novelty into the world, and yet we tolerate incredible dulness. I need only suggest what kind of sermons are still listened to in the most enlightened countries. There are such words as joy and sorrow, but they are only the burden of a psalm, sung with a nasal twang, while we believe in the ordinary and mean. We think that we can change our clothes only. It is said that the British Empire is very large and respectable, and that the United States are a first-rate power. We do not believe that a tide rises and falls behind every man which can float the British Empire like a chip, if he should ever harbor it in his mind. Who knows what sort of seventeen-year locust will next come out of the ground? The government of the world I live in was not framed, like that of Britain, in after-dinner conversations over the wine.

The life in us is like the water in the river. It may rise this year higher than man has ever known it, and flood the parched uplands; even this may be the eventful year, which will drown out all our muskrats. It was not always dry land where we dwell. I see far inland the banks which the stream anciently washed, before science began to record its freshets. Every one has heard the story which has gone the rounds of New England, of a strong and beautiful bug which came out of the dry leaf of an old table of apple-tree wood, which had stood in a farmer's kitchen for sixty years, first in Connecticut, and afterward in Massachusetts, — from an egg deposited in the living tree many years earlier still, as appeared by counting the annual layers beyond it, which was heard gnawing out for several weeks, hatched perchance by the heat of an urn. Who does not feel his faith in a resurrection and immortality strengthened by hearing of this? Who knows what beautiful and winged life, whose egg has been buried for ages under many concentric layers of woodenness in the dead dry life of society, deposited at first in the alburnum of the green and living tree, which has been gradually converted into the semblance of its well-seasoned tomb, — heard perchance gnawing out now for years by the astonished family of man, as they sat round the festive board, — may unexpectedly come forth from amidst society's most trivial and handselled furniture, to enjoy its perfect summer life at last!

I do not say that John or Jonathan will realize all this; but such is the character of that morrow which mere lapse of time can never make to dawn. The light which puts out our eyes is darkness to us. Only that day dawns to which we are awake. There is more day to dawn. The sun is but a morning star.

(1854)

Questions

1. How does Henry David Thoreau characterize life in New England at the time he went to live at Walden? How do you regard that characterization? To what extent might it apply to life today?

2. About the different ways in which people live their lives, Thoreau writes, "This is the only way, we say; but there are as many ways as there can be drawn radii from one centre" (par. 7). Do you agree? Why or why not?
3. Being extremely economical in his assessment even for his own time, Thoreau denotes what he calls "necessary of life" and what he considers near necessities (par. 9). He writes, "Most of the luxuries, and many of the so called comforts of life, are not only not indispensable, but positive hinderances to the elevation of mankind" (par. 10). Do you agree with this statement? What would we add to his list today? Which things that Thoreau considered luxuries do we now deem necessities?
4. Thoreau writes, "There are nowadays professors of philosophy, but not philosophers. Yet it is admirable to profess because it was once admirable to live" (par. 10). What does he mean? To what extent does he speak to our time as well as to his own?
5. How would you describe Thoreau's tone in the first two sentences of paragraph 11? How is his attitude relevant to our current economy?
6. Thoreau says that he will talk about how he has spent his life in years past and "hint at some of the enterprises which I have cherished" (par. 13). How would you paraphrase the account that he provides in the next eight paragraphs (pars. 14–21)?
7. Who is Thoreau's intended audience in paragraph 2? How does he characterize that audience? Who is it in paragraph 12? Which one is more likely to attend to his message? Is such an audience living today?
8. What is the purpose of the example that Thoreau introduces in paragraph 22? Do you agree with the lesson that he draws from it? Explain.
9. How does Thoreau characterize himself in paragraphs 23–25?
10. Thoreau calls student life at "Cambridge College" (Harvard University, from which Thoreau had graduated) as "this expensive game" (par. 26). Do you agree with Thoreau's ideas about education? Make specific references to the text of paragraph 26 in your answer.
11. What is Thoreau calling for when he writes, "Simplicity, simplicity, simplicity!" and enjoins his readers to "simplify, simplify" (par. 31)? Explain.
12. Thoreau writes, "We do not ride on the railroad; it rides upon us" (par. 31). Consider an electronic device (such as a laptop computer, a smartphone, a tablet, an MP3 player, or such social networks as Facebook and Twitter). What would Thoreau say about it? Has this device helped simplify our lives or has it had a negative impact on them? Explain.
13. Thoreau writes, "What news! how much more important to know what that is which was never old!" (par. 34). Write an essay in which you evaluate Thoreau's own writing according to this thought. Consider how this essay appeals to two audiences: the contemporaneous and the contemporary.
14. What does Thoreau mean by the phrase "starved before we are hungry" (par. 32)? What other examples of paradox do you find in this excerpt from Walden? How do they contribute to Thoreau's main ideas?

15. How do you interpret Thoreau's assertion that "[s]hams and delusions are esteemed for soundless truths, while reality is fabulous" (par. 35)? Using that statement as a topic sentence, develop the idea with examples from your own experience.
16. Thoreau speaks of the "government of the world I live in" (par. 46). What does he mean? How would you describe the world that he lives in? What governs it?
17. One of the rhetorical techniques that Thoreau uses most is analogy (he even states at one point, "so much for analogy"). Identify three examples of his use of analogy and explain which one you find most compelling or effective.
18. Thoreau concludes Walden as follows: "The light which puts out our eyes is darkness to us. Only that day dawns to which we are awake. There is more day to dawn. The sun is but a morning star" (par. 48). Do you see this as a fitting conclusion? Explain what Thoreau means. Why does he conclude this way?
19. Do you think Thoreau's advice and sentiments are meant as recommendations for living one's entire life or as suggestions for periodically reflecting on life's true meaning? Is he suggesting isolation as a way of life? Explain.
20. Thoreau is known for his epigrammatic statements, some of which have become so popular and familiar that they adorn posters, bumper stickers, and coffee mugs. Select your favorite one from the reading and explain why you find it so compelling.

from Walden

E. B. White

E. B. White (1899–1985) was an editor, an essayist, and a writer of children's books who lived in New York and Maine. He is best known for his essay "Once More to the Lake," for his children's books Stuart Little (1945) and Charlotte's Web (1952), and for his revision of William Strunk Jr.'s The Elements of Style (1959). In the essay included here, White composes a letter to Thoreau, intending to bring him up to date regarding Concord, Massachusetts.

Miss Nims, take a letter to Henry David Thoreau. Dear Henry: I thought of you the other afternoon as I was approaching Concord doing fifty on Route 62. That is a high speed at which to hold a philosopher in one's mind, but in this century we are a nimble bunch.

On one of the lawns in the outskirts of the village a woman was cutting the grass with a motorized lawn mower. What made me think of you was that the machine had rather got away from her, although she was game enough, and in the brief glimpse I had of the scene it appeared to me that the lawn was mowing the lady. She kept a tight grip on the handles, which throbbed violently with every explosion of the one-cylinder motor, and as she sheered around bushes and lurched along at a reluctant trot behind her impetuous servant, she looked like a puppy who had grabbed something that was too much for him. Concord hasn't changed much, Henry; the farm implements and the animals still have the upper hand.

I may as well admit that I was journeying to Concord with the deliberate intention of visiting your woods; for although I have never knelt at the grave of a philosopher nor placed wreaths on moldy poets, and have often gone a mile out of my way to avoid some place of historical interest, I have always wanted to see Walden Pond. The account which you left of your sojourn there is, you will be amused to learn, a document of increasing pertinence; each year it seems to gain a little headway, as the world loses ground. We may all be transcendental yet, whether we like it or not. As our common complexities increase, any tale of individual simplicity (and yours is the best written and the cockiest) acquires a new fascination; as our goods accumulate, but not our well-being, your report of an existence without material adornment takes on a certain awkward credibility.

My purpose in going to Walden Pond, like yours, was not to live cheaply or to live dearly there, but to transact some private business with the fewest obstacles. Approaching Concord, doing forty, doing forty-five, doing fifty, the steering wheel held snug in my palms, the highway held grimly in my vision, the crown of the road now serving me (on the righthand curves), now defeating me (on the lefthand curves), I began to rouse myself from the stupefaction which a day's motor journey induces. It was a delicious evening, Henry, when the whole body is one sense, and imbibes delight through every pore, if I may coin a phrase. Fields were richly brown where the harrow, drawn by the stripped Ford, had lately sunk its teeth; pastures were green; and overhead the sky had that same everlasting great look which you will find on Page 144 of the Oxford pocket edition. I could feel the road entering me, through tire, wheel, spring, and cushion; shall I not have intelligence with earth too? Am I not partly leaves and vegetable mold myself? — a man of infinite horsepower, yet partly leaves.

Stay with me on 62 and it will take you into Concord. As I say, it was a delicious 5 evening. The snake had come forth to die in a bloody S on the highway, the wheel upon its head, its bowels flat now and exposed. The turtle had come up too to cross the road and die in the attempt, its hard shell smashed under the rubber blow, its intestinal yearning (for the other side of the road) forever squashed. There was a sign by the wayside which announced that the road had a "cotton surface." You wouldn't know what that is, but neither, for that matter, did I. There is a cryptic ingredient in many of our modern improvements — we are awed and pleased without knowing quite what we are enjoying. It is something to be traveling on a road with a cotton surface.

The civilization round Concord today is an odd distillation of city, village, farm, and manor. The houses, yards, fields look not quite suburban, not quite rural. Under the bronze beech and the blue spruce of the departed baron grazes the milch goat of the heirs. Under the porte-cochère stands the reconditioned station wagon; under the grape arbor sit the puppies for sale. (But why do men degenerate ever? What makes families run out?)

It was June and everywhere June was publishing her immemorial stanza; in the lilacs, in the syringa, in the freshly edged paths and the sweetness of moist beloved gardens, and the little wire wickets that preserve the tulips' front. Farmers were already moving the fruits of their toil into their yards, arranging the rhubarb, the asparagus, the strictly fresh eggs on the painted stands under the little shed roofs with the patent shingles. And though it was almost a hundred years since you had taken your ax and started cutting out your home on Walden Pond, I was interested to observe that the philosophical spirit was still alive in Massachusetts: in the center of a vacant lot some boys were assembling the framework of the rude shelter, their whole mind and skill concentrated in the rather inauspicious helter-skeleton of studs and rafters. They too were escaping from town, to live naturally, in a rich blend of savagery and philosophy.

That evening, after supper at the inn, I strolled out into the twilight to dream my shapeless transcendental dreams and see that the car was locked up for the night (first open the right front door, then reach over, straining, and pull up the handles of the left rear and the left front till you hear the click, then the handle of the right rear, then shut the right front but open it again, remembering that the key is still in the ignition switch, remove the key, shut the right front again with a bang, push the tiny keyhole cover to one side, insert key, turn, and withdraw). It is what we all do, Henry. It is called locking the car. It is said to confuse thieves and keep them from making off with the laprobe. Four doors to lock behind one robe. The driver himself never uses a laprobe, the free movement of his legs being vital to the operation of the vehicle; so that when he locks the car it is a pure and unselfish act. I have in my life gained very little essential heat from laprobes, yet I have ever been at pains to lock them up. . . .

A fire engine, out for a trial spin, roared past Emerson's house, hot with readiness for public duty. Over the barn roofs the martins dipped and chittered. A swarthy daughter of an asparagus grower, in culottes, shirt, and bandanna, pedalled past on her bicycle. It was indeed a delicious evening, and I returned to the inn (I believe it was your house once) to rock with the old ladies on the concrete veranda.

Next morning early I started afoot for Walden, out Main Street and down Thoreau, 10 past the depot and the Minuteman Chevrolet Company. The morning was fresh, and in a bean field along the way I flushed an agriculturalist, quietly studying his beans. Thoreau Street soon joined Number 126, an artery of the State. We number our highways nowadays, our speed being so great we can remember little of their quality or character and are lucky to remember their number. (Men have an indistinct notion that if they keep up this activity long enough all will at length ride somewhere, in next to no time.) Your pond is on 126.

I knew I must be nearing your woodland retreat when the Golden Pheasant lunchroom came into view — Sealtest ice cream, toasted sandwiches, hot frankfurters, waffles, tonics, and lunches. Were I the proprietor, I should add rice, Indian meal, and molasses — just for old time's sake. The Pheasant, incidentally, is for sale: a chance for some nature lover who wishes to set himself up beside a pond in the Concord atmosphere and live deliberately, fronting only the essential facts of life on Number 126. Beyond the Pheasant was a place called Walden Breezes, an oasis whose porch pillars were made of old green shutters sawed into lengths. On the porch was a distorting mirror, to give the traveler a comical image of himself, who had miraculously learned to gaze in an ordinary glass without smiling. Behind the Breezes, in a sun-parched clearing, dwelt your philosophical descendants in their trailers, each trailer the size of your hut, but all grouped together for the sake of congeniality. Trailer people leave the city, as you did, to discover solitude and in any weather, at any hour of the day or night, to improve the nick of time; but they soon collect in villages and get bogged deeper in the mud than ever. The camp behind Walden Breezes was just rousing itself to the morning. The ground was packed hard under the heel, and the sun came through the clearing to bake the soil and enlarge the wry smell of cramped housekeeping. Cushman's bakery truck had stopped to deliver an early basket of rolls. A camp dog, seeing me in the road, barked petulantly. A man emerged from one of the trailers and set forth with a bucket to draw water from some forest tap.

Leaving the highway I turned off into the woods toward the pond, which was apparent through the foliage. The floor of the forest was strewn with dried old oak leaves and Transcripts. From beneath the flattened popcorn wrapper (granum explosum) peeped the frail violet. I followed a footpath and descended to the water's edge. The pond lay clear and blue in the morning light, as you have seen it so many times. In the shallows a man's waterlogged shirt undulated gently. A few flies came out to greet me and convoy me to your cove, past the No Bathing signs on which the fellows and the girls had scrawled their names. I felt strangely excited suddenly to be snooping around your premises, tiptoeing along watchfully, as though not to tread by mistake upon the intervening century. Before I got to the cove I heard something which seemed to me quite wonderful: I heard your frog, a full, clear troonk, guiding me, still hoarse and solemn, bridging the years as the robins had bridged them in the sweetness of the village evening. But he soon quit, and I came on a couple of young boys throwing stones at him.

Your front yard is marked by a bronze tablet set in a stone. Four small granite posts, a few feet away, show where the house was. On top of the tablet was a pair of faded blue bathing trunks with a white stripe. Back of it is a pile of stones, a sort of cairn, left by your visitors as a tribute I suppose. It is a rather ugly little heap of stones, Henry. In fact the hillside itself seems faded, browbeaten; a few tall skinny pines, bare of lower limbs, a smattering of young maples in suitable green, some birches and oaks, and a number of trees felled by the last big wind. It was from the bole of one of these fallen pines, torn up by the roots, that I extracted the stone which I added to the cairn — a sentimental act in which I was interrupted by a small terrier from a nearby picnic group, who confronted me and wanted to know about the stone.

I sat down for a while on one of the posts of your house to listen to the bluebottles and the dragonflies. The invaded glade sprawled shabby and mean at my feet, but the flies were tuned to the old vibration. There were the remains of a fire in your ruins, but I doubt that it was yours; also two beer bottles trodden into the soil and become part of earth. A young oak had taken root in your house, and two or three ferns, unrolling like the ticklers at a banquet. The only other furnishings were a DuBarry pattern sheet, a page torn from a picture magazine, and some crusts in wax paper.

Before I quit I walked clear round the pond and found the place where you used 15 to sit on the northeast side to get the sun in the fall, and the beach where you got sand for scrubbing your floor. On the eastern side of the pond, where the highway borders it, the State has built dressing rooms for swimmers, a float with diving towers, drinking fountains of porcelain, and rowboats for hire. The pond is in fact a State Preserve, and carries a twenty-dollar fine for picking wild flowers, a decree signed in all solemnity by your fellow-citizens Walter C. Wardwell, Erson B. Barlow, and Nathaniel I. Bowditch. There was a smell of creosote where they had been building a wide wooden stairway to the road and the parking area. Swimmers and boaters were arriving; bodies plunged vigorously into the water and emerged wet and beautiful in the bright air. As I left, a boatload of town boys were splashing about in mid-pond, kidding and fooling, the young fellows singing at the tops of their lungs in a wild chorus:

Amer-ica, Amer-ica, God shed his grace on thee,
And crown thy good with brotherhood
From sea to shi-ning sea!

I walked back to town along the railroad, following your custom. The rails were expanding noisily in the hot sun, and on the slope of the roadbed the wild grape and the blackberry sent up their creepers to the track.

The expense of my brief sojourn in Concord was:

Canvas shoes	$1.95
Baseball bat	.25	} gifts to take back to a boy
Left-handed fielder's glove	1.25
Hotel and meals	4.25
In all	$7.70

As you see, this amount was almost what you spent for food for eight months. I cannot defend the shoes or the expenditure for shelter and food: they reveal a meanness and grossness in my nature which you would find contemptible. The baseball equipment, however, is the kind of impediment with which you were never on even terms. You must remember that the house where you practiced the sort of economy which I respect was haunted only by mice and squirrels. You never had to cope with a shortstop.

(1939)

Questions

1. How many direct references to the text of Walden do you find in E. B. White's essay? Choose the three that you find most interesting. How do they contribute to the effectiveness of the piece?
2. What is White's attitude toward progress? Explain.
3. Note two instances of irony. What is their rhetorical effect?
4. How would you describe White's overall tone?

A Short History of America

Robert Crumb

Born in 1943, Robert Crumb was one of the originators of "underground" comics, creating such characters as Mr. Natural and Fritz the Cat. The comic strip included here first appeared in CoEvolution Quarterly in 1979.

© Robert Crumb 2013

(See color insert, Image 26.)

Questions

1. How would you paraphrase the narrative sequence depicted in the twelve frames?
2. Imagine that you are living in the time depicted in one of the frames. In a letter to someone living in an earlier frame, write about the progress the country has made. Or, write a warning to future generations who might occupy later frames.
3. What can you infer about Robert Crumb's attitude toward the progress depicted in the cartoon? Do you agree with his perspective? Why or why not?
4. Write an answer to the question "What next?" posed at the end of the final frame. Then create your own visual that supports your response. You can create your visual in one of three ways: draw the next frame or sequence of frames, take photos that depict the next frame or sequence, or find images online or in magazines that do so.
5. Which frame most accurately depicts a scene contemporaneous to Thoreau's time? Explain.
6. Select three frames from the cartoon sequence. For each one, find a quotation from Walden that could serve as a caption for the cartoon. Explain the reasons for your choices.

Living like Weasels

Annie Dillard

The following essay is from Annie Dillard's book Teaching a Stone to Talk: Expeditions and Encounters (1982). Dillard (b. 1945) is a Pulitzer Prize–winning author, professor of English, and philosopher of nature who writes in the tradition of Thoreau, and whose master's thesis was on Walden.

A weasel is wild. Who knows what he thinks? He sleeps in his underground den, his tail draped over his nose. Sometimes he lives in his den for two days without leaving. Outside, he stalks rabbits, mice, muskrats, and birds, killing more bodies than he can eat warm, and often dragging the carcasses home. Obedient to instinct, he bites his prey at the neck, either splitting the jugular vein at the throat or crunching the brain at the base of the skull, and he does not let go. One naturalist refused to kill a weasel who was socketed into his hand deeply as a rattlesnake. The man could in no way pry the tiny weasel off, and he had to walk half a mile to water, the weasel dangling from his palm, and soak him off like a stubborn label.

And once, says Ernest Thompson Seton[1] — once, a man shot an eagle out of the sky. He examined the eagle and found the dry skull of a weasel fixed by the jaws to his throat. The supposition is that the eagle had pounced on the weasel and the weasel swiveled and bit as instinct taught him, tooth to neck, and nearly won. I would like to have seen that eagle from the air a few weeks or months before he was shot. Was the whole weasel still attached to his feathered throat, a fur pendant? Or did the eagle eat what he could reach, gutting the living weasel with his talons before his breast, bending his beak, cleaning the beautiful airborne bones?

[1]A founding chair of the Boy Scouts of America, Ernest Thompson Seton (1860–1946) was a British wildlife illustrator, naturalist, and writer. — Eds.

I have been reading about weasels because I saw one last week. I startled a weasel who startled me, and we exchanged a long glance.

Near my house in Virginia is a pond — Hollins Pond. It covers two acres of bottomland near Tinker Creek with six inches of water and six thousand lily pads. There is a fifty-five mph highway at one end of the pond, and a nesting pair of wood ducks at the other. Under every bush is a muskrat hole or a beer can. The far end is an alternating series of fields and woods, fields and woods, threaded everywhere with motorcycle tracks — in whose bare clay wild turtles lay eggs.

One evening last week at sunset, I walked to the pond and sat on a downed log near the shore. I was watching the lily pads at my feet tremble and part over the thrusting path of a carp. A yellow warbler appeared to my right and flew behind me. It caught my eye; I swiveled around — and the next instant, inexplicably, I was looking down at a weasel, who was looking up at me.

Weasel! I'd never seen one wild before. He was ten inches long, thin as a curve, a muscled ribbon, brown as fruitwood, soft-furred, alert. His face was fierce, small and pointed as a lizard's; he would have made a good arrowhead. There was just a dot of chin, maybe two brown hairs' worth, and then the pure white fur began that spread down his underside. He had two black eyes I didn't see, any more than you see a window.

The weasel was stunned into stillness as he was emerging from beneath an enormous shaggy wild rose bush four feet away. I was stunned into stillness twisted backward on the tree trunk. Our eyes locked, and someone threw away the key.

Our look was as if two lovers, or deadly enemies, met unexpectedly on an overgrown path when each had been thinking of something else: a clearing blow to the gut. It was also a bright blow to the brain, or a sudden beating of brains, with all the charge and intimate grate of rubbed balloons. It emptied our lungs. It felled the forest, moved the fields, and drained the pond; the world dismantled and tumbled into that black hole of eyes. If you and I looked at each other that way, our skulls would split and drop to our shoulders. But we don't. We keep our skulls.

He disappeared. This was only last week, and already I don't remember what shattered the enchantment. I think I blinked, I think I retrieved my brain from the weasel's brain, and tried to memorize what I was seeing, and the weasel felt the yank of separation, the careening splashdown into real life and the urgent current of instinct. He vanished under the wild rose. I waited motionless, my mind suddenly full of data and my spirit with pleadings, but he didn't return.

Please do not tell me about "approach-avoidance conflicts." I tell you I've been in that weasel's brain for sixty seconds, and he was in mine. Brains are private places, muttering through unique and secret tapes — but the weasel and I both plugged into another tape simultaneously, for a sweet and shocking time. Can I help it if it was a blank?

What goes on in his brain the rest of the time? What does a weasel think about? He won't say. His journal is tracks in clay, a spray of feathers, mouse blood and bone: uncollected, unconnected, loose-leaf, and blown.

I would like to learn, or remember, how to live. I come to Hollins Pond not so much to learn how to live as, frankly, to forget about it. That is, I don't think I can learn from a wild animal how to live in particular — shall I suck warm blood, hold my tail high, walk with my footprints precisely over the prints of my hands? — but I might learn something of mindlessness, something of purity of living in the physical senses and the dignity of living without bias or motive. The weasel lives in necessity and we live in choice, hating necessity and dying at the last ignobly in its talons. I would like to live as I should, as the weasel lives as he should. And I suspect that for me the way is like the weasel's: open to time and death painlessly, noticing everything, remembering nothing, choosing the given with a fierce and pointed will.

I missed my chance. I should have gone for the throat. I should have lunged for that streak of white under the weasel's chin and held on, held on through mud and into the wild rose, held on for a dearer life. We could live under the wild rose wild as weasels, mute and uncomprehending. I could very calmly go wild. I could live two days in the den, curled, leaning on mouse fur, sniffing bird bones, blinking, licking, breathing musk, my hair tangled in the roots of grasses. Down is a good place to go, where the mind is single. Down is out, out of your ever-loving mind and back to your careless senses. I remember muteness as a prolonged and giddy fast, where every moment is a feast of utterance received. Time and events are merely poured, unremarked, and ingested directly, like blood pulsed into my gut through a jugular vein. Could two live that way? Could two live under the wild rose, and explore by the pond, so that the smooth mind of each is as everywhere present to the other, and as received and as unchallenged, as falling snow?

We could, you know. We can live any way we want. People take vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience — even of silence — by choice. The thing is to stalk your calling in a certain skilled and supple way, to locate the most tender and live spot and plug into that pulse. This is yielding, not fighting. A weasel doesn't "attack" anything; a weasel lives as he's meant to, yielding at every moment to the perfect freedom of single necessity.

I think it would be well, and proper, and obedient, and pure, to grasp your one necessity and not let it go, to dangle from it limp wherever it takes you. Then even death, where you're going no matter how you live, cannot you part. Seize it and let it seize you up aloft even, till your eyes burn out and drop; let your musky flesh fall off 15 in shreds, and let your very bones unhinge and scatter, loosened over fields, over fields and woods, lightly, thoughtless, from any height at all, from as high as eagles.

(1982)

Questions

1. What comes to mind when you hear the word weasel? What are the qualities of a weasel that Annie Dillard admires?
2. Dillard uses a great deal of figurative language, hyperbole, and even alliteration in her writing. How do these features contribute to the effectiveness of the essay?
3. Dillard writes "we" in the third paragraph, indicating the first of several times she identifies with the weasel. What are the others? What is the effect of these identifications?
4. Notice Dillard's careful attention to detail and style. How do the juxtapositions in paragraph 5 and the particular details — especially in paragraphs 4 and 6 — contribute to her purpose?
5. Dillard uses the phrase "under the wild rose" several times in the essay. What effect does this repetition have on the piece as a whole?
6. What does Dillard mean by "the perfect freedom of single necessity" (par. 14)? She continues, "I think it would be well, and proper, and obedient, and pure, to grasp your one necessity and not let it go, to dangle from it limp wherever it takes you" (par. 15). What does she mean? What might be your "one necessity"? Do you agree with what she says about grasping it? Explain.

from The Future of Life

E. O. Wilson

In the following excerpt, from The Future of Life (2002), acclaimed scientist Edward O. Wilson composes a "letter" to Henry David Thoreau in which he considers Thoreau's relevance to our time.

Henry!

May I call you by your Christian name? Your words invite familiarity and make little sense otherwise. How else to interpret your insistent use of the first personal pronoun? I wrote this account, you say, here are my deepest thoughts, and no third person placed between us could ever be so well represented. Although Walden is sometimes oracular in tone, I don't read it, the way some do, as an oration to the multitude. Rather, it is a work of art, the testament of a citizen of Concord, in New England, from one place, one time, and one writer's personal circumstance that manages nevertheless to reach across five generations to address accurately the general human condition. Can there be a better definition of art? . . .

Now, prophet of the conservation movement, mentor of Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr., accept this tribute tardily given. Keen observer of the human condition, scourge of the philistine culture, Greek stoic adrift in the New World, you are reborn in each generation and vested with new meaning and nuance. Sage of Concord — Saint Henry, they sometimes call you — you've fairly earned your place in history.

On the other hand, you were not a great naturalist. (Forgive me!) Even had you kept entirely to natural history during your short life, you would have ranked well below William Bartram, Louis Agassiz, and that prodigious collector of North American plants John Torrey, and be scarcely remembered today. With longer life it would likely have been different, because you were building momentum in natural history rapidly when you left us. And to give you full credit, your ideas on succession and other properties of living communities pointed straight toward the modern science of ecology.

That doesn't matter now. I understand why you came to Walden Pond; your words are clear enough on that score. Granted, you chose this spot primarily to study nature. But you could have done that as easily and far more comfortably on daily excursions from your mother's house in Concord Center, half an hour's walk away, where in fact you did frequently repair for a decent meal. Nor was your little cabin meant to be a wilderness hermitage. No wilderness lay within easy reach anyway, and even the woods around Walden Pond had shrunk to their final thin margins by the 1840s. You called solitude your favorite companion. You were not afraid, you said, to be left to the mercy of your own thoughts. Yet you craved humanity passionately, and your voice is anthropocentric in mood and philosophy. Visitors to the Walden cabin were welcomed. Once a group of twenty-five or more crowded into the solitary room of the tiny house, shoulder to shoulder. You were not appalled by so much human flesh pressed together (but I am). You were lonely at times. The whistle of a passing train on the Fitchburg track and the distant rumble of oxcarts crossing a bridge must have given you comfort on cold, rainy days. Sometimes you went out looking for someone, anyone, in spite of your notorious shyness, just to have a conversation. You fastened on them, as you put it, like a bloodsucker.

In short, you were far from the hard-eyed frontiersman bearing pemmican and a long rifle. Frontiersmen did not saunter, botanize, and read Greek. So how did it happen that an amateur naturalist perched in a toy house on the edge of a ravaged woodland became the founding saint of the conservation movement? Here is what I believe happened. Your spirit craved an epiphany. You sought enlightenment and fulfillment the Old Testament way, by reduction of material existence to the fundamentals. The cabin was your cave on the mountainside. You used poverty to purchase a margin of free existence. It was the only method you could devise to seek the meaning in a life otherwise smothered by quotidian necessity and haste. You lived at Walden, as you said (I dare not paraphrase), 5 > to front only the essential facts of life, and see if I could not learn what it had to teach, and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not lived . . . to live deep > and suck out all the marrow of life, to live so sturdily and Spartan-like as to put to rout all that was not life, to cut a broad swath and shave close, to drive life into a corner, and reduce it to its lowest terms, and, if it proved to be mean, why then to get the whole and genuine meanness of it, and publish its meanness to the world; or if it were sublime, to know it by experience, and be able to give a true account of it in my next excursion.

You were mistaken, I think, to suppose that there are as many ways of life possible as radii that can be drawn from the center of a circle, and your choice just one of them. On the contrary, the human mind can develop along only a very few pathways imaginable. They are selected by satisfactions we instinctively seek in common. The sturdiness of human nature is the reason people plant flowers, gods live on high mountains, and a lake is the eye of the world through which — your metaphor — we can measure our own souls.

It is exquisitely human to search for wholeness and richness of experience. When these qualities are lost among the distracting schedules of everyday life, we seek them elsewhere. When you stripped your outside obligations to the survivable minimum, you placed your trained and very active mind in an unendurable vacuum. And this is the essence of the matter: in order to fill the vacuum, you discovered the human proclivity to embrace the natural world.

Your childhood experience told you exactly where to go. It could not be a local cornfield or gravel pit. Nor the streets of Boston, which, however vibrant as the hub of a growing nation, might cost a layabout his dignity and even his life. It had to be a world both tolerant of poverty and rich and beautiful enough to be spiritually rewarding. Where around Concord could that possibly be but a woodlot next to a lake?

You traded most of the richness of social existence for an equivalent richness of the natural world. The choice was entirely logical, for the following reason. Each of us finds a comfortable position somewhere along the continuum that ranges from complete withdrawal and self-absorption at one end to full civic engagement and reciprocity at the other. The position is never fixed. We fret, vacillate, and steer our lives through the riptide of countervailing instincts that press from both ends of the continuum. The uncertainty we feel is not a curse. It is not a confusion on the road out of Eden. It is just the human condition. We are intelligent mammals, fitted by evolution — by God, if you prefer — to pursue personal ends through cooperation. Our priceless selves and family first, society next. In this respect we are the polar opposite of your cabinside ants, bound together as replaceable parts of a superorganism. Our lives are therefore an insoluble problem, a dynamic process in search of an indefinable goal. They are neither a celebration nor a spectacle but rather, as a later philosopher put it, a predicament. Humanity is the species forced by its basic nature to make moral choices and seek fulfillment in a changing world by any means it can devise.

You searched for essence at Walden and, whether successful in your own mind or not, you hit upon an ethic with a solid feel to it; nature is ours to explore forever; 10 it is our crucible and refuge; it is our natural home; it is all these things. Save it, you said: in wildness is the preservation of the world.

Now, in closing this letter, I am forced to report bad news. (I put it off till the end.) The natural world in the year 2001 is everywhere disappearing before our eyes — cut to pieces, mowed down, slowed under, gobbled up, replaced by human artifacts.

No one in your time could imagine a disaster of this magnitude. Little more than a billion people were alive in the 1840s. They were overwhelmingly agricultural, and few families needed more than two or three acres to survive. The American frontier was still wide open. And far away on continents to the south, up great rivers, beyond unclimbed mountain ranges, stretched unspoiled equatorial forests brimming with the maximum diversity of life. These wildernesses seemed as unattainable and timeless as the planets and stars. That could not last, because the mood of Western civilization is Abrahamic. The explorers and colonists were guided by a biblical prayer: May we take possession of this land that God has provided and let it drip milk and honey into our mouths, forever.

Now, more than six billion people fill the world. The great majority are very poor; nearly one billion exist on the edge of starvation. All are struggling to raise the quality of their lives any way they can. That unfortunately includes the conversion of the surviving remnants of the natural environment. Half of the great tropical forests have been cleared. The last frontiers of the world are effectively gone. Species of plants and animals are disappearing a hundred or more times faster than before the coming of humanity, and as many as half may be gone by the end of this century. An Armageddon is approaching at the beginning of the third millennium. But it is not the cosmic war and fiery collapse of mankind foretold in sacred scripture. It is the wreckage of the planet by an exuberantly plentiful and ingenious humanity.

The race is now on between the technoscientific forces that are destroying the living environment and those that can be harnessed to save it. We are inside a bottleneck of overpopulation and wasteful consumption. If the race is won, humanity can emerge in far better condition than when it entered, and with most of the diversity of life still intact.

The situation is desperate — but there are encouraging signs that the race can be won. Population growth has slowed, and, if the present trajectory holds, is likely to peak between eight and ten billion people by century's end. That many people, experts tell us, can be accommodated with a decent standard of living, but just barely: the amount of arable land and water available per person, globally, is already declining. In solving the problem, other experts tell us, it should also be possible to shelter most of the vulnerable plant and animal species. 15

In order to pass through the bottleneck, a global land ethic is urgently needed. Not just any land ethic that might happen to enjoy agreeable sentiment, but one based on the best understanding of ourselves and the world around us that science and technology can provide. Surely the rest of life matters. Surely our stewardship is its only hope. We will be wise to listen carefully to the heart, then act with rational intention and all the tools we can gather and bring to bear.

Henry, my friend, thank you for putting the first element of that ethic in place. Now it is up to us to summon a more encompassing wisdom. The living world is dying; the natural economy is crumbling beneath our busy feet. We have been too self-absorbed to foresee the long-term consequences of our actions, and we will suffer a terrible loss unless we shake off our delusions and move quickly to a solution. Science and technology led us into this bottleneck. Now science and technology must help us find our way through and out.

You once said that old deeds are for old people, and new deeds are for new. I think that in historical perspective it is the other way around. You were the new and we are the old. Can we now be the wiser? For you, here at Walden Pond, the lamentation of the mourning dove and the green frog's t-r-r-oonk! across the predawn water were the true reason for saving this place. For us, it is an exact knowledge of what that truth is, all that it implies, and how to employ it to best effect. So, two truths. We will have them both, you and I and all those now and forever to come who accept the stewardship of nature.

Affectionately yours,
Edward
(2002)

Questions

1. Do you agree with E. O. Wilson's characterization of Walden as a work of art? Why or why not?
2. While Wilson's essay praises Thoreau, there are places where he is critical of the Thoreau "myth." Choose two. How does Wilson's critical attitude affect his ethos? Is it effective with the reader? Explain.
3. In paragraphs 7–9, Wilson discusses Thoreau's purpose. How accurate do you find his account? Use references to Walden to support your position.
4. Note the rhetorical shift in paragraph 11. How do you suppose Thoreau might react to this shift? How might he respond to Wilson's "bad news"?
5. Notice that Wilson begins his peroration by addressing his reader, "Henry, my friend." While Henry David Thoreau is nominally his audience, we know that the actual audience consists of contemporary twenty-first-century readers. How does Wilson's attitude toward his audience differ when addressing those different audiences? Be specific.
6. How would you paraphrase Wilson's main idea? Be specific.

Doing Nothing

Sue Monk Kidd

The following blog post, which considers the influence of Thoreau, is by Sue Monk Kidd, an author best known for her novels The Secret Life of Bees (2002) and The Invention of Wings (2013).

Last fall, after I finished writing The Mermaid Chair, I began to think fondly of doing nothing. I'd been working at a pretty high pitch for several years, writing, speaking and traveling, and I'd loved every moment of it, but honestly, now I felt tired down in my bones, in the wrinkles of gray matter in my brain. I was what you call spent.

The other day someone told me about seeing a prime time television commercial urging the American people to please, please take their vacations. Apparently the time we take for rest and renewal is shrinking; apparently we place our work at the top of the food chain and it tends to swallow up everything else.

In The Secret Life of Bees (page 57 to be exact), there's a line in which Lily says, "Next to Shakespeare, I love Thoreau best." I love Thoreau best, too. I read Walden when I was fifteen. Along with Kate Chopin's novel, The Awakening, it made the biggest impression on me of any book I read in my adolescence. As you probably know, Walden is Thoreau's account of seeking spiritual awakening by returning to a simple life beside Walden Pond in the New England woods. It is strange the way certain sentences from the book are still alive in me. Like this one:

> I went to the woods because I wished to live deliberately, to . . . see if I could not learn what it had to teach, and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not lived.

Since fifteen, I've harbored a secret and, I admit, highly romantic fantasy of going off like Thoreau to my own Walden Pond.

But as I considered an entire winter of doing nothing, I told my husband we better leap before I started looking around too much at all the things I had to do, before the urge to write the next book got to me. We ended up on an island along the coast of Florida, in a place by the sea where I leave the doors flung open to the sound of the waves, where early in the morning pelicans lap through the salted fog and dolphins spew their breath beyond the jetty. Every day I tell myself that I came here to see if I could live deliberately and learn what this place has to teach me.

I have been here seven weeks now. Of course my Thoreau experiment got the romance knocked out of it pretty early on. My car battery went dead — it did not distinguish between my regular life and my contemplative life. And so it seems to unfold nearly every day — the complexity and demands of life on earth intrude and I am pulled away from doing nothing to doing something. But still . . . still I am finding a slower rhythm establishing itself in me. 5

At the moment, I am writing to you from the lanai. In Georgia where I grew up, this would be called the porch; in Charleston, the piazza. What these things all have in common is that you sit on them and observe the breathing world. This newsletter is coming along slowly because I keep peering out at the water where the sun is hovering on the horizon. The first time I observed it sink into the gulf, I explained to my husband that it looked like a big orange, fizzing tablet that drops into the water and dissolves. He said by all means not to use that terrible metaphor in the newsletter. I am anyway because it makes me laugh. And because as bad as it is, the metaphor is apt. After the sun hits the water, light will splash up in effervescent patterns, moving across the sky. Most evenings I sit right here watching all this till I'm enclosed in darkness and awe.

I know now there really is a kind of loitering that is good for us. In Walden, Thoreau describes how he sat in his doorway for hours watching the pines and hickories and sumacs — essentially doing nothing — and proclaimed the experience far better than any work of his hands. Can you think of anything that seems more out of touch with the rushing world? Yet, he proclaims there's value in sitting there. Even when you recognize its value, it can be hard to practice this sort of thing. I understand that. I spent the first two weeks of my "nothing doing retreat" (as a friend of mine labeled it) fighting off the recurring idea that I was wasting time, that watching sun cycles and water heave itself onto the shore in repetitive sameness for hours on end is irrelevant.

Then one day on the lanai, I watched a vast migration of stingrays. They floated in the water for hours like great dark lily pads, and I watched with the vague sense of coming into sync with a deeper, slower, truer rhythm than the one I usually lived by. I began to see the relevance of doing nothing.

It's clear to me that the human soul is meant to move at a much slower pace than the world around it. When we lose touch with this pace, we can get what has been referred to in medical circles as "hurry sickness." It shows up in a whole array of symptoms and diseases. Since coming here my blood pressure has sunk to new lows.

And it is not just my body and spirit that need this episode of lavish rest, but my creativity. 10

It waxed for such a long season, but now it needed to wane in order to renew itself. I read an article years ago that said the mind had to rest in order for the brain to produce the chemicals necessary to think dynamic, new thoughts, otherwise we just keep recycling the same old tired ones. I have no idea if this is really true, but I think it must be. Right now, my creative mind is lying empty and fallow. I have plowed under all my ideas. With each day that passes, the feeling grows in me that the seed for my next book is lying in a fertile crevice deep inside, incubating. Waiting.

Meanwhile, here on the lanai, I notice the sun has finally disappeared and the afterglow is darkening toward night. I can no longer see my scribbles on the legal pad. I think, though, I've said what I wanted to say to you: how beautiful nothing can be.

(2008)

Questions

1. Do you think that Americans work too much, as Sue Monk Kidd suggests? Is there "a kind of loitering that is good for us" (par. 7)? Should we slow down, contemplate, and sometimes "do nothing," as she recommends?
2. Kidd says that Thoreau's Walden and Chopin's The Awakening were the books that made the strongest impressions on her when she was an adolescent. Which books have done that for you? From what you have read of Walden, how likely is it that it might be an important book for you?
3. In paragraph 3, Kidd quotes a famous passage from Walden: "I went to the woods because I wished to live deliberately, to . . . see if I could not learn what it had to teach, and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not lived." How does this particular statement express Kidd's purpose in her own life? Explain.
4. Kidd writes, "It's clear to me that the human soul is meant to move at a much slower pace than the world around it. When we lose touch with this pace, we can get what has been referred to in medical circles as 'hurry sickness.' It shows up in a whole array of symptoms and diseases" (par. 9). Have you experienced "hurry sickness"? Have you observed it? Do you agree with Kidd that slowing down can ameliorate its symptoms? Explain.

from Hamlet's BlackBerry

William Powers

The following passage is excerpted from "The Walden Zone," a chapter in Hamlet's BlackBerry: A Practical Philosophy for Building a Good Life in the Digital Age (2010), by contemporary journalist William Powers.

At a time of rapidly growing connectedness, Thoreau disconnected. He was the great escape artist, and escape would seem to be his message. If you want to take back your life, Get out! Or, as he puts it in Walden:

> I went to the woods because I wished to live deliberately, to front only the essential facts of life, and see if I could not learn what it had to teach, and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not lived. . . . I wanted to live deep and suck out all the marrow of life.

The essential problem hasn't changed, nor has the goal. Who doesn't want to live the fullest, deepest life they possibly can? For the overconnected soul wishing to apply Thoreau's message, however, the sticking point is his method. As a practical matter, not many people have the freedom to escape society — jobs, family, and other obligations — and hole up in the woods. In any case, very few of us want the pure solitude that Thoreau seems to be advocating when he writes, "I love to be alone. I never found the companion that was so companionable as solitude."

It's the rare person whose ideal of home is a cabin for one in a neighborhood without neighbors. Part of what's always been special and invigorating about the typical home is that it makes solitude available within the context of the larger social environment. It's an intermittent respite, a space into which one retreats briefly at regular intervals, to emerge later refreshed.

Today there's another factor that makes Thoreau's approach seem not just unappealing but downright pointless. Even if we wanted to run away physically from society, in a digital world there's no place to go. With ubiquitous mobile connectivity, you can't use geography to escape what he called society, because it's everywhere. If you have a screen of any kind with you — and who doesn't these days? — you haven't left society at all.

But to dismiss Thoreau for these reasons is to miss the whole point of Walden and its relevance to our time. In fact, he wasn't trying to escape civilization, and what he created at Walden Pond was not even close to pure solitude. As for ubiquitous technology, it's true that the world was a lot less connected in the middle of the nineteenth century than it is today. However, Thoreau lived through a major technological shift, the arrival of instant communication, that foreshadowed the current one. The woods weren't wireless in his era, but for the first time in history they were getting wired, and the wires were carrying information around the world at unimaginable speeds. Thoreau saw the enormous human implications of this change, and he structured the Walden experiment so that it spoke not just to his own time but to the technological future he saw coming. 5

In a world where it's increasingly hard to escape the crowd, can you still build a refuge, a place to go inward and reclaim all the things that a too-busy life takes away? Thoreau says you can, and he offers a practical construct for making it happen. . . .

But can we apply Walden to our time? Thoreau may have been close to town, but he wasn't holed up with the rest of the planet, as we are with our screens. Given that digital technology has so altered the landscape of modern life, and particularly life at home, is it a stretch to think Thoreau could have anything useful to say to us?

Not at all. Though it's true that he lived in a very different information environment from today's, he and his friends and neighbors really were living close to the rest of the planet in a new way. Previously, information could travel only as quickly as the swiftest mode of physical transportation, which was trains. With the arrival of the telegraph in the 1840s, messages could suddenly dart from place to place instantaneously. Oceans, deserts, and mountain ranges were no longer barriers. All it took was a wire. The notion that one could now theoretically keep up with anything and everything happening on Earth, and around the clock, was both thrilling and unsettling. An East Coast American of Thoreau's generation wasn't just increasingly connected to the wide world, he was increasingly immersed in it, and he needed to manage that immersion. What to read? What to care about?

This was a subtle but significant shift in the nature of inward life, and everyone was grappling with it. "A slender wire has become the highway of thought," observed the New York Times in an editorial published on September 14, 1852.

> Messages follow each other in quick succession. Joy spreads on the track of sorrow. The arrival of a ship, news of a revolution, or a battle, the price of pork, the state of foreign and domestic markets, missives of love, the progress of courts, the success or discomfiture of disease, the result of elections, and an innumerable host of social, political and commercial details, all chase each other over the slender and unconscious wires.

With a little updating of the language, this could be a description of the moment-by-moment randomness now offered by any digital screen. There was simply a great deal more information bearing down on everyone, and even the home was no safe haven. In The Victorian Internet, a history of the telegraph, Tom Standage quotes W. E. Dodge, a prominent telegraph-era businessman from New York, describing the plight of a family man battling information overload: 10

> The merchant goes home after a day of hard work and excitement to a late dinner, trying amid the family circle to forget business, when he is interrupted by a telegram from London, directing, perhaps, the purchase in San Francisco of 20,000 barrels of flour, and the poor man must dispatch his dinner as hurriedly as possible in order to send off his message to California. The businessman of the present day must be continually on the jump.

In other words, the telegraph was the latest agent of the "quiet desperation" that Thoreau saw all around him and felt in himself. Devices meant to relieve burdens were imposing new ones, pulling people away from life's most meaningful experiences, including the family dinner table. "But lo! men have become the tools of their tools," he wrote, and though he wasn't specifically referring to the telegraph, elsewhere in Walden he made it clear that the slender wire could make tools out of people. New technologies, he said, are often just "pretty toys, which distract our attention from serious things. . . . We are in great haste to construct a magnetic telegraph from Maine to Texas; but Maine and Texas, it may be, have nothing important to communicate." Yet at other times, he wrote about the telegraph in a hopeful, lyrical way, suggesting he saw the wonder of the technology and perhaps its potential to do good. "As I went under the new telegraph wire, I heard it vibrating like a harp high overhead," he noted in his journal. "It was as the sound of a far-off glorious life."

Naturalist that he was, it's often assumed that Thoreau loathed technology. In fact he was a sophisticated user, and occasionally a designer, of technologies. He never made much money from writing and supported himself by working in two different tool-intensive fields: as a surveyor and in the pencil-manufacturing business owned by his family. At one point he took on the ambitious project of reengineering the Thoreau pencil so it might fare better in a competitive marketplace. He worked hard on it, conducting extensive research into why certain European-made pencils were so superior to their American counterparts. Based on what he learned, he changed the materials, design, and manufacturing process of his company's pencils, essentially developing a brand-new product. His efforts were a great success, producing

"the very best lead pencils manufactured in America" at the time, according to Henry Petroski's The Pencil, a history of the tool.

Thoughtful student of technology that he was, Thoreau saw that as the latest connective devices extended their reach into the lives of individuals, they were exacting huge costs. They're the same costs we're paying today — extreme busyness and a consequent loss of depth. The more wired people became, the more likely they were to fill up their minds with junk and trivia. What if we built this fabulous global telegraph network, he wondered, and then used it only to keep up on gossip about celebrities? "We are eager to tunnel under the Atlantic and bring the Old World some weeks nearer to the New; but perchance the first news that will leak through into the broad, flapping American ear will be that the Princess Adelaide has the whooping cough. After all, the man whose horse trots a mile a minute does not carry the most important messages."

That is, he saw that instant communication had the potential to exacerbate the very problem he had gone to Walden to solve, the superficial, short-attention-span approach to life that afflicted his friends and neighbors and often himself. They were all living from one emergency to the next, he writes at one point, consumed by their work, always checking the latest news. . . .

Once the consciousness was hooked on busyness and external stimuli, Thoreau 15 saw, it was hard to break the habit. Never mind the telegraph, even the post office could become an addiction, as he observed in a speech:

> Surface meets surface. When our life ceases to be inward and private, conversation degenerates into mere gossip. . . . In proportion as our inward life fails, we go more constantly and desperately to the post-office. You may depend on it, that the poor fellow who walks away with the greatest number of letters proud of his extensive correspondence has not heard from himself this long while.

This is the problem of our time, too, of course. And it's what he went to Walden to solve. The mission: to see if, by building a home at a slight distance from society — disconnected, yet still connected in many ways — and living there thoughtfully, he could go back inward, regaining the depth and joy that was being leached out of everyday life.

Among all those who were struggling with this challenge in the mid–nineteenth century, Thoreau was unusually well situated to find an answer. Concord was the center of American Transcendentalism, a philosophical movement that provided a rich vein of pertinent ideas. Transcendentalists believed that true enlightenment does not come from other people or outward sources such as organized religion, scientific observation, and books; rather, it comes from within. The profoundest truths about existence are available to each of us through intuition and reflection.

It was a philosophy that spoke directly to a time when trains and telegraph lines, as well as industrialization and other forces of modernity, were pulling people in exactly the opposite direction — outward. The crowd seemed terribly important and powerful in those days, just as it does now, and it was hard to resist its influence. It was as if you had no choice but to submit, fall in line. The Transcendentalists believed that resistance was crucial. Emerson, the movement's leading figure, wrote in his great essay "Self-Reliance" that to be truly happy and productive, you have to tune out the crowd and listen to "the voices which we hear in solitude." In another piece, Emerson described a Transcendentalist as a person who essentially wakes up one day and realizes, "My life is superficial, takes no root in the deep world." And then does something about it.

Guided by this philosophy, the Walden project was really an exercise in practical reengineering. In this case, the device that needed redesigning wasn't a pencil but life itself. Thoreau's method was to strip away the layers of complexity that outer life imposes, to "Simplify, simplify," as he wrote, and, in so doing, recover that lost depth. As Thoreau scholar Bradley P. Dean puts it, "By simplifying our outward lives, we are freer and better able to expand and enrich our inward lives."

The heart of the effort, serving as both headquarters and object lesson, was 20
Thoreau's tiny house and the life he constructed there. It was seriously spartan, reflecting the simplicity creed. But there was another kind of simplicity that mattered even more than the material kind: simplicity of the mind. Though the house was right in the midst of civilization, close to town, in sight of the railroad, and within easy reach of visitors, he defined it as a zone of inwardness, and that's what it became. . . .

Zoning is way overdue for a comeback, a digital revival, and it's surprising it hasn't happened yet. Thoreau could be the model. Our situation is different from his, in that the crowd is no longer just nearby — it's right in the home, wherever there's a screen. So our zoning has to be interior. Every home could have at least one Walden Zone, a room where no screens of any kind are allowed. Households that take their tranquillity seriously, and have sufficient room, might designate such a space for each person. There could be a shelf or cabinet outside the doorway where, upon entering, all smart phones and laptops are turned off and put away.

The wireless signals in those rooms won't go away, of course, and that's a problem. But as with Thoreau, the point of the zone is to use an idea as a constraint on behavior. For a Walden Zone to work, you first have to believe it's a good idea; once you do, it's a lot easier to resist temptation. The mind puts up an invisible wall, which blocks the invisible signal. Technology could help, too. Perhaps a canny entrepreneur with an eye to the Thoreauvian future will come up with a device that scrambles wireless signals in any designated space.

The opposite of a Walden Zone would be a Crowd Zone, any room specifically designated for screen life. Home offices would be automatic Crowd Zones for most people. Since the kitchen is a natural gathering place in many homes, it's a good Crowd Zone candidate. In a thoughtfully zoned house, a kitchen with floor-to-ceiling wall screens begins to make sense. Connectedness is much more appealing and rewarding when you know there's a place nearby to get away to.

Another option is whole-house zoning, in which the entire dwelling becomes a Walden Zone during certain times of the day or certain days of the week. This requires more commitment, as it means truly swearing off screens during designated times. The advantage of this approach is that it creates a genuine refuge, as Thoreau's house must have been on quiet winter nights when the town seemed a thousand miles away. My family has had great success with a regimen of this kind. . . .

The point is not to withdraw from the world but within the world. It's funny that Thoreau, of all people, should be the source of this wisdom. But remember, Walden was just a two-year experiment. When it was done, he returned to society and lived the rest of his life there. But he took a valuable piece of knowledge with him: you can go home again, whenever you need sanctuary, so long as you have a home that serves this purpose. It doesn't have to be far off in the woods or up in the mountains or anywhere special. It's not the place that matters, it's the philosophy. To be happy in the crowd, everyone needs a little Walden. 25

"You think that I am impoverishing myself by withdrawing from men," Thoreau once wrote in his journal, "but in my solitude I have woven for myself a silken web or chrysalis, and, nymph-like, shall ere long burst forth a more perfect creature, fitted for a higher society."

(2010)

Questions

1. William Powers writes, "But to dismiss Thoreau for these reasons is to miss the whole point of Walden and its relevance to our time" (par. 5). What are "these reasons" to which he refers? Briefly summarize them. Do you agree with him?
2. Why does Powers call Thoreau's stay at Walden Pond the "Walden experiment" (par. 5)?
3. Powers asks, "But can we apply Walden to our time? . . . [I]s it a stretch to think Thoreau could have anything useful to say to us?" and then answers, "Not at all" (pars. 7–8). How adequately does Powers support his own answer to what seems to be a rhetorical question? Be specific.
4. Powers quotes from an 1852 New York Times editorial and from The Victorian Internet, a history of the telegraph, and writes of the editorial, "With a little updating . . . , this could be a description of the moment-by-moment randomness now offered by any digital screen" (par. 10). Rewrite both passages, updating the details. Then assess the validity of Powers's claim.
5. Powers writes, "Devices meant to relieve burdens were imposing new ones, pulling people away from life's most meaningful experiences" (par. 11). Have you observed or experienced this phenomenon? Do you agree with what Powers writes about our modern, "plugged-in" world: that we suffer from "extreme busyness and a consequent loss of depth" and that "[t]he more wired people became, the more likely they were to fill up their minds with junk and trivia" (par. 13)? Explain.
6. What does Powers mean by "simplicity of the mind" (par. 20)?
7. Do you agree with Powers that having a "Walden Zone" (par. 21) would be a good thing? Why or why not?
8. As he concludes this selection, Powers writes, "It doesn't have to be far off in the woods or up in the mountains or anywhere special. It's not the place that matters, it's the philosophy. To be happy in the crowd, everyone needs a little Walden"

(par. 25). "In "Self-Reliance" (p. 590), Thoreau's friend and neighbor Ralph Waldo Emerson writes, "It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinion; it is easy in solitude to live after our own; but the great man is he who in the midst of the crowd keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude." Compare the ideas expressed in those statements. Do you agree with them? Explain.

My Walden, My Walmart

Crispin Sartwell

The following op-ed piece by philosophy professor and writer Crispin Sartwell appeared in the New York Times on May 2, 2012.

I'm a Thoreauvian philosopher. I realize that sounds pretentious, but I do live more or less alone in the woods, in an old one-room schoolhouse amid orchards, trying to "front" nature. I've actually had several Waldens here in central Pennsylvania, though as it happens, none of them have ever been too far from a Walmart. And since I'm constantly in there, I probably shouldn't pretend I hate it.

One day, somewhere near the peanut butter, I ran into my occasional acquaintance Greg.

"Hey, man!" I said. "Nice day."

"Is it? I can't deal with it, nice or not," Greg offered in return, tossing piles of two-for-one items into the cart, as one does when one has three daughters at home. "It's the change. I'm not ready." It turned out he was referring to the simultaneous menopause of his wife and puberty of his middle girl. Nothing he could say or do, he claimed, didn't cause the people he loved to scream in his face, burst into tears and run to their rooms.

Now, the degree of intimacy Greg and I mustered near the peanut butter might 5 appear excessive, though it was encouraged by the fact that we are both guys and share, though not with Thoreau, the experience of raising daughters.

It was also made possible by the excellent social vibe of a Walmart in small-town America. I'm liable to see Greg again sometime around Christmas. I'll tell him I'm having prostate issues, or that I'm under indictment, or whatever it may be that day.

We are at a cultural moment when living in close proximity and having many close friends and a ceaseless embracing community are thought to be unalloyed goods. "Bowling alone" is our shorthand for personal despair and social disintegration.

However, as I dare say you — like Jean-Paul Sartre[1] — have noticed, people can be annoying. We need distance from, as much as we need association with, one another. Thoreau tried for both: he would walk from Walden Pond to Concord, hang out with his dear friends the Emersons and the Alcotts, and then retreat to his hovel to be fairly happily alone.

[1]Twentieth-century French existentialist writer and philosopher who included in his play No Exit the famous line "Hell is other people." — Eds.

If on such occasions Thoreau was thinking in his reflective way that human beings are animals and that what we do is natural, then he did not consider his stroll into Concord a departure from nature but an exploration of a bit of it. And this is the way I feel about Walmart, which — big-box island in a blacktop sea — is a perfectly natural object, as much an environment as my woods.

Walmart is no Concord. And if Greg will pardon my saying so, he is no 10
Emerson or Alcott, though possibly he is a better golfer than either. Then again, he is also not my dear friend. He's just a guy I'm happy to run across in Walmart. He's generous enough to give me sudden access to his life, without placing me under an obligation to do anything more than giggle and cluck. Ours is a perfectly good, serviceable relationship, shaped as it is by long aisles of distracting merchandise and extensive shopping lists.

Like Thoreau, I am an anarchist berry picker. Like Thoreau, I lack both easy charm and extreme social desperation, the very features of personality that fit human beings for society. Like Thoreau, I am trying to reduce my expenses to something close to my income.

Unlike Thoreau, I have cable. Yet Thoreau and I commune, more or less the same way that Greg and I do, across space and time. And that's how I can assure you that, if Thoreau were around today, he'd be pushing a cart through a Walmart three miles from Walden Pond with a bag of socks, a gallon of milk and a Blu-ray player, nodding pleasantly at people he sort of recognizes.

(2012)

Questions

1. How does Crispin Sartwell's use of humor contribute to the effectiveness of this piece?
2. How does Sartwell compare Concord with Walmart? Is he making an analogy between Henry David Thoreau and himself? Explain.
3. Do you agree with Sartwell's concluding remark? Why or why not?
4. What is Sartwell's main point? Do you agree with him?

from Walden on Wheels
On the Open Road from Debt to Freedom

Ken Ilgunas

Adapted from Walden on Wheels: On the Open Road from Debt to Freedom (2013), a memoir by Ken Ilgunas, the following article appeared in the New York Times on April 10, 2013.

Could I live in a van? I looked over the Craigslist ads, took a bus to John's used car dealership in Raleigh, N.C., and scanned the rows of sedans, trucks and SUVs in search of my new home. And there it was. A giant 1994 Ford Econoline coated with a burgundy sheen, the sun turning its black-tinted windows a blinding white. It looked out of place among the shiny, spotless SUVs, whose bumpers proudly faced away, as if exhibiting a juvenile disdain for their ponderous elder. Its distended underbelly hung vulnerably low — so low I wondered if it would scrape its undercarriage when climbing up and over speed bumps.

It was big, it was beautiful and, best of all, it was only $1,500.

While the ad promised that the van "drives great," it had more than enough problems to justify its price tag: one of the two side doors wouldn't open, there were large patches on the windows where the tint had peeled off, and the tires were bald — so bald that, later on, when I went to buy a part at Sears, a couple of mechanics doubled over in laughter when I asked them if they thought the tires would pass inspection.

"I'll take it," I told John anyway, unable to hold back my grin. Despite its deformities, it was love at first sight.

I had been accepted into Duke's graduate liberal studies program, but I couldn't 5 afford it. I had just paid off my $32,000 undergraduate debt, I was nearly broke, and the prospect of taking out loans was unthinkable. Going back into debt made about as much sense as running out of a burning building just to run into another.

Today, the cost of higher education is ridiculous. Average tuition at a public university, in state, is $8,655. At a private, it's $29,056. My program would cost, in total, a reasonable $11,000 after grant aid. But it's not just tuition that puts students into debt; it's room and board. At Duke, where rates are similar to universities across the country, a non-air-conditioned dorm with two roommates costs $5,464 an academic year. The cheapest meal plan for freshmen is a ghastly $5,540, or $27 a day.

When I added up the costs of tuition, books, transportation, food, housing, not to mention car insurance, utilities and, dare I say, a date, I felt hopeless. I had only $4,000 to my name and no possessions except a backpack full of camping gear. But as desperate as I was, I was determined to go back to school.

Which brought me back to: Could I live in a van?

The van-dwelling lifestyle, I figured, would eliminate many of the costs. For Internet and electricity, I'd use the library. For showers, I'd buy a cheap campus gym membership. For food, I'd cook my own meals. For rent, well, I wouldn't have any rent. For dates, well, I probably wouldn't have any of them, either.

Seven and a half years before, when I had enrolled at the University at Buffalo as 10 an undergraduate, I wasn't the sort of person who would have done something as bold and weird and possibly illegal as secretly living in a big creepy van on a college campus. But something had changed on my journey to get out of debt.

Along with owing $32,000, I'd graduated with an unmarketable degree in history and English. Naturally, I struggled to find work and wound up taking a $9-an-hour job as a tour guide and cook at a remote truck stop called Coldfoot in Alaska's Arctic. But while I took the job out of desperation, I'd accidentally placed myself in a near-ideal situation to pay off my debt. In Coldfoot, the nearest store was 250 miles away (eliminating all temptations to buy stuff), there was no cellphone reception (making a phone plan unnecessary), and workers got free room and board (no food, rent or utility costs). After a year, I had paid off $18,000. A year later, I got a better-paying seasonal job with the Park Service. After two and a half years of work, I was debt free.

But my journey wasn't just a financial awakening. I had learned about subsistence living in Arctic villages, and worked with a 74-year-old maintenance man who lived in his 1980 Chevy Suburban year-round. I began to bring into question what passed for "normal" down in the lower 48, especially when it often led to a lifetime of work, bills and Bed Bath & Beyond purchases. Out of debt, I felt for the first time that my life was my own, and that I could do whatever I wished with it.

And more than anything I wished to use this freedom to continue the liberal arts education that had put me into so much debt. While the cost of my education had chained my ankles to the steel balls of debt, the liberal arts had freed some other part of me. Between a Thoreauvian van-dwelling experiment and studying the great thinkers, I thought Duke would help me become a better person. Living in a van wouldn't just be a way for me to afford school. It would be an adventure. It would be my "Walden on Wheels."

"Could I live in a van?" I asked myself one last time. Why the hell not?

The spring semester would start in just a couple of days, so I spent a day making the van as comfortable as I could. I removed the two middle pilot seats to create living space, brought in a plastic storage container to hold my possessions, neatly folded all my clothes into my suitcase, and bought a big black cloth to hang behind my driver and passenger seats so that no one could see me inside. 15

I knew I had the personality for van dwelling. I'd developed a comfort with tight quarters, a sixth sense for cheapness and a tolerance for squalor that was (I hate to brag) unequaled. I had the physical constitution for it, too: I was blessed with a high tolerance for cold temperatures, practically no sense of smell and a bladder (I hate to brag) the size of a football.

But the first few weeks didn't match up with my romantic vision of a Waldenesque life of ancient texts and quiet solitude. I was assigned to the Mill Lot, a parking lot in the middle of a busy shopping district, a mile from campus, in the heart of Durham. I parked in between a college bar and an apartment building within eyeshot of office windows where men and women in business attire, I worried, might discover me.

Although the lot was rarely visited, I was constantly paranoid about getting discovered. Because I didn't know what Duke would say if it learned of my experiment, I was determined to keep the van a secret. I wouldn't tell anyone. And to ensure "stealth," as van dwellers call it (see the Yahoo message board "VanDwellers"), each morning I lifted up the blinds and looked out the windows to make sure no one saw me leave the van, and I didn't re-enter until late at night. Whenever the subject of my home came up in conversations with fellow students, I lied my pants off.

My secret was making it impossible to make friends, I was sleeping in temperatures as low as 10 degrees, and as a bachelor living in tight quarters, I was constantly inhaling air riddled with strange odors. Worst of all, I felt a terrible loneliness settle deep into me. To compensate, I began to sing and talk to myself with unprecedented frequency.

My main concern, though, was my dwindling money supply. After my first week of purchases — the van, books, school fees, car insurance, food and a cellphone bill — I had less than $1,000 left in savings and $2,000 to pay in tuition. I had nothing else to cut back on, so I tried to eat as little as possible. Walking back from the library one night, I spotted a few mangled slices of pizza lying in a box on the lawn. A savage hunger roared in my belly. Has it already come to this? 20

My worries were temporarily alleviated when I became a paid "study participant" for Duke's neuroscience department. Several times a week, for $10 an hour, I was zapped by electrodes, pricked by needles and dazed by pharmaceuticals. Shamelessly, I donated three of my four primary bodily fluids. Later, I found out about studies that paid $20 an hour to perform cognitive tests inside an M.R.I.

Though the van-dwelling lifestyle had its share of hardships, I adapted. On my isobutane backpacking stove, I cooked lavish meals each night, usually some combination of vegetables, noodles and peanut butter. I had only one pot, so all my meals were stews: spaghetti stew, rice and bean stew, vegetable stew, with healthy, calorie-dense dollops of peanut butter mixed in. For breakfast, I'd have cereal with powdered milk, and for lunch I'd make sandwiches and carry them to campus. At the gym, I showered, shaved and brushed my teeth, and filled up large water bottles for cooking.

I washed my clothes every few weeks at a laundromat a short walk from my parking space, and I did all of my studying at the campus library, where I used the free Wi-Fi and charged up my electronics. The van offered no protection from the cold, but once I shivered into my thermal underwear and slipped into my sleeping bag, burritoed in my own body heat, I'd fall into a deep and peaceful slumber.

The van-dwelling lifestyle proved to be as affordable as I'd suspected. I was able to eat for $4.34 a day and I lived on $103 a week. My finances became even more manageable when I got a part-time job tutoring at an inner-city elementary school.

I didn't buy my first meal at a restaurant until more than halfway through the semester, on a weeklong trip to a field station for my "Biodiversity in North Carolina" class. The day before I was to go, my mother sent me an e-mail reminding me about my tax return. I'd get a refund! It was a $1,600 golden ticket that Uncle Sam was going to slip into my bank account. I was rich. This was a turning point, I realized. I had financial security for the first time in months. I'm not poor anymore, I thought nostalgically. 25

Knowing that my tax refund was coming, I slackened my Spartan standards: I bought a case of beer, I dined at a restaurant twice, and at the field station I slept in a heated room on a comfortable bed. But treating myself made me feel a strange sense of guilt, as if I'd cut some corner I promised myself I wouldn't cut. During my third night at the station, beleaguered with self-reproach, I dragged my sleeping bag outside and slept on the pavement under the stars. I didn't need these things. The beer, the food or even the bed. I didn't even really want them. I was buying stuff simply because I could afford it. If you put a man in a country club, he'll feel the need for a yacht. But if you drop him in the wilderness, his desires will be only those essential to his survival. I had decided not to take out loans for graduate school in part because I knew that if I allowed myself access to easy money, I'd again fall victim to the consumerist trap. I'd be indiscreet with my money. I'd begin to pay for and rely on things I thought I needed but didn't. I'd lose perspective. I didn't want to once again be swallowed whole by the dominant culture, accepting its norms and values and desires as my own.

I knew what I was missing in my life. It wasn't things. It wasn't heat, plumbing, an iPhone or a plasma-screen TV. It was people. It was a community. It was a meaningful role to play in society. And these were things — as much as I wanted them — that I knew I could temporarily do without.

When not at work or in class, I would lie in bed for hours, reading, thinking, doing nothing, enjoying the solitude, staring at the ceiling, idly musing, unworried about feeling industrious or useful. I pondered everything from the Milky Way to the fallen crumb on my floor.

Oh, and the liberal arts. Studying liberal arts, after years spent working at far-flung camps that didn't have as much as a stack of used books, felt like vital fare for a famished soul. I read Rousseau and Diogenes and Thoreau, and my liberal arts education, as well as the education of living in a van, came together like two rivers meeting at a confluence and flowing together as one.

After the semester, I went back to Alaska for the summer, where I worked and 30 filled up my depleted bank account. As the fall approached, I looked up rates of apartments around Duke. But I began to think of how my van had begun to feel less like an experiment and more like a real home. I remembered the half-dozen dogwood trees that shadowed my parking spot and bore branches heavy with thick, lustrous white flowers, and how they buzzed with a million bumblebees and smelled of a woman's hair. I'd remember how, on mornings, I'd awake to a medley of birdsong so loud and cheery you'd think my little hermitage was tucked away in a copse of trees at Walden Pond.

To me, Thoreau's cabin wasn't just a home; it was the reimagining of a life; it was the conviction that we can turn the wildest figments of our imagination into something real. And I knew that whether I'd come to live in a home on wheels or in one fastened to the ground, I'd in some sense be a van dweller for life.

That fall semester, I asked myself, "Could I live in a van?"

Could I not?

(2013)

Questions

1. What are Ken Ilgunas's reasons for living in a van? How do they compare with Thoreau's reasons for living in a cabin? Why does Ilgunas call his enterprise a "Thoreauvian van-dwelling experiment" (par. 13)? Why would he title his book Walden on Wheels?

2. When Ilgunas received his tax refund, he spent his money on what Thoreau would call "luxuries," only to report, "I didn't need these things" (par. 26). What does Ilgunas's experiment teach him about "economy," as Thoreau saw it?
3. Ilgunas writes, "To me, Thoreau's cabin wasn't just a home; it was the reimagining of a life; it was the conviction that we can turn the wildest figments of our imagination into something real" (par. 31). Near the end of Walden, Thoreau writes, "If you have built castles in the air, your work need not be lost; that is where they should be. Now put the foundations under them." Compare those two statements. To what extent does Ilgunas's experiment respond to what Thoreau enjoins?
4. What is the main point Ilgunas wishes to leave with his readers? What is your overall response to his piece? Is it admirable? Realistic? Could you see yourself becoming a Thoreau for our time, as Ilgunas has? Explain.

Making Connections

1. Imagine that Bill McKibben (p. 759) and Annie Dillard (p. 785) could respond to "A Short History of America" by Robert Crumb (p. 783). What might each of them say?
2. Compare and contrast the perspectives on Thoreau presented by McKibben and William Powers (p. 795).
3. Compare and contrast E. B. White's (p. 779) and E. O. Wilson's (p. 788) "letters" to Thoreau. Which one do you prefer? Why?
4. Sue Monk Kidd (p. 793) writes about "her Thoreau experiment"; Powers discusses "the Walden experiment"; Ken Ilgunas (p. 802) writes about his "Thoreauvian van-dwelling experiment." What is the significance of the word choice in each case?
5. In two different places in her essay, Dillard deliberately evokes Thoreau's Walden. Identify the passages and discuss their effect on her meaning.
6. Compare Kidd and Ilgunas on their ideas of "doing nothing."
7. Compare the perspectives of Wilson, Kidd, and Powers. What ideas do they share? How do they differ?

Entering the Conversation

As you respond to each of the following prompts, support your position with appropriate evidence, including at least three of the sources in this Conversation on the legacy of Thoreau, unless otherwise indicated.

1. In his 2008 book, Promised Land: Thirteen Books That Changed America, Jay Parini writes, "Walden presents a challenge on every page, as Thoreau lays down the gauntlet, saying: Look at me. Then look at yourself. Are you living up to your potential? Are you learning from life what it really has to teach? Have you fronted the essentials in your own fashion?" Do you feel that challenge as you read Walden? Write an essay that examines the validity of Parini's claim.

2. In The Thoreau You Didn't Know (2009), Robert Sullivan imagines Thoreau in modern America, and asks:

> Would he blog? Would he but fish only from sustainable industries when ordering seafood at a restaurant? Would he use Google or Yahoo! Or another web browser, since Google depends on hydroelectric power that affects salmon runs in the Pacific Northwest, and would he use a Blackberry in a restaurant or wait until he got outside or back to his hotel room? Most crucially, perhaps, what kind of car would Thoreau drive?

Why do you suppose the legacy of Thoreau is so strong that a writer would even pose such questions? How would you answer two of them?

3. "In one book . . . he surpasses everything we have had in America," Robert Frost said of Thoreau. Based on your knowledge of American literature, defend or challenge Frost's claim.

4. An 1854 review of Walden in the Boston Daily Journal begins, "This is a remarkable book." The review concludes, "But while many will be fascinated by its contents, few will be improved . . . the best that can be said of the work in its probable effects is, that while many will be charmed by the descriptive powers of the author, and will smile at his extravagant ideas, few will be influenced by his opinions. This is a negative virtue in a book which might do much mischief if the author could establish a bond of sympathy with the reader." What do you suppose could be the "mischief" that the book might do? Write an essay that supports or refutes the assertions made in the review.

5. "The Criminalization of Natural Play," a chapter from Last Child in the Woods (2008) by contemporary environmentalist and educator Richard Louv, begins with an epigraph from Walden: "For many years I was self-appointed inspector of snowstorms and rainstorms." Complaining about ever-increasing restrictions on play and access to nature for children, Louv writes, "They want to let their imaginations run; they want to see where a stream of water takes them." Why would the example of Henry David Thoreau serve as a good one for children today?

6. Thoreau discusses "modern improvements" (note that he puts the phrase in quotation marks) and says, "As if the main object were to talk fast and not to talk sensibly. We are eager to tunnel under the Atlantic and bring the old world some weeks nearer to the new: but perchance the first news that will leak through into the broad, flapping American ear will be that the Princess Adelaide has the whooping cough" (par. 27). Later on, he disparages the telegraph and the post office. One might wonder whether Neil Postman had Thoreau in mind when writing in Amusing Ourselves to Death that "the contribution of the telegraph to public discourse was to dignify irrelevance and amplify impotence." Write an essay in which you consider the implications of Thoreau's and Postman's statements as they relate to contemporary society. Use your own observation and experience as evidence to support your argument.

7. As noted in the introduction to this Conversation, Thoreau's legacy may be seen as fivefold: he is a model of self-reliance, of political integrity, of transcendentalist belief, of environmentalist concern, and of visionary thinking. Which of these do you see as the most important? Explain why.

8. In "Walden: Living Deliberately," Bill McKibben writes, "In the 154 years since Walden, Thoreau has become ever more celebrated in theory and ever more ignored in practice" (par. 7). Write an essay in which you defend, challenge, or qualify McKibben's assertion.

Grammar as Rhetoric and Style

Cumulative, Periodic, and Inverted Sentences

Most of the time, writers of English use the following standard sentence patterns:

Subject/Verb (SV)

S V

The man nodded. —Harriet Beecher Stowe

Subject/Verb/Subject complement (SVC)

S V C

Society is a wave. —Ralph Waldo Emerson

Subject/Verb/Direct object (SVO)

S V O

Haley gave an uneasy growl. —Harriet Beecher Stowe

Subject/Verb/Indirect object/Direct object (SVIO)

S V I O

[you understood] Tell me that. —Herman Melville

To make longer sentences, writers often coordinate two or more of the standard sentence patterns or subordinate one sentence pattern to another. To make longer sentences, writers often coordinate two or more of the standard sentence patterns using a coordinating conjunction such as and, but, or so, or subordinate one sentence pattern or another. (See the grammar lesson about subordination on p. 836.) Here are examples of both techniques.

Coordinating patterns

S V O
The woman's passionate exclamations collected a crowd around her, and the trader briefly explained to them the cause of the agitation.
S V O

—Harriet Beecher Stowe

S V
A mass of people, inactive, except as applauding spectators, hemmed the procession in, and several women ran along the sidewalks, piercing the confusion of heavier sounds, with their shrill voices of mirth or terror.
O S V

—Nathaniel Hawthorne

S V O S V C
At last he broke the silence, and that was a relief to both of us.

—Harriet Jacobs

Subordinating one pattern to another

S V C S V
It was a bright, tranquil evening when the boat stopped at the wharf at Louisville.

—Harriet Beecher Stowe

S V ┌──────────O──────────┐
While the editors argue that the slaves were in fact the prime movers of emancipation, nowhere do they deny Lincoln's centrality to the events that culminated in universal freedom.
S V ┌──O──┐

—Ira Berlin

S V O S V C
When I wrote the following pages, or rather the bulk of them, I lived alone, in the woods, a mile from any neighbor, in a house which I had built myself, on the shore of Walden Pond, in Concord, Massachusetts, and earned my living by the labor of my hands only.
V O

—Henry David Thoreau

┌──S──┐
Approaching Concord, doing forty, doing forty-five, doing fifty, the steering wheel
V O V S
held snug in my palms, the highway held grimly in my vision, the crown of the road now serving me (on the righthand curves), now defeating me (on the lefthand curves), I began to rouse myself from the stupefaction which a day's motor journey induces. —E. B. White

S┌── V ──┐ O

One disadvantage of sticking with standard sentence patterns, coordinating them or subordinating them, is that several standard sentences in a row become monotonous. So writers break out of the standard patterns now and then by using a more unusual pattern, such as the cumulative sentence, the periodic sentence, or the inverted sentence. When you use one of these sentence patterns, you call attention to that sentence because its pattern contrasts significantly with those of the sentences surrounding it. You can use unusual sentence patterns to emphasize a point, as well as to control sentence rhythm, increase tension, or create a dramatic impact. In other words, using an unusual pattern helps you avoid monotony in your writing.

Cumulative Sentence

The cumulative, or "loose," sentence begins with a standard sentence pattern (shown here in blue) and adds multiple details after it. The details can take the form of subordinate clauses or different kinds of phrases. These details accumulate, or pile up — hence, the name cumulative.

He now roamed desperately, and at random, through the town, almost ready to believe that a spell was on him, like that, by which a wizard of his country, had once kept three pursuers wandering, a whole winter night, within twenty paces of the cottage which they sought. —Nathaniel Hawthorne

It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us — that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion — that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain — that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom — and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth. —Abraham Lincoln

We ended up on an island along the coast of Florida, in a place by the sea where I leave the doors flung open to the sound of the waves, where early in the morning pelicans flap through the salted fog and dolphins spew their breath beyond the jetty. —Sue Monk Kidd

In the cumulative sentence from Sue Monk Kidd, the independent clause focuses on place, an island in Florida. Then the sentence accumulates a string of modifiers that describe that place with sensory details. Using a cumulative sentence allows Kidd to include all of these modifiers in one smooth sentence rather than use a series of shorter sentences that repeat "island." Furthermore, this accumulation of modifiers takes the reader into the scene just as the writer experiences it: one detail at a time.

Periodic Sentence

The periodic sentence begins with multiple details and holds off a standard sentence pattern — the subject and predicate (shown here in blue) — until the end.

In the following periodic sentence, Henry David Thoreau begins with several modifiers that detail his thoughts of John Brown. The independent clause comes at the end.

> When I think of him, and his six sons, and his son-in-law, — not to enumerate the others, — enlisted for this fight, proceeding coolly, reverently, humanely to work, for months, if not years, sleeping and waking upon it, summering and wintering the thought, without expecting any reward but a good conscience, while almost all America stood ranked on the other side, I say again, that it affects me as a sublime spectacle.
>
> —Henry David Thoreau

In the following periodic sentence, Herman Melville packs the front of the sentence with phrases providing elaborate detail. His modifiers describe the circumstances that propel him to "go to sea," with the independent clause containing the subject and the predicate coming at the end.

> Whenever I find myself growing grim about the mouth; whenever it is a damp, drizzly November in my soul; whenever I find myself involuntarily pausing before coffin warehouses, and bringing up the rear of every funeral I meet; and especially whenever my hypos get such an upper hand of me, that it requires a strong moral principle to prevent me from deliberately stepping into the street, and methodically knocking people's hats off — then, I account it high time to get to sea as soon as I can.
>
> —Herman Melville

The vivid descriptions and figurative language engage us, so that by the end of the sentence we can feel (or at least imagine) what Ishmael, Melville's narrator, feels about going to sea. By placing the descriptions at the beginning of the sentence, Melville demonstrates how a series of impressions and circumstances can lead to a decision to act. Could Melville have written this as a cumulative sentence? He probably could have by moving things around—"I account it high time to get to sea as soon as I can whenever . . ." — and then providing the details. The impact of the descriptive detail would be similar in some ways but not exactly the same. Clearly, Melville preferred the periodic to the cumulative in this case.

Whether you choose to place detail at the beginning or the end of a sentence often depends on the surrounding sentences. Unless you have a good reason, though, you probably should not put one cumulative sentence after another or one periodic sentence after another. Instead, by shifting sentence patterns, you can vary sentence length and change the rhythm of your sentences.

Finally, perhaps the most famous example of the periodic sentence in modern English prose is the fourth sentence in paragraph 14 of Martin Luther King Jr.'s "Letter from Birmingham Jail." It can be found on page 1345.

Inverted Sentence

In every standard English sentence pattern, the subject comes before the verb (SV). But if a writer chooses, he or she can invert the standard sentence pattern and put the verb before the subject (VS) or the object before the subject or verb (OVS). This is called an inverted sentence. Inversion is more common in poetry than prose, as the following examples illustrate:

> V S O
> Comes a still voice — Yet a few days, and thee
> S ┌─V─┐
> The all-beholding sun shall see no more
> In all his course . . .
>
> —William Cullen Bryant

> S V C O S V
> The port is near, the bells I hear, the people all exulting,
> V S O
> While follow eyes the steady keel, the vessel grim and daring . . .
>
> —Walt Whitman

Here are three prose examples:

> C C
> A settled apathy, a gradual wasting away of the person, and frequent although > transient affections of a partially cataleptical character were the unusual diagnosis.
> C V S
>
> —Edgar Allan Poe

> C V S V
> Accursed be he who willingly saddens an immortal spirit, doomed to infamy in > later, wiser ages, doomed in future stages of his own being to deadly penance, only short of death.
> V
>
> —Margaret Fuller

> ┌─V─┐ ┌──S──┐
> Already from your prison has come a shout of triumph against the giant sin of our country.
>
> —Frances Ellen Watkins Harper

The inverted sentence pattern slows the reader down because it is simply more difficult to comprehend inverted word order. Take this example from Ralph Waldo Emerson.

> High be his heart, faithful his will, clear his sight, that he may in good earnest be doctrine, society, law to himself, that a simple purpose may be to him as strong as iron necessity is to others.
>
> —Ralph Waldo Emerson

In this example, Emerson calls attention to the adjectives (the subject complements "high, "faithful," and "clear") that describe his subject's condition, placing attention on those features while avoiding beginning with the repetitive "his." Consider the difference had he written the following:

> His heart is high, his will faithful, his sight clear . . .

This "revised" version is easier to read quickly, and even though the meaning is essentially the same, the emphasis is different. In fact, to understand the full impact, we need to consider the sentence as a whole. The virtues extolled at the beginning (loftiness, faith, and loyalty, clarity of vision) are those necessary for strength of purpose and self-reliance. The emphasis on the virtues that the inversion provides, rather than on the hypothetical man whom they describe, serves Emerson's purpose.

A Word about Punctuation

It is important to follow the normal rules of comma use when punctuating unusual sentence patterns. In a cumulative sentence, the descriptors that follow the main clause generally need to be set off from it and one another with commas, as in the examples from Hawthorne and Kidd on page 811. Likewise, in a periodic sentence, the series of clauses or phrases that precede the subject should be set off from the subject and one another by commas, as in the example from Thoreau on page 812. When writing an inverted sentence, you may be tempted to insert a comma between the verb and the subject because of the unusual order — but do not the comma insert!

• EXERCISE 1 •

For each of the following, craft a periodic, a cumulative, or an inverted sentence by filling in the blanks. Identify each sentence by type.

1. Among the tangle of weeds and brush were _____.
2. Hoping, knowing _____, but realizing _____, the candidate _____.
3. All his life, he would remember that fateful moment when the fish _____, _____, _____.
4. If you _____ and if you _____, then _____.
5. Into the clouds soared _____.
6. Only when _____ will _____.

• EXERCISE 2 •

The following paragraph from Who Freed the Slaves? by James M. McPherson consists of five sentences: a simple declarative sentence; then a complex sentence that begins with a conjunction and an adverbial clause; another simple declarative sentence; next a short cumulative sentence; and finally a lengthy periodic sentence. Keep the first and third sentences as they are. Reverse the order of sentence two, beginning with the main clause and ending with the subordinate clause, and then rewrite the cumulative sentence as periodic and the periodic as cumultive. Compare the two paragraphs. Discuss the relationship among the sentences in each paragraph and the rhetorical effect of syntax on each.

Regrettably, Lincoln did not live to see the final ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment. But if he had never lived, it seems safe to say that we would not have had a Thirteenth Amendment in 1865. In that sense, the traditional answer to the question "Who Freed the Slaves?" is the right answer. Lincoln did not accomplish this in the manner sometimes symbolically portrayed, breaking the chains of helpless and passive bondsmen with the stroke of a pen by signing the Emancipation Proclamation. But by pronouncing slavery a moral evil that must come to an end and then winning the presidency in 1860, provoking the South to secede, by refusing to compromise on the issue of slavery's expansion or on Fort Sumter, by careful leadership and timing that kept a fragile Unionist coalition together in the first year of war and committed it to emancipation in the second, by refusing to compromise this policy once he had adopted it, and by prosecuting the war to unconditional victory as commander in chief of an army of liberation, Abraham Lincoln freed the slaves.

• EXERCISE 3 •

Identify each of the following sentences as periodic, cumulative, or inverted, and discuss the impact of using that pattern. (Each sentence is a direct quotation from essays in this chapter, so you might want to check the context of the sentence to appreciate its impact more fully.) Note that some sentences use more than one unusual pattern.

1. It was June and everywhere June was publishing her immemorial stanza; in the lilacs, in the syringa, in the freshly edged paths and the sweetness of moist beloved gardens, and the little wire wickets that preserve the tulips' front. —E. B. White

2. About eleven o'clock the next day, a mixed throng was gathered around the court-house steps, — smoking, chewing, spitting, swearing, and conversing, according to their respective tastes and turns, — waiting for the auction to commence. —Harriet Beecher Stowe

3. While the objects around me — while the carvings of the ceilings, the sombre tapestries of the walls, the ebon blackness of the floors, and the phantasmagoric armorial trophies which rattled as I strode, were but matters to which, or to such as which, I had been accustomed from my infancy — while I hesitated not to acknowledge how familiar was all this — I still wondered to find how unfamiliar were the fancies which ordinary images were stirring up. —Edgar Allan Poe

4. Let us, then, take up the sword, trusting in God, who will defend the right, remembering that these are other days than those of yore; that the world today is on the side of freedom and universal political equality; that the war cry of the howling leaders of Secession and treason is: "Let us drive back the advance guard of civil and religious freedom; let us have more slave territory; let us build stronger the tyrant system of slavery in the great American Republic." —Alfred M. Green

5. Now, at the expiration of four years, during which public declarations have been constantly called forth on every point and phase of the great contest which still absorbs the attention, and engrosses the energies of the nation, little that is new could be presented. —Abraham Lincoln

6. To this little speech Mr. Lincoln listened with earnest attention and with very apparent sympathy, and replied to each point in his own peculiar, forcible way. —Frederick Douglass

7. I endeavoured to believe that much, if not all of what I felt, was due to the bewildering influence of the gloomy furniture of the room — of the dark and tattered draperies, which, tortured into motion by the breath of a rising tempest, swayed fitfully to and fro upon the walls, and rustled uneasily about the decorations of the bed. —Edgar Allan Poe

8. Though the national independence be blurred by the servility of individuals, though freedom and equality have been proclaimed only to leave room for a monstrous display of slave-dealing and slave-keeping; though the free American so often feels himself free, like the Roman, only to pamper his appetites and his indolence through the misery of his fellow beings, still it is not in vain, that the verbal statement has been made, "All men are born free and equal." —Margaret Fuller

9. Sustained by a consciousness that our transition from the former Union to the present Confederacy has not proceeded from any disregard on our part of our just obligations, or any failure to perform every constitutional duty — moved by no intention or design to invade the rights of others — anxious to cultivate peace and commerce with all nations — if we may not hope to avoid war, we may at least expect that posterity will acquit us of having needlessly engaged in it. —Jefferson Davis

10. Under these circumstances, without attaching importance, in themselves, to the changes demanded by the champions of woman, we hail them as signs of the times. —Margaret Fuller

11. I felt creeping upon me, by slow yet certain degrees, the wild influences of his own fantastic yet impressive superstitions. —Edgar Allan Poe

• EXERCISE 4 •

Following are several examples of unusual sentence patterns. Using each one as a model, write your own sentence about texts or issues from this chapter, imitating the syntax of each.

1. Night came on, — night calm, unmoved, and glorious, shining down with her innumerable and solemn angel eyes, twinkling, beautiful, but silent.
—Harriet Beecher Stowe

2. If we shall suppose that American Slavery is one of those offences which, in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through His appointed time, He now wills to remove, and that He gives to both North and South, this terrible war, as the woe due to those by whom the offence came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a Living God always ascribe to Him?
—Abraham Lincoln

3. Now, if it is deemed necessary that I should forfeit my life for the furtherance of the ends of justice, and mingle my blood further with the blood of my children and with the blood of millions in this slave country whose rights are disregarded by wicked, cruel, and unjust enactments, — I submit; so let it be done! —John Brown

4. In front of the Gothic window stood the old citizen, wrapped in a wide gown, his grey periwig exchanged for a nightcap, which was thrust back from his forehead, and his silk stockings hanging down about his legs.
—Nathaniel Hawthorne

5. The rugged battle of fate, where strength is born, we shun.
—Ralph Waldo Emerson

6. Fondly do we hope — fervently do we pray — that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. —Abraham Lincoln

7. At length, after many pauses to examine the gorgeous display of goods in the shop windows, and after suffering some rebukes for the impertinence of his scrutiny into people's faces, the Major's kinsman found himself near the steepled building, still unsuccessful in his search.

—Nathaniel Hawthorne

8. During the whole of a dull, dark, and soundless day in the autumn of the year, when the clouds hung oppressively low in the heavens, I had been passing alone, on horseback, through a singularly dreary tract of country, and at length found myself, as the shades of the evening drew on, within view of the melancholy House of Usher. —Edgar Allan Poe

9. When first I took up my abode in the woods, that is, began to spend my nights as well as days there, which, by accident, was on Independence day, or the fourth of July, 1845, my house was not finished for winter, but was merely a defence against the rain, without plastering or chimney, the walls being of rough weather-stained boards, with wide chinks, which made it cool at night. —Henry David Thoreau

10. I went to the woods because I wished to live deliberately, to front only the essential facts of life, and see if I could not learn what it had to teach, and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not lived.

—Henry David Thoreau

• EXERCISE 5 •

In this chapter, you have learned about sentence structure, or syntax—specifically, about cumulative, periodic, and inverted sentences. Write a paragraph that includes at least one example of each type. Also include a simple sentence and one that uses either coordination or subordination. Then, rewrite your cumulative sentence as periodic, your periodic as cumulative, and your inverted sentence in normal word order (SVO). Carefully consider the rhetorical effects of each pattern. Finally, rewrite your paragraph using those patterns that you deem most effective. Explain the reasons for your choices.

Suggestions for Writing

America in Conflict

1. Women's rights and the status of women are central issues in the selections by Margaret Fuller (p. 607), Sojourner Truth (p. 625), and Harriet Jacobs (p. 675). Compare and contrast how the three writers use rhetorical strategies to establish their positions about women in America.

2. Consider the contrasting visual images found at the beginning and end of the chronological portion of this chapter: the romantic visions depicted by Thomas Cole (p. 556) and Asher B. Durand (p. 557) and the reports of grim reality by Alexander Gardner (p. 685) and Timothy O'Sullivan (p. 686). How effectively do these contrasting visuals serve to frame, or bookend, the period covered by the chapter?

3. In his Journal entry of March 1845, Ralph Waldo Emerson writes: "Poetry must be new as foam, and as old as the rock." In his essay "Circles," he writes, "The poets are thus liberating gods." This chapter contains the work of six poets: William Cullen Bryant, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Walt Whitman, Allen Ginsberg, Herman Melville, and William Stafford. Select one of Emerson's statements and write an essay that defends or challenges its application to three of the poets in the chapter.

4. Compare and contrast the narratives of Frederick Douglass (p. 614) and Harriet Jacobs (p. 675). Which one is more compelling? Why?

5. Slavery is addressed directly by the autobiographical works of Douglass and Jacobs, by Harriet Beecher Stowe's fictional account (p. 627), by Alfred M. Green's speech (p. 673), by the song "No More Auction Block for Me" (p. 674), and by the auction block monument (p. 641). Compare and contrast three of these texts as they address the institution of slavery.

6. Select one of the following statements from Alexis de Tocqueville's 1835 book, Democracy in America. Write an essay that defends, challenges, or qualifies the statement's validity, using at least three texts from the chapter to support your position.

   > I know no country in which there is so little independence of mind and freedom of discussion as in America.
   >
   > The great advantages of the Americans consists in their being able to commit faults which they may afterwards repair.
   >
   > The great advantage of the Americans is that they have arrived at a state of democracy without having to endure a democratic revolution; and that they are born equal, instead of becoming so.
   >
   > It is by the enjoyment of a dangerous freedom that the Americans learn the art of rendering the danger of freedom less formidable.

7. It is often suggested that the works of many of the writers in this period represent a tension between optimism and pessimism, between hope and mystery, between the exploration of evil and the possibility of good, between darkness and light. On one side would be Emerson, Thoreau, and Whitman; on the other we would have Hawthorne, Poe, and Melville. Consider the following statements — the first, about Hawthorne, and the second, about Melville — from historian Vernon Louis Parrington's 1927 work, Main Currents in American Thought:

> And so while the Concord thinkers were proclaiming man to be the indubitable child of God, Hawthorne was critically examining the question of evil as it appeared in the light of his own experience. It was the central, fascinating problem of his intellectual life, and in pursuit of a solution he probed curiously into the hidden, furtive recesses of the soul.
>
> All the powers of darkness fought over him. They drove him down into the gloom of his tormented soul, and if they did not conquer, they left him maimed and stricken. The golden dreams of transcendental faith, that buoyed up Emerson and gave hope to Thoreau, turned to ashes in his mouth; the white gleams of mysticism that now and then lighted up his path died out and left him in darkness.

Select one of Parrington's statements and support, qualify, or challenge its validity, using the work of three or four writers from this chapter as evidence.

8. "Be ashamed to die unless you have won some victory for humanity!" stated Horace Mann in his commencement address at Antioch College in 1859. Write an essay about those writers and texts in this chapter that express a victory for humanity. Refer to at least three texts.

9. Many of the texts in this chapter might be said to be about the meeting of and conflict among three races: white, black, and Native American. In Alexis de Tocqueville's 1835 book, Democracy in America, he writes: "The human beings who are scattered over [the United States] . . . do not form, as in Europe, so many branches of the same stock. Three races, naturally distinct, and, I might almost say, hostile to each other, are discoverable among them at the first glance. Almost insurmountable barriers had been raised between them by education and law, as well as by their origin and outward characteristics, but fortune has brought them together on the same soil, where, although they are mixed, they do not amalgamate, and each race fulfills its destiny apart." Consider the implications of that statement for the texts in this chapter. Using references to at least three texts, assess the validity of the statement regarding race in America.

10. On December 2, 1841, in his Lecture on the Times, Ralph Waldo Emerson stated, "But turn it how we will, as we ponder this meaning of the times, every new thought drives us to the deep fact, that the Time is the child of the Eternity. The main interest which any aspects of the Times can have for us, is the great spirit which gazes through them, the light which they can shed on the wonderful questions, What we are? and Whither we tend? We do not wish to be deceived. Here we drift, like white sail across the wild ocean, now bright on the wave, now darkling in the trough of the sea;—but from what port did we sail? Who knows? Or to what port are we bound? Who knows?" Consider Emerson's statement carefully. Write an essay that explores Emerson's thoughts and ideas as they relate to at least three selections from the chapter.

11. Many of the works in this chapter are about the Civil War. Consider those by John Brown and Abraham Lincoln and the works by Jefferson Davis, Alfred M. Green, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Herman Meville, Timothy O'Sullivan; the song "No More Auction Block for Me"; and the recruitment poster. Write an essay about what these texts have done to enhance your understanding of that war. Refer to at least three of the texts in your response.

12. The period covered by this chapter is often called the "American Renaissance," in literary scholar F. O. Matthiessen's words, or the age of American romanticism. The chief features of romanticism are its favoring of the imagination, emotion, and intuition over reason and order; the importance of the individual and self-reliance over authority, tradition, and conformity; trust in subjectivity over objectivity; belief in the innocence of youth over the corruptions and compromises of age; a preference for the natural world, the frontier, and primitivism over civilization and urbanity; and a high regard for the rebel over the conservative. A reaction against orthodoxy, the romantic view esteems the democratic spirit, the quest for beauty and truth, and a delight in mystery and adventure and looks to nature as a source of knowledge, power, and enlightenment. The chief figures of romanticism in this chapter are William Cullen Bryant, Thomas Cole, Asher B. Durand, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Edgar Allan Poe, Henry David Thoreau, Herman Melville, and Walt Whitman. Select three of these writers and write an essay that demonstrates them to be major voices in American romanticism. Which single writer best expresses the romantic spirit? Explain.

this page left intentionally blank

8

Reconstructing America

1865–1913

After the Civil War, the United States grappled with its aftermath, both joyous and mournful. How should the newly unified nation ensure the rights of millions of newly freed slaves? How should it rebuild the South and its political systems while reuniting the nation? What should be done with the leaders of the Confederacy? Presidents Abraham Lincoln, Andrew Johnson, and Ulysses S. Grant implemented policies to tackle these questions, policies that collectively came to be called Reconstruction. The issue of ensuring the rights of newly freed slaves was addressed by the ratification of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments, which outlawed slavery and granted African Americans citizenship, the right to vote, the rights of due process, and equal protection under the law. After the war, the Southern states came under the authority of the Union army, and with Reconstruction, they began again to self-govern and to have representation in the U.S. Congress. These new governments, often biracial, established public schools and charitable institutions, and raised taxes to support public works such as construction projects and transportation networks.

Despite what most believe were the good intentions of Reconstruction, the decade following the Civil War remained a period of violence and division. Racial tensions and discrimination flourished, as groups such as the Ku Klux Klan, the White League, and the Red Shirts terrorized African Americans, while regressive white politicians regained enough power to institute the discriminatory Jim Crow laws. In this chapter, readings by Paul Laurence Dunbar and Ida B. Wells-Barnett explore the pain and suffering of the African American population during this time, and correspondence between the newly freed Jourdon Anderson and his former master reveals a new American power structure. Writings by Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. DuBois highlight contrasting approaches to the education and leadership of African Americans as they assumed their full rights and responsibilities as citizens.

America experienced its most rapid westward expansion in this post–Civil War period. The Homestead Act of 1862 provided opportunities for Americans to own undeveloped federal land west of the Mississippi at no cost. This, along with mining, ranching, and the spirit of exploration and adventure, drew Americans westward. Between 1862 and 1934, 1.6 million homesteads were granted, privatizing 420,000 square miles of American land — about 10 percent of the land in the United States.

Prints and Photographs Division, Library of Congress

This woodcut, originally titled Reconstruction of the South, depicts a literal turning of swords into ploughshares as both the South and the Union are reconstructed following the Civil War. The center of the image features entrepreneur and philanthropist George Peabody, who gave $2 million to support education in the South through his Peabody Education Fund.

Applicants for homesteads were required to be the heads of their households or at least twenty-one years old; they had to live on the land for at least five years, build a home, and start a farm or ranch. Conditions in the American "Wild West" were notoriously difficult, and only about 40 percent of homestead applicants completed their five-year commitment and received the title to their land.

Much of this westward expansion was facilitated by the completion of the transcontinental railroad in 1869, which made travel to the West much faster and safer than it had been by wagon train. While seen as a reflection of technological innovation and inevitable "progress," the transcontinental railroad relied on cheap labor primarily provided by Chinese immigrants. At one point, 8,000 of the 10,000 men toiling for the Central Pacific Railroad were Chinese. Public concern about the impact of these workers on the labor force led to passage of the Chinese Exclusion Act in 1882, which prohibited immigration from China for the next ten years.

Westward expansion occurred at the expense of Native American populations, who were dislocated and relocated to make room for settlers. Both the settlers and the U.S. Army sent to protect them frequently met with resistance from displaced tribes, leading to skirmishes and outright battles. These conflicts have since been elevated by

Prints and Photographs Division, Library of Congress

John Gast, American Progress, 1872, color lithograph from an oil painting by the same title. This painting was commissioned by publisher George Crofutt and used to promote his travel guides to the American West. It appeared as a woodcut on the frontispiece of his Transcontinental Tourist's Guide, and copies of the color lithograph were given to each subscriber of his publication Western World.

Hollywood and storytellers to the level of American mythology, particularly the figure of the American cowboy. Romanticized as a brave loner who embodied the "rugged individualist" of the dime novels that popularized this image, the cowboy became a powerful part of the national narrative. A Conversation in this chapter explores the evolution of this mythic figure and considers his impact on the national character, as well as his more contemporary incarnations.

In his groundbreaking speech in 1893 at the World's Columbian Exposition, a celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of Columbus's arrival in the New World, Frederick Jackson Turner lamented the "closing" of the frontier and what that loss of a sense of infinite boundaries would mean for the national identity. His "Frontier Thesis" provided a foundation for manifest destiny, an ideology that justified territorial expansion to the Pacific Ocean and annexation of Pacific territories.

As the nation expanded, so too did its population. From the 1850s to the 1860s, immigration nearly doubled, and it continued to increase steadily until the 1930s. In this period, immigrants were primarily Europeans lured to America by the promise of freedom and prosperity. A Conversation about immigration in this chapter will ask you to consider "the lure of America" and reflect on attitudes toward immigrants both then and now.

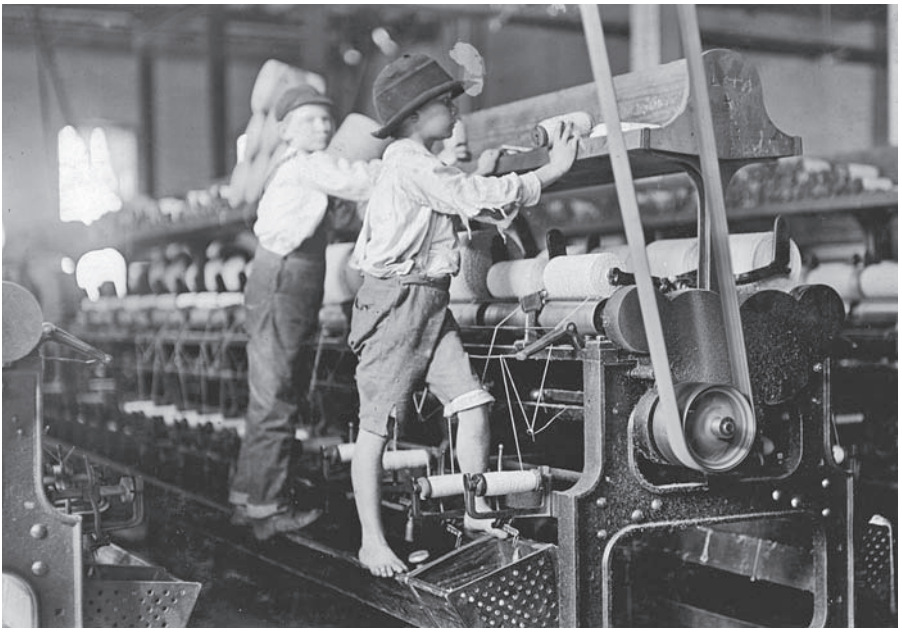
Much of the immigrant population clustered in American urban metropolises, driven there in large part by jobs created by rapid industrial growth. In the years approaching the turn of the twentieth century, America was leading the world in the production of iron and steel, producing half of the world's cotton, corn, and oil, and mining a third of its gold and coal. As industrialization flourished, products became cheaper, giving Americans unprecedented buying power. For some, rapid industrialization meant economic prosperity and cheaper consumer goods. This resulted in the growth of a new middle class, a group who worked to live but also enjoyed leisure time, vacations, and entertainment ranging from sporting events to vaudeville shows to carnival amusements. Department stores and mail-order catalogs became prevalent. Advances in electricity revolutionized America's living and working spaces. The trolley car and the train transported Americans with extraordinary speed and convenience.

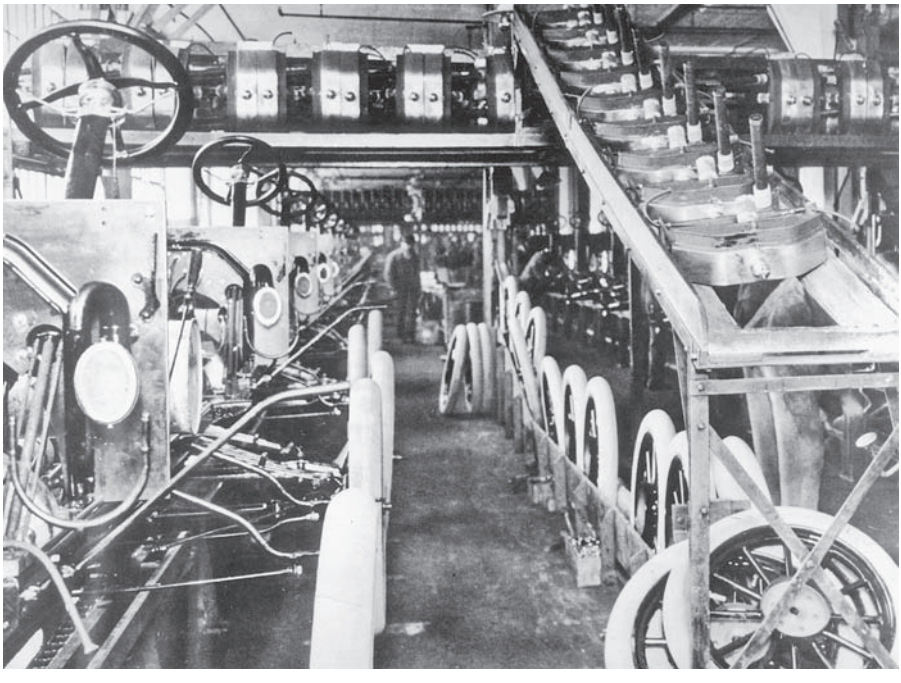
But despite these advances, most Americans were not wealthy, and urban life was particularly harsh in this period. Inhabitants of the cities experienced extreme overcrowding, crushing poverty, and disease. Children and adults toiled in factories. Schooling was still a luxury. Governments provided no social safety nets for



Prints and Photographs Division, Library of Congress

This photograph and others by photographer and social reformer Lewis Wickes Hine led to outrage over child-labor practices in America — and eventually to reforms. This particular shot was taken in Bib Mill No. 1, Macon, Georgia, in 1909. Of this photo Hine said, "Some boys were so small they had to climb up on the spinning frame to mend the broken threads and put back the empty bobbins."

their constituents. The gap between the rich and the poor became so vast that, as the saying goes, "one half of the world does not know how the other half lives." Jacob Riis took that old saying as the inspiration for his groundbreaking work of photojournalism, How the Other Half Lives, which illustrated the squalid conditions of New York's slums and tenement houses and exposed the country's middle and upper classes to these images for the first time. A selection of his writing, along with some of his stunning photographs, can be found in this chapter. Also included in this chapter are excerpts from Upton Sinclair's The Jungle, a fictional — though appallingly realistic — depiction of the treatment of workers in a Chicago meatpacking plant, and Twenty Years at Hull House, the memoir of Jane Addams, a social reformer and founder of one of America's first settlement houses. She writes of the poverty and abuse that pervaded Chicago and her hope to uplift her city and community through progressive reform, democratic and egalitarian social and political institutions, and suffrage and economic opportunity for all.



Mary Evans Picture Library

In 1913, Henry Ford installed the first moving assembly line in his Highland Park factory (in Detroit, Michigan) and revolutionized the automobile industry by producing a car every ninety-three minutes. By 1918, the plant was turning out ten thousand cars a day. The efficiency of the plant made the Ford Model T the world's first affordable automobile, making car ownership a reality for the middle class.

During this period, workers facing low wages, long hours, and dreadful living conditions collided with growing corporations that amassed enormous wealth for a few individuals. Movements emerged to improve working conditions and address growing economic inequality. Laborers organized to fight for wages, benefits, and rights. The Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions (later to become the American Federation of Labor) was founded in 1881. Though child labor did not formally come to an end until the 1930s, the National Child Labor Committee formed in 1904 and dedicated itself to eradicating the practice. Women began calling for full voting rights that would, for one thing, ensure they had a stronger influence over working conditions for children and for themselves. While the Nineteenth Amendment giving women the right to vote was not ratified until 1920, political and social activism during the late 1800s and early 1900s laid the foundation for passage of that legislation.

Despite the hardships endured during this period, it was also an exciting time of technological progress that would forever change Americans' way of life. The automobile began to be mass manufactured in 1901 by the Ransom E. Olds company, which would later become Oldsmobile. The Wright Brothers completed the first powered flight at Kitty Hawk. Kodak began manufacturing the first portable camera. Guglielmo Marconi sent the first successful radio communication. Thomas Edison invented the alkaline battery, the lightbulb, the phonograph, and the kinetophone — or talking motion picture. Einstein published his theory of special relativity in 1905, which, among other things, explained gravity as a curvature in space-time and laid the groundwork for the field of nuclear physics by revealing the relationship between mass and energy: $E = mc^2$.

Our national literature flourished in this era. Technologies such as the use of automated presses and the invention of the linotype machine resulted in wide dissemination of printed materials. These advances along with the rapid growth of public libraries and increased literacy rates made reading a national pastime — and a big business. By the end of the century, the term "best seller" had entered the American vernacular.

Though some of the wounds of the Civil War had been healed, westward expansion was giving way to imperialistic calls for a global presence, and changing demographics brought demands for more equitable political and social conditions. On July 4, 1913, the nation symbolically looked both backward and forward when more than fifty thousand veterans came together to commemorate the Battle of Gettysburg. In his Independence Day speech, President Woodrow Wilson struck a conciliatory note, saying:

> Do not put uniforms by. Put the harness of the present on. Lift your eyes to the great tracts of life yet to be conquered in the interest of righteous peace, of that prosperity which lies in a people's hearts and outlasts all wars and errors of men.

Yet the harmonious respite was brief; one year later, on August 14, 1914, the United States entered World War I.

Jourdon Anderson

Jourdon Anderson (c. 1825–1907) was an African American slave from Tennessee who was freed in 1864 by the Union army during the Civil War. Soon after his emancipation, Anderson and his family settled in Dayton, Ohio, where he worked various jobs before becoming sexton for a local church, a position he held until his death.

To My Old Master

Although there has been some doubt about the authenticity of this letter, it appears in The Freedman's Book (1865), by Lydia Maria Child, with the note "written just as he dictated it." The letter was also published in the Cincinnati Commercial and the New York Tribune.

Dayton, Ohio, August 7, 1865.

To my old Master, Colonel P. H. Anderson, Big Spring, Tennessee.

Sir: I got your letter, and was glad to find that you had not forgotten Jourdon, and that you wanted me to come back and live with you again, promising to do better for me than anybody else can. I have often felt uneasy about you. I thought the Yankees would have hung you long before this, for harboring Rebs they found at your house. I suppose they never heard about your going to Colonel Martin's to kill the Union soldier that was left by his company in their stable. Although you shot at me twice before I left you, I did not want to hear of your being hurt, and am glad you are still living. It would do me good to go back to the dear old home again, and see Miss Mary and Miss Martha and Allen, Esther, Green, and Lee. Give my love to them all, and tell them I hope we will meet in the better world, if not in this. I would have gone back to see you all when I was working in the Nashville Hospital, but one of the neighbors told me that Henry intended to shoot me if he ever got a chance.

I want to know particularly what the good chance is you propose to give me. I am doing tolerably well here. I get twenty-five dollars a month, with victuals and clothing; have a comfortable home for Mandy, — the folks call her Mrs. Anderson, — and the children — Milly, Jane, and Grundy — go to school and are learning well. The teacher says Grundy has a head for a preacher. They go to Sunday school, and Mandy and me attend church regularly. We are kindly treated. Sometimes we overhear others saying, "Them colored people were slaves" down in Tennessee. The children feel hurt when they hear such remarks; but I tell them it was no disgrace in Tennessee to belong to Colonel Anderson. Many darkeys would have been proud, as I used to be, to call you master. Now if you will write and say what wages you will give me, I will be better able to decide whether it would be to my advantage to move back again.

As to my freedom, which you say I can have, there is nothing to be gained on that score, as I got my free papers in 1864 from the Provost-Marshal-General of the Department of Nashville. Mandy says she would be afraid to go back without some proof that you were disposed to treat us justly and kindly; and we have concluded to test your sincerity by asking you to send us our wages for the time we served you. This will make us forget and forgive old scores, and rely on your justice and friendship in the future. I served you faithfully for thirty-two years, and Mandy twenty years. At twenty-five dollars a month for me, and two dollars a week for Mandy, our earnings would amount to eleven thousand six hundred and eighty dollars. Add to this the interest for the time our wages have been kept back, and deduct what you paid for our clothing, and three doctor's visits to me, and pulling a tooth for Mandy, and the balance will show what we are in justice entitled to. Please send the money by Adams's Express, in care of V. Winters, Esq., Dayton, Ohio. If you fail to pay us for faithful labors in the past, we can have little faith in your promises in the future. We trust the good Maker has opened your eyes to the wrongs which you and your fathers have done to me and my fathers, in making us toil for you for generations without recompense. Here I draw my wages every Saturday night; but in Tennessee there was never any pay-day for the negroes any more than for the horses and cows. Surely there will be a day of reckoning for those who defraud the laborer of his hire.

In answering this letter, please state if there would be any safety for my Milly and 5
Jane, who are now grown up, and both good-looking girls. You know how it was with poor Matilda and Catherine. I would rather stay here and starve — and die, if it come to that — than have my girls brought to shame by the violence and wickedness of their young masters. You will also please state if there has been any schools opened for the colored children in your neighborhood. The great desire of my life now is to give my children an education, and have them form virtuous habits.

Say howdy to George Carter, and thank him for taking the pistol from you when you were shooting at me.

From your old servant,
Jourdon Anderson.
(1865)

Exploring the Text

1. What information about his "old Master" does Jourdon Anderson recall in the letter? What impression does the recollection of these details suggest about the ethos Jourdon is establishing? How do you imagine Colonel Anderson might respond when reminded, for instance, of his "harboring Rebs" (par. 1)?
2. What evidence does Jourdon provide — implicitly or explicitly — of the dignity and respectful treatment he and his family enjoy in their midwestern home?
3. What does Jourdon require in order for him to "forget and forgive old scores, and rely on [Colonel Anderson's] justice and friendship in the future" (par. 3)? What other assurance(s) does Jourdon ask of Colonel Anderson? Based on language in the text, what do you think Jourdon believes the odds are that Colonel Anderson will meet his terms?

4. How would you describe the tone of the letter? How do irony and understatement contribute to achieving that tone?

Winslow Homer

Winslow Homer (1836–1910) is considered one of the most significant American painters of the nineteenth century. Born in Boston, Massachusetts, and mainly self-taught, Homer started his career as a commercial illustrator. During the Civil War (1861–1865) he was sent to the front lines to sketch battle scenes and camp life for Harper's magazine.

The Veteran in a New Field

Homer completed the following painting in 1865, a few months after the end of the Civil War.

Image copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Image source: Art Resource, NY.

Winslow Homer, The Veteran in a New Field, 1865, oil on canvas, 24⅛" × 38⅛", Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.
(See color insert, Image 27.)

Exploring the Text

1. What strikes you first and most powerfully about the painting? Is it a specific detail or a general feeling?
2. What does the composition of the painting suggest about its meaning? Consider the division of space, the colors, and the placement of the figure.
3. What is the effect of the central figure having his back to us, the viewers? Do you think Winslow Homer is making a statement about "turning his back" on something or someone, or does this perspective lead the viewer to a particular attitude toward the scene? Explain.
4. What biblical associations does wheat have? How might specific scriptures inform your understanding of the painting?
5. The veteran in this painting holds a scythe that was out-of-date even during this period. If you look carefully, you can see the multiple blades of a more modern cradle scythe that Homer deliberately painted over in favor of the archaic single-bladed scythe. Why might the artist have done that? What is the impact of the veteran using an old-fashioned single-bladed scythe to mow the field?
6. What is the narrative of this painting — that is, what story does it tell? Is it optimistic? Sad? Redemptive? Ambivalent? Is it a story of new beginnings, or is it an elegy? Explain your response by citing details from the painting and your understanding of its historical context.
7. Many of the Civil War's bloodiest battles were fought in fields of grain, and in Chapter 7 (p. 686) you analyzed an image of one of them in A Harvest of Death. That photo, like many others, pictures corpses lying on a field. Given this information, along with the details of Homer's painting, how do you interpret the title Homer chose?

TALKBACK

Natasha Trethewey

Appointed poet laureate in 2012, Natasha Trethewey was born in Gulfport, Mississippi, in 1966 and earned an MA in literature at Hollins University in Virginia and an MFA in poetry at the University of Massachusetts. She is currently a professor of English and creative writing at Emory University in Atlanta, Georgia. Her first collection of poetry, Domestic Work (2000), was selected by Rita Dove as the winner of the inaugural Cave Canem Poetry Prize for the best first book by an African American poet.

Again, the Fields
After Winslow Homer

"Again, the Fields" is from Native Guard (2006), the book for which Trethewey was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in 2007.

the dead they lay long the lines like sheaves of Wheat I could have walked on the boddes all most from one end too the other

No more muskets, the bone-drag weariness of marching, the trampled grass, soaked earth red as the wine of sacrament. Now, the veteran turns toward a new field, bright as domes of the republic. Here, he has shrugged off the past — his jacket and canteen flung down in the corner.

At the center of the painting, he anchors the trinity, joining earth and sky.

The wheat falls beneath his scythe — a language of bounty — the swaths like scripture on the field's open page.

Boundless, the wheat stretches beyond the frame, as if toward a distant field — the white canvas where sky and cotton meet, where another veteran toils, his hands the color of dark soil.

(2006)

Exploring the Text

1. Natasha Trethewey subtitles her poem "After Winslow Homer" and begins it with an epigraph quoting a Civil War soldier's letter to his father. How do these two introductory elements inform your reading of the poem?
2. Read the first sentence aloud, noting the line breaks as the poet indicates. What emotions are evoked? What tone do the first four lines establish?
3. What biblical images and associations does Trethewey include in the poem? What is the effect of references to "the trinity" (l. 10) or the simile "like scripture on the field's open page" (l. 13)?
4. What is the "language of bounty" (l. 12)? Consider the actual reference that the appositive structure indicates as well as the metaphoric meaning.
5. The "distant field" of the last three lines introduces a scene that happens outside the frame of the painting. What is that scene? Were you surprised by this turn in the poem? Why or why not? Reread the poem and consider the ways that Trethewey might be preparing the reader for the final stanza.

Making Connections

1. The speaker in the poem both describes and interprets Homer's painting. Which are the literal descriptions; which are interpretive?
2. How would you describe Trethewey's attitude toward Homer's painting? Is she critical? Appreciative? Admiring? Ironic? Nostalgic? Ambivalent?
3. In his announcement of Trethewey as U.S. Poet Laureate in 2012, James Billington, the librarian of Congress, said that the language of her poetry "reminds you that the experience of great art, of great poetry, is something that stretches beyond the frame it comes to you in." In what ways does "Again, the Fields" stretch beyond the frame of Homer's canvas? Discuss to what extent you think it fair to hypothesize or point out what is not included or addressed in a work from an earlier time period.
4. An elegy is a tribute to, lamentation for, or serious reflection on the dead. Compare and contrast Homer's painting and Trethewey's poem as elegies.
5. Imagine that Homer could read "Again, the Fields." What might his response be? Research Homer's participation in the Civil War; then, in his voice, write a letter to Trethewey.

Emily Dickinson

Born into a prominent family in Amherst, Massachusetts, Emily Dickinson (1830–1886) received some formal education at Amherst Academy and Mary Lyons Mount Holyoke Female Seminary (which became Mount Holyoke College). Dickinson was a famously shy and reclusive person who preferred to remain within her close family circle, though some contemporary scholars have begun to question that characterization. In 1862, she enclosed four poems in a letter to literary critic and abolitionist Thomas Wentworth Higginson, who had written a piece in the Atlantic Monthly that included practical advice for young writers. Her letter began, "Mr. Higginson, — Are you too deeply occupied to say if my verse is alive? The mind is so near itself it cannot see distinctly, and I have none to ask. Should you think it breathed, and had you the leisure to tell me, I should feel quick gratitude." Dickinson didn't sign the letter, but instead enclosed her name on a card inside a smaller envelope. Dickinson wrote more than seventeen hundred poems, but only ten were published in her lifetime.

"Hope" is the thing with feathers —

"Hope" is the thing with feathers —
That perches in the soul —
And sings the tune without the words —
And never stops — at all —

And sweetest — in the Gale — is heard —
And sore must be the storm —
That could abash the little Bird
That kept so many warm —

I've heard it in the chillest land —
And on the strangest Sea —
Yet, never, in Extremity,
It asked a crumb — of Me.

(c. 1861)

Exploring the Text

1. What associations — even archetypes — does Emily Dickinson evoke with her image of "Hope" as a bird?
2. Why would Dickinson, a brilliant poet, use such a general, sometimes derogatory, word as "thing" (l. 1)? What difference would it make to say, for instance, that Hope is the "creature" with feathers, or that Hope "wears" feathers?
3. Of what importance is it that Hope sings the "tune without the words" (l. 3) — that is, Hope does not use verbal language?
4. What is the meaning of "abash" (l. 7)? What does the sound of this term add to the meaning?
5. In what ways might you read the phrase "in Extremity" (l. 11) as ambiguous? To whom or what does it refer?
6. How does the repeated four-part structure of the three stanzas reinforce the poem's meaning?

The Soul selects her own Society —

The Soul selects her own Society —
Then — shuts the Door —
To her divine Majority —
Present no more —

Unmoved — she notes the Chariots — pausing —
At her low Gate —
Unmoved — an Emperor be kneeling
Upon her Mat —

I've known her — from an ample nation —
Choose One —
Then — close the Valves of her attention —
Like Stone —

(c. 1862)

Exploring the Text

1. What aspects of the human being does the Soul represent in this poem? Of what importance is it that the Soul is referred to as a "she" in this poem?
2. What is the "divine Majority" (l. 3)? What are the multiple meanings of "majority," and which ones might apply here?
3. In the second stanza, who is "Unmoved"? What is the effect of the words indicating status?
4. In the third stanza, what association do the "Valves" evoke? What does this image suggest?
5. How is the Soul characterized in this poem? As coldly self-sufficient? Confidently independent? Angry and distant? Proudly self-assured? Explain.
6. How do the rhythm and rhyme of this poem contribute to its meaning? Consider the paired lines within each stanza. How does the final line create an appropriate effect for the meaning of this poem?
7. Following is an analysis of the poem by contemporary critic Camille Paglia:

   > This is Emily Dickinson's declaration of independence, a manifesto of artistic vocation and mission. It is stern, flat, and implacable. Yet its emotions are intense and stretched to the limit. . . . Tenderness or compassion would compromise her artistic integrity and endanger her enterprise. . . . [W]ith militant resolve, she negates the entire world to preserve her small, proud kingdom of art.

   Do you agree or disagree with this analysis? Discuss which parts of this interpretation your understanding of the poem supports or challenges or which require qualification.

After great pain, a formal feeling comes —

After great pain, a formal feeling comes —
The Nerves sit ceremonious, like Tombs —
The stiff Heart questions was it He, that bore,
And Yesterday, or Centuries before?

The Feet, mechanical, go round —
Of Ground, or Air, or Ought — A Wooden way
Regardless grown,
A Quartz contentment, like a stone —

This is the Hour of Lead —
Remembered, if outlived,
As Freezing persons, recollect the Snow —
First — Chill — then Stupor — then the letting go —

(c. 1862)

Exploring the Text

1. In the opening stanza, what is "a formal feeling"?
2. What connotations are associated with "formal," "ceremonious," and "stiff" — the language used in stanza 1? What words in subsequent lines carry similar connotations?
3. Who is the "He" in line 3? How does that reference connect with line 4?
4. What stage of grief is described in the second stanza? How does the sufferer experience it? Is there any kind of peace or relief suggested by the oxymoron "Quartz contentment" (l. 9)?
5. What are the various meanings of the word "Ought" (l. 6)? Which meaning do you think is most fitting here — and why?
6. What are the possibilities for the final stage of grief, as described in the third stanza? How does the metaphor Emily Dickinson develops illuminate those?
7. Dickinson does not give us a first-person speaker, nor does she anywhere in the poem refer to the grief-stricken person as a whole human being. How, instead, does she refer to those who are grieving? What is the effect of this choice?
8. Dickinson does not indicate the specific event that causes the grief in this poem. What is the impact of not creating a more specific context? Does the abstraction add to or diminish the power of the poem?
9. How would you describe the tone of the poem? Cite specific lines and phrases to support your description.

I heard a Fly buzz — when I died —

I heard a Fly buzz — when I died —
The Stillness in the Room
Was like the Stillness in the Air —
Between the Heaves of Storm —

The Eyes around — had wrung them dry —
And Breaths were gathering firm
For that last Onset — when the King
Be witnessed — in the Room —

I willed my Keepsakes — Signed away
What portion of me be Assignable — and then it was There interposed a Fly —

With Blue — uncertain stumbling Buzz —
Between the light — and me —
And then the Windows failed — and then
I could not see to see —

(c. 1862)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the actual scene or setting being described in this poem? Who is the speaker?
2. What is the effect in the opening line of juxtaposing two events that are, at least on the surface, of such different magnitude?
3. What is meant by line 5: "The Eyes around — had wrung them dry — "? What is the antecedent of "them"?
4. Who is "the King" (l. 7)? What are at least two possibilities? Provide plausible support for each.
5. Look up the definition of "interposed" (par. 12) to explore multiple meanings. What do various meanings add to your understanding of the poem?
6. The fourth stanza has puzzled readers and critics alike. How do you interpret that stanza, and how does your interpretation affect your reading of the poem as a whole?
7. What do you make of the choice to use a fly in this poem? Is Dickinson simply using the fly as typical of a small, minor living creature, one we casually swat away without thinking? Since flies feed on dead flesh (maggots consume corpses), does it serve as a reminder that life ends in decay? Does the fly represent Satan's lieutenant Beelzebub, known also as the Lord of the Flies? Is the fly a symbol of death? Or is there another view? Explain how your understanding of the fly guides your interpretation of the poem.

My Life had stood — a Loaded Gun —

My Life had stood — a Loaded Gun —
In Corners — till a Day
The Owner passed — identified —
And carried Me away —

And now We roam in Sovreign Woods —
And now We hunt the Doe —
And every time I speak for Him —
The Mountains straight reply —

And do I smile, such cordial light
Upon the Valley glow —
It is as a Vesuvian face
Had let its pleasure through —

And when at Night — Our good Day done —
I guard My Master's Head —
'Tis better than the Eider-Duck's[1]
Deep Pillow — to have shared —

[1]Arctic duck famed for its down feathers, which were often used for pillows and blankets. — Eds.

To foe of His — I'm deadly foe —
None stir the second time —
On whom I lay a Yellow Eye —
Or an emphatic Thumb —

Though I than He — may longer live
He longer must — than I —
For I have but the power to kill,
Without — the power to die —

(c. 1863)

Exploring the Text

1. Who is the speaker — the "Me" (l. 4) — in the poem? What are the pronoun referents in line 7, "I speak for Him"?
2. In stanza 2, why are the woods "Sovreign" (l. 5)?
3. How does the "cordial light" of the "smile" (l. 9) contrast with the "Vesuvian face" (l. 11)? What does Dickinson suggest through this juxtaposition?
4. Why is it "better" to "guard My Master's Head" than to lie sharing the "Eider-Duck's / Deep Pillow" (ll. 14–16)?
5. Poet and feminist critic Adrienne Rich (1929–2010) has called this "a central poem in understanding Emily Dickinson, and ourselves, and the condition of the woman artist, particularly in the nineteenth century. It seems likely that the nineteenth-century woman poet, especially, felt the medium of poetry as dangerous. . . . [T]he poem grows out of her anger at the narrow life allowed to Dickinson by her society and by her father." In what ways do you see this as a poem about the anger of an artist?
6. Another way to look at this poem is through a historical lens. Writing to refute a more symbolic interpretation of the poem, British poet Herbert Lomas reminds readers that the poem was written two years after the start of the Civil War, near the time of the Battle of Gettysburg (1863). He argues that the gun is literal, which, he claims, explains the final stanza: "The personified gun says it may well outlive its Master (in a gun-room and in the poem). Its Master, however, can and may well die in battle — but 'must longer' live than the gun: for the Owner/Master is an immortal soul, and killer of other immortal souls." Explain why you agree or disagree with this interpretation. What other parts of the poem support or challenge this interpretation?
7. The previous two questions explain interpretations by literary critics. How do you interpret this complicated poem? What resources of language does Dickinson employ to develop the meaning you see in the text?

TALKBACK

Hans Ostrom

Hans Ostrom (b. 1954) grew up in Sierra City, California. His grandfather, a Swedish immigrant, worked in gold mines in the Sierra Nevada range. Ostrom, Distinguished Professor of English at the University of Puget Sound, teaches composition, creative writing, rhetoric, and literature and is codirector of African American studies. He is the author of Langston Hughes: A Study of the Short Fiction (1993) and A Langston Hughes Encyclopedia (2001). Ostrom's articles, poems, and short stories have appeared in a variety of magazines and journals. He is also the author of the novels Three to Get Ready (1991) and Honoring Juanita (2010), as well as two poetry collections, Subjects Apprehended (2000) and The Coast Starlight: Collected Poems, 1976–2006 (2006).

Emily Dickinson and Elvis Presley in Heaven

They call each other E. Elvis picks wildflowers near the river and brings them to Emily. She explains half-rhymes to him.

In heaven Emily wears her hair long, sports
Levis and western blouses with rhinestones.
Elvis is lean again, wears baggy trousers and T-shirts, a letterman's jacket from Tupelo High.

They take long walks and often hold hands.
She prefers they remain just friends. Forever.

Emily's poems now contain naugahyde, Cadillacs, Electricity, jets, TV, Little Richard and Richard Nixon. The rock-a-billy rhythm makes her smile.

Elvis likes himself with style. This afternoon he will play guitar and sing "I Taste a Liquor Never Brewed" to the tune of "Love Me Tender."

Emily will clap and harmonize. Alone in their cabins later, they'll listen to the river and nap. They will not think of Amherst or Las Vegas. They know why God made them roommates. It's because America was their hometown. It's because God is a thing without feathers. It's because God wears blue suede shoes.

(2006)

Exploring the Text

1. Hans Ostrom's poem depends on the reader understanding references to both Emily Dickinson's and Elvis Presley's works. What resonances does he expect his readers to have with the following allusions related to Elvis and his era: "lean again" (l. 6), "Tupelo High" (l. 7), "naugahyde" (l. 10), "Little Richard and Richard / Nixon" (ll. 11–12), "Love Me Tender" (l. 15), and "Las Vegas" (l. 19)?
2. What is the intention and effect of the period after "friends" in line 9?
3. In nearly every stanza, Ostrom uses enjambment — a stylistic device in which one line ends without a pause and continues to the next line to complete its meaning. What is the effect of this device in Ostrom's poem?
4. What does Ostrom's pairing of Presley and Dickinson suggest about the poet's idea of heaven?

Making Connections

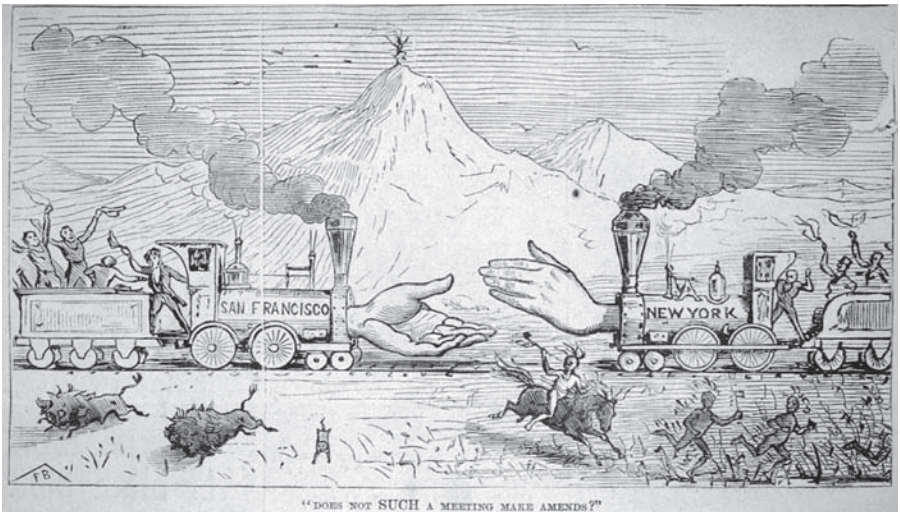
1. What qualities of these two people — one a classic poet, the other a pop-culture icon — and our understanding of and response to them does Hans Ostrom's poem suggest?
2. What technical qualities of Dickinson's poetry does Ostrom incorporate into this poem? Why?
3. Is Ostrom mocking, poking fun at, paying tribute to, or being disrespectful of Dickinson and the stereotype of her as a reclusive spinster? Cite both her poems and his as you explain what you believe his intent and tone are in this poem.
4. How does Ostrom argue that the Belle of Amherst and the King of Rock and Roll are both undeniably American? To what extent is he suggesting that they are equally important in terms of their influence on American culture — or is he?

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper

This cartoon was created by a staff cartoonist for the popular weekly news and literary publication Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, later renamed Leslie's Weekly.

Does Not Such a Meeting Make Amends?

On July 1, 1862, President Abraham Lincoln signed into law the Pacific Railway Act, which provided federal support to construct a railway system that would extend from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean. Such a system, when combined with the existing railroads operating in the East, would create the first transcontinental railroad. Construction by the Union Pacific Railroad began in Iowa and worked its way west, while the Central Pacific Railroad started in San Francisco and proceeded east. On May 10, 1869, rails of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railways were joined at Promontory Point, Utah, thus connecting the nation from coast to coast. A ceremony was held to drive in the Golden Spike, a symbol of completion. The wood engraving shown here appeared on May 29, 1869.



Prints and Photographs Division, Library of Congress

Exploring the Text

1. What is the narrative of this illustration? Identify the different characters who are involved. How is the landscape depicted? Which elements function as symbols? Start with where your eye is drawn and then move out into the surrounding fields as you analyze this complex image.

2. What "amends" does this illustration suggest need to be made? How would this event make amends? Look up the definition of "amends" and consider multiple meanings.
3. Are the specific contemporary issues that needed to be amended depicted in the illustration, or did the artist assume that the audience knew what they were? If you see them in the illustration, identify them.
4. Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper was known for its patriotic stances on most issues. To what extent do you find this illustration patriotic? How does it "answer" the question that is its caption: "Does not SUCH a meeting making amends?"

Red Cloud

Makhpiya-Luta (1822–1909), known as Red Cloud, was chief of the largest tribe of the Oglala Sioux. He successfully resisted development of Powder River Country in Wyoming and Montana from 1866 to 1868, a period known as Red Cloud's War.

Speech on Indian Rights

On November 6, 1868, Red Cloud signed a treaty that ended Red Cloud's War, ceded tribal lands, and established the Great Sioux Reservation, which encompassed all of South Dakota west of the Missouri River. This treaty marked the end of the Oglala Sioux's nearly decade-long efforts to maintain their land in the Yellowstone and Powder River valleys. In 1870, Red Cloud traveled to New York and Washington, D.C., to clarify the treaty, whose terms authorized U.S. government agents as administrators of the reservation, and to speak in defense of the Sioux. His speeches, which aroused public opinion, resulted in the government revising the treaty. Although Red Cloud remained a critic of the government, and especially of agents of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, he counseled his tribe to remain peaceful, fearing that additional wars would result in further losses — a position not entirely appreciated by younger, more radical members of his tribe. Following is a speech he gave at Cooper Union, a private college in New York City, on July 16, 1870, at a reception in his honor.

My Brothers and my Friends who are before me today: God Almighty has made us all, and He is here to hear what I have to say to you today. The Great Spirit made us both. He gave us lands and He gave you lands. You came here and we received you as brothers. When the Almighty made you, He made you all white and clothed you. When He made us He made us with red skins and poor. When you first came we were very many and you were few. Now you are many and we are few. You do not know who appears before you to speak. He is a representative of the original American race, the first people of this continent. We are good, and not bad. The reports which you get about us are all on one side. You hear of us only as murderers and thieves. We are not so. If we had more lands to give to you we would give them, but we have no more. We are driven into a very little island, and we want you, our dear friends, to help us with the Government of the United States. The Great Spirit made us poor and ignorant. He made you rich and wise and skillful in things which we know nothing about. The good Father made you to eat tame game and us to eat wild game. Ask any one who has gone through to California. They will tell you we have treated them well. You have children. We, too, have children, and we wish to bring them up well. We ask you to help us do it. At the mouth of Horse Creek, in 1852, the Great Father[1] made a treaty with us. We agreed to let him pass through our territory unharmed for fifty-five years. We kept our word. We committed no murders, no depredations, until the troops came there. When the troops were sent there trouble and disturbance arose. Since that time there have been various goods sent from time to time to us, but only once did they reach us, and soon the Great Father took away the only good man he had sent us, Col. Fitzpatrick. The Great Father said we must go to farming, and some of our men went to farming near Fort Laramie, and were treated very badly indeed. We came to Washington to see our Great Father that peace might be continued. The Great Father that made us both wishes peace to be kept; we want to keep peace. Will you help us? In 1808 men came out and brought papers. We could not read them, and they did not tell us truly what was in them. We thought the treaty was to remove the forts, and that we should then cease from fighting. But they wanted to send us traders on the Missouri. We did not want to go on the Missouri, but wanted traders where we were. When I reached Washington the Great Father explained to me what the treaty was, and showed me that the interpreters had deceived me. All I want is right and justice. I have tried to get from the Great Father what is right and just. I have not altogether succeeded. I want you to help me to get what is right and just. I represent the whole Sioux nation, and they will be bound by what I say. I am no Spotted Tail, to say one thing one day and be bought for a pin the next. Look at me. I am poor and naked, but I am the Chief of the nation. We do not want riches, but we want to train our children right. Riches would do us no good. We could not take them with us to the other world. We do not want riches, we want peace and love.

The riches that we have in this world, Secretary Cox[2] said truly, we cannot take with us to the next world. Then I wish to know why Commissioners are sent out to us who do nothing but rob us and get the riches of this world away from us? I was brought up among the traders, and those who came out there in the early times treated me well and I had a good time with them. They taught us to wear clothes and to use tobacco and ammunition. But, by and by, the Great Father sent out a different kind of men; men who cheated and drank whisky; men who were so bad that the Great Father could not keep them at home and so sent them out there. I have sent a great many words to the Great Father but they never reached him. They were drowned on the way, and I was afraid the words I spoke lately to the Great Father would not reach you, so I came to speak to you myself; and now I am going away to my home. I want to have men sent out to my people whom we know and can trust. I am glad I have come here. You belong in the East and I belong in the West, and I am glad I have come here and that we could understand one another. I am very much obliged to you for listening to me. I go home this afternoon. I hope you will think of what I have said to you. I bid you all an affectionate farewell.

---

[1]Red Cloud uses this term to refer to the president of the United States. — Eds.

[2]Jacob Dolson Cox (1828–1900) was the United States Secretary of the interior from 1869–70. — Eds.

(1870)

Exploring the Text

1. What common ground does Red Cloud establish at the outset with his audience? What differences does he acknowledge?
2. What is the stated purpose of his speech? What evidence does he provide to support his intentions?
3. What specific allegations does he make against the U.S. government? What are the most serious transgressions, according to his view? What actions does he recommend to address the problems he identifies?
4. Red Cloud insists that he wants only peace. What evidence do you find of his sincerity through both his literal statements and his rhetorical strategies?
5. How would you describe the tone of the speech? Use a phrase that includes a contrast word (such as but or yet) to capture the complexity of the tone.
6. At the end of this speech, Red Cloud was given a standing ovation. Why would his audience have been so moved by his message and the way he presented it? In your response, consider the following description of Cooper Union's founder:

> Peter Cooper's abolitionism was consistent with his generally progressive social views. He was a strong advocate for the rights of Native Americans and lobbied President Grant to adopt a peace policy in the west. In the 1870s, at a time when Indians were widely regarded as enemy savages, great leaders like Red Cloud, of the Lakota Sioux, and Little Raven, chief of the Arapaho, were given the lectern at the Great Hall. Cooper was also a fighter for women's rights who opened the doors of his institute to Susan B. Anthony and Elizabeth Cady Stanton.

Thomas Nast

Thomas Nast (1840–1902) has been called "the father of American caricature" because of his influential political cartoons. He was known for his legendary campaign against New York City's Boss Tweed and the Tammany Hall political machine. He popularized the political symbols of the elephant for the Republican Party and the donkey for the Democratic Party. Between 1859 and 1896, he drew more than 2,200 political cartoons for Harper's Weekly.

Worse than Slavery

The following image appeared in Harper's Weekly in 1874. Note that the White League, founded in Louisiana in 1874, was a paramilitary group committed to white supremacy. While it had some links to the Ku Klux Klan, the White League operated much more openly: members (many of whom were former Confederate soldiers) did not hide their identities, and the group generally acted through mainstream political channels.

Prints and Photographs Division, Library of Congress

Exploring the Text

1. What precisely is going on in this image? Identify each of the characters, the symbols, and the allusions. What "story" or narrative is Thomas Nast telling?

2. How do the structure, placement of characters, proportions, and use of space in this visual image contribute to the narrative?
3. What tensions does Nast emphasize in this cartoon? Consider his depiction through its use of both visual images and written text.
4. Nast uses little humor in this cartoon, yet he does employ caricature. What elements of caricature do you notice? How does caricature contribute to his argument?
5. How does Nast support his claim that African Americans in the South were facing something "Worse than Slavery"? Explain in terms of evidence presented to prove a claim. Does Nast address a counterargument? Qualify or modify his claim? How persuasive do you think he would have been to readers of Harper's Weekly in 1874?

Mark Twain

Mark Twain (1835–1910) is the pseudonym of Samuel Langhorne Clemens. Best known as a novelist — The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884), Tom Sawyer (1876), and A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court (1889) are among Twain's most famous novels — Twain also worked as a typesetter, a riverboat pilot, a miner, a reporter, and an editor. His early writings reflect his pre–Civil War upbringing in their idyllic images as well as in their reminders of some of America's least acceptable social realities. Twain spent his life observing and reporting on his surroundings, and his work provides a glimpse into the mind-set of people who lived in the late nineteenth century.

from Life on the Mississippi

Life on the Mississippi (1883), a mixture of autobiography and travel narrative, recounts Twain's experiences as a riverboat pilot on the Mississippi River traveling from St. Louis to New Orleans. What follows are Chapter VIII, "Perplexing Lessons," and Chapter IX, "Continued Perplexities," which appear early in the memoir and describe the young Twain's training as a "cub" steamboat pilot under the tutelage of Mr. Bixby.

Chapter VIII: Perplexing Lessons

At the end of what seemed a tedious while, I had managed to pack my head full of islands, towns, bars, "points," and bends; and a curiously inanimate mass of lumber it was, too. However, inasmuch as I could shut my eyes and reel off a good long string of these names without leaving out more than ten miles of river in every fifty, I began to feel that I could take a boat down to New Orleans if I could make her skip those little gaps. But of course my complacency could hardly get start enough to lift my nose a trifle into the air, before Mr. Bixby would think of something to fetch it down again. One day he turned on me suddenly with this settler:

"What is the shape of Walnut Bend?"

He might as well have asked me my grandmother's opinion of protoplasm. I reflected respectfully, and then said I didn't know it had any particular shape. My gunpowdery chief went off with a bang, of course, and then went on loading and firing until he was out of adjectives.

I had learned long ago that he only carried just so many rounds of ammunition, and was sure to subside into a very placable and even remorseful old smooth-bore as soon as they were all gone. That word "old" is merely affectionate; he was not more than thirty-four. I waited. By and by he said:

"My boy, you've got to know the shape of the river perfectly. It is all there is left to steer by on a very dark night. Every thing else is blotted out and gone. But mind you, it hasn't the same shape in the night that it has in the daytime."

"How on earth am I ever going to learn it, then?"

"How do you follow a hall at home in the dark? Because you know the shape of it. You can't see it."

"Do you mean to say that I've got to know all the million trifling variations of shape in the banks of this interminable river as well as I know the shape of the front hall at home?"

"On my honor, you've got to know them better than any man ever did know the shapes of the halls in his own house."

"I wish I was dead!"

"Now I don't want to discourage you, but ——"

"Well, pile it on me; I might as well have it now as another time."

"You see, this has got to be learned; there isn't any getting around it. A clear starlight night throws such heavy shadows that, if you didn't know the shape of a shore perfectly, you would claw away from every bunch of timber, because you would take the black shadow of it for a solid cape; and you see you would be getting scared to death every fifteen minutes by the watch. You would be fifty yards from shore all the time when you ought to be within fifty feet of it. You can't see a snag in one of those shadows, but you know exactly where it is, and the shape of the river tells you when you are coming to it. Then there's your pitch-dark night; the river is a very different shape on a pitch-dark night from what it is on a starlight night. All shores seem to be straight lines, then, and mighty dim ones, too; and you'd run them for straight lines, only you know better. You boldly drive your boat right into what seems to be a solid, straight wall (you knowing very well that in reality there is a curve there), and that wall falls back and makes way for you. Then there's your gray mist. You take a night when there's one of these grisly, drizzly, gray mists, and then there isn't any particular shape to a shore. A gray mist would tangle the head of the oldest man that ever lived. Well, then, different kinds of moonlight change the shape of the river in different ways. You see ——"

"Oh, don't say any more, please! Have I got to learn the shape of the river according to all these five hundred thousand different ways? If I tried to carry all that cargo in my head it would make me stoop-shouldered."

"No! you only learn the shape of the river; and you learn it with such absolute certainty that you can always steer by the shape that's in your head, and never mind the one that's before your eyes."

"Very well, I'll try it; but, after I have learned it, can I depend on it? Will it keep the same form and not go fooling around?"

Before Mr. Bixby could answer, Mr. W. came in to take the watch, and he said:

"Bixby, you'll have to look out for President's Island, and all that country clear away up above the Old Hen and Chickens. The banks are caving and the shape of the shores changing like every thing. Why, you wouldn't know the point above 40. You can go up inside the old sycamore snag, now."[1]

So that question was answered. Here were leagues of shore changing shape. My spirits were down in the mud again. Two things seemed pretty apparent to me. One was, that in order to be a pilot a man had got to learn more than any one man ought to be allowed to know; and the other was, that he must learn it all over again in a different way every twenty-four hours.

That night we had the watch until twelve. Now it was an ancient river custom for 20 the two pilots to chat a bit when the watch changed. While the relieving pilot put on his gloves and lit his cigar, his partner, the retiring pilot, would say something like this:

"I judge the upper bar is making down a little at Hale's Point; had quarter twain with the lower lead and mark twain[2] with the other."

"Yes, I thought it was making down a little, last trip. Meet any boats?"

"Met one abreast the head of 21, but she was away over hugging the bar, and I couldn't make her out entirely. I took her for the Sunny South — hadn't any skylights forward of the chimneys."

And so on. And as the relieving pilot took the wheel his partner would mention that we were in such-and-such a bend, and say we were abreast of such-and-such a man's wood-yard or plantation. This was courtesy; I supposed it was necessity. But Mr. W. came on watch full twelve minutes late on this particular night — a tremendous breach of etiquette; in fact, it is the unpardonable sin among pilots. So Mr. Bixby gave him no greeting whatever, but simply surrendered the wheel and marched out of the pilot-house without a word. I was appalled; it was a villainous night for blackness, we were in a particularly wide and blind part of the river, where there was no shape or substance to any thing, and it seemed incredible that Mr. Bixby should have left that poor fellow to kill the boat, trying to find out where he was. But I resolved that I would stand by him any way. He should find that he was not wholly friendless. So I stood around, and waited to be asked where we were. But Mr. W. plunged on serenely through the solid firmament of black cats that stood for an atmosphere, and never opened his mouth. "Here is a proud devil!" thought I; "here is a limb of Satan that would rather send us all to destruction than put himself under obligations to me, because I am not yet one of the salt of the earth and privileged to snub captains and lord it over every thing dead and alive in a steamboat." I presently climbed up on the bench; I did not think it was safe to go to sleep while this lunatic was on watch.

---

[1]It may not be necessary, but still it can do no harm to explain that "inside" means between the snag and the shore. — M. T.

[2]Archaic word for two; in this context, it means two fathoms deep (about 12 feet) and safe for passage by a riverboat. — Eds.

However, I must have gone to sleep in the course of time, because the next thing I was aware of was the fact that day was breaking, Mr. W. gone, and Mr. Bixby at the wheel again. So it was four o'clock and all well — but me; I felt like a skinful of dry bones, and all of them trying to ache at once. 25

Mr. Bixby asked me what I had stayed up there for. I confessed that it was to do Mr. W. a benevolence — tell him where he was. It took five minutes for the entire preposterousness of the thing to filter into Mr. Bixby's system, and then I judge it filled him nearly up to the chin; because he paid me a compliment — and not much of a one either. He said:

"Well, taking you by and large, you do seem to be more different kinds of an ass than any creature I ever saw before. What did you suppose he wanted to know for?"

I said I thought it might be a convenience to him.

"Convenience! D —— nation! Didn't I tell you that a man's got to know the river in the night the same as he'd know his own front hall?"

"Well, I can follow the front hall in the dark if I know it is the front hall; but suppose you set me down in the middle of it in the dark and not tell me which hall it is; how am I to know?" 30

"Well, you've got to, on the river!"

"All right. Then I'm glad I never said any thing to Mr. W."

"I should say so! Why, he'd have slammed you through the window and utterly ruined a hundred dollars' worth of window-sash and stuff."

I was glad this damage had been saved, for it would have made me unpopular with the owners. They always hated any body who had the name of being careless and injuring things.

I went to work now to learn the shape of the river; and of all the eluding and ungraspable objects that ever I tried to get mind or hands on, that was the chief. I would fasten my eyes upon a sharp, wooded point that projected far into the river some miles ahead of me, and go to laboriously photographing its shape upon my brain; and just as I was beginning to succeed to my satisfaction, we would draw up toward it and the exasperating thing would begin to melt away and fold back into the bank! If there had been a conspicuous dead tree standing upon the very point of the cape, I would find that tree inconspicuously merged into the general forest, and occupying the middle of a straight shore, when I got abreast of it! No prominent hill would stick to its shape long enough for me to make up my mind what its form really was, but it was as dissolving and changeful as if it had been a mountain of butter in the hottest corner of the tropics. Nothing ever had the same shape when I was coming down-stream that it had borne when I went up. I mentioned these little difficulties to Mr. Bixby. He said: 35

"That's the very main virtue of the thing. If the shapes didn't change every three seconds they wouldn't be of any use. Take this place where we are now, for instance. As long as that hill over yonder is only one hill, I can boom right along the way I'm going; but the moment it splits at the top and forms a V, I know I've got to scratch to starboard in a hurry, or I'll bang this boat's brains out against a rock; and then the moment one of the prongs of the V swings behind the other, I've got to waltz to larboard again, or I'll have a misunderstanding with a snag that would snatch the keelson out of this steamboat as neatly as if it were a sliver in your hand. If that hill didn't change its shape on bad nights there would be an awful steamboat grave-yard around here inside of a year."

It was plain that I had got to learn the shape of the river in all the different ways that could be thought of, — upside down, wrong end first, inside out, fore-and-aft, and "thort-ships," — and then know what to do on gray nights when it hadn't any shape at all. So I set about it. In the course of time I began to get the best of this knotty lesson, and my self-complacency moved to the front once more. Mr. Bixby was all fixed, and ready to start it to the rear again. He opened on me after this fashion:

"How much water did we have in the middle crossing at Hole-in-the-Wall, trip before last?"

I considered this an outrage. I said:

"Every trip, down and up, the leadsmen are singing through that tangled place for three-quarters of an hour on a stretch. How do you reckon I can remember such a mess as that?"

"My boy, you've got to remember it. You've got to remember the exact spot and the exact marks the boat lay in when we had the shoalest water, in every one of the five hundred shoal places between St. Louis and New Orleans; and you mustn't get the shoal soundings and marks of one trip mixed up with the shoal soundings and marks of another, either, for they're not often twice alike. You must keep them separate."

When I came to myself again, I said:

"When I get so that I can do that, I'll be able to raise the dead, and then I won't have to pilot a steamboat to make a living. I want to retire from this business. I want a slush-bucket and a brush; I'm only fit for a roustabout. I haven't got brains enough to be a pilot; and if I had I wouldn't have strength enough to carry them around, unless I went on crutches."

"Now drop that! When I say I'll learn[3] a man the river, I mean it. And you can depend on it, I'll learn him or kill him."

Chapter IX: Continued Perplexities

There was no use in arguing with a person like this. I promptly put such a strain on my memory that by and by even the shoal water and the countless crossing-marks began to stay with me. But the result was just the same. I never could more than get one knotty thing learned before another presented itself. Now I had often seen pilots gazing at the water and pretending to read it as if it were a book; but it was a book that told me nothing. A time came at last, however, when Mr. Bixby seemed to think me far enough advanced to bear a lesson on water-reading. So he began:

"Do you see that long, slanting line on the face of the water? Now, that's a reef. Moreover, it's a bluff reef. There is a solid sand-bar under it that is nearly as straight up and down as the side of a house. There is plenty of water close up to it, but mighty little on top of it. If you were to hit it, you would knock the boat's brains out. Do you see where the line fringes out at the upper end and begins to fade away?"

[3] "Teach" is not in the river vocabulary. — M. T.

"Yes, sir."

"Well, that is a low place; that is the head of the reef. You can climb over there, and not hurt any thing. Cross over, now, and follow along close under the reef — easy water there — not much current."

I followed the reef along till I approached the fringed end. Then Mr. Bixby said:

"Now get ready. Wait till I give the word. She won't want to mount the reef; a boat 50 hates shoal water. Stand by — wait — wait — keep her well in hand. Now cramp her down! Snatch her! snatch her!"

He seized the other side of the wheel and helped to spin it around until it was hard down, and then we held it so. The boat resisted, and refused to answer for a while, and next she came surging to starboard, mounted the reef, and sent a long, angry ridge of water foaming away from her bows.

"Now watch her; watch her like a cat, or she'll get away from you. When she fights strong and the tiller slips a little, in a jerky, greasy sort of way, let up on her a trifle; it is the way she tells you at night that the water is too shoal; but keep edging her up, little by little, toward the point. You are well up on the bar now; there is a bar under every point, because the water that comes down around it forms an eddy and allows the sediment to sink. Do you see those fine lines on the face of the water that branch out like the ribs of a fan? Well, those are little reefs; you want to just miss the ends of them, but run them pretty close. Now look out — look out! Don't you crowd that slick, greasy-looking place; there ain't nine feet there; she won't stand it. She begins to smell it; look sharp, I tell you! Oh, blazes, there you go! Stop the starboard wheel! Quick! Ship up to back! Set her back!"

The engine bells jingled and the engines answered promptly, shooting white columns of steam far aloft out of the 'scape-pipes, but it was too late. The boat had "smelt" the bar in good earnest; the foamy ridges that radiated from her bows suddenly disappeared, a great dead swell came rolling forward, and swept ahead of her, she careened far over to larboard, and went tearing away toward the shore as if she were about scared to death. We were a good mile from where we ought to have been when we finally got the upper hand of her again.

During the afternoon watch the next day, Mr. Bixby asked me if I knew how to run the next few miles. I said:

"Go inside the first snag above the point, outside the next one, start out from the 55 lower end of Higgins's wood-yard, make a square crossing, and ——"

"That's all right. I'll be back before you close up on the next point."

But he wasn't. He was still below when I rounded it and entered upon a piece of river which I had some misgivings about. I did not know that he was hiding behind a chimney to see how I would perform. I went gayly along, getting prouder and prouder, for he had never left the boat in my sole charge such a length of time before. I even got to "setting" her and letting the wheel go entirely, while I vaingloriously turned my back and inspected the stern marks and hummed a tune, a sort of easy indifference which I had prodigiously admired in Bixby and other great pilots. Once I inspected rather long, and when I faced to the front again my heart flew into my mouth so suddenly that if I hadn't clapped my teeth together I should have lost it. One of those frightful bluff reefs was stretching its deadly length right across our bows! My head was gone in a moment; I did not know which end I stood on; I gasped and could not get my breath; I spun the wheel down with such rapidity that it wove itself together like a spider's web; the boat answered and turned square away from the reef, but the reef followed her! I fled, but still it followed, still it kept — right across my bows! I never looked to see where I was going, I only fled. The awful crash was imminent. Why didn't that villain come? If I committed the crime of ringing a bell I might get thrown overboard. But better that than kill the boat. So in blind desperation I started such a rattling "shivaree" down below as never had astounded an engineer in this world before, I fancy. Amidst the frenzy of the bells the engines began to back and fill in a furious way, and my reason forsook its throne — we were about to crash into the woods on the other side of the river. Just then Mr. Bixby stepped calmly into view on the hurricane deck. My soul went out to him in gratitude. My distress vanished; I would have felt safe on the brink of Niagara with Mr. Bixby on the hurricane deck. He blandly and sweetly took his toothpick out of his mouth between his fingers, as if it were a cigar, — we were just in the act of climbing an overhanging big tree, and the passengers were scudding astern like rats, — and lifted up these commands to me ever so gently:

"Stop the starboard! Stop the larboard! Set her back on both!"

The boat hesitated, halted, pressed her nose among the boughs a critical instant, then reluctantly began to back away.

"Stop the larboard! Come ahead on it! Stop the starboard! Come ahead on it! Point her for the bar!"

I sailed away as serenely as a summer's morning. Mr. Bixby came in and said, with mock simplicity:

"When you have a hail, my boy, you ought to tap the big bell three times before you land, so that the engineers can get ready."

I blushed under the sarcasm, and said I hadn't had any hail.

"Ah! Then it was for wood, I suppose. The officer of the watch will tell you when he wants to wood up."

I went on consuming, and said I wasn't after wood.

"Indeed? Why, what could you want over here in the bend, then? Did you ever know of a boat following a bend up-stream at this stage of the river?"

"No, sir — and I wasn't trying to follow it. I was getting away from a bluff reef."

"No, it wasn't a bluff reef; there isn't one within three miles of where you were."

"But I saw it. It was as bluff as that one yonder."

"Just about. Run over it!"

"Do you give it as an order?"

"Yes. Run over it!"

"If I don't, I wish I may die."

"All right; I am taking the responsibility."

I was just as anxious to kill the boat, now, as I had been to save it before. I impressed 75 my orders upon my memory, to be used at the inquest, and made a straight break for the reef. As it disappeared under our bows I held my breath; but we slid over it like oil.

"Now, don't you see the difference? It wasn't any thing but a wind reef. The wind does that."

"So I see. But it is exactly like a bluff reef. How am I ever going to tell them apart?"

"I can't tell you. It is an instinct. By and by you will just naturally know one from the other, but you never will be able to explain why or how you know them apart."

It turned out to be true. The face of the water, in time, became a wonderful book — a book that was a dead language to the uneducated passenger, but which told its mind to me without reserve, delivering its most cherished secrets as clearly as if it uttered them with a voice. And it was not a book to be read once and thrown aside, for it had a new story to tell every day. Throughout the long twelve hundred miles there was never a page that was void of interest, never one that you could leave unread without loss, never one that you would want to skip, thinking you could find higher enjoyment in some other thing. There never was so wonderful a book written by man; never one whose interest was so absorbing, so unflagging, so sparklingly renewed with every reperusal. The passenger who could not read it was charmed with a peculiar sort of faint dimple on its surface (on the rare occasions when he did not overlook it altogether); but to the pilot that was an italicized passage; indeed, it was more than that, it was a legend of the largest capitals, with a string of shouting exclamation points at the end of it, for it meant that a wreck or a rock was buried there that could tear the life out of the strongest vessel that ever floated. It is the faintest and simplest expression the water ever makes, and the most hideous to a pilot's eye. In truth, the passenger who could not read this book saw nothing but all manner of pretty pictures in it, painted by the sun and shaded by the clouds, whereas to the trained eye these were not pictures at all, but the grimmest and most dead-earnest of reading matter.

Now when I had mastered the language of this water, and had come to know 80 every trifling feature that bordered the great river as familiarly as I knew the letters of the alphabet, I had made a valuable acquisition. But I had lost something, too. I had lost something which could never be restored to me while I lived. All the grace, the beauty, the poetry, had gone out of the majestic river! I still kept in mind a certain wonderful sunset which I witnessed when steamboating was new to me. A broad expanse of the river was turned to blood; in the middle distance the red hue brightened into gold, through which a solitary log came floating, black and conspicuous; one place a long, slanting mark lay sparkling upon the water; in another the surface was broken by boiling, tumbling rings, that were as many-tinted as an opal; where the ruddy flush was faintest, was a smooth spot that was covered with graceful circles and radiating lines, ever so delicately traced; the shore on our left was densely wooded, and the sombre shadow that fell from this forest was broken in one place by a long, ruffled trail that shone like silver; and high above the forest wall a clean-stemmed dead tree waved a single leafy bough that glowed like a flame in the unobstructed splendor that was flowing from the sun. There were graceful curves, reflected images, woody heights, soft distances; and over the whole scene, far and near, the dissolving lights drifted steadily, enriching it every passing moment with new marvels of coloring.

I stood like one bewitched. I drank it in, in a speechless rapture. The world was new to me, and I had never seen any thing like this at home. But as I have said, a day came when I began to cease from noting the glories and the charms which the moon and the sun and the twilight wrought upon the river's face; another day came when I ceased altogether to note them. Then, if that sunset scene had been repeated, I should have looked upon it without rapture, and should have commented upon it, inwardly, after this fashion: "This sun means that we are going to have wind to-morrow; that floating log means that the river is rising, small thanks to it; that slanting mark on the water refers to a bluff reef which is going to kill somebody's steamboat one of these nights, if it keeps on stretching out like that; those tumbling 'boils' show a dissolving bar and a changing channel there; the lines and circles in the slick water over yonder are a warning that that troublesome place is shoaling up dangerously; that silver streak in the shadow of the forest is the 'break' from a new snag, and he has located himself in the very best place he could have found to fish for steamboats; that tall dead tree, with a single living branch, is not going to last long, and then how is a body ever going to get through this blind place at night without the friendly old landmark?"

No, the romance and the beauty were all gone from the river. All the value any feature of it had for me now was the amount of usefulness it could furnish toward compassing the safe piloting of a steamboat. Since those days, I have pitied doctors from my heart. What does the lovely flush in a beauty's cheek mean to a doctor but a "break" that ripples above some deadly disease? Are not all her visible charms sown thick with what are to him the signs and symbols of hidden decay? Does he ever see her beauty at all, or doesn't he simply view her professionally, and comment upon her unwholesome condition all to himself? And doesn't he sometimes wonder whether he has gained most or lost most by learning his trade?

(1883)

Exploring the Text

1. What kind of a student is young Mark Twain as he portrays himself in the first chapter, "Perplexing Lessons"? Consider his interactions with both Mr. Bixby and Mr. W.
2. Twain explains in a footnote that Mr. Bixby uses the term "learn" instead of "teach" because the latter is "not in the river vocabulary"; for example, Bixby states, "When I say I'll learn a man the river, I mean it" (par. 44). What does this distinction say about Bixby's attitude toward the process of education on the river?
3. Throughout these two chapters, Twain focuses on his early education as an apprentice steamboat pilot. What are the primary lessons he learns from Bixby? How would you describe Bixby's teaching methods? What, for instance, does he mean when he explains the necessity of knowing "all the million trifling variations of shape in the banks of this interminable river . . . better than any man ever did know the shapes of the halls in his own house" (pars. 8–9)?

4. Known for his biting wit and satire, Twain once wrote, "Humor is the good natured side of a truth." Do you see evidence of such use of humor in Life on the Mississippi? Find at least three examples of humor in this excerpt, including both sharp and gentle, and discuss what effect(s) Twain achieves through humor. How does Twain use it to express his version of the truth?
5. Twain portrays the Mississippi River as a character as much as he portrays Mr. Bixby, Mr. W., and others. What are the qualities of this character? What is Twain's attitude toward "her," as he refers to the river? Do you think he is romanticizing the river and the surrounding community and environment?
6. What does Twain mean when he writes, "The face of the water, in time, became a wonderful book" (par. 79)? What details does he offer to expand on and explore this metaphor?
7. Why does Twain believe that once he "had mastered the language of this water . . . [a]ll the grace, the beauty, the poetry, had gone out of the majestic river" (par. 80)?
8. Like all memoir, these two chapters include the voice of the young remembered self along with that of the more mature remembering self. What are the different narrative strategies of each of these voices? Consider dialogue, action, reflection, and tone in your response.

Sarah Orne Jewett

Sarah Orne Jewett (1849–1909) was born in Maine. As a young girl, she accompanied her father, a country doctor, on his visits to patients, an experience that, at least in part, inspired her to write stories about rural New England. She began writing as a child, and at nineteen she had a story published in the Atlantic Monthly. One major theme in Jewett's work is the powerful influence of nature. A White Heron and Other Stories, published in 1886, and The Country of the Pointed Firs, published a decade later, are her best known works.

A White Heron

Following is "A White Heron" (1886), the most popular of Jewett's short stories.

I

The woods were already filled with shadows one June evening, just before eight o'clock, though a bright sunset still glimmered faintly among the trunks of the trees. A little girl was driving home her cow, a plodding, dilatory, provoking creature in her behavior, but a valued companion for all that. They were going away from whatever light there was, and striking deep into the woods, but their feet were familiar with the path, and it was no matter whether their eyes could see it or not.

There was hardly a night the summer through when the old cow could be found waiting at the pasture bars; on the contrary, it was her greatest pleasure to hide herself away among the high huckleberry bushes, and though she wore a loud bell she had made the discovery that if one stood perfectly still it would not ring. So Sylvia had to hunt for her until she found her, and call Co'! Co'! with never an answering Moo, until her childish patience was quite spent. If the creature had not given good milk and plenty of it, the case would have seemed very different to her owners. Besides, Sylvia had all the time there was, and very little use to make of it. Sometimes in pleasant weather it was a consolation to look upon the cow's pranks as an intelligent attempt to play hide and seek, and as the child had no playmates she lent herself to this amusement with a good deal of zest. Though this chase had been so long that the wary animal herself had given an unusual signal of her whereabouts, Sylvia had only laughed when she came upon Mistress Moolly at the swamp-side, and urged her affectionately homeward with a twig of birch leaves. The old cow was not inclined to wander farther, she even turned in the right direction for once as they left the pasture, and stepped along the road at a good pace. She was quite ready to be milked now, and seldom stopped to browse. Sylvia wondered what her grandmother would say because they were so late. It was a great while since she had left home at half-past five o'clock, but everybody knew the difficulty of making this errand a short one. Mrs. Tilley had chased the hornéd torment too many summer evenings herself to blame any one else for lingering, and was only thankful as she waited that she had Sylvia, nowadays, to give such valuable assistance. The good woman suspected that Sylvia loitered occasionally on her own account; there never was such a child for straying about out-of-doors since the world was made! Everybody said that it was a good change for a little maid who had tried to grow for eight years in a crowded manufacturing town, but, as for Sylvia herself, it seemed as if she never had been alive at all before she came to live at the farm. She thought often with wistful compassion of a wretched geranium that belonged to a town neighbor.

"'Afraid of folks,'" old Mrs. Tilley said to herself, with a smile, after she had made the unlikely choice of Sylvia from her daughter's houseful of children, and was returning to the farm. "'Afraid of folks,' they said! I guess she won't be troubled no great with 'em up to the old place!" When they reached the door of the lonely house and stopped to unlock it, and the cat came to purr loudly, and rub against them, a deserted pussy, indeed, but fat with young robins, Sylvia whispered that this was a beautiful place to live in, and she never should wish to go home.

The companions followed the shady wood-road, the cow taking slow steps and the child very fast ones. The cow stopped long at the brook to drink, as if the pasture were not half a swamp, and Sylvia stood still and waited, letting her bare feet cool themselves in the shoal water, while the great twilight moths struck softly against her. She waded on through the brook as the cow moved away, and listened to the thrushes with a heart that beat fast with pleasure. There was a stirring in the great boughs overhead. They were full of little birds and beasts that seemed to be wide awake, and going about their world, or else saying good-night to each other in sleepy twitters. Sylvia herself felt sleepy as she walked along. However, it was not much farther to the house, and the air was soft and sweet. She was not often in the woods so late as this, and it made her feel as if she were a part of the gray shadows and the moving leaves. She was just thinking how long it seemed since she first came to the farm a year ago, and wondering if everything went on in the noisy town just the same as when she was there, the thought of the great red-faced boy who used to chase and frighten her made her hurry along the path to escape from the shadow of the trees.

Suddenly this little woods-girl is horror-stricken to hear a clear whistle not very far away. Not a bird's-whistle, which would have a sort of friendliness, but a boy's whistle, determined, and somewhat aggressive. Sylvia left the cow to whatever sad fate might await her, and stepped discreetly aside into the bushes, but she was just too late. The enemy had discovered her, and called out in a very cheerful and persuasive tone, "Halloa, little girl, how far is it to the road?" and trembling Sylvia answered almost inaudibly, "A good ways."

She did not dare to look boldly at the tall young man, who carried a gun over his shoulder, but she came out of her bush and again followed the cow, while he walked alongside.

"I have been hunting for some birds," the stranger said kindly, "and I have lost my way, and need a friend very much. Don't be afraid," he added gallantly. "Speak up and tell me what your name is, and whether you think I can spend the night at your house, and go out gunning early in the morning."

Sylvia was more alarmed than before. Would not her grandmother consider her much to blame? But who could have foreseen such an accident as this? It did not seem to be her fault, and she hung her head as if the stem of it were broken, but managed to answer "Sylvy," with much effort when her companion again asked her name.

Mrs. Tilley was standing in the doorway when the trio came into view. The cow gave a loud moo by way of explanation.

"Yes, you'd better speak up for yourself, you old trial! Where'd she tuck herself away this time, Sylvy?" But Sylvia kept an awed silence; she knew by instinct that her grandmother did not comprehend the gravity of the situation. She must be mistaking the stranger for one of the farmer-lads of the region.

The young man stood his gun beside the door, and dropped a lumpy game-bag beside it; then he bade Mrs. Tilley good-evening, and repeated his wayfarer's story, and asked if he could have a night's lodging.

"Put me anywhere you like," he said. "I must be off early in the morning, before day; but I am very hungry, indeed. You can give me some milk at any rate, that's plain."

"Dear sakes, yes," responded the hostess, whose long slumbering hospitality seemed to be easily awakened. "You might fare better if you went out to the main road a mile or so, but you're welcome to what we've got. I'll milk right off, and you make yourself at home. You can sleep on husks or feathers," she proffered graciously. "I raised them all myself. There's good pasturing for geese just below here towards the ma'sh. Now step round and set a plate for the gentleman, Sylvy!" And Sylvia promptly stepped. She was glad to have something to do, and she was hungry herself.

It was a surprise to find so clean and comfortable a little dwelling in this New England wilderness. The young man had known the horrors of its most primitive housekeeping, and the dreary squalor of that level of society which does not rebel at the companionship of hens. This was the best thrift of an old-fashioned farmstead, though on such a small scale that it seemed like a hermitage. He listened eagerly to the old woman's quaint talk, he watched Sylvia's pale face and shining gray eyes with ever growing enthusiasm, and insisted that this was the best supper he had eaten for a month, and afterward the new-made friends sat down in the doorway together while the moon came up.

Soon it would be berry-time, and Sylvia was a great help at picking. The cow was a 15 good milker, though a plaguy thing to keep track of, the hostess gossiped frankly, adding presently that she had buried four children, so Sylvia's mother, and a son (who might be dead) in California were all the children she had left. "Dan, my boy, was a great hand to go gunning," she explained sadly. "I never wanted for pa'tridges or gray squer'ls while he was to home. He's been a great wand'rer, I expect, and he's no hand to write letters. There, I don't blame him, I'd ha' seen the world myself if it had been so I could.

"Sylvy takes after him," the grandmother continued affectionately, after a minute's pause. "There ain't a foot o' ground she don't know her way over, and the wild creaturs counts her one o' themselves. Squer'ls she'll tame to come an' feed right out o' her hands, and all sorts o' birds. Last winter she got the jay-birds to bangeing here, and I believe she'd 'a' scanted herself of her own meals to have plenty to throw out amongst 'em, if I hadn't kep' watch. Anything but crows, I tell her, I'm willin' to help support, — though Dan he had a tamed one o' them that did seem to have reason same as folks. It was round here a good spell after he went away. Dan an' his father they didn't hitch, — but he never held up his head ag'in after Dan had dared him an' gone off."

The guest did not notice this hint of family sorrows in his eager interest in something else.

"So Sylvy knows all about birds, does she?" he exclaimed, as he looked round at the little girl who sat, very demure but increasingly sleepy, in the moonlight. "I am making a collection of birds myself. I have been at it ever since I was a boy." (Mrs. Tilley smiled.) "There are two or three very rare ones I have been hunting for these five years. I mean to get them on my own ground if they can be found."

"Do you cage 'em up?" asked Mrs. Tilley doubtfully, in response to this enthusiastic announcement.

"Oh no, they're stuffed and preserved, dozens and dozens of them," said the 20 ornithologist, "and I have shot or snared every one myself. I caught a glimpse of a white heron a few miles from here on Saturday, and I have followed it in this direction. They have never been found in this district at all. The little white heron, it is," and he turned again to look at Sylvia with the hope of discovering that the rare bird was one of her acquaintances.

But Sylvia was watching a hop-toad in the narrow footpath.

"You would know the heron if you saw it," the stranger continued eagerly. "A queer tall white bird with soft feathers and long thin legs. And it would have a nest perhaps in the top of a high tree, made of sticks, something like a hawk's nest."

Sylvia's heart gave a wild beat; she knew that strange white bird, and had once stolen softly near where it stood in some bright green swamp grass, away over at the other side of the woods. There was an open place where the sunshine always seemed strangely yellow and hot, where tall, nodding rushes grew, and her grandmother had warned her that she might sink in the soft black mud underneath and never be heard of more. Not far beyond were the salt marshes just this side the sea itself, which Sylvia wondered and dreamed much about, but never had seen, whose great voice could sometimes be heard above the noise of the woods on stormy nights.

"I can't think of anything I should like so much as to find that heron's nest," the handsome stranger was saying. "I would give ten dollars to anybody who could show it to me," he added desperately, "and I mean to spend my whole vacation hunting for it if need be. Perhaps it was only migrating, or had been chased out of its own region by some bird of prey."

Mrs. Tilley gave amazed attention to all this, but Sylvia still watched the toad, not 25 divining, as she might have done at some calmer time, that the creature wished to get to its hole under the door-step, and was much hindered by the unusual spectators at that hour of the evening. No amount of thought, that night, could decide how many wished-for treasures the ten dollars, so lightly spoken of, would buy.

The next day the young sportsman hovered about the woods, and Sylvia kept him company, having lost her first fear of the friendly lad, who proved to be most kind and sympathetic. He told her many things about the birds and what they knew and where they lived and what they did with themselves. And he gave her a jack-knife, which she thought as great a treasure as if she were a desert-islander. All day long he did not once make her troubled or afraid except when he brought down some unsuspecting singing creature from its bough. Sylvia would have liked him vastly better without his gun; she could not understand why he killed the very birds he seemed to like so much. But as the day waned, Sylvia still watched the young man with loving admiration. She had never seen anybody so charming and delightful; the woman's heart, asleep in the child, was vaguely thrilled by a dream of love. Some premonition of that great power stirred and swayed these young creatures who traversed the solemn woodlands with soft-footed silent care. They stopped to listen to a bird's song; they pressed forward again eagerly, parting the branches, — speaking to each other rarely and in whispers; the young man going first and Sylvia following, fascinated, a few steps behind, with her gray eyes dark with excitement.

She grieved because the longed-for white heron was elusive, but she did not lead the guest, she only followed, and there was no such thing as speaking first. The sound of her own unquestioned voice would have terrified her, — it was hard enough to answer yes or no when there was need of that. At last evening began to fall, and they drove the cow home together, and Sylvia smiled with pleasure when they came to the place where she heard the whistle and was afraid only the night before.

II

Half a mile from home, at the farther edge of the woods, where the land was highest, a great pine-tree stood, the last of its generation. Whether it was left for a boundary mark, or for what reason, no one could say; the woodchoppers who had felled its mates were dead and gone long ago, and a whole forest of sturdy trees, pines and oaks and maples, had grown again. But the stately head of this old pine towered above them all and made a landmark for sea and shore miles and miles away. Sylvia knew it well. She had always believed that whoever climbed to the top of it could see the ocean; and the little girl had often laid her hand on the great rough trunk and looked up wistfully at those dark boughs that the wind always stirred, no matter how hot and still the air might be below. Now she thought of the tree with a new excitement, for why, if one climbed it at break of day, could not one see all the world, and easily discover from whence the white heron flew, and mark the place, and find the hidden nest?

What a spirit of adventure, what wild ambition! What fancied triumph and delight and glory for the later morning when she could make known the secret! It was almost too real and too great for the childish heart to bear.

All night the door of the little house stood open and the whippoorwills came and 30 sang upon the very step. The young sportsman and his old hostess were sound asleep, but Sylvia's great design kept her broad awake and watching. She forgot to think of sleep. The short summer night seemed as long as the winter darkness, and at last when the whippoorwills ceased, and she was afraid the morning would after all come too soon, she stole out of the house and followed the pasture path through the woods, hastening toward the open ground beyond, listening with a sense of comfort and companionship to the drowsy twitter of a half-awakened bird, whose perch she had jarred in passing. Alas, if the great wave of human interest which flooded for the first time this dull little life should sweep away the satisfactions of an existence heart to heart with nature and the dumb life of the forest!

There was the huge tree asleep yet in the paling moonlight, and small and silly Sylvia began with utmost bravery to mount to the top of it, with tingling, eager blood coursing the channels of her whole frame, with her bare feet and fingers, that pinched and held like bird's claws to the monstrous ladder reaching up, up, almost to the sky itself. First she must mount the white oak tree that grew alongside, where she was almost lost among the dark branches and the green leaves heavy and wet with dew; a bird fluttered off its nest, and a red squirrel ran to and fro and scolded pettishly at the harmless housebreaker. Sylvia felt her way easily. She had often climbed there, and knew that higher still one of the oak's upper branches chafed against the pine trunk, just where its lower boughs were set close together. There, when she made the dangerous pass from one tree to the other, the great enterprise would really begin.

She crept out along the swaying oak limb at last, and took the daring step across into the old pine-tree. The way was harder than she thought; she must reach far and hold fast, the sharp dry twigs caught and held her and scratched her like angry talons, the pitch made her thin little fingers clumsy and stiff as she went round and round the tree's great stem, higher and higher upward. The sparrows and robins in the woods below were beginning to wake and twitter to the dawn, yet it seemed much lighter there aloft in the pine-tree, and the child knew she must hurry if her project were to be of any use.

The tree seemed to lengthen itself out as she went up, and to reach farther and farther upward. It was like a great main-mast to the voyaging earth; it must truly have been amazed that morning through all its ponderous frame as it felt this determined spark of human spirit wending its way from higher branch to branch. Who knows how steadily the least twigs held themselves to advantage this light, weak creature on her way! The old pine must have loved his new dependent. More than all the hawks, and bats, and moths, and even the sweet voiced thrushes, was the brave, beating heart of the solitary gray-eyed child. And the tree stood still and frowned away the winds that June morning while the dawn grew bright in the east.

Sylvia's face was like a pale star, if one had seen it from the ground, when the last thorny bough was past, and she stood trembling and tired but wholly triumphant, high in the tree-top. Yes, there was the sea with the dawning sun making a golden dazzle over it, and toward that glorious east flew two hawks with slow-moving pinions. How low they looked in the air from that height when one had only seen them before far up, and dark against the blue sky. Their gray feathers were as soft as moths; they seemed only a little way from the tree, and Sylvia felt as if she too could go flying away among the clouds. Westward, the woodlands and farms reached miles and miles into the distance; here and there were church steeples, and white villages, truly it was a vast and awesome world.

The birds sang louder and louder. At last the sun came up bewilderingly bright. 35
Sylvia could see the white sails of ships out at sea, and the clouds that were purple and rose-colored and yellow at first began to fade away. Where was the white heron's nest in the sea of green branches, and was this wonderful sight and pageant of the world the only reward for having climbed to such a giddy height? Now look down again, Sylvia, where the green marsh is set among the shining birches and dark hemlocks; there where you saw the white heron once you will see him again; look, look! a white spot of him like a single floating feather comes up from the dead hemlock and grows larger, and rises, and comes close at last, and goes by the landmark pine with steady sweep of wing and outstretched slender neck and crested head. And wait! wait! do not move a foot or a finger, little girl, do not send an arrow of light and consciousness from your two eager eyes, for the heron has perched on a pine bough not far beyond yours, and cries back to his mate on the nest and plumes his feathers for the new day!

The child gives a long sigh a minute later when a company of shouting cat-birds comes also to the tree, and vexed by their fluttering and lawlessness the solemn heron goes away. She knows his secret now, the wild, light, slender bird that floats and wavers, and goes back like an arrow presently to his home in the green world beneath. Then Sylvia, well satisfied, makes her perilous way down again, not daring to look far below the branch she stands on, ready to cry sometimes because her fingers ache and her lamed feet slip. Wondering over and over again what the stranger would say to her, and what he would think when she told him how to find his way straight to the heron's nest.

"Sylvy, Sylvy!" called the busy old grandmother again and again, but nobody answered, and the small husk bed was empty and Sylvia had disappeared.

The guest waked from a dream, and remembering his day's pleasure hurried to dress himself that might it sooner begin. He was sure from the way the shy little girl looked once or twice yesterday that she had at least seen the white heron, and now she must really be made to tell. Here she comes now, paler than ever, and her worn old frock is torn and tattered, and smeared with pine pitch. The grandmother and the sportsman stand in the door together and question her, and the splendid moment has come to speak of the dead hemlock-tree by the green marsh.

But Sylvia does not speak after all, though the old grandmother fretfully rebukes her, and the young man's kind, appealing eyes are looking straight in her own. He can make them rich with money; he has promised it, and they are poor now. He is so well worth making happy, and he waits to hear the story she can tell.

No, she must keep silence! What is it that suddenly forbids her and makes her dumb? Has she been nine years growing and now, when the great world for the first time puts out a hand to her, must she thrust it aside for a bird's sake? The murmur of the pine's green branches is in her ears, she remembers how the white heron came flying through the golden air and how they watched the sea and the morning together, and Sylvia cannot speak; she cannot tell the heron's secret and give its life away. 40

Dear loyalty, that suffered a sharp pang as the guest went away disappointed later in the day, that could have served and followed him and loved him as a dog loves! Many a night Sylvia heard the echo of his whistle haunting the pasture path as she came home with the loitering cow. She forgot even her sorrow at the sharp report of his gun and the sight of thrushes and sparrows dropping silent to the ground, their songs hushed and their pretty feathers stained and wet with blood. Were the birds better friends than their hunter might have been, — who can tell? Whatever treasures were lost to her, woodlands and summer-time, remember! Bring your gifts and graces and tell your secrets to this lonely country child!

(1886)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the effect of the imagery in the first paragraph?
2. Look up sylvan in the dictionary. What does Sarah Orne Jewett suggest by using Sylvia as the name of her protagonist?
3. In paragraph 2, Jewett writes, "The good woman suspected that Sylvia loitered occasionally on her own account; there never was such a child for straying about out-of-doors since the world was made!" In terms of the voice, what is the relationship between the two clauses that make up this sentence?
4. How does Sylvia regard the stranger and his request (par. 8)?
5. How has Jewett characterized the hunter so that he is not simply a villain or an evil force for Sylvia to resist? For instance, what is the significance of his being an ornithologist? What other details and descriptions does Jewett use to make his portrayal more complex?
6. Jewett concludes paragraph 30 by writing, "Alas, if the great wave of human interest which flooded for the first time this dull little life should sweep away the satisfactions of an existence heart to heart with nature and the dumb life of the forest!"

Considering especially such diction as "dull," "little," and "dumb," what is Jewett's attitude toward Sylvia?
7. What is the effect of Jewett's use of personification throughout the story?
8. "A White Heron" may be read as a hero's journey that follows the traditional pattern of a central figure who is cast out from familiar surroundings, undertakes a journey, encounters obstacles, and experiences a significant change, leading to some sort of redemption. Discuss Sylvia's journey from this perspective.
9. Some have characterized Jewett as a local colorist. That is, they view her work, including this story, as regionalist literature that focuses on specific features such as the dialect, customs, and landscape of a geographical area. Regionalist works are thus valued more as reflections of a particular place than as depictions of larger universal themes. Do you see "A White Heron" as primarily an example of regionalism? Explain your answer with specific references to the text of the story.

Albert Bierstadt

Albert Bierstadt (1830–1902) was a German American painter best known for his depictions of the nineteenth-century American West. Having grown up in New Bedford, Massachusetts, where his family settled when they immigrated in 1831, Bierstadt returned to Germany in his twenties to study with members of the highly acclaimed Düsseldorf school of painting. He moved back to America in 1857, and soon after was contracted by the U.S. government to travel west with a land surveyor to create sketches and drawings of the region. Upon his return to the East, Bierstadt converted many of the sketches into finished paintings, and his interest in the American West continued throughout his career.

The Last of the Buffalo

In the following painting from 1888, Bierstadt laments the pending extinction of the buffalo, which had become a pressing issue in the late 1880s as a result of westward expansion. The painting raised awareness of the problem, and following an official government census, a conservation plan was implemented.

Exploring the Text

1. Albert Bierstadt's paintings are often described as epic works showing grand vistas. What elements in this depiction of the American landscape fit these descriptions?
2. What two symbols of the American West are at the center of the painting? How are the fates of these two connected?

Corcoran Gallery of Art, Washington D.C., USA/Gift of Mary (Mrs. Albert) Bierstadt/The Bridgeman Art Library

ALBERT BIERSTADT, THE LAST OF THE BUFFALO, 1888, OIL ON CANVAS, 71" × 118¾", CORCORAN GALLERY, WASHINGTON, D.C.
(See color insert, Image 28.)

3. If you read the painting as a narrative, what story is Bierstadt telling? In addition to the central conflict, consider the buffalo in the foreground, the skulls and bones in the left foreground, and the lighting.
4. One critic has described this painting as "a lament for the West that has passed." What specific elements of the painting would you cite to support this interpretation? Do you find such an interpretation realistic? Harsh? Sentimental? Explain your answer.

ANDREW CARNEGIE

Andrew Carnegie (1835–1919) came to America from Scotland at the age of thirteen. In a classic rags-to-riches tale, he rose from poverty to become one of the nation's wealthiest industrialists. After working in entry-level positions for the railroads, Carnegie worked his way up the ladder, eventually noticing the need for sturdy iron bridges for trains, which led to his founding of the Keystone Bridge Company. This emphasis on iron bridges and steel train rails drew him into the steel industry in earnest; he founded Carnegie Steel, which would later become U.S. Steel—at that time the most valuable company in the world. Carnegie devoted the last two decades of his life to philanthropy, encouraging education through public libraries and Carnegie Mellon University and peace through the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

from The Gospel of Wealth

In this selection written in 1889, when wealth was increasingly being concentrated in the hands of an elite group of industrialists, Carnegie argues that the rich understand best how to use their wealth for the common good. Following is an excerpt from his essay, which was published in the North American Review, a highly regarded literary magazine.

The problem of our age is the proper administration of wealth, that the ties of brotherhood may still bind together the rich and poor in harmonious relationship. The conditions of human life have not only been changed, but revolutionized, within the past few hundred years. In former days there was little difference between the dwelling, dress, food, and environment of the chief and those of his retainers. The Indians are today where civilized man then was. . . . The contrast between the palace of the millionaire and the cottage of the laborer with us to-day measures the change which has come with civilization. This change, however, is not to be deplored, but welcomed as highly beneficial. It is well, nay, essential, for the progress of the race that the houses of some should be homes for all that is highest and best in literature and the arts, — and for all the refinements of civilization, rather than that none should be so. Much better this great irregularity than universal squalor. . . . The "good old times" were not good old times. Neither master nor servant was as well situated then as to-day. A relapse to old conditions would be disastrous to both — not the least so to him who serves — and would sweep away civilization with it. But whether the change be for good or ill, it is upon us, beyond our power to alter, and, therefore, to be accepted and made the best of. It is a waste of time to criticize the inevitable.

It is easy to see how the change has come. . . . In the manufacture of products we have the whole story. . . . Formerly, articles were manufactured at the domestic hearth, or in small shops which formed part of the household. The master and his apprentices worked side by side, the latter living with the master, and therefore subject to the same conditions. When these apprentices rose to be masters, there was little or no change in their mode of life, and they, in turn, educated succeeding apprentices in the same routine. There was, substantially, social equality, and even political equality, for those engaged in industrial pursuits had then little or no voice in the State.

The inevitable result of such a mode of manufacture was crude articles at high prices. To-day the world obtains commodities of excellent quality at prices which even the preceding generation would have deemed incredible. . . . The poor enjoy what the rich could not before afford. What were the luxuries have become the necessaries of life. The laborer has now more comforts than the farmer had a few generations ago. The farmer has more luxuries than the landlord had, and is more richly clad and better housed. The landlord has books and pictures rarer and appointments more artistic than the king could then obtain.

The price we pay for this salutary change is, no doubt, great. We assemble thousands of operatives in the factory, and in the mine, of whom the employer can know little or nothing, and to whom he is little better than a myth. All intercourse between them is at an end. Rigid castes are formed, and, as usual, mutual ignorance breeds mutual distrust. Each caste is without sympathy with the other, and ready to credit anything disparaging in regard to it. Under the law of competition, the employer of thousands is forced into the strictest economies, among which the rates paid to labor figure prominently, and often there is friction between the employer and the employed, between capital and labor, between rich and poor. Human society loses homogeneity.

The price which society pays for the law of competition, like the price it pays for cheap comforts and luxuries, is also great; but the advantages of this law are also greater still than its cost — for it is to this law that we owe our wonderful material development, which brings improved conditions in its train. But, whether the law be benign or not, we must say of it, as we say of the change in the conditions of men to which we have referred: It is here; we cannot evade it; no substitutes for it have been found; and while the law may be sometimes hard for the individual, it is best for the race, because it insures the survival of the fittest in every department. We accept and welcome, therefore, as conditions to which we must accommodate ourselves, great inequality of environments; the concentration of business, industrial and commercial, in the hands of a few; and the law of competition between these, as being not only beneficial, but essential to the future progress of the race. . . .

What is the proper mode of administering wealth after the laws upon which civilization is founded have thrown it into the hands of the few? And it is of this great question that I believe I offer the true solution. It will be understood that fortunes are here spoken of, not moderate sums saved by many years of effort, the returns from which are required for the comfortable maintenance and education of families. This is not wealth, but only competence, which it should be the aim of all to acquire, and which it is for the best interests of society should be acquired. . . .

There remains . . . only one mode of using great fortunes; . . . in this we have the true antidote for the temporary unequal distribution of wealth, the reconciliation of the rich and the poor — a reign of harmony. . . . It is founded upon the present most intense Individualism, and the race is prepared to put it in practice by degrees whenever it pleases. Under its sway we shall have an ideal State, in which the surplus wealth of the few will become, in the best sense, the property of the many, because administered for the common good; and this wealth, passing through the hands of the few, can be made a much more potent force for the elevation of our race than if distributed in small sums to the people themselves. Even the poorest can be made to see this, and to agree that great sums gathered by some of their fellow-citizens and spent for public purposes, from which the masses reap the principal benefit, are more valuable to them than if scattered among themselves in trifling amounts through the course of many years. . . .

Poor and restricted are our opportunities in this life, narrow our horizon, our best work most imperfect; but rich men should be thankful for one inestimable boon. They have it in their power during their lives to busy themselves in organizing benefactions from which the masses of their fellows will derive lasting advantage, and thus dignify their own lives. The highest life is probably to be reached, not by such imitation of the life of Christ as Count Tolstoi[1] gives us, but, while animated by Christ's spirit, by recognizing the changed conditions of this age, and adopting modes of expressing this spirit suitable to the changed conditions under which we live, still laboring for the good of our fellows, which was the essence of his life and teaching, but laboring in a different manner.

This, then, is held to be the duty of the man of wealth: To set an example of modest, unostentatious living, shunning display or extravagance; to provide moderately for the legitimate wants of those dependent upon him; and, after doing so, to consider all surplus revenues which come to him simply as trust funds, which he is called upon to administer, and strictly bound as a matter of duty to administer in the manner which, in his judgment, is best calculated to produce the most beneficial results for the community — the man of wealth thus becoming the mere trustee and agent for his poorer brethren, bringing to their service his superior wisdom, experience, and ability to administer, doing for them better than they would or could do for themselves. . . .

[O]ne of the serious obstacles to the improvement of our race is indiscriminate charity. It were better for mankind that the millions of the rich were thrown into the sea than so spent as to encourage the slothful, the drunken, the unworthy. Of every thousand dollars spent in so-called charity to-day; it is probable that nine hundred and fifty dollars is unwisely spent — so spent, indeed, as to produce the very evils which it hopes to mitigate or cure. . . .

[T]he best means of benefiting the community is to place within its reach the ladders upon which the aspiring can rise — free libraries, parks, and means of recreation, by which men are helped in body and mind; works of art, certain to give pleasure and improve the public taste; and public institutions of various kinds, which will improve the general condition of the people; in this manner returning their surplus wealth to the mass of their fellows in the forms best calculated to do them lasting good.

Thus is the problem of rich and poor to be solved. The laws of accumulation will be left free, the laws of distribution free. Individualism will continue, but the millionaire will be but a trustee for the poor, intrusted for a season with a great part of the increased wealth of the community, but administering it for the community far better than it could or would have done for itself. . . .

Such, in my opinion, is the true gospel concerning wealth, obedience to which is destined some day to solve the problem of the rich and the poor, and to bring "Peace on earth, among men good will."

(1889)

Exploring the Text

1. What does Andrew Carnegie mean by this statement in the opening paragraph: "Much better this great irregularity than universal squalor"? How does this statement lay the foundation for the argument that follows?

[1]Russian author Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910), whose later works tried to distinguish between Christian doctrine and the true teachings of Jesus. — Eds.

2. What forces and changes does Carnegie consider "inevitable" (par. 1) and why? In what ways does this perspective lay the foundation for his overall argument?
3. What is the logic that Carnegie uses to conclude that the advantages of the "law of competition" (par. 5) outweigh any disadvantages? You might explain his logic through the use of a syllogism or Toulmin analysis.
4. Carnegie uses a number of familiar words that he either defines in narrow terms or assumes his audience understands. What is the meaning of each of the following terms in the context of Carnegie's article: "civilization/civilized" (par. 1), "caste" (par. 4), "race" (par. 5), "progress" (par. 5), "trust fund" (par. 9), and "duty" (par. 9)?
5. How does Carnegie believe the "reign of harmony" (par. 7) between rich and poor will be brought about? Why, according to him, must "indiscriminate charity" (par. 10) be eliminated to achieve such a reconciliation?
6. Identify at least two counterarguments that Carnegie addresses. How effectively does he concede and refute each?
7. On what basis does Carnegie invoke Christian beliefs as part of his argument? What is the effect of calling his beliefs about wealth a "gospel"?
8. To what extent has Carnegie's belief that the wealthiest members of the community should be "trustee[s] for the poor" (par. 12) become an accepted tenet of American culture today?

Jacob Riis

Jacob Riis (1849–1914) was a Danish American social reformer, journalist, and photographer. Riis emigrated from Denmark to America when he was twenty-one years old and settled in New York, where he first found work as a carpenter and then began his career in journalism. As a police reporter for the New York Tribune, Riis focused on the impoverished New Yorkers who populated the slums of the city and with articles and photographs exposed their poor living conditions to the middle and upper classes.

The Mixed Crowd

In 1889, Riis published a magazine article about the harsh realities of the New York City slums, including candid photographs of the tenements and their residents. In response to the article's popularity, Riis expanded it into a book entitled How the Other Half Lives: Studies among the Tenements of New York. The book is credited with having contributed to reforms, including New York State's landmark Tenement House Act of 1901. Included here is Chapter 3 from How the Other Half Lives, accompanied by two of Riis's groundbreaking photographs.

When once I asked the agent of a notorious Fourth Ward alley how many people might be living in it I was told: One hundred and forty families, one hundred Irish, thirty-eight Italian, and two that spoke the German tongue. Barring the agent herself, there was not a native-born individual in the court. The answer was characteristic of the cosmopolitan character of lower New York, very nearly so of the whole of it, wherever it runs to alleys and courts. One may find for the asking an Italian, a German, a French, African, Spanish, Bohemian, Russian, Scandinavian, Jewish, and Chinese colony. Even the Arab, who peddles "holy earth" from the Battery[1] as a direct importation from Jerusalem, has his exclusive preserves at the lower end of Washington Street. The one thing you shall vainly ask for in the chief city of America is a distinctively American community. There is none; certainly not among the tenements. Where have they gone to, the old inhabitants? I put the question to one who might fairly be presumed to be of the number, since I had found him sighing for the "good old days" when the legend "no Irish need apply" was familiar in the advertising columns of the newspapers. He looked at me with a puzzled air. "I don't know," he said. "I wish I did. Some went to California in '49, some to the war and never came back. The rest, I expect, have gone to heaven, or somewhere. I don't see them 'round here."

Whatever the merit of the good man's conjectures, his eyes did not deceive him. They are not here. In their place has come this queer conglomerate mass of heterogeneous elements, ever striving and working like whiskey and water in one glass, and with the like result final union and a prevailing taint of whiskey. The once unwelcome Irishman has been followed in his turn by the Italian, the Russian Jew, and the Chinaman, and has himself taken a hand at opposition, quite as bitter and quite as ineffectual, against these later hordes. Wherever these have gone they have crowded him out, possessing the block, the street, the ward with their denser swarms. But the Irishman's revenge is complete. Victorious in defeat over his recent as over his more ancient foe, the one who opposed his coming no less than the one who drove him out, he dictates to both their politics, and, secure in possession of the offices, returns the native his greeting with interest, while collecting the rents of the Italian whose house he has bought with the profits of his saloon. As a landlord he is picturesquely autocratic. An amusing instance of his methods came under my notice while writing these lines. An inspector of the Health Department found an Italian family paying a man with a Celtic name twenty-five dollars a month for three small rooms in a ramshackle rear tenement — more than twice what they were worth — and expressed his astonishment to the tenant, an ignorant Sicilian laborer. He replied that he had once asked the landlord to reduce the rent, but he would not do it.

"Well! What did he say?" asked the inspector.

---

[1]The southern shoreline of Manhattan, which was used as a cannon battery to defend the Dutch settlement of New Amsterdam; it served that role in later wars as well. — Eds.

The Museum of the City of New York/Art Resource, NY

It Costs a Dollar a Month to Sleep in These Sheds (c. 1902).

"'Damma, man!' he said; 'if you speaka thata way to me, I fira you and your things in the streeta.'" And the frightened Italian paid the rent.

In justice to the Irish landlord it must be said that like an apt pupil he was merely showing forth the result of the schooling he had received, re-enacting, in his own way, the scheme of the tenements. It is only his frankness that shocks. The Irishman does not naturally take kindly to tenement life, though with characteristic versatility he adapts himself to its conditions at once. It does violence, nevertheless, to the best that is in him, and for that very reason of all who come within its sphere soonest corrupts him. The result is a sediment, the product of more than a generation in the city's slums, that, as distinguished from the larger body of his class, justly ranks at the foot of tenement dwellers, the so-called "low Irish." 5

It is not to be assumed, of course, that the whole body of the population living in the tenements, of which New Yorkers are in the habit of speaking vaguely as "the poor," or even the larger part of it, is to be classed as vicious or as poor in the sense of verging on beggary.

New York's wage-earners have no other place to live, more is the pity. They are truly poor for having no better homes; waxing poorer in purse as the exorbitant rents to which they are tied, as ever was serf to soil, keep rising. The wonder is that they are not all corrupted, and speedily, by their surroundings. If, on the contrary, there be a steady working up, if not out of the slough, the fact is a powerful argument for the optimist's belief that the world is, after all, growing better, not worse, and would go far toward disarming apprehension, were it not for the steadier growth of the sediment of the slums and its constant menace. Such an impulse toward better things there certainly is. The German rag-picker of thirty years ago, quite as low in the scale as his Italian successor, is the thrifty tradesman or prosperous fanner[2] of to-day.[3]

The Italian scavenger of our time is fast graduating into exclusive control of the corner fruit-stands, while his black-eyed boy monopolizes the boot-blacking industry in which a few years ago he was an intruder. The Irish hod-carrier[4] in the second generation has become a brick-layer, if not the Alderman of his ward, while the Chinese coolie[5] is in almost exclusive possession of the laundry business. The reason is obvious. The poorest immigrant comes here with the purpose and ambition to better himself and, given half a chance, might be reasonably expected to make the most of it. To the false plea that he prefers the squalid homes in which his kind are housed there could be no better answer. The truth is, his half chance has too long been wanting, and for the bad result he has been unjustly blamed.

As emigration from east to west follows the latitude, so does the foreign influx in New York distribute itself along certain well-defined lines that waver and break only under the stronger pressure of a more gregarious race or the encroachments of inexorable business. A feeling of dependence upon mutual effort, natural to strangers in a strange land, unacquainted with its language and customs, sufficiently accounts for this.

The Irishman is the true cosmopolitan immigrant. All-pervading, he shares his 10 lodging with perfect impartiality with the Italian, the Greek, and the "Dutchman," yielding only to sheer force of numbers, and objects equally to them all. A map of the city, colored to designate nationalities, would show more stripes than on the skin of a zebra, and more colors than any rainbow. The city on such a map would fall into two great halves, green for the Irish prevailing in the West Side tenement districts, and blue for the Germans on the East Side. But intermingled with these ground colors would be an odd variety of tints that would give the whole the appearance of an extraordinary crazy-quilt. From down in the Sixth Ward, upon the site of the old Collect Pond that in the days of the fathers drained the hills which are no more, the red of the Italian would be seen forcing its way northward along the line of Mulberry Street to the quarter of the French purple on Bleecker Street and South Fifth Avenue, to lose itself and reappear, after a lapse of miles, in the "Little Italy" of Harlem, east

---

[2]Someone who winnows or cleans grain using a fan to blow away dirt and husks. — Eds.

[3]The Sheriff Street Colony of rag-pickers, long since gone, is an instance in point. The thrifty Germans saved up money during years of hard work in squalor and apparently wretched poverty to buy a township in a Western State, and the whole colony moved out there in a body. There need be no doubt about their thriving there. — Riis

[4]Coal carrier, but also a general term for an unskilled laborer. — Eds.

[5]Term for Chinese and Indian laborers that, in current usage, is derogatory. — Eds.

Image copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Image source: Art Resource, NY.

Baby in a Slum Tenement (c. 1889).

of Second Avenue. Dashes of red, sharply defined, would be seen strung through the Annexed District, northward to the city line. On the West Side the red would be seen overrunning the old Africa of Thompson Street, pushing the black of the negro rapidly uptown, against querulous but unavailing protests, occupying his home, his church, his trade and all, with merciless impartiality. There is a church in Mulberry Street that has stood for two generations as a sort of milestone of these migrations. Built originally for the worship of staid New Yorkers of the "old stock," it was engulfed by the colored tide, when the draft-riots drove the negroes out of reach of Cherry Street and the Five Points. Within the past decade the advance wave of the Italian onset reached it, and to-day the arms of United Italy adorn its front. The negroes have made a stand at several points along Seventh and Eighth Avenues; but their main body, still pursued by the Italian foe, is on the march yet, and the black mark will be found overshadowing to-day many blocks on the East Side, with One Hundredth Street as the centre, where colonies of them have settled recently.

Hardly less aggressive than the Italian, the Russian and Polish Jew, having overrun the district between Rivington and Division Streets, east of the Bowery, to the point of suffocation, is filling the tenements of the old Seventh Ward to the river front, and disputing with the Italian every foot of available space in the back alleys of Mulberry Street. The two races, differing hopelessly in much, have this in common: they carry their slums with them wherever they go, if allowed to do it. Little Italy already rivals its parent, the "Bend," in foulness. Other nationalities that begin at the bottom make a fresh start when crowded up the ladder. Happily both are manageable, the one by rabbinical, the other by the civil law. Between the dull gray of the Jew, his favorite color, and the Italian red, would be seen squeezed in on the map a sharp streak of yellow, marking the narrow boundaries of Chinatown. Dovetailed in with the German population, the poor but thrifty Bohemian might be picked out by the sombre hue of his life as of his philosophy, struggling against heavy odds in the big human bee-hives of the East Side. Colonies of his people extend northward, with long lapses of space, from below the Cooper Institute[6] more than three miles. The Bohemian is the only foreigner with any considerable representation in the city who counts no wealthy man of his race, none who has not to work hard for a living, or has got beyond the reach of the tenement.

(1890)

Exploring the Text

1. In the first paragraph, Jacob Riis writes, "The one thing you shall vainly ask for in the chief city of America is a distinctly American community." Do you find that statement ironic? Do you find it characteristic of our idea of the "melting pot"? Explain.
2. Riis, in paragraphs 2 and 3, describes the "picturesquely autocratic" Irish landlord; in paragraph 5, he states, "In justice to the Irish landlord it must be said that like an apt pupil he was merely showing forth the result of the schooling he had received, re-enacting, in his own way, the scheme of the tenements." What does Riis mean by that last statement? What is his larger point that this example of the Irish serves to support?
3. Riis refers to the "German rag-picker," the "Italian scavenger," the "Irish hod-carrier," and the "Chinese coolie" (pars. 7 and 8). Do you read these phrases as stereotypes? Are they offensive? Why or why not? Why has Riis chosen to use these examples?
4. How does Riis characterize the immigrant in paragraph 8? Is this characterization inconsistent or consistent with the previous paragraphs? Explain.
5. Look very carefully at the diction and imagery Riis uses in paragraphs 10 and 11. How do his rhetorical choices characterize the immigrant's struggle? How do these choices reflect the relationship between Riis and his likely audience?
6. What do you see as Riis's purpose in this piece? To what extent do you believe he succeeds in achieving that purpose?
7. What is most striking about the photos that accompany this essay? What argument is Riis making through them? Cite specific details that support his claim(s).

---

[6]Founded by Peter Cooper, the Cooper Institute (now called Cooper Union) is a private college located in New York's East Village neighborhood. — Eds.

8. Although Riis did feature individuals, especially children, in some of his photos, more often he chose to depict a group image. Why? What is the impact of de-emphasizing the individual in these group portraits?
9. In the introduction to How the Other Half Lives, Riis wrote the following:

> Long ago it was said that "one half of the world does not know how the other half lives." That was true then. It did not know because it did not care. The half that was on top cared little for the struggles, and less for the fate, of those who were underneath, so long as it was able to hold them there and keep its own seat.

In what ways does this essay with the accompanying photographs insist that the "half that was on top" pay attention to and care about the "struggles" and "fate" of the "other half"? How does Riis appeal to the conscience and fears of the middle- and upper-class viewer?

Ambrose Bierce

Ambrose Bierce (1842–c. 1914) was an American journalist, critic, and short-story writer from Meigs County, Ohio. When the Civil War broke out in 1861, Bierce enlisted in the Union army, where he served as a topographer and fought in many well-known battles such as Shiloh, Pickett's Mill, and Chickamauga. He resigned from the army in 1865 and moved to California, where he began his writing career, becoming a regular columnist and editorialist for the San Francisco Examiner. Bierce also wrote novels, poems, and fables, but is most famous for his Devil's Dictionary, which includes sardonic definitions of common words, for instance: Bride, n., A woman with a fine prospect of happiness behind her. Hoping to report firsthand on Pancho Villa and the Mexican Revolution, Bierce traveled to Mexico in 1913; he disappeared in 1914 and was never seen again.

An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge

This short story, Bierce's most famous, was originally published in the San Francisco Examiner in 1890.

I

A man stood upon a railroad bridge in Northern Alabama, looking down into the swift waters twenty feet below. The man's hands were behind his back, the wrists bound with a cord. A rope loosely encircled his neck. It was attached to a stout cross-timber above his head, and the slack fell to the level of his knees. Some loose boards laid upon the sleepers supporting the metals of the railway supplied a footing for him and his executioners — two private soldiers of the Federal army, directed by a sergeant, who in civil life may have been a deputy sheriff. At a short remove upon the same temporary platform was an officer in the uniform of his rank, armed. He was a captain. A sentinel at each end of the bridge stood with his rifle in the position known as "support," that is to say, vertical in front of the left shoulder, the hammer resting on the forearm thrown straight across the chest — a formal and unnatural position, enforcing an erect carriage of the body. It did not appear to be the duty of these two men to know what was occurring at the centre of the bridge; they merely blockaded the two ends of the foot plank which traversed it.

Beyond one of the sentinels nobody was in sight; the railroad ran straight away into a forest for a hundred yards, then, curving, was lost to view. Doubtless there was an outpost further along. The other bank of the stream was open ground — a gentle acclivity crowned with a stockade of vertical tree trunks, loop-holed for rifles, with a single embrasure through which protruded the muzzle of a brass cannon commanding the bridge. Midway of the slope between bridge and fort were the spectators — a single company of infantry in line, at "parade rest," the butts of the rifles on the ground, the barrels inclining slightly backward against the right shoulder, the hands crossed upon the stock. A lieutenant stood at the right of the line, the point of his sword upon the ground, his left hand resting upon his right. Excepting the group of four at the centre of the bridge not a man moved. The company faced the bridge, staring stonily, motionless. The sentinels, facing the banks of the stream, might have been statues to adorn the bridge. The captain stood with folded arms, silent, observing the work of his subordinates but making no sign. Death is a dignitary who, when he comes announced, is to be received with formal manifestations of respect, even by those most familiar with him. In the code of military etiquette silence and fixity are forms of deference.

The man who was engaged in being hanged was apparently about thirty-five years of age. He was a civilian, if one might judge from his dress, which was that of a planter. His features were good — a straight nose, firm mouth, broad forehead, from which his long, dark hair was combed straight back, falling behind his ears to the collar of his well-fitted frock coat. He wore a moustache and pointed beard, but no whiskers; his eyes were large and dark grey and had a kindly expression which one would hardly have expected in one whose neck was in the hemp. Evidently this was no vulgar assassin. The liberal military code makes provision for hanging many kinds of people, and gentlemen are not excluded.

The preparations being complete, the two private soldiers stepped aside and each drew away the plank upon which he had been standing. The sergeant turned to the captain, saluted and placed himself immediately behind that officer, who in turn moved apart one pace. These movements left the condemned man and the sergeant standing on the two ends of the same plank, which spanned three of the cross-ties of the bridge. The end upon which the civilian stood almost, but not quite, reached a fourth. This plank had been held in place by the weight of the captain; it was now held by that of the sergeant. At a signal from the former, the latter would step aside, the plank would tilt and the condemned man go down between two ties. The arrangement commended itself to his judgment as simple and effective. His face had not been covered nor his eyes bandaged. He looked a moment at his "unsteadfast footing," then let his gaze wander to the swirling water of the stream racing madly beneath his feet. A piece of dancing driftwood caught his attention and his eyes followed it down the current. How slowly it appeared to move! What a sluggish stream!

He closed his eyes in order to fix his last thoughts upon his wife and children. The water, touched to gold by the early sun, the brooding mists under the banks at some distance down the stream, the fort, the soldiers, the piece of drift — all had distracted him. And now he became conscious of a new disturbance. Striking through the thought of his dear ones was a sound which he could neither ignore nor understand, a sharp, distinct, metallic percussion like the stroke of a blacksmith's hammer upon the anvil; it had the same ringing quality. He wondered what it was, and whether immeasurably distant or near by — it seemed both. Its recurrence was regular, but as slow as the tolling of a death knell. He awaited each stroke with impatience and — he knew not why — apprehension. The intervals of silence grew progressively longer; the delays became maddening. With their greater infrequency the sounds increased in strength and sharpness. They hurt his ear like the thrust of a knife; he feared he would shriek. What he heard was the ticking of his watch.

He unclosed his eyes and saw again the water below him. "If I could free my hands," he thought, "I might throw off the noose and spring into the stream. By diving I could evade the bullets, and, swimming vigorously, reach the bank, take to the woods, and get away home. My home, thank God, is as yet outside their lines; my wife and little ones are still beyond the invader's farthest advance."

As these thoughts, which have here to be set down in words, were flashed into the doomed man's brain rather than evolved from it, the captain nodded to the sergeant. The sergeant stepped aside.

II

Peyton Farquhar was a well-to-do planter, of an old and highly respected Alabama family. Being a slave owner, and, like other slave owners, a politician, he was naturally an original secessionist and ardently devoted to the Southern cause. Circumstances of an imperious nature which it is unnecessary to relate here, had prevented him from taking service with the gallant army which had fought the disastrous campaigns ending with the fall of Corinth,[1] and he chafed under the inglorious restraint, longing for the release of his energies, the larger life of the soldier, the opportunity for distinction. That opportunity, he felt, would come, as it comes to all in war time. Meanwhile he did what he could. No service was too humble for him to perform in aid of the South, no adventure too perilous for him to undertake if consistent with the character of a civilian who was at heart a soldier, and who in good faith and without too much qualification assented to at least a part of the frankly villainous dictum that all is fair in love and war.

[1]Corinth, Mississippi, was taken by the Union army in May 1862. — Eds.

One evening while Farquhar and his wife were sitting on a rustic bench near the entrance to his grounds, a grey-clad soldier rode up to the gate and asked for a drink of water. Mrs. Farquhar was only too happy to serve him with her own white hands. While she was gone to fetch the water, her husband approached the dusty horseman and inquired eagerly for news from the front.

"The Yanks are repairing the railroads," said the man, "and are getting ready for another advance. They have reached the Owl Creek bridge, put it in order, and built a stockade on the other bank. The commandant has issued an order, which is posted everywhere, declaring that any civilian caught interfering with the railroad, its bridges, tunnels, or trains, will be summarily hanged. I saw the order."

"How far is it to the Owl Creek bridge?" Farquhar asked.

"About thirty miles."

"Is there no force on this side the creek?"

"Only a picket post half a mile out, on the railroad, and a single sentinel at this end of the bridge."

"Suppose a man — a civilian and student of hanging — should elude the picket post and perhaps get the better of the sentinel," said Farquhar, smiling, "what could he accomplish?"

The soldier reflected. "I was there a month ago," he replied. "I observed that the flood of last winter had lodged a great quantity of driftwood against the wooden pier at this end of the bridge. It is now dry and would burn like tow."

The lady had now brought the water, which the soldier drank. He thanked her ceremoniously, bowed to her husband, and rode away. An hour later, after nightfall, he repassed the plantation, going northward in the direction from which he had come. He was a Federal scout.

III

As Peyton Farquhar fell straight downward through the bridge, he lost consciousness and was as one already dead. From this state he was awakened — ages later, it seemed to him — by the pain of a sharp pressure upon his throat, followed by a sense of suffocation. Keen, poignant agonies seemed to shoot from his neck downward through every fibre of his body and limbs. These pains appeared to flash along well-defined lines of ramification, and to beat with an inconceivably rapid periodicity. They seemed like streams of pulsating fire heating him to an intolerable temperature. As to his head, he was conscious of nothing but a feeling of fullness — of congestion. These sensations were unaccompanied by thought. The intellectual part of his nature was already effaced; he had power only to feel, and feeling was torment. He was conscious of motion. Encompassed in a luminous cloud, of which he was now merely the fiery heart, without material substance, he swung through unthinkable arcs of oscillation, like a vast pendulum. Then all at once, with terrible suddenness, the light about him shot upward with the noise of a loud plash; a frightful roaring was in his ears, and all was cold and dark. The power of thought was restored; he knew that the rope had broken and he had fallen into the stream. There was no additional strangulation; the noose about his neck was already suffocating him, and kept the water from his lungs.

To die of hanging at the bottom of a river — the idea seemed to him ludicrous. He opened his eyes in the blackness and saw above him a gleam of light, but how distant, how inaccessible! He was still sinking, for the light became fainter and fainter until it was a mere glimmer. Then it began to grow and brighten, and he knew that he was rising toward the surface — knew it with reluctance, for he was now very comfortable. "To be hanged and drowned," he thought, "that is not so bad; but I do not wish to be shot. No; I will not be shot; that is not fair."

He was not conscious of an effort, but a sharp pain in his wrist apprised him that he was trying to free his hands. He gave the struggle his attention, as an idler might observe the feat of a juggler, without interest in the outcome. What splendid effort! — what magnificent, what superhuman strength! Ah, that was a fine endeavor! Bravo! The cord fell away; his arms parted and floated upward, the hands dimly seen on each side in the growing light. He watched them with a new interest as first one and then the other pounced upon the noose at his neck. They tore it away and thrust it fiercely aside, its undulations resembling those of a water-snake. "Put it back, put it back!" He thought he shouted these words to his hands, for the undoing of the noose had been succeeded by the direst pang which he had yet experienced. His neck arched horribly; his brain was on fire; his heart, which had been fluttering faintly, gave a great leap, trying to force itself out at his mouth. His whole body was racked and wrenched with an insupportable anguish! But his disobedient hands gave no heed to the command. They beat the water vigorously with quick, downward strokes, forcing him to the surface. He felt his head emerge; his eyes were blinded by the sunlight; his chest expanded convulsively, and with a supreme and crowning agony his lungs engulfed a great draught of air, which instantly he expelled in a shriek!

He was now in full possession of his physical senses. They were, indeed, preter- 20 naturally keen and alert. Something in the awful disturbance of his organic system had so exalted and refined them that they made record of things never before perceived. He felt the ripples upon his face and heard their separate sounds as they struck. He looked at the forest on the bank of the stream, saw the individual trees, the leaves and the veining of each leaf — saw the very insects upon them, the locusts, the brilliant-bodied flies, the grey spiders stretching their webs from twig to twig. He noted the prismatic colors in all the dewdrops upon a million blades of grass. The humming of the gnats that danced above the eddies of the stream, the beating of the dragon flies' wings, the strokes of the water spiders' legs, like oars which had lifted their boat — all these made audible music. A fish slid along beneath his eyes and he heard the rush of its body parting the water.

He had come to the surface facing down the stream; in a moment the visible world seemed to wheel slowly round, himself the pivotal point, and he saw the bridge, the fort, the soldiers upon the bridge, the captain, the sergeant, the two privates, his executioners. They were in silhouette against the blue sky. They shouted and gesticulated, pointing at him; the captain had drawn his pistol, but did not fire; the others were unarmed. Their movements were grotesque and horrible, their forms gigantic.

Suddenly he heard a sharp report and something struck the water smartly within a few inches of his head, spattering his face with spray. He heard a second report, and saw one of the sentinels with his rifle at his shoulder, a light cloud of blue smoke rising from the muzzle. The man in the water saw the eye of the man on the bridge gazing into his own through the sights of the rifle. He observed that it was a grey eye, and remembered having read that grey eyes were keenest and that all famous marksmen had them. Nevertheless, this one had missed.

A counter swirl had caught Farquhar and turned him half round; he was again looking into the forest on the bank opposite the fort. The sound of a clear, high voice in a monotonous singsong now rang out behind him and came across the water with a distinctness that pierced and subdued all other sounds, even the beating of the ripples in his ears. Although no soldier, he had frequented camps enough to know the dread significance of that deliberate, drawling, aspirated chant; the lieutenant on shore was taking a part in the morning's work. How coldly and pitilessly — with what an even, calm intonation, presaging and enforcing tranquility in the men — with what accurately-measured intervals fell those cruel words:

"Attention, company. . . . Shoulder arms. . . . Ready. . . . Aim. . . . Fire."

Farquhar dived — dived as deeply as he could. The water roared in his ears like the voice of Niagara, yet he heard the dulled thunder of the volley, and rising again toward the surface, met shining bits of metal, singularly flattened, oscillating slowly downward. Some of them touched him on the face and hands, then fell away, continuing their descent. One lodged between his collar and neck; it was uncomfortably warm, and he snatched it out.

As he rose to the surface, gasping for breath, he saw that he had been a long time under water; he was perceptibly farther down stream — nearer to safety. The soldiers had almost finished reloading; the metal ramrods flashed all at once in the sunshine as they were drawn from the barrels, turned in the air, and thrust into their sockets. The two sentinels fired again, independently and ineffectually.

The hunted man saw all this over his shoulder; he was now swimming vigorously with the current. His brain was as energetic as his arms and legs; he thought with the rapidity of lightning.

"The officer," he reasoned, "will not make the martinet's error a second time. It is as easy to dodge a volley as a single shot. He has probably already given the command to fire at will. God help me, I cannot dodge them all!"

An appalling plash within two yards of him, followed by a loud rushing sound, diminuendo, which seemed to travel back through the air to the fort and died in an explosion which stirred the very river to its deeps! A rising sheet of water, which curved over him, fell down upon him, blinded him, strangled him! The cannon had taken a hand in the game. As he shook his head free from the commotion of the smitten water, he heard the deflected shot humming through the air ahead, and in an instant it was cracking and smashing the branches in the forest beyond.

"They will not do that again," he thought; "the next time they will use a charge of grape. I must keep my eye upon the gun; the smoke will apprise me — the report arrives too late; it lags behind the missile. It is a good gun."

Suddenly he felt himself whirled round and round — spinning like a top. The water, the banks, the forest, the now distant bridge, fort, and men — all were commingled and blurred. Objects were represented by their colors only; circular horizontal streaks of color — that was all he saw. He had been caught in a vortex and was being whirled on with a velocity of advance and gyration which made him giddy and sick. In a few moments he was flung upon the gravel at the foot of the left bank of the stream — the southern bank — and behind a projecting point which concealed him from his enemies. The sudden arrest of his motion, the abrasion of one of his hands on the gravel, restored him and he wept with delight. He dug his fingers into the sand, threw it over himself in handfuls and audibly blessed it. It looked like gold, like diamonds, rubies, emeralds; he could think of nothing beautiful which it did not resemble. The trees upon the bank were giant garden plants; he noted a definite order in their arrangement, inhaled the fragrance of their blooms. A strange, roseate light shone through the spaces among their trunks, and the wind made in their branches the music of æolian harps.[2] He had no wish to perfect his escape, was content to remain in that enchanting spot until retaken.

A whizz and rattle of grapeshot among the branches high above his head roused him from his dream. The baffled cannoneer had fired him a random farewell. He sprang to his feet, rushed up the sloping bank, and plunged into the forest.

All that day he travelled, laying his course by the rounding sun. The forest seemed interminable; nowhere did he discover a break in it, not even a woodman's road. He had not known that he lived in so wild a region. There was something uncanny in the revelation.

By nightfall he was fatigued, footsore, famishing. The thought of his wife and children urged him on. At last he found a road which led him in what he knew to be the right direction. It was as wide and straight as a city street, yet it seemed untravelled. No fields bordered it, no dwelling anywhere. Not so much as the barking of a dog suggested human habitation. The black bodies of the great trees formed a straight wall on both sides, terminating on the horizon in a point, like a diagram in a lesson in perspective. Overhead, as he looked up through this rift in the wood, shone great golden stars looking unfamiliar and grouped in strange constellations. He was sure they were arranged in some order which had a secret and malign significance. The wood on either side was full of singular noises, among which — once, twice, and again — he distinctly heard whispers in an unknown tongue.

His neck was in pain, and, lifting his hand to it, he found it horribly swollen. He 35 knew that it had a circle of black where the rope had bruised it. His eyes felt congested; he could no longer close them. His tongue was swollen with thirst; he relieved its fever by thrusting it forward from between his teeth into the cool air. How softly the turf had carpeted the untravelled avenue! He could no longer feel the roadway beneath his feet!

Doubtless, despite his suffering, he fell asleep while walking, for now he sees another scene — perhaps he has merely recovered from a delirium. He stands at the gate of his own home. All is as he left it, and all bright and beautiful in the morning sunshine. He must have travelled the entire night. As he pushes open the gate and passes up the wide white walk, he sees a flutter of female garments; his wife, looking fresh and cool and sweet, steps down from the verandah to meet him. At the bottom of the steps she stands waiting, with a smile of ineffable joy, an attitude of matchless grace and dignity. Ah, how beautiful she is! He springs forward with extended arms. As he is about to clasp her, he feels a stunning blow upon the back of the neck; a blinding white light blazes all about him, with a sound like a shock of a cannon — then all is darkness and silence!

[2]In Greek mythology, stringed musical instruments played by the wind. — Eds.

Peyton Farquhar was dead; his body, with a broken neck, swung gently from side to side beneath the timbers of the Owl Creek bridge.

(1890)

Exploring the Text

1. Consider the title of the story: "An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge." Why "an" and not "the"? Why the general, objective word "occurrence"? Note a few other examples of the flat, objective nature of the narration. What effect(s) does Ambrose Bierce achieve by choosing to narrate in this way?
2. This story is notable for the vivid quality of its description. Find three examples of strong visual description. How do such appeals to the sense of sight contribute to the author's purpose?
3. What is the purpose of section II of the story, which shifts in time from sections I and III?
4. To what extent were you surprised by the ending of the story? Specifically, what was your reaction to the final sentence? What do you think that Bierce intended or did not intend this story to be about?
5. What clues to the ending of the story did you find as you first read it? Upon rereading, what additional clues do you see? Pay particular attention to paragraphs 18–20.
6. Reviewing a new collected edition of Bierce's works in the May 2012 edition of the New York Review of Books, literary critic Michael Dirda writes:

   > Throughout these gruesome episodes of war, there is no armor against fate, as seeming coincidence assumes the character of tragic destiny. Bierce himself always insisted that most of his Civil War fiction was based on fact. As he wrote in a letter, "It commonly occurs that in my poor little battle-yarns the incidents that come in for special reprobation by the critics as 'improbable' and even 'impossible' are transcripts from memory — things that actually occurred before my eyes." The Battle of Shiloh, for instance, took place near Owl Creek.

   Do you regard the story as "improbable" or "impossible"? Or do you see it as realistic? What in the story would lead the reader to regard it as having been based on fact? Explain.
7. Modern American writer Kurt Vonnegut Jr. called "An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge" the greatest American short story. What might account for his estimation? Do you agree? Why or why not?

8. Watch French director Robert Enrico's 1962 short film (24 minutes) "An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge," which aired on The Twilight Zone in 1964. The film won awards at both the Cannes Film Festival and the Academy Awards. Compare and contrast the film with the short story.

Ida B. Wells-Barnett

The daughter of slaves, Ida B. Wells-Barnett (1862–1931) was born in Mississippi and raised six of her siblings after both her parents and their youngest child died in a yellow fever epidemic in 1878. She worked as a teacher and journalist, becoming the editor and part owner of the Memphis Free Speech at age twenty-seven. She became increasingly committed to uncovering the brutality of lynching after three African American business owners, including a friend of hers, were lynched in Memphis in 1892.

from Southern Horrors
Lynch Law in All Its Phases

Wells-Barnett expanded a seven-column article written for the New York Age into a pamphlet entitled "Southern Horrors: Lynch Law in All Its Phases." The "lynch law" referred to the practice of punishment through mob action without due process of law. Following is the preface and a selection from that pamphlet.

Preface

The greater part of what is contained in these pages was published in the New York Age June 25, 1892, in explanation of the editorial which the Memphis whites considered sufficiently infamous to justify the destruction of my paper, The Free Speech.

Since the appearance of that statement, requests have come from all parts of the country that "Exiled," (the name under which it then appeared) be issued in pamphlet form. Some donations were made, but not enough for that purpose. The noble effort of the ladies of New York and Brooklyn . . . have enabled me to comply with this request and give the world a true, unvarnished account of the causes of lynch law in the South.

This statement is not a shield for the despoiler of virtue, nor altogether a defense for the poor blind Afro-American Sampsons who suffer themselves to be betrayed by white Delilahs. It is a contribution to truth, an array of facts, the perusal of which it is hoped will stimulate this great American Republic to demand that justice be done though the heavens fall.

It is with no pleasure I have dipped my hands in the corruption here exposed. Somebody must show that the Afro-American race is more sinned against than sinning, and it seems to have fallen upon me to do so. The awful death-roll that Judge

Lynch is calling every week is appalling, not only because of the lives it takes, the rank cruelty and outrage to the victims, but because of the prejudice it fosters and the stain it places against the good name of a weak race.

The Afro-American is not a bestial race. If this work can contribute in any way toward proving this, and at the same time arouse the conscience of the American people to a demand for justice to every citizen, and punishment by law for the lawless, I shall feel I have done my race a service. Other considerations are of minor importance.

Ida B. Wells.
New York City, Oct. 26, 1892.

To the Afro-American women of New York and Brooklyn, whose race love, earnest zeal and unselfish effort at Lyric Hall, in the City of New York, on the night of October 5th, 1892, — made possible its publication, this pamphlet is gratefully dedicated by the author.

Chapter V: The South's Position

Henry W. Grady[1] in his well-mannered speeches in New England and New York pictured the Afro-American as incapable of self-government. Through him and other leading men the cry of the South to the country has been "Hands off! Leave us to solve our problem." To the Afro-American the South says, "the white man must and will rule." There is little difference between the Ante-bellum South and the New South.

Her white citizens are wedded to any method however revolting, any measure however extreme, for the subjugation of the young manhood of the race. They have cheated him out of his ballot, deprived him of civil rights or redress therefor in the civil courts, robbed him of the fruits of his labor, and are still murdering, burning and lynching him.

The result is a growing disregard of human life. Lynch law has spread its insiduous influence till men in New York State, Pennsylvania and on the free Western plains feel they can take the law in their own hands with impunity, especially where an Afro-American is concerned. The South is brutalized to a degree not realized by its own inhabitants, and the very foundation of government, law and order, are imperilled.

Public sentiment has had a slight "reaction" though not sufficient to stop the crusade of lawlessness and lynching. The spirit of Christianity of the great M. E. Church[2] was aroused to the frequent and revolting crimes against a weak people, enough to pass strong condemnatory resolutions at its General Conference in Omaha last May. The spirit of justice of the grand old party asserted itself sufficiently to secure [1]Henry W. Grady (1850–1889) was a prominent Southern journalist who used articles in the Atlanta Constitution to define a vision of the New South — one dependent on neither slavery nor agriculture for its survival. — Eds.

[2]Methodist Episcopal Church. — Eds.

a denunciation of the wrongs, and a feeble declaration of the belief in human rights in the Republican platform at Minneapolis, June 7th. Some of the great dailies and weeklies have swung into line declaring that lynch law must go. The President of the United States issued a proclamation that it be not tolerated in the territories over which he has jurisdiction. Governor Northern and Chief Justice Bleckley of Georgia have proclaimed against it. . . .

The strong arm of the law must be brought to bear upon lynchers in severe punishment, but this cannot and will not be done unless a healthy public sentiment demands and sustains such action. 10

The men and women in the South who disapprove of lynching and remain silent on the perpetration of such outrages, are particeps criminis, accomplices, accessories before and after the fact, equally guilty with the actual law-breakers who would not persist if they did not know that neither the law nor militia would be employed against them.

Chapter VI: Self Help

In the creation of this healthier public sentiment, the Afro-American can do for himself what no one else can do for him. The world looks on with wonder that we have conceded so much and remain law-abiding under such great outrage and provocation.

To Northern capital and Afro-American labor the South owes its rehabilitation. If labor is withdrawn capital will not remain. The Afro-American is thus the backbone of the South. A thorough knowledge and judicious exercise of this power in lynching localities could many times effect a bloodless revolution. The white man's dollar is his god, and to stop this will be to stop outrages in many localities.

The Afro-Americans of Memphis denounced the lynching of three of their best citizens, and urged and waited for the authorities to act in the matter and bring the lynchers to justice. No attempt was made to do so, and the black men left the city by thousands, bringing about great stagnation in every branch of business. Those who remained so injured the business of the street car company by staying off the cars, that the superintendent, manager and treasurer called personally on the editor of the Free Speech, asked them to urge our people to give them their patronage again. Other business men became alarmed over the situation and the Free Speech was run away that the colored people might be more easily controlled. A meeting of white citizens in June, three months after the lynching, passed resolutions for the first time, condemning it. But they did not punish the lynchers. Every one of them was known by name, because they had been elected to do the dirty work, by some of the very citizens who passed these resolutions. Memphis is fast losing her black population, who proclaim as they go that there is no protection for the life and property of any Afro-American citizen in Memphis who is not a slave.

The Afro-American citizens of Kentucky, whose intellectual and financial improvement has been phenomenal, have never had a separate car law until now. Delegations and petitions poured into the Legislature against it, yet the bill passed and the Jim Crow Car of Kentucky is a legalized institution. Will the great mass of Negroes continue to patronize the railroad? A special from Covington, Ky., says: 15

> Covington, June 13th. — The railroads of the State are beginning to feel very markedly, the effects of the separate coach bill recently passed by the Legislature. No class of people in the State have so many and so largely attended excursions as the blacks. All these have been abandoned, and regular travel is reduced to a minimum. A competent authority says the loss to the various roads will reach $1,000,000 this year.

A call to a State Conference in Lexington, Ky., last June had delegates from every country in the State. Those delegates, the ministers, teachers, heads of secret and others orders, and the head of every family should [pass] the word around for every member of the race in Kentucky to stay off railroads unless obliged to ride. If they did so, and their advice was followed persistently the convention would not need to petition the Legislature to repeal the law or raise money to file a suit. The railroad corporations would be so effected they would in self-defense lobby to have the separate car law repealed. On the other hand, as long as the railroads can get Afro-American excursions they will always have plenty of money to fight all the suits brought against them. They will be aided in so doing by the same partisan public sentiment which passed the law. White men passed the law, and white judges and juries would pass upon the suits against the law, and render judgment in line with their prejudices and in deference to the greater financial power.

The appeal to the white man's pocket has ever been more effectual than all the appeals ever made to his conscience. Nothing, absolutely nothing, is to be gained by a further sacrifice of manhood and self-respect. By the right exercise of his power as the industrial factor of the South, the Afro-American can demand and secure his rights, the punishment of lynchers, and a fair trial for accused rapists.

Of the many inhuman outrages of this present year, the only case where the proposed lynching did not occur, was where the men armed themselves in Jacksonville, Fla., and Paducah, Ky., and prevented it. The only times an Afro-American who was assaulted got away has been when he had a gun and used it in self-defense.

The lesson this teaches and which every Afro-American should ponder well, is that a Winchester rifle should have a place of honor in every black home, and it should be used for that protection which the law refuses to give. When the white man who is always the aggressor knows he runs as great risk of biting the dust every time his Afro-American victim does, he will have greater respect for Afro-American life. The more the Afro-American yields and cringes and begs, the more he has to do so, the more he is insulted, outraged and lynched.

The assertion has been substantiated throughout these pages that the press contains unreliable and doctored reports of lynchings, and one of the most necessary things for the race to do is to get these facts before the public. The people must know before they can act, and there is no educator to compare with the press. 20

The Afro-American papers are the only ones which will print the truth, and they lack means to employ agents and detectives to get at the facts. The race must rally a mighty host to the support of their journals, and thus enable them to do much in the way of investigation.

A lynching occurred at Port Jarvis, N.Y., the first week in June. A white and colored man were implicated in the assault upon a white girl. It was charged that the white man paid the colored boy to make the assault, which he did on the public highway in broad day time, and was lynched. This, too, was done by "parties unknown." The white man in the case still lives. He was imprisoned and promises to fight the case on trial. At the preliminary examination, it developed that he had been a suitor of the girl's. She had repulsed and refused him, yet had given him money, and he had sent threatening letters demanding more.

The day before this examination she was so wrought up, she left home and wandered miles away. When found she said she did so because she was afraid of the man's testimony. Why should she be afraid of the prisoner? Why should she yield to his demands for money if not to prevent him exposing something he knew? It seems explainable only on the hypothesis that a liaison existed between the colored boy and the girl, and the white man knew of it. The press is singularly silent. Has it a motive? We owe it to ourselves to find out.

Near Vicksburg, Miss., a murder was committed by a gang of burglars. Of course it must have been done by Negroes, and Negroes were arrested for it. It is believed that 2 men, Smith Tooley and John Adams belonged to a gang controlled by white men and, fearing exposure, on the night of July 4th, they were hanged in the Court House yard by those interested in silencing them. Robberies since committed in the same vicinity have been known to be by white men who had their faces blackened. We strongly believe in the innocence of these murdered men, but we have no proof. No other news goes out to the world save that which stamps us as a race of cut-throats, robbers and lustful wild beasts. So great is Southern hate and prejudice, they legally (?) hung poor little thirteen year old Mildred Brown at Columbia, S.C., Oct. 7th, on the circumstantial evidence that she poisoned a white infant. If her guilt had been proven unmistakably, had she been white, Mildred Brown would never have been hung.

The country would have been aroused and South Carolina disgraced forever for 25 such a crime. The Afro-American himself did not know as he should have known as his journals should be in a position to have him know and act.

Nothing is more definitely settled than he must act for himself. I have shown how he may employ the boycott, emigration and the press, and I feel that by a combination of all these agencies can be effectually stamped out lynch law, that last relic of barbarism and slavery. "The gods help those who help themselves."

(1892)

Exploring the Text

1. What ethos does Ida B. Wells-Barnett establish in the preface? How do the diction and imagery of this opening section appeal to the pathos of her audience?
2. How does Wells-Barnett support her claim that "[t]here is little difference between the Ante-bellum South and the New South" (par. 6)?
3. What efforts to stop the "insiduous influence" (par. 8) of lynch laws does she acknowledge? Why does she believe those efforts have been largely ineffective?

4. Wells-Barnett argues that "the Afro-American can do for himself what no one else can do for him" (par. 12). What specific strategies does she advocate? Which appeal to economic interests? Which are based on an-eye-for-an-eye justice? Which seem most feasible to you?
5. Why does Wells-Barnett claim that "there is no educator to compare with the press" (par. 20)? Does she refer to a specific press or to the press in general?
6. What impact do the examples — that is, the actual cases — that she cites have? Do you think these serve as effective support for the claims she makes? Why or why not?
7. To what extent has Wells-Barnett made the case that the lynch law is "that last relic of barbarism and slavery" (par. 26), as she describes it? Has she sufficiently prepared her audience for such strong rhetoric? Explain your response with specific reference to the text.

Kate Chopin

Born Katherine O'Flaherty in St. Louis, Missouri, Kate Chopin (1850–1904) is best known for her novel The Awakening (1899), which is now recognized as an American classic but was controversial when originally published. Most of Chopin's work is set in Louisiana, where she settled after marrying New Orleans businessman Oscar Chopin. After his early death in 1883, she was determined to earn her living as a writer. She published short stories in magazines such as the Atlantic, New Century, and Vogue. Although some of her earlier work received positive responses as sketches with local and regional appeal, Chopin was criticized for her frank depiction of women's desire for personal freedom, a theme that received full expression in The Awakening.

The Story of an Hour

"The Story of an Hour" was initially rejected by both Century and Vogue magazines because of its potentially controversial themes; after the critical success of a collection of Chopin's short fiction, Vogue published it in 1894. The story enjoyed even greater popularity in the mid-twentieth century when it was regarded as an early feminist text.

Knowing that Mrs. Mallard was afflicted with a heart trouble, great care was taken to break to her as gently as possible the news of her husband's death.

It was her sister Josephine who told her, in broken sentences; veiled hints that revealed in half concealing. Her husband's friend Richards was there, too, near her. It was he who had been in the newspaper office when intelligence of the railroad disaster was received, with Brently Mallard's name leading the list of "killed." He had only taken the time to assure himself of its truth by a second telegram, and had hastened to forestall any less careful, less tender friend in bearing the sad message.

She did not hear the story as many women have heard the same, with a paralyzed inability to accept its significance. She wept at once, with sudden, wild abandonment, in her sister's arms. When the storm of grief had spent itself she went away to her room alone. She would have no one follow her.

There stood, facing the open window, a comfortable, roomy armchair. Into this she sank, pressed down by a physical exhaustion that haunted her body and seemed to reach into her soul.

She could see in the open square before her house the tops of trees that were all aquiver with the new spring life. The delicious breath of rain was in the air. In the street below a peddler was crying his wares. The notes of a distant song which some one was singing reached her faintly, and countless sparrows were twittering in the eaves. 5

There were patches of blue sky showing here and there through the clouds that had met and piled one above the other in the west facing her window.

She sat with her head thrown back upon the cushion of the chair, quite motionless, except when a sob came up into her throat and shook her, as a child who has cried itself to sleep continues to sob in its dreams.

She was young, with a fair, calm face, whose lines bespoke repression and even a certain strength. But now there was a dull stare in her eyes, whose gaze was fixed away off yonder on one of those patches of blue sky. It was not a glance of reflection, but rather indicated a suspension of intelligent thought.

There was something coming to her and she was waiting for it, fearfully. What was it? She did not know; it was too subtle and elusive to name. But she felt it, creeping out of the sky, reaching toward her through the sounds, the scents, the color that filled the air.

Now her bosom rose and fell tumultuously. She was beginning to recognize this thing that was approaching to possess her, and she was striving to beat it back with her will — as powerless as her two white slender hands would have been. 10

When she abandoned herself a little whispered word escaped her slightly parted lips. She said it over and over under her breath: "free, free, free!" The vacant stare and the look of terror that had followed it went from her eyes. They stayed keen and bright. Her pulses beat fast, and the coursing blood warmed and relaxed every inch of her body.

She did not stop to ask if it were or were not a monstrous joy that held her. A dear and exalted perception enabled her to dismiss the suggestion as trivial.

She knew that she would weep again when she saw the kind, tender hands folded in death; the face that had never looked save with love upon her fixed and gray and dead. But she saw beyond that bitter moment a long procession of years to come that would belong to her absolutely. And she opened and spread her arms out to them in welcome.

There would be no one to live for her during those coming years; she would live for herself. There would be no powerful will bending hers in that blind persistence with which men and women believe they have a right to impose a private will upon a fellow-creature. A kind intention or a cruel intention made the act seem no less a crime as she looked upon it in that brief moment of illumination.

And yet she had loved him — sometimes. Often she had not. What did it matter! What could love, the unsolved mystery, count for in face of this possession of self-assertion which she suddenly recognized as the strongest impulse of her being! 15

"Free! Body and soul free!" she kept whispering.

Josephine was kneeling before the closed door with her lips to the keyhole, imploring for admission. "Louise, open the door! I beg; open the door — you will make yourself ill. What are you doing, Louise? For heaven's sake open the door."

"Go away. I am not making myself ill." No; she was drinking in a very elixir of life through that open window.

Her fancy was running riot along those days ahead of her. Spring days, and summer days, and all sorts of days that would be her own. She breathed a quick prayer that life might be long. It was only yesterday she had thought with a shudder that life might be long.

She arose at length and opened the door to her sister's importunities. There was a feverish triumph in her eyes, and she carried herself unwittingly like a goddess of Victory. She clasped her sister's waist, and together they descended the stairs. Richards stood waiting for them at the bottom. 20

Some one was opening the front door with a latchkey. It was Brently Mallard who entered, a little travel-stained, composedly carrying his gripsack and umbrella. He had been far from the scene of accident, and did not even know there had been one. He stood amazed at Josephine's piercing cry; at Richards' quick motion to screen him from the view of his wife.

But Richards was too late.

When the doctors came they said she had died of heart disease — of joy that kills.

(1894)

Exploring the Text

1. What ambiguities do you find in paragraph 3; that is, what descriptions and details have potential multiple meanings?
2. What tension between the interior world of Mrs. Mallard and the world outside the window does Kate Chopin develop in paragraphs 4–6?
3. How do you interpret the meaning of the description that Mrs. Mallard's gaze was "not a glance of reflection, but rather indicated a suspension of intelligent thought" (par. 8)?
4. What is the "monstrous joy" (par. 12) that Mrs. Mallard feels?
5. Mrs. Mallard remembers that her husband "had never looked save with love upon her" (par. 13); she reflects that "she had loved him — sometimes. Often she had not" (par. 15). What do these conflicting descriptions suggest about their relationship?
6. What is the freedom that Mrs. Mallard seems to long for in this story?

7. What does Chopin mean when she refers to Mrs. Mallard as carrying herself "unwittingly like a goddess of Victory" (par. 20)?
8. What details, including passages, would you cite to support an interpretation of this story as a criticism of the institution of marriage? Are there indications that Mrs. Mallard was or was not a dutiful wife? Does Chopin characterize Brently Mallard as a good husband?
9. Who is the victim and who is the victimizer in this story? Or is this terminology inappropriate?

Booker T. Washington

Born a slave in West Virginia, Booker T. Washington (1856–1915) was an influential educator and the founder of Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute in Alabama. After emancipation, he worked in salt mines and coal mines and then literally walked two hundred miles to attend the Hampton Institute in Virginia, which was then an industrial school for African Americans and Native Americans. There, he paid his tuition and board by working as a janitor. Graduating with honors in 1875, Washington taught at the Hampton Institute until 1881.

The Atlanta Exposition Address

Stressing the importance of learning a trade and developing self-confidence, Washington's pragmatism appealed to African Americans living in the post-Reconstruction South. He was criticized by the NAACP and other organizations for promoting accommodation rather than resistance to Southern white supremacy. He worked behind the scenes, however, to sponsor civil rights suits and advocate on behalf of Historically Black Colleges and Universities. Washington delivered the following speech in 1895 before the Cotton States and International Exposition in Atlanta to promote the economic ascendancy of the South.

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Board of Directors and Citizens.

One-third of the population of the South is of the Negro race. No enterprise seeking the material, civil, or moral welfare of this section can disregard this element of our population and reach the highest success. I but convey to you, Mr. President and Directors, the sentiment of the masses of my race when I say that in no way have the value and manhood of the American Negro been more fittingly and generously recognized than by the managers of this magnificent Exposition at every stage of its progress. It is a recognition that will do more to cement the friendship of the two races than any occurrence since the dawn of our freedom.

Not only this, but the opportunity here afforded will awaken among us a new era of industrial progress. Ignorant and inexperienced, it is not strange that in the first years of our new life we began at the top instead of at the bottom; that a seat in Congress or the state legislature was more sought than real estate or industrial skill; that the political convention of stump speaking had more attractions than starting a dairy farm or truck garden.

A ship lost at sea for many days suddenly sighted a friendly vessel. From the mast of the unfortunate vessel was seen a signal, "Water, water; we die of thirst!" The answer from the friendly vessel at once came back, "Cast down your bucket where you are." A second time the signal, "Water, water; send us water!" ran up from the distressed vessel, and was answered, "Cast down your bucket where you are." And a third and fourth signal for water was answered, "Cast down your bucket where you are." The captain of the distressed vessel, at last heeding the injunction, cast down his bucket, and it came up full of fresh, sparkling water from the mouth of the Amazon River. To those of my race who depend on bettering their condition in a foreign land or who underestimate the importance of cultivating friendly relations with the Southern white man, who is their next-door neighbour, I would say: "Cast down your bucket where you are" — cast it down in making friends in every manly way of the people of all races by whom we are surrounded.

Cast it down in agriculture, mechanics, in commerce, in domestic service, and in the professions. And in this connection it is well to bear in mind that whatever other sins the South may be called to bear, when it comes to business pure and simple, it is in the South that the Negro is given a man's chance in the commercial world, and in nothing is this Exposition more eloquent than in emphasizing this chance. Our greatest danger is that in the great leap from slavery to freedom we may overlook the fact that the masses of us are to live by the productions of our hands, and fail to keep in mind that we shall prosper in proportion as we learn to dignify and glorify common labour and put brains and skill into the common occupations of life; shall prosper in proportion as we learn to draw the line between the superficial and the substantial, the ornamental gewgaws of life and the useful. No race can prosper till it learns that there is as much dignity in tilling a field as in writing a poem. It is at the bottom of life we must begin, and not at the top. Nor should we permit our grievances to overshadow our opportunities.

To those of the white race who look to the incoming of those of foreign birth and strange tongue and habits for the prosperity of the South, were I permitted I would repeat what I say to my own race, "Cast down your bucket where you are." Cast it down among the eight millions of Negroes whose habits you know, whose fidelity and love you have tested in days when to have proved treacherous meant the ruin of your firesides. Cast down your bucket among these people who have, without strikes and labour wars, tilled your fields, cleared your forests, builded your railroads and cities, and brought forth treasures from the bowels of the earth, and helped make possible this magnificent representation of the progress of the South. Casting down your bucket among my people, helping and encouraging them as you are doing on these grounds, and to education of head, hand, and heart, you will find that they will buy your surplus land, make blossom the waste places in your fields, and run your factories. While doing this, you can be sure in the future, as in the past, that you and your families will be surrounded by the most patient, faithful, law-abiding, and unresentful people that the world has seen. As we have proved our loyalty to you in the past, in nursing your children, watching by the sickbed of your mothers and fathers, and often following them with tear-dimmed eyes to their graves, so in the future, in our humble way, we shall stand by you with a devotion that no foreigner can approach, ready to lay down our lives, if need be, in defence of yours, interlacing our industrial, commercial, civil, and religious life with yours in a way that shall make the interests of both races one. In all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress.

There is no defence or security for any of us except in the highest intelligence and development of all. If anywhere there are efforts tending to curtail the fullest growth of the Negro, let these efforts be turned into stimulating, encouraging, and making him the most useful and intelligent citizen. Effort or means so invested will pay a thousand per cent interest. These efforts will be twice blessed — "blessing him that gives and him that takes."

There is no escape through law of man or God from the inevitable: —

The laws of changeless justice bind
  Oppressor with oppressed;
And close as sin and suffering joined
  We march to fate abreast.

Nearly sixteen millions of hands will aid you in pulling the load upward, or they will pull against you the load downward. We shall constitute one-third and more of the ignorance and crime of the South, or one-third its intelligence and progress; we shall contribute one-third to the business and industrial prosperity of the South, or we shall prove a veritable body of death, stagnating, depressing, retarding every effort to advance the body politic.

Gentlemen of the Exposition, as we present to you our humble effort at an exhibition of our progress, you must not expect overmuch. Starting thirty years ago with ownership here and there in a few quilts and pumpkins and chickens (gathered from miscellaneous sources), remember the path that has led from these to the inventions and production of agricultural implements, buggies, steam-engines, newspapers, books, statuary, carving, paintings, the management of drugstores and banks, has not been trodden without contact with thorns and thistles. While we take pride in what we exhibit as a result of our independent efforts, we do not for a moment forget that our part in this exhibition would fall far short of your expectations but for the constant help that has come to our educational life, not only from the Southern states, but especially from Northern philanthropists, who have made their gifts a constant stream of blessing and encouragement.

The wisest among my race understand that the agitation of questions of social 10 equality is the extremest folly, and that progress in the enjoyment of all the privileges that will come to us must be the result of severe and constant struggle rather than of artificial forcing. No race that has anything to contribute to the markets of the world is long in any degree ostracized. It is important and right that all privileges of the law be ours, but it is vastly more important that we be prepared for the exercises of these privileges. The opportunity to earn a dollar in a factory just now is worth infinitely more than the opportunity to spend a dollar in an opera-house.

In conclusion, may I repeat that nothing in thirty years has given us more hope and encouragement, and drawn us so near to you of the white race, as this opportunity offered by the Exposition; and here bending, as it were, over the altar that represents the results of the struggles of your race and mine, both starting practically empty-handed three decades ago, I pledge that in your effort to work out the great and intricate problem which God has laid at the doors of the South, you shall have at all times the patient, sympathetic help of my race; only let this be constantly in mind, that, while from representations in these buildings of the product of field, of forest, of mine, of factory, letters, and art, much good will come, yet far above and beyond material benefits will be that higher good, that, let us pray God, will come, in a blotting out of sectional differences and racial animosities and suspicions, in a determination to administer absolute justice, in a willing obedience among all classes to the mandates of law. This, then, coupled with our material prosperity, will bring into our beloved South a new heaven and new earth.

(1895)

Exploring the Text

1. What are Booker T. Washington's goals as articulated in this speech? What does he believe is the best way to achieve them?
2. What appeals to ethos does Washington make in the opening paragraphs? What additional appeals to ethos does he make as the speech proceeds?
3. What is the point of the story Washington tells in paragraph 3 about a "ship lost at sea"? What is the rhetorical effect?
4. This speech has come to be known by the sentence "Cast down your bucket where you are" (par. 3). What does Washington mean by this exhortation?
5. In what types of work does Washington believe African Americans should engage? What is the logic that leads him to this belief?
6. How do you interpret Washington's concluding statement in paragraph 5: "In all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress"?
7. Why is the Shakespeare quotation in paragraph 7 (" 'blessing him that gives and him that takes' ") appropriate to the point Washington is making?
8. Discuss two possible — and contrasting — interpretations of Washington's assertion: "The opportunity to earn a dollar in a factory just now is worth infinitely more than the opportunity to spend a dollar in an opera-house" (par. 10). In today's age of globalization and outsourcing, when many of our factory jobs have gone to foreign workers, does this statement still apply? Rewrite the sentence, replacing "factory" with a contemporary place of employment. Does the new sentence effectively update the idea? Why or why not?

9. Where in this speech does Washington implicitly argue against racial stereotypes and advocate American values of rugged individualism and a strong work ethic? How have racial stereotypes changed since then? Is our work ethic as strong now as it once was?
10. Discuss the importance of the occasion and audience of this speech. How do these factors influence its form and content?
11. In the introduction to Washington's autobiography, Up from Slavery, Henry Louis Gates Jr. and Nellie McKay make the following observation: "To some, Washington's autobiography seems to paper over centuries of accumulated white responsibility for the evils of slavery, and instead of demanding the reform of white American institutions, it calls for African American conformity to the dominant myth of individualism in the United States. To other readers, however, Washington's message in Up from Slavery puts its priorities exactly where they had to be — on the necessity of self-help within the African American community" (Norton Anthology of African American Literature). Which view is closer to yours? Cite specific passages to support your position.

Paul Laurence Dunbar

Paul Laurence Dunbar (1872–1906) was the first African American to gain national popularity as a poet. Born and raised in Dayton, Ohio, and the son of ex-slaves, Dunbar published his first poems in Dayton's local newspaper, the Herald, in 1888. In 1891, when his formal schooling ended, he began work as an elevator operator, and he used this position to publicize and sell copies of his first collection of poetry, Oak and Ivy, which was written half in traditional verse and half in African American dialect. He gained international fame for his second book of poems, Majors and Minors (1896), and in his career he went on to publish ten more books of poetry, four short-story collections, five novels, and one play. He also wrote the lyrics for the first Broadway musical written and performed solely by African Americans. Titled In Dahomey, the musical appeared on Broadway in 1903 and became one of the most successful productions of the time period.

We Wear the Mask

"We Wear the Mask" is considered by many to be the best of Dunbar's work. Published in 1895, it anticipates the concept of "the veil" that W. E. B. DuBois explores in The Souls of Black Folk (1903) and presages many seminal works by later African American writers, including the novel Invisible Man by Ralph Ellison (p. 1201).

We wear the mask that grins and lies,
It hides our cheeks and shades our eyes,—
This debt we pay to human guile;
With torn and bleeding hearts we smile,
And mouth with myriad subtleties.

Why should the world be over-wise,
In counting all our tears and sighs?
Nay, let them only see us, while
We wear the mask.

We smile, but, O great Christ, our cries
To thee from tortured souls arise.
We sing, but oh the clay is vile
Beneath our feet, and long the mile;
But let the world dream otherwise,
We wear the mask!

(1896)

Exploring the Text

1. What does Paul Laurence Dunbar mean by "This debt we pay to human guile" (l. 3)? What are the "myriad subtleties" (l. 5)?
2. Who are the "tortured souls" (l. 11)? How do you interpret "the clay is vile / Beneath our feet, and long the mile" (ll. 12–13)?
3. In both stanzas 2 and 3, the speaker contrasts appearance and reality in two different situations (and with two different examples). What do they have in common?
4. What is the relationship between the speaker and the audience? What is the effect of using first-person plural?
5. How would you characterize the tone of this poem?
6. Imagine that you did not know that Dunbar was African American or that the poem is generally understood within a racial context. In what ways could the poem be about the "mask(s)" that most humans present to the exterior world?
7. Dunbar has been severely criticized by other African American writers for his dialect poetry, which many feel perpetuates racial stereotypes. Critic Joanne Braxton looks to "We Wear the Mask" to counter such criticism, making the point that here Dunbar is writing about the mask he was forced to wear to conceal the truth behind "his comic drama, his witty lyricism, and his use of irony" in those poems. How might you interpret the poem as Dunbar's defense of the poetic mask he wore in order to appeal to a wide readership?

Douglass

Dunbar's poem "Douglass," from his 1903 collection, Lyrics of Love and Laughter, is an apostrophe to African American leader Frederick Douglass, whom Dunbar met in 1893 while promoting his first collection of poetry, Oak and Ivy. Douglass admired Dunbar's work and hired him to manage the Haitian exhibit at the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago.

Ah, Douglass, we have fall'n on evil days,
  Such days as thou, not even thou didst know,
  When thee, the eyes of that harsh long ago
Saw, salient, at the cross of devious ways,
And all the country heard thee with amaze.
  Not ended then, the passionate ebb and flow,
  The awful tide that battled to and fro;
We ride amid a tempest of dispraise.
Now, when the waves of swift dissension swarm,
  And Honor, the strong pilot, lieth stark,
Oh, for thy voice high-sounding o'er the storm,
  For thy strong arm to guide the shivering bark,
The blast-defying power of thy form,
  To give us comfort through the lonely dark.

(1903)

Exploring the Text

1. Why does Paul Laurence Dunbar, the speaker of the poem, call on Douglass at this particular time in history? How does he characterize the moment? What qualities of Douglass does Dunbar believe are sorely needed at the moment in history when the poem was written?
2. What is the central metaphor that Dunbar develops in this poem? Cite specific lines and phrases that dramatize the crisis Dunbar depicts through this metaphor.
3. How does the sonnet structure reinforce the meaning of this poem?
4. Dunbar wrote a poem entitled "Frederick Douglass" in 1895 when he first heard of his friend's death. Compare and contrast "Douglass" with that earlier poem. How are the two different occasions that inspired the poems reflected in the verse? Which poem do you believe is more effective? Why?

TALKBACK

Robert Hayden

Born Asa Bundy Sheffey in Detroit, Michigan, Robert Hayden (1913–1980) attended Detroit City College (now Wayne State University) before studying under W. H. Auden (p. 1169) in the graduate English program at the University of Michigan. In 1976, Hayden was appointed consultant in poetry to the Library of Congress, a post that was the forerunner to that of poet laureate. His first volume, Heart-Shape in the Dust (1940), took its voice from the Harlem Renaissance. Later work continued to garner critical praise, including Hayden's epic poem on the Amistad mutiny, "Middle Passage," and A Ballad of Remembrance (1962).

Frederick Douglass

This poem first appeared in the Atlantic Monthly in 1947.

When it is finally ours, this freedom, this liberty, this beautiful and terrible thing, needful to man as air, usable as earth; when it belongs at last to all,
when it is truly instinct, brain matter, diastole, systole, reflex action; when it is finally won; when it is more than the gaudy mumbo jumbo of politicians:
this man, this Douglass, this former slave, this Negro beaten to his knees, exiled, visioning a world where none is lonely, none hunted, alien, this man, superb in love and logic, this man shall be remembered. Oh, not with statues' rhetoric, not with legends and poems and wreaths of bronze alone, but with the lives grown out of his life, the lives fleshing his dream of the beautiful, needful thing.

(1947)

Exploring the Text

1. The poem consists of one long periodic sentence and a fragment. What is the main clause of the sentence? What is the effect of the multiple dependent clauses and modifiers leading to the independent clause?
2. What is the effect of Robert Hayden referring to liberty as "this beautiful and terrible thing" (ll. 1–2)?
3. What is "the gaudy mumbo jumbo of politicians" (l. 6)?
4. What other abstractions (such as "this beautiful and terrible thing") do you find in the poem? How does Hayden manage to make Frederick Douglass a vital presence when he uses such abstractions to recall him?

5. Lines 11–14, while technically a sentence fragment, are, in fact, an explanation. What is Hayden explaining, and how these lines are linked to the previous sentence?
6. In the Norton Anthology of African American Literature, editors Henry Louis Gates Jr. and Nellie McKay point out that Hayden's poetry fell out of favor with many of the young black nationalists of the 1960s who felt that it did not speak directly enough to the more radical politics of civil rights. Yet, they continue, the "beat" of a poem such as "Frederick Douglass" testifies to his "vision of human possibility that bet its hand on the redemptive occasions of the future." In what ways might the "beat" of the poem contribute to its being interpreted as a call to action? Consider anaphora, enjambment, and repetition in your response.

Making Connections

1. These two poems about Frederick Douglass were written more than four decades apart, obviously during very different political eras. What qualities of Douglass do both Paul Laurence Dunbar and Hayden stress? How do the differences in the characteristics each poet emphasizes reflect the poet's historical context?
2. How would you describe each of these poems? Are they a tribute to Douglass? A meditation on Douglass? A lamentation of his passing? A personal remembrance? A celebration of his influence? A memorial to his greatness? An adulatory praise song? Cite specific passages to support your response, including consideration of the different titles.
3. Both Dunbar and Hayden chose to use the sonnet form for these poems, though in very different ways. How does each poet's approach to this conventional structure contribute to the tone of his poem?
4. Dunbar calls on Douglass for guidance during "a tempest of dispraise" (l. 8). Hayden asserts that "this man / shall be remembered" (ll. 10–11). To what extent do you think Hayden's assertion suggests that the memory of Douglass, so strong and unquestionable to Dunbar, is in jeopardy? Base your response on these poems as well as on your knowledge of the political time periods.

Stephen Crane

Stephen Crane (1871–1900) was an American novelist, short-story writer, and journalist and considered to be one of the most innovative writers of his time. Born in Newark, New Jersey, Crane began writing at a young age, publishing his first articles when he was sixteen. In 1891, he quit school to become a freelance reporter and writer, writing for various New York City publications, including the Tribune. His first novel, Maggie: A Girl of the Streets, won him literary acclaim in 1893, and in 1895 he published The Red Badge of Courage, a Civil War novel that made him internationally famous.

The Open Boat

A Tale Intended to Be After the Fact. Being the Experience of Four Men from the Sunk Steamer Commodore

Crane based "The Open Boat" on his experience as a war correspondent aboard the Commodore, a steamship that shipwrecked off the coast of Florida on its way to Cuba with munitions for the insurgents who were rebelling against Spanish rule. Crane and three others spent thirty hours in a ten-foot dinghy before washing ashore near Daytona Beach, Florida. His report of the incident was published in the New York Press on January 7, 1897, less than a week after his rescue. This story, which appeared in the June 1897 issue of Scribner's magazine, has been widely praised by writers such as Ernest Hemingway and Joseph Conrad and is considered by many to be Crane's best work.

I

None of them knew the color of the sky. Their eyes glanced level, and were fastened upon the waves that swept toward them. These waves were of the hue of slate, save for the tops, which were of foaming white, and all of the men knew the colors of the sea. The horizon narrowed and widened, and dipped and rose, and at all times its edge was jagged with waves that seemed thrust up in points like rocks.

Many a man ought to have a bath-tub larger than the boat which here rode upon the sea. These waves were most wrongfully and barbarously abrupt and tall, and each froth-top was a problem in small boat navigation.

The cook squatted in the bottom and looked with both eyes at the six inches of gunwale which separated him from the ocean. His sleeves were rolled over his fat forearms, and the two flaps of his unbuttoned vest dangled as he bent to bail out the boat. Often he said: "Gawd! That was a narrow clip." As he remarked it he invariably gazed eastward over the broken sea.

The oiler, steering with one of the two oars in the boat, sometimes raised himself suddenly to keep clear of water that swirled in over the stern. It was a thin little oar and it seemed often ready to snap.

The correspondent, pulling at the other oar, watched the waves and wondered why he was there. 5

The injured captain, lying in the bow, was at this time buried in that profound dejection and indifference which comes, temporarily at least, to even the bravest and most enduring when, willy nilly, the firm fails, the army loses, the ship goes down. The mind of the master of a vessel is rooted deep in the timbers of her, though he command for a day or a decade, and this captain had on him the stern impression of a scene in the grays of dawn of seven turned faces, and later a stump of a top-mast with a white ball on it that slashed to and fro at the waves, went low and lower, and down. Thereafter there was something strange in his voice. Although steady, it was deep with mourning, and of a quality beyond oration or tears.

"Keep'er a little more south, Billie," said he.

"'A little more south,' sir," said the oiler in the stern.

A seat in this boat was not unlike a seat upon a bucking broncho, and, by the same token, a broncho is not much smaller. The craft pranced and reared, and plunged like an animal. As each wave came, and she rose for it, she seemed like a horse making at a fence outrageously high. The manner of her scramble over these walls of water is a mystic thing, and, moreover, at the top of them were ordinarily these problems in white water, the foam racing down from the summit of each wave, requiring a new leap, and a leap from the air. Then, after scornfully bumping a crest, she would slide, and race, and splash down a long incline and arrive bobbing and nodding in front of the next menace.

A singular disadvantage of the sea lies in the fact that after successfully surmounting one wave you discover that there is another behind it just as important and just as nervously anxious to do something effective in the way of swamping boats. In a ten-foot dingey one can get an idea of the resources of the sea in the line of waves that is not probable to the average experience, which is never at sea in a dingey. As each slaty wall of water approached, it shut all else from the view of the men in the boat, and it was not difficult to imagine that this particular wave was the final outburst of the ocean, the last effort of the grim water. There was a terrible grace in the move of the waves, and they came in silence, save for the snarling of the crests. 10

In the wan light, the faces of the men must have been gray. Their eyes must have glinted in strange ways as they gazed steadily astern. Viewed from a balcony, the whole thing would doubtlessly have been weirdly picturesque. But the men in the boat had no time to see it, and if they had had leisure there were other things to occupy their minds. The sun swung steadily up the sky, and they knew it was broad day because the color of the sea changed from slate to emerald-green, streaked with amber lights, and the foam was like tumbling snow. The process of the breaking day was unknown to them. They were aware only of this effect upon the color of the waves that rolled toward them.

In disjointed sentences the cook and the correspondent argued as to the difference between a life-saving station and a house of refuge. The cook had said: "There's a house of refuge just north of the Mosquito Inlet Light, and as soon as they see us, they'll come off in their boat and pick us up."

"As soon as who see us?" said the correspondent.

"The crew," said the cook.

"Houses of refuge don't have crews," said the correspondent. "As I understand them, they are only places where clothes and grub are stored for the benefit of shipwrecked people. They don't carry crews." 15

"Oh, yes, they do," said the cook.

"No, they don't," said the correspondent.

"Well, we're not there yet, anyhow," said the oiler, in the stern.

"Well," said the cook, "perhaps it's not a house of refuge that I'm thinking of as being near Mosquito Inlet Light. Perhaps it's a life-saving station."

"We're not there yet," said the oiler, in the stern.

II

As the boat bounced from the top of each wave, the wind tore through the hair of the hatless men, and as the craft plopped her stern down again the spray slashed past them. The crest of each of these waves was a hill, from the top of which the men surveyed, for a moment, a broad tumultuous expanse; shining and wind-riven. It was probably splendid. It was probably glorious, this play of the free sea, wild with lights of emerald and white and amber.

"Bully good thing it's an on-shore wind," said the cook. "If not, where would we be? Wouldn't have a show."

"That's right," said the correspondent.

The busy oiler nodded his assent.

Then the captain, in the bow, chuckled in a way that expressed humor, contempt, tragedy, all in one. "Do you think we've got much of a show, now, boys?" said he.

Whereupon the three were silent, save for a trifle of hemming and hawing. To express any particular optimism at this time they felt to be childish and stupid, but they all doubtless possessed this sense of the situation in their mind. A young man thinks doggedly at such times. On the other hand, the ethics of their condition was decidedly against any open suggestion of hopelessness. So they were silent.

"Oh, well," said the captain, soothing his children, "we'll get ashore all right."

But there was that in his tone which made them think, so the oiler quoth: "Yes! If this wind holds!"

The cook was bailing: "Yes! If we don't catch hell in the surf."

Canton flannel gulls flew near and far. Sometimes they sat down on the sea, near patches of brown sea-weed that rolled over the waves with a movement like carpets on a line in a gale. The birds sat comfortably in groups, and they were envied by some in the dingey, for the wrath of the sea was no more to them than it was to a covey of prairie chickens a thousand miles inland. Often they came very close and stared at the men with black beadlike eyes. At these times they were uncanny and sinister in their unblinking scrutiny, and the men hooted angrily at them, telling them to be gone. One came, and evidently decided to alight on the top of the captain's head. The bird flew parallel to the boat and did not circle, but made short sidelong jumps in the air in chicken-fashion. His black eyes were wistfully fixed upon the captain's head. "Ugly brute," said the oiler to the bird. "You look as if you were made with a jackknife." The cook and the correspondent swore darkly at the creature. The captain naturally wished to knock it away with the end of the heavy painter, but he did not dare do it, because anything resembling an emphatic gesture would have capsized this freighted boat, and so with his open hand, the captain gently and carefully waved the gull away. After it had been discouraged from the pursuit the captain breathed easier on account of his hair, and others breathed easier because the bird struck their minds at this time as being somehow grewsome and ominous.

In the meantime the oiler and the correspondent rowed. And also they rowed.

They sat together in the same seat, and each rowed an oar. Then the oiler took both oars; then the correspondent took both oars; then the oiler; then the correspondent. They rowed and they rowed. The very ticklish part of the business was when the time came for the reclining one in the stern to take his turn at the oars. By the very last star of truth, it is easier to steal eggs from under a hen than it was to change seats in the dingey. First the man in the stern slid his hand along the thwart and moved with care, as if he were of Sèvres. Then the man in the rowing seat slid his hand along the other thwart. It was all done with the most extraordinary care. As the two sidled past each other, the whole party kept watchful eyes on the coming wave, and the captain cried: "Look out now! Steady there!"

The brown mats of sea-weed that appeared from time to time were like islands, bits of earth. They were travelling, apparently, neither one way nor the other. They were, to all intents, stationary. They informed the men in the boat that it was making progress slowly toward the land.

The captain, rearing cautiously in the bow, after the dingey soared on a great swell, said that he had seen the lighthouse at Mosquito Inlet. Presently the cook remarked that he had seen it. The correspondent was at the oars, then, and for some reason he too wished to look at the lighthouse, but his back was toward the far shore and the waves were important, and for some time he could not seize an opportunity to turn his head. But at last there came a wave more gentle than the others, and when at the crest of it he swiftly scoured the western horizon.

"See it?" said the captain.

"No," said the correspondent, slowly, "I didn't see anything."

"Look again," said the captain. He pointed. "It's exactly in that direction."

At the top of another wave, the correspondent did as he was bid, and this time his eyes chanced on a small still thing on the edge of the swaying horizon. It was precisely like the point of a pin. It took an anxious eye to find a lighthouse so tiny.

"Think we'll make it, captain?"

"If this wind holds and the boat don't swamp, we can't do much else," said the captain.

The little boat, lifted by each towering sea, and splashed viciously by the crests, made progress that in the absence of sea-weed was not apparent to those in her. She seemed just a wee thing wallowing, miraculously, top-up, at the mercy of five oceans. Occasionally, a great spread of water, like white flames, swarmed into her.

"Bail her, cook," said the captain, serenely.

"All right, captain," said the cheerful cook.

III

It would be difficult to describe the subtle brotherhood of men that was here established on the seas. No one said that it was so. No one mentioned it. But it dwelt in the boat, and each man felt it warm him. They were a captain, an oiler, a cook, and a correspondent, and they were friends, friends in a more curiously iron-bound degree than may be common. The hurt captain, lying against the water-jar in the bow, spoke always in a low voice and calmly, but he could never command a more ready and swiftly obedient crew than the motley three of the dingey. It was more than a mere recognition of what was best for the common safety. There was surely in it a quality that was personal and heartfelt. And after this devotion to the commander of the boat there was this comradeship that the correspondent, for instance, who had been taught to be cynical of men, knew even at the time was the best experience of his life. But no one said that it was so. No one mentioned it.

"I wish we had a sail," remarked the captain. "We might try my overcoat on the end of an oar and give you two boys a chance to rest." So the cook and the correspondent held the mast and spread wide the overcoat. The oiler steered, and the little boat made good way with her new rig. Sometimes the oiler had to scull sharply to keep a sea from breaking into the boat, but otherwise sailing was a success.

Meanwhile the light-house had been growing slowly larger. It had now almost assumed color, and appeared like a little gray shadow on the sky. The man at the oars could not be prevented from turning his head rather often to try for a glimpse of this little gray shadow.

At last, from the top of each wave the men in the tossing boat could see land. Even as the light-house was an upright shadow on the sky, this land seemed but a long black shadow on the sea. It certainly was thinner than paper. "We must be about opposite New Smyrna," said the cook, who had coasted this shore often in schooners. "Captain, by the way, I believe they abandoned that life-saving station there about a year ago."

"Did they?" said the captain.

The wind slowly died away. The cook and the correspondent were not now obliged to slave in order to hold high the oar. But the waves continued their old impetuous swooping at the dingey, and the little craft, no longer under way, struggled woundily over them. The oiler or the correspondent took the oars again.

Shipwrecks are apropos of nothing. If men could only train for them and have them occur when the men had reached pink condition, there would be less drowning at sea. Of the four in the dingey none had slept any time worth mentioning for two days and two nights previous to embarking in the dingey, and in the excitement of clambering about the deck of a foundering ship they had also forgotten to eat heartily.

For these reasons, and for others, neither the oiler nor the correspondent was fond of rowing at this time. The correspondent wondered ingenuously how in the name of all that was sane could there be people who thought it amusing to row a boat. It was not an amusement; it was a diabolical punishment, and even a genius of mental aberrations could never conclude that it was anything but a horror to the muscles and a crime against the back. He mentioned to the boat in general how the amusement of rowing struck him, and the weary-faced oiler smiled in full sympathy. Previously to the foundering, by the way, the oiler had worked double-watch in the engine-room of the ship.

"Take her easy, now, boys," said the captain. "Don't spend yourselves. If we have to run a surf you'll need all your strength, because we'll sure have to swim for it. Take your time."

Slowly the land arose from the sea. From a black line it became a line of black and a line of white, trees, and sand. Finally, the captain said that he could make out a house on the shore. "That's the house of refuge, sure," said the cook. "They'll see us before long, and come out after us."

The distant light-house reared high. "The keeper ought to be able to make us out now, if he's looking through a glass," said the captain. "He'll notify the life-saving people."

"None of those other boats could have got ashore to give word of the wreck," said the oiler, in a low voice. "Else the life-boat would be out hunting us."

Slowly and beautifully the land loomed out of the sea. The wind came again. It had veered from the northeast to the southeast. Finally, a new sound struck the ears of the men in the boat. It was the low thunder of the surf on the shore. "We'll never be able to make the light-house now," said the captain. "Swing her head a little more north, Billie," said the captain.

"'A little more north,' sir," said the oiler.

Whereupon the little boat turned her nose once more down the wind, and all but the oarsman watched the shore grow. Under the influence of this expansion doubt and direful apprehension was leaving the minds of the men. The management of the boat was still most absorbing, but it could not prevent a quiet cheerfulness. In an hour perhaps, they would be ashore.

Their back-bones had become thoroughly used to balancing in the boat and they now rode this wild colt of a dingey like circus men. The correspondent thought that he had been drenched to the skin, but happening to feel in the top pocket of his coat, he found therein eight cigars. Four of them were soaked with sea-water; four were perfectly scatheless. After a search, somebody produced three dry matches, and thereupon the four waifs rode in their little boat, and with an assurance of an impending rescue shining in their eyes, puffed at the big cigars and judged well and ill of all men. Everybody took a drink of water.

IV

"Cook," remarked the captain, "there don't seem to be any signs of life about your house of refuge."

"No," replied the cook. "Funny they don't see us!"

A broad stretch of lowly coast lay before the eyes of the men. It was of low dunes topped with dark vegetation. The roar of the surf was plain, and sometimes they could see the white lip of a wave as it spun up the beach. A tiny house was blocked out black upon the sky. Southward, the slim light-house lifted its little gray length.

Tide, wind, and waves were swinging the dingey northward. "Funny they don't see us," said the men.

The surf's roar was here dulled, but its tone was, nevertheless, thunderous and mighty. As the boat swam over the great rollers, the men sat listening to this roar.

"We'll swamp sure," said everybody.

It is fair to say here that there was not a life-saving station within twenty miles in either direction, but the men did not know this fact and in consequence they made dark and opprobrious remarks concerning the eyesight of the nation's life-savers. Four scowling men sat in the dingey and surpassed records in the invention of epithets.

"Funny they don't see us."

The light-heartedness of a former time had completely faded. To their sharpened minds it was easy to conjure pictures of all kinds of incompetency and blindness and, indeed, cowardice. There was the shore of the populous land, and it was bitter and bitter to them that from it came no sign.

"Well," said the captain, ultimately, "I suppose we'll have to make a try ourselves. If we stay out here too long we'll none of us have strength left to swim after the boat swamps."

And so the oiler, who was at the oars, turned the boat straight for the shore. 70
There was a sudden tightening of muscles. There was some thinking.

"If we don't all get ashore — " said the captain. "If we don't all get ashore, I suppose you fellows know where to send news of my finish?"

They then briefly exchanged some addresses and admonitions. As for the reflections of the men, there was a great deal of rage in them. Perchance they might be formulated thus: "If I am going to be drowned — if I am going to be drowned — if I am going to be drowned, why, in the name of the seven mad gods who rule the sea, was I allowed to come thus far and contemplate sand and trees? Was I brought here merely to have my nose dragged away as I was about to nibble the sacred cheese of life? It is preposterous. If this old ninny-woman, Fate, cannot do better than this, she should be deprived of the management of men's fortunes. She is an old hen who knows not her intention. If she has decided to drown me, why did she not do it in the beginning and save me all this trouble. The whole affair is absurd. . . . But, no, she cannot mean to drown me. She dare not drown me. She cannot drown me. Not after all this work." Afterward the man might have had an impulse to shake his fist at the clouds: "Just you drown me, now, and then hear what I call you!"

The billows that came at this time were more formidable. They seemed always just about to break and roll over the little boat in a turmoil of foam. There was a preparatory and long growl in the speech of them. No mind unused to the sea would have concluded that the dingey could ascend these sheer heights in time. The shore was still afar. The oiler was a wily surfman. "Boys," he said, swiftly, "she won't live three minutes more and we're too far out to swim. Shall I take her to sea again, captain?"

"Yes! Go ahead!" said the captain.

This oiler, by a series of quick miracles, and fast and steady oarsmanship, turned 75 the boat in the middle of the surf and took her safely to sea again.

There was a considerable silence as the boat bumped over the furrowed sea to deeper water. Then somebody in gloom spoke. "Well, anyhow, they must have seen us from the shore by now."

The gulls went in slanting flight up the wind toward the gray desolate east. A squall, marked by dingy clouds, and clouds brick-red, like smoke from a burning building, appeared from the southeast.

"What do you think of those life-saving people? Ain't they peaches?"

"Funny they haven't seen us."

"Maybe they think we're out here for sport! Maybe they think we're fishin'. Maybe 80 they think we're damned fools."

It was a long afternoon. A changed tide tried to force them southward, but wind and wave said northward. Far ahead, where coast-line, sea, and sky formed their mighty angle, there were little dots which seemed to indicate a city on the shore.

"St. Augustine?"

The captain shook his head. "Too near Mosquito Inlet."

And the oiler rowed, and then the correspondent rowed. Then the oiler rowed. It was a weary business. The human back can become the seat of more aches and pains than are registered in books for the composite anatomy of a regiment. It is a limited area, but it can become the theatre of innumerable muscular conflicts, tangles, wrenches, knots, and other comforts.

"Did you ever like to row, Billie?" asked the correspondent.

"No," said the oiler. "Hang it."

When one exchanged the rowing-seat for a place in the bottom of the boat, he suffered a bodily depression that caused him to be careless of everything save an obligation to wiggle one finger. There was cold sea-water swashing to and fro in the boat, and he lay in it. His head, pillowed on a thwart, was within an inch of the swirl of a wave crest, and sometimes a particularly obstreperous sea came in-board and drenched him once more. But these matters did not annoy him. It is almost certain that if the boat had capsized he would have tumbled comfortably out upon the ocean as if he felt sure that it was a great soft mattress.

"Look! There's a man on the shore!"

"Where?"

"There! See 'im? See 'im?"

"Yes, sure! He's walking along."

"Now he's stopped. Look! He's facing us!"

"He's waving at us!"

"So he is! By thunder!"

"Ah, now, we're all right! Now we're all right! There'll be a boat out here for us half an hour."

"He's going on. He's running. He's going up to that house there."

The remote beach seemed lower than the sea, and it required a searching glance to discern the little black figure. The captain saw a floating stick and they rowed to it. A bath-towel was by some weird chance in the boat, and, tying this on the stick, the captain waved it. The oarsman did not dare turn his head, so he was obliged to ask questions.

"What's he doing now?"

"He's standing still again. He's looking, I think. . . . There he goes again. Toward the house. . . . Now he's stopped again."

"Is he waving at us?"

"No, not now! he was, though."

"Look! There comes another man!"

"He's running."

"Look at him go, would you."

"Why, he's on a bicycle. Now he's met the other man. They're both waving at us. Look!"

"There comes something up the beach."

"What the devil is that thing?"

"Why, it looks like a boat."

"Why, certainly it's a boat."

"No, it's on wheels."

"Yes, so it is. Well, that must be the life-boat. They drag them along shore on a wagon."

"That's the life-boat, sure."

"No, by — , it's — it's an omnibus."

"I tell you it's a life-boat."

"It is not! It's an omnibus. I can see it plain. See? One of these big hotel omnibuses."

"By thunder, you're right. It's an omnibus, sure as fate. What do you suppose they are doing with an omnibus? Maybe they are going around collecting the life-crew, hey?"

"That's it, likely. Look! There's a fellow waving a little black flag. He's standing on the steps of the omnibus. There come those other two fellows. Now they're all talking together. Look at the fellow with the flag. Maybe he ain't waving it."

"That ain't a flag, is it? That's his coat. Why, certainly, that's his coat."

"So it is. It's his coat. He's taken it off and is waving it around his head. But would you look at him swing it."

"Oh, say, there isn't any life-saving station there. That's just a winter resort hotel omnibus that has brought over some of the boarders to see us drown."

"What's that idiot with the coat mean? What's he signaling, anyhow?"

"It looks as if he were trying to tell us to go north. There must be a life-saving station up there."

"No! He thinks we're fishing. Just giving us a merry hand. See? Ah, there, Willie."

"Well, I wish I could make something out of those signals. What do you suppose he means?"

"He don't mean anything. He's just playing."

"Well, if he'd just signal us to try the surf again, or to go to sea and wait, or go north, or go south, or go to hell — there would be some reason in it. But look at him. He just stands there and keeps his coat revolving like a wheel. The ass!"

"There come more people."

"Now there's quite a mob. Look! Isn't that a boat?"

"Where? Oh, I see where you mean. No, that's no boat."

"That fellow is still waving his coat."

"He must think we like to see him do that. Why don't he quit it. It don't mean anything."

"I don't know. I think he is trying to make us go north. It must be that there's a life-saving station there somewhere."

"Say, he ain't tired yet. Look at 'im wave."

"Wonder how long he can keep that up. He's been revolving his coat ever since he caught sight of us. He's an idiot. Why aren't they getting men to bring a boat out.

A fishing boat — one of those big yawls — could come out here all right. Why don't he do something?"

"Oh, it's all right, now."

"They'll have a boat out here for us in less than no time, now that they've seen us."

A faint yellow tone came into the sky over the low land. The shadows on the sea slowly deepened. The wind bore coldness with it, and the men began to shiver.

"Holy smoke!" said one, allowing his voice to express his impious mood, "if we keep on monkeying out here! If we've got to flounder out here all night!"

"Oh, we'll never have to stay here all night! Don't you worry. They've seen us now, and it won't be long before they'll come chasing out after us."

The shore grew dusky. The man waving a coat blended gradually into this gloom, and it swallowed in the same manner the omnibus and the group of people. The spray, when it dashed uproariously over the side, made the voyagers shrink and swear like men who were being branded.

"I'd like to catch the chump who waved the coat. I feel like soaking him one, just for luck."

"Why? What did he do?"

"Oh, nothing, but then he seemed so damned cheerful."

In the meantime the oiler rowed, and then the correspondent rowed, and then the oiler rowed. Gray-faced and bowed forward, they mechanically, turn by turn, plied the leaden oars. The form of the light-house had vanished from the southern horizon, but finally a pale star appeared, just lifting from the sea. The streaked saffron in the west passed before the all-merging darkness, and the sea to the east was black. The land had vanished, and was expressed only by the low and drear thunder of the surf.

"If I am going to be drowned — if I am going to be drowned — if I am going to drowned, why, in the name of the seven mad gods, who rule the sea, was I allowed to come thus far and contemplate sand and trees? Was I brought here merely to have my nose dragged away as I was about to nibble the sacred cheese of life?"

The patient captain, drooped over the water-jar, was sometimes obliged to speak to the oarsman.

"Keep her head up! Keep her head up!"

"'Keep her head up,' sir." The voices were weary and low.

This was surely a quiet evening. All save the oarsman lay heavily and listlessly in the boat's bottom. As for him, his eyes were just capable of noting the tall black waves that swept forward in a most sinister silence, save for an occasional subdued growl of a crest.

The cook's head was on a thwart, and he looked without interest at the water under his nose. He was deep in other scenes. Finally he spoke. "Billie," he murmured, dreamfully, "what kind of pie do you like best?"

V

"Pie," said the oiler and the correspondent, agitatedly. "Don't talk about those things, blast you!"

"Well," said the cook, "I was just thinking about ham sandwiches, and — "

A night on the sea in an open boat is a long night. As darkness settled finally, the shine of the light, lifting from the sea in the south, changed to full gold. On the northern horizon a new light appeared, a small bluish gleam on the edge of the waters. These two lights were the furniture of the world. Otherwise there was nothing but waves.

Two men huddled in the stern, and distances were so magnificent in the dingey that the rower was enabled to keep his feet partly warmed by thrusting them under his companions. Their legs indeed extended far under the rowing-seat until they touched the feet of the captain forward. Sometimes, despite the efforts of the tired oarsman, a wave came piling into the boat, an icy wave of the night, and the chilling water soaked them anew. They would twist their bodies for a moment and groan, and sleep the dead sleep once more, while the water in the boat gurgled about them as the craft rocked.

The plan of the oiler and the correspondent was for one to row until he lost the ability, and then arouse the other from his sea-water couch in the bottom of the boat.

The oiler plied the oars until his head drooped forward, and the overpowering sleep blinded him. And he rowed yet afterward. Then he touched a man in the bottom of the boat, and called his name. "Will you spell me for a little while?" he said, meekly.

"Sure, Billie," said the correspondent, awakening and dragging himself to a sitting position. They exchanged places carefully, and the oiler, cuddling down in the sea-water at the cook's side, seemed to go to sleep instantly.

The particular violence of the sea had ceased. The waves came without snarling. The obligation of the man at the oars was to keep the boat headed so that the tilt of the rollers would not capsize her, and to preserve her from filling when the crests rushed past. The black waves were silent and hard to be seen in the darkness. Often one was almost upon the boat before the oarsman was aware.

In a low voice the correspondent addressed the captain. He was not sure that the captain was awake, although this iron man seemed to be always awake. "Captain, shall I keep her making for that light north, sir?"

The same steady voice answered him. "Yes. Keep it about two points off the port bow."

The cook had tied a life-belt around himself in order to get even the warmth which this clumsy cork contrivance could donate, and he seemed almost stove-like when a rower, whose teeth invariably chattered wildly as soon as he ceased his labor, dropped down to sleep.

The correspondent, as he rowed, looked down at the two men sleeping under foot. The cook's arm was around the oiler's shoulders, and, with their fragmentary clothing and haggard faces, they were the babes of the sea, a grotesque rendering of the old babes in the wood.

Later he must have grown stupid at his work, for suddenly there was a growling of water, and a crest came with a roar and a swash into the boat, and it was a wonder that it did not set the cook afloat in his life-belt. The cook continued to sleep, but the oiler sat up, blinking his eyes and shaking with the new cold.

"Oh, I'm awful sorry, Billie," said the correspondent, contritely.

"That's all right, old boy," said the oiler, and lay down again and was asleep.

Presently it seemed that even the captain dozed, and the correspondent thought that he was the one man afloat on all the oceans. The wind had a voice as it came over the waves, and it was sadder than the end.

There was a long, loud swishing astern of the boat, and a gleaming trail of phosphorescence, like blue flame, was furrowed on the black waters. It might have been made by a monstrous knife.

Then there came a stillness, while the correspondent breathed with the open mouth and looked at the sea.

Suddenly there was another swish and another long flash of bluish light, and this time it was alongside the boat, and might almost have been reached with an oar. The correspondent saw an enormous fin speed like a shadow through the water, hurling the crystalline spray and leaving the long glowing trail.

The correspondent looked over his shoulder at the captain. His face was hidden, 170 and he seemed to be asleep. He looked at the babes of the sea. They certainly were asleep. So, being bereft of sympathy, he leaned a little way to one side and swore softly into the sea.

But the thing did not then leave the vicinity of the boat. Ahead or astern, on one side or the other, at intervals long or short, fled the long sparkling streak, and there was to be heard the whiroo of the dark fin. The speed and power of the thing was greatly to be admired. It cut the water like a gigantic and keen projectile.

The presence of this biding thing did not affect the man with the same horror that it would if he had been a picnicker. He simply looked at the sea dully and swore in an undertone.

Nevertheless, it is true that he did not wish to be alone with the thing. He wished one of his companions to awaken by chance and keep him company with it. But the captain hung motionless over the water-jar and the oiler and the cook in the bottom of the boat were plunged in slumber.

VI

"If I am going to be drowned — if I am going to be drowned — if I am going to be drowned, why, in the name of the seven mad gods, who rule the sea, was I allowed to come thus far and contemplate sand and trees?"

During this dismal night, it may be remarked that a man would conclude that it 175 was really the intention of the seven mad gods to drown him, despite the abominable injustice of it. For it was certainly an abominable injustice to drown a man who had worked so hard. The man felt it would be a crime most unnatural. Other people had drowned at sea since galleys swarmed with painted sails, but still ——

When it occurs to a man that nature does not regard him as important, and that she feels she would not maim the universe by disposing of him, he at first wishes to throw bricks at the temple, and hates deeply the fact that there are no bricks and no temples. Any visible expression of nature would surely be pelleted with his jeers.

Then, if there be no tangible thing to hoot he feels, perhaps, the desire to confront a personification and indulge in pleas, bowed to one knee, and with hands supplicant, saying: "Yes, but I love myself."

A high cold star on a winter's night is the word he feels that she says to him. Thereafter he knows the pathos of his situation.

The men in the dingey had not discussed these matters, but each had, no doubt, reflected upon them in silence and according to his mind. There was seldom any expression upon their faces save the general one of complete weariness. Speech was devoted to the business of the boat.

To chime the notes of his emotion, a verse mysteriously entered the correspon- 180 dent's head. He had even forgotten that he had forgotten this verse, but it suddenly was in his mind.

A soldier of the Legion lay dying in Algiers,
There was lack of woman's nursing, there was dearth of woman's tears;
But a comrade stood beside him, and he took that comrade's hand
And he said: "I shall never see my own, my native land."

In his childhood, the correspondent had been made acquainted with the fact that a soldier of the Legion lay dying in Algiers, but he had never regarded the fact as important. Myriads of his school-fellows had informed him of the soldier's plight, but the dinning had naturally ended by making him perfectly indifferent. He had never considered it his affair that a soldier of the Legion lay dying in Algiers, nor had it appeared to him as a matter for sorrow. It was less to him than the breaking of a pencil's point.

Now, however, it quaintly came to him as a human, living thing. It was no longer merely a picture of a few throes in the breast of a poet, meanwhile drinking tea and warming his feet at the grate; it was an actuality — stern, mournful, and fine.

The correspondent plainly saw the soldier. He lay on the sand with his feet out straight and still. While his pale left hand was upon his chest in an attempt to thwart the going of his life, the blood came between his fingers. In the far Algerian distance, a city of low square forms was set against a sky that was faint with the last sunset hues. The correspondent, plying the oars and dreaming of the slow and slower movements of the lips of the soldier, was moved by a profound and perfectly impersonal comprehension. He was sorry for the soldier of the Legion who lay dying in Algiers.

The thing which had followed the boat and waited had evidently grown bored at the delay. There was no longer to be heard the slash of the cut-water, and there was no longer the flame of the long trail. The light in the north still glimmered, but it was apparently no nearer to the boat. Sometimes the boom of the surf rang in the correspondent's ears, and he turned the craft seaward then and rowed harder. Southward, someone had evidently built a watch-fire on the beach. It was too low and too far to be seen, but it made a shimmering, roseate reflection upon the bluff back of it, and this could be discerned from the boat. The wind came stronger, and sometimes a wave suddenly raged out like a mountain-cat and there was to be seen the sheen and sparkle of a broken crest.

The captain, in the bow, moved on his water-jar and sat erect. "Pretty long night," he observed to the correspondent. He looked at the shore. "Those life-saving people take their time."

"Did you see that shark playing around?"

"Yes, I saw him. He was a big fellow, all right."

"Wish I had known you were awake."

Later the correspondent spoke into the bottom of the boat.

"Billie!" There was a slow and gradual disentanglement. "Billie, will you spell me?"

"Sure," said the oiler.

As soon as the correspondent touched the cold comfortable sea-water in the bottom of the boat, and had huddled close to the cook's life-belt he was deep in sleep, despite the fact that his teeth played all the popular airs. This sleep was so good to him that it was but a moment before he heard a voice call his name in a tone that demonstrated the last stages of exhaustion. "Will you spell me?"

"Sure, Billie."

The light in the north had mysteriously vanished, but the correspondent took his course from the wide-awake captain.

Later in the night they took the boat farther out to sea, and the captain directed the cook to take one oar at the stern and keep the boat facing the seas. He was to call out if he should hear the thunder of the surf. This plan enabled the oiler and the correspondent to get respite together. "We'll give those boys a chance to get into shape again," said the captain. They curled down and, after a few preliminary chatterings and trembles, slept once more the dead sleep. Neither knew they had bequeathed to the cook the company of another shark, or perhaps the same shark.

As the boat caroused on the waves, spray occasionally bumped over the side and gave them a fresh soaking, but this had no power to break their repose. The ominous slash of the wind and the water affected them as it would have affected mummies.

"Boys," said the cook, with the notes of every reluctance in his voice, "she's drifted in pretty close. I guess one of you had better take her to sea again." The correspondent, aroused, heard the crash of the toppled crests.

As he was rowing, the captain gave him some whiskey and water, and this steadied the chills out of him. "If I ever get ashore and anybody shows me even a photograph of an oar——"

At last there was a short conversation.

"Billie. . . . Billie, will you spell me?"

"Sure," said the oiler.

VII

When the correspondent again opened his eyes, the sea and the sky were each of the gray hue of the dawning. Later, carmine and gold was painted upon the waters. The morning appeared finally, in its splendor, with a sky of pure blue, and the sunlight flamed on the tips of the waves.

On the distant dunes were set many little black cottages, and a tall white wind-mill reared above them. No man, nor dog, nor bicycle appeared on the beach. The cottages might have formed a deserted village.

The voyagers scanned the shore. A conference was held in the boat. "Well," said the captain, "if no help is coming, we might better try a run through the surf right away. If we stay out here much longer we will be too weak to do anything for ourselves at all." The others silently acquiesced in this reasoning. The boat was headed for the beach. The correspondent wondered if none ever ascended the tall wind-tower, and if then they never looked seaward. This tower was a giant, standing with its back to the plight of the ants. It represented in a degree, to the correspondent, the serenity of nature amid the struggles of the individual — nature in the wind, and nature in the vision of men. She did not seem cruel to him then, nor beneficent, nor treacherous, nor wise. But she was indifferent, flatly indifferent. It is, perhaps, plausible that a man in this situation pressed with the unconcern of the universe, should see the innumerable flaws of his life and have them taste wickedly in his mind and wish for another chance. A distinction between right and wrong seems absurdly clear to him, then, in this new ignorance of the grave-edge, and he understands that if he were given another opportunity he would mend his conduct and his words, and be better and brighter during an introduction, or at a tea.

"Now, boys," said the captain, "she is going to swamp sure. All we can do is to 205 work her in as far as possible, and then when she swamps, pile out and scramble for the beach. Keep cool now and don't jump until she swamps sure."

The oiler took the oars. Over his shoulders he scanned the surf. "Captain," he said, "I think I'd better bring her about, and keep her head-on to the seas and back her in."

"All right, Billie," said the captain. "Back her in." The oiler swung the boat then and, seated in the stern, the cook and the correspondent were obliged to look over their shoulders to contemplate the lonely and indifferent shore.

The monstrous inshore rollers heaved the boat high until the men were again enabled to see the white sheets of water scudding up the slanted beach. "We won't get in very close," said the captain. Each time a man could wrest his attention from the rollers, he turned his glance toward the shore, and in the expression of the eyes during this contemplation there was a singular quality. The correspondent, observing the others, knew that they were not afraid, but the full meaning of their glances was shrouded.

As for himself, he was too tired to grapple fundamentally with the fact. He tried to coerce his mind into thinking of it, but the mind was dominated at this time by the muscles, and the muscles said they did not care. It merely occurred to him that if he should drown it would be a shame.

There were no hurried words, no pallor, no plain agitation. The men simply 210 looked at the shore. "Now, remember to get well clear of the boat when you jump," said the captain.

Seaward the crest of a roller suddenly fell with a thunderous crash, and the long white comber came roaring down upon the boat.

"Steady now," said the captain. The men were silent. They turned their eyes from the shore to the comber and waited. The boat slid up the incline, leaped at the furious top, bounced over it, and swung down the long back of the waves. Some water had been shipped and the cook bailed it out.

But the next crest crashed also. The tumbling boiling flood of white water caught the boat and whirled it almost perpendicular. Water swarmed in from all sides. The correspondent had his hands on the gunwale at this time, and when the water entered at that place he swiftly withdrew his fingers, as if he objected to wetting them.

The little boat, drunken with this weight of water, reeled and snuggled deeper into the sea.

"Bail her out, cook! Bail her out," said the captain.

"All right, captain," said the cook.

"Now, boys, the next one will do for sure," said the oiler. "Mind to jump clear of the boat."

The third wave moved forward, huge, furious, implacable. It fairly swallowed the dingey, and almost simultaneously the men tumbled into the sea. A piece of life-belt had lain in the bottom of the boat, and as the correspondent went overboard he held this to his chest with his left hand.

The January water was icy, and he reflected immediately that it was colder than he had expected to find it off the coast of Florida. This appeared to his dazed mind as a fact important enough to be noted at the time. The coldness of the water was sad; it was tragic. This fact was somehow mixed and confused with his opinion of his own situation that it seemed almost a proper reason for tears. The water was cold.

When he came to the surface he was conscious of little but the noisy water. Afterward he saw his companions in the sea. The oiler was ahead in the race. He was swimming strongly and rapidly. Off to correspondent's left, the cook's great white and corked back bulged out of the water, and in the rear the captain was hanging with his one good hand to the keel of the overturned dingey.

There is a certain immovable quality to a shore, and the correspondent wondered at it amid the confusion of the sea.

It seemed also very attractive, but the correspondent knew that it was a long journey, and he paddled leisurely. The piece of life-preserver lay under him, and sometimes he whirled down the incline of a wave as if he were on a hand-sled.

But finally he arrived at a place in the sea where travel was beset with difficulty. He did not pause swimming to inquire what manner of current had caught him, but there his progress ceased. The shore was set before him like a bit of scenery on a stage, and he looked at it and understood with his eyes each detail of it.

As the cook passed, much farther to the left, the captain was calling to him, "Turn over on your back, cook! Turn over on your back and use the oar."

"All right, sir." The cook turned on his back, and, paddling with an oar, went ahead as if he were a canoe.

Presently the boat also passed to the left of the correspondent with the captain clinging with one hand to the keel. He would have appeared like a man raising himself to look over a board fence, if it were not for the extraordinary gymnastics of the boat. The correspondent marvelled that the captain could still hold it.

They passed on, nearer to shore — the oiler, the cook, the captain — and following them went the water-jar, bouncing gayly over the seas.

The correspondent remained in the grip of this strange new enemy — a current. The shore, with its white slope of sand and its green bluff, topped with little silent cottages, was spread like a picture before him. It was very near to him then, but he was impressed as one who in a gallery looks at a scene from Brittany or Algiers.

He thought: "I am going to drown? Can it be possible? Can it be possible? Can it be possible?" Perhaps an individual must consider his own death to be the final phenomenon of nature.

But later a wave perhaps whirled him out of this small deadly current, for he found 230 suddenly that he could again make progress toward the shore. Later still, he was aware that the captain, clinging with one hand to the keel of the dingey, had his face turned away from the shore and toward him, and was calling his name. "Come to the boat! Come to the boat!"

In his struggle to reach the captain and the boat, he reflected that when one gets properly wearied, drowning must really be a comfortable arrangement, a cessation of hostilities accompanied by a large degree of relief, and he was glad of it, for the main thing in his mind for some moments had been horror of the temporary agony. He did not wish to be hurt.

Presently he saw a man running along the shore. He was undressing with most remarkable speed. Coat, trousers, shirt, everything flew magically off him.

"Come to the boat," called the captain.

"All right, captain." As the correspondent paddled, he saw the captain let himself down to bottom and leave the boat. Then the correspondent performed his one little marvel of the voyage. A large wave caught him and flung him with ease and supreme speed completely over the boat and far beyond it. It struck him even then as an event in gymnastics, and a true miracle of the sea. An overturned boat in the surf is not a plaything to a swimming man.

The correspondent arrived in water that reached only to his waist, but his condi- 235 tion did not enable him to stand for more than a moment. Each wave knocked him into a heap, and the under-tow pulled at him.

Then he saw the man who had been running and undressing, and undressing and running, come bounding into the water. He dragged ashore the cook, and then waded toward the captain, but the captain waved him away, and sent him to the correspondent. He was naked, naked as a tree in winter, but a halo was about his head, and he shone like a saint. He gave a strong pull, and a long drag, and a bully heave at the correspondent's hand. The correspondent, schooled in the minor formulae, said: "Thanks, old man." But suddenly the man cried: "What's that?" He pointed a swift finger. The correspondent said: "Go."

In the shallows, face downward, lay the oiler. His forehead touched sand that was periodically, between each wave, clear of the sea.

The correspondent did not know all that transpired afterward. When he achieved safe ground he fell, striking the sand with each particular part of his body. It was as if he had dropped from a roof, but the thud was grateful to him.

It seems that instantly the beach was populated with men with blankets, clothes, and flasks, and women with coffee-pots and all the remedies sacred to their minds. The welcome of the land to the men from the sea was warm and generous, but a still and dripping shape was carried slowly up the beach, and the land's welcome for it could only be the different and sinister hospitality of the grave.

When it came night, the white waves paced to and fro in the moonlight, and the 240 wind brought the sound of the great sea's voice to the men on shore, and they felt that they could then be interpreters.

(1897)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the effect of the opening paragraph? How does it set the scene for the entire story?
2. What is the narrative stance in this story? How do you account for conditional statements — set here in italic — such as "In the wan light, the faces of the men must have been gray. Their eyes must have glinted" (par. 11) and "It was probably splendid. It was probably glorious, this play of the free sea, wild with lights of emerald and white and amber" (par. 21)? Why does Stephen Crane introduce such uncertainty?
3. What is "the subtle brotherhood of men" (par. 44) that Crane's narrator refers to? How is this camaraderie developed into a theme in the story?
4. What is the importance of the narrator's imagined "reflections of the men," which "might be formulated thus: 'If I am going to be drowned — if I am going to be drowned . . . She dare not drown me. She cannot drown me. Not after all this work' " (par. 72)?
5. Why does the correspondent "mysteriously" recall a verse he "had even forgotten that he had forgotten" (par. 180)? What is the meaning of the description that he was moved "by a profound and perfectly impersonal comprehension" (par. 183)?
6. Why are the characters referred to by their function rather than their given names in most of the story? Why is the oiler, Billie, the exception?
7. The story is divided into seven sections or chapters. What is the structural principle governing these divisions? What titles might you give each?
8. The ocean dominates this story from the very first paragraph to the last. How does Crane portray the sea in this story? Cite specific passages of description, paying close attention to figurative language.
9. Early in the story, we are told that the captain "chuckled in a way that expressed humor, contempt, tragedy, all in one" (par. 25). Identify at least one passage and discuss how Crane shows the complexity of feeling multiple emotions simultaneously, especially conflicting emotions. Consider instances that include humor in this life-and-death situation.
10. Crane does not depict nature as an entirely hostile force in "The Open Boat"; he shows how it both impedes and assists the four men. What details illustrate the varying roles nature plays in this story? Ultimately, what conclusion does the correspondent reach about the relationship between humans and nature? Consider the ending in your response.

11. Explain why you believe that the worldview Crane presents in this story is ultimately optimistic or pessimistic.
12. Following is a section from Crane's account of the sinking of the Commodore. How does it differ in style and tone from the short story? What seeds of the story do you detect in this nonfiction report?

> The cook let go of the line.
>
> We rowed around to see if we could not get a line from the chief engineer, and all this time, mind you, there were no shrieks, no groans, but silence, silence and silence, and then the Commodore sank. She lurched to windward, then swung afar back, righted and dove into the sea, and the rafts were suddenly swallowed by this frightful maw of the ocean. And then by the men on the ten-foot dingy were words said that were still not words, something far beyond words.
>
> The lighthouse of Mosquito Inlet stuck up above the horizon like the point of a pin. We turned our dingy toward the shore. The history of life in an open boat for thirty hours would no doubt be very instructive for the young, but none is to be told here now. For my part I would prefer to tell the story at once, because from it would shine the splendid manhood of Captain Edward Murphy and of William Higgins, the oiler, but let it suffice at this time to say that when we were swamped in the surf and making the best of our way toward the shore the captain gave orders amid the wildness of the breakers as clearly as if he had been on the quarterdeck of a battleship.
>
> John Kitchell of Daytona came running down the beach, and as he ran the air was filled with clothes. If he had pulled a single lever and undressed, even as the fire horses harness, he could not to me seem to have stripped with more speed. He dashed into the water and grabbed the cook. Then he went after the captain, but the captain sent him to me, and then it was that we saw Billy Higgins lying with his forehead on sand that was clear of the water, and he was dead.

E. A. Robinson

Edwin Arlington Robinson (1869–1935) was a Pulitzer Prize–winning American poet born in Maine. Robinson studied at Harvard University, where he published his first poems in the Harvard Advocate. He moved to New York City in the 1890s, and in 1896 he published his first volume of poetry, The Torrent and the Night, at his own expense. Unable to make a living as a poet, Robinson took a job as an inspector for the New York City subway system. He gained little attention for his poetry until 1902, when President Theodore Roosevelt wrote a magazine article praising Robinson's poetry collection Captain Craig and Other Poems. Soon after, Roosevelt offered Robinson a position in a U.S. Customs House, a job that he kept from 1905 to 1910. The Man against the Sky (1916) became his first major success. In 1922, he won a Pulitzer Prize for Collected Poems, and in 1925 he won another Pulitzer Prize for The Man Who Died Twice. He was awarded his third and final Pulitzer Prize in 1928 for a trilogy of poems based on Arthurian legends.

Richard Cory

This poem was published in Robinson's 1897 collection, The Children of the Night.

Whenever Richard Cory went down town,
We people on the pavement looked at him:
He was a gentleman from sole to crown,
Clean favored, and imperially slim.

And he was always quietly arrayed,
And he was always human when he talked;
But still he fluttered pulses when he said,
"Good-morning," and he glittered when he walked.

And he was rich — yes, richer than a king —
And admirably schooled in every grace:
In fine, we thought that he was everything
To make us wish that we were in his place.

So on we worked, and waited for the light,
And went without the meat, and cursed the bread;
And Richard Cory, one calm summer night,
Went home and put a bullet through his head.

(1897)

Exploring the Text

1. How would you characterize the speaker in this poem?
2. What specific information does the poem provide about the appearance and demeanor of Richard Cory?
3. What is meant by his being "quietly arrayed" (l. 5) and "always human" (l. 6)?
4. Line 13 opens with the conjunction "So," which suggests causality. What is the cause-effect relationship between stanza 3 and the first two lines of stanza 4?
5. The ending of the poem is surprising, even shocking, when first read, and we have not even a hint of why Richard Cory took such desperate action. Do you think it is more effective that we know nothing of the circumstances or turmoil that might have led him to commit suicide?

6. Explain how situational irony works in this poem.

Miniver Cheevy

This poem was first published in Robinson's collection The Town Down the River (1910).

Miniver Cheevy, child of scorn,
  Grew lean while he assailed the seasons;
He wept that he was ever born,
  And he had reasons.

Miniver loved the days of old
  When swords were bright and steeds were prancing;
The vision of a warrior bold
  Would set him dancing.

Miniver sighed for what was not,
  And dreamed, and rested from his labors;
He dreamed of Thebes and Camelot,
  And Priam's[1] neighbors.

Miniver mourned the ripe renown
  That made so many a name so fragrant;
He mourned Romance, now on the town,
  And Art, a vagrant.

Miniver loved the Medici,[2]
  Albeit he had never seen one;
He would have sinned incessantly
  Could he have been one.

Miniver cursed the commonplace
  And eyed a khaki suit with loathing;
He missed the mediaeval grace
  Of iron clothing.

---

[1]King of Troy during the Trojan War. — Eds.

[2]Italian political and banking dynasty that ruled the city-state of Florence and other parts of Tuscany from the fourteenth to the eighteenth century. The family boasts four popes, two queens of France, and a host of other royalty. — Eds.

Miniver scorned the gold he sought,
  But sore annoyed was he without it;
Miniver thought, and thought, and thought,
  And thought about it.

Miniver Cheevy, born too late,
  Scratched his head and kept on thinking;
Miniver coughed, and called it fate,
  And kept on drinking.

(1910)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the ambiguity in the description "child of scorn" (l. 1)? What are two possible meanings?
2. The words used to describe Cheevy's view of "the days of old" (l. 5) are fairly clichéd: "When swords were bright and steeds were prancing; / The vision of a warrior bold" (ll. 6–7). What effect does E. A. Robinson achieve by choosing such hackneyed expressions?
3. Why does Cheevy dream of "Thebes and Camelot, / And Priam's neighbors" (ll. 11–12)? What do these examples have in common?
4. What is the "khaki suit" (l. 22)? What is "iron clothing" (l. 24)?
5. How do you interpret these lines: "Miniver scorned the gold he sought, / But sore annoyed was he without it" (ll. 25–26)?
6. What examples of humor do you find in this poem? Consider elements such as word choice, alliteration, repetition, and allusion as well as patterns of rhyme and rhythm. How would you characterize the humor? Is it gentle sarcasm? Bitter irony? Playful wit?
7. Do you think that Miniver Cheevy's inability to fit into his own era is a consequence of history (i.e., he was born at the wrong time) or the result of his own character failings? Make your case with concrete references to the text of the poem.
8. What is the tone of the poem? Cite specific words and lines to support your response.

Theodore Roosevelt

Theodore Roosevelt (1858–1919) was only forty-two when he became the twenty-sixth president of the United States following William McKinley's assassination in 1901. During his first term, he spearheaded the construction of the Panama Canal, and during his second, he won the Nobel Peace Prize — the first American to do so — for his mediation in the Russo-Japanese War of 1904–1905. Prior to holding office, he commanded the famed Rough Riders, an all-volunteer cavalry that led the charge on San Juan Hill in the Spanish-American War, for which he was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor. Roosevelt led what he called the "strenuous life," which included working on his ranch in the Dakotas, going on safari in Africa, and exploring the Amazon basin.

The Strenuous Life

Included here is the first part of the speech Roosevelt delivered in 1899 to Chicago's Hamilton Club, a private organization, after the Senate had ratified the treaty with Spain that established the Philippines as a colony of the United States. In the remainder of the speech, Roosevelt defends American imperialism as much on the basis of his definition of the American character as on the country's political and economic interests.

In speaking to you, men of the greatest city of the West, men of the State which gave to the country Lincoln and Grant, men who preëminently and distinctly embody all that is most American in the American character, I wish to preach, not the doctrine of ignoble ease, but the doctrine of the strenuous life, the life of toil and effort, of labor and strife; to preach that highest form of success which comes, not to the man who desires mere easy peace, but to the man who does not shrink from danger, from hardship, or from bitter toil, and who out of these wins the splendid ultimate triumph.

A life of slothful ease, a life of that peace which springs merely from lack either of desire or of power to strive after great things, is as little worthy of a nation as of an individual. I ask only that what every self-respecting American demands from himself and from his sons shall be demanded of the American nation as a whole. Who among you would teach your boys that ease, that peace, is to be the first consideration in their eyes — to be the ultimate goal after which they strive? You men of Chicago have made this city great, you men of Illinois have done your share, and more than your share, in making America great, because you neither preach nor practise such a doctrine. You work yourselves, and you bring up your sons to work. If you are rich and are worth your salt, you will teach your sons that though they may have leisure, it is not to be spent in idleness; for wisely used leisure merely means that those who possess it, being free from the necessity of working for their livelihood, are all the more bound to carry on some kind of non-remunerative work in science, in letters, in art, in exploration, in historical research — work of the type we most need in this country, the successful carrying out of which reflects most honor upon the nation.

We do not admire the man of timid peace. We admire the man who embodies victorious effort; the man who never wrongs his neighbor, who is prompt to help a friend, but who has those virile qualities necessary to win in the stern strife of actual life. It is hard to fail, but it is worse never to have tried to succeed. In this life we get nothing save by effort. Freedom from effort in the present merely means that there has been stored up effort in the past. A man can be freed from the necessity of work only by the fact that he or his fathers before him have worked to good purpose. If the freedom thus purchased is used aright, and the man still does actual work, though of a different kind, whether as a writer or a general, whether in the field of politics or in the field of exploration and adventure, he shows he deserves his good fortune. But if he treats this period of freedom from the need of actual labor as a period, not of preparation, but of mere enjoyment, even though perhaps not of vicious enjoyment, he shows that he is simply a cumberer of the earth's surface, and he surely unfits himself to hold his own with his fellows if the need to do so should again arise. A mere life of ease is not in the end a very satisfactory life, and, above all, it is a life which ultimately unfits those who follow it for serious work in the world.

In the last analysis a healthy state can exist only when the men and women who make it up lead clean, vigorous, healthy lives; when the children are so trained that they shall endeavor, not to shirk difficulties, but to overcome them; not to seek ease, but to know how to wrest triumph from toil and risk. The man must be glad to do a man's work, to dare and endure and to labor; to keep himself, and to keep those dependent upon him. The woman must be the housewife, the helpmeet of the home-maker, the wise and fearless mother of many healthy children. In one of Daudet's powerful and melancholy books he speaks of "the fear of maternity, the haunting terror of the young wife of the present day." When such words can be truthfully written of a nation, that nation is rotten to the heart's core. When men fear work or fear righteous war, when women fear motherhood, they tremble on the brink of doom; and well it is that they should vanish from the earth, where they are fit subjects for the scorn of all men and women who are themselves strong and brave and high-minded,

As it is with the individual, so it is with the nation. It is a base untruth to say that 5 happy is the nation that has no history. Thrice happy is the nation that has a glorious history. Far better it is to dare mighty things, to win glorious triumphs, even though checkered by failure, than to take rank with those poor spirits who neither enjoy much nor suffer much, because they live in the gray twilight that knows not victory nor defeat. If in 1861 the men who loved the Union had believed that peace was the end of all things, and war and strife the worst of all things, and had acted up to their belief, we would have saved hundreds of thousands of lives, we would have saved hundreds of millions of dollars. Moreover, besides saving all the blood and treasure we then lavished, we would have prevented the heartbreak of many women, the dissolution of many homes, and we would have spared the country those months of gloom and shame when it seemed as if our armies marched only to defeat. We could have avoided all this suffering simply by shrinking from strife. And if we had thus avoided it, we would have shown that we were weaklings, and that we were unfit to stand among the great nations of the earth. Thank God for the iron in the blood of our fathers, the men who upheld the wisdom of Lincoln, and bore sword or rifle in the armies of Grant! Let us, the children of the men who proved themselves equal to the mighty days, let us, the children of the men who carried the great Civil War to a triumphant conclusion, praise the God of our fathers that the ignoble counsels of peace were rejected; that the suffering and loss, the blackness of sorrow and despair, were unflinchingly faced, and the years of strife endured; for in the end the slave was freed, the Union restored, and the mighty American republic placed once more as a helmeted queen among nations.

We of this generation do not have to face a task such as that our fathers faced, but we have our tasks, and woe to us if we fail to perform them! We cannot, if we would, play the part of China, and be content to rot by inches in ignoble ease within our borders, taking no interest in what goes on beyond them, sunk in a scrambling commercialism; heedless of the higher life, the life of aspiration, of toil and risk, busying ourselves only with the wants of our bodies for the day, until suddenly we should find, beyond a shadow of question, what China has already found, that in this world the nation that has trained itself to a career of unwarlike and isolated ease is bound, in the end, to go down before other nations which have not lost the manly and adventurous qualities. If we are to be a really great people, we must strive in good faith to play a great part in the world. We cannot avoid meeting great issues. All that we can determine for ourselves is whether we shall meet them well or ill. In 1898 we could not help being brought face to face with the problem of war with Spain. All we could decide was whether we should shrink like cowards from the contest, or enter into it as beseemed a brave and high-spirited people; and, once in, whether failure or success should crown our banners.

So it is now. We cannot avoid the responsibilities that confront us in Hawaii, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. All we can decide is whether we shall meet them in a way that will redound to the national credit, or whether we shall make of our dealings with these new problems a dark and shameful page in our history. To refuse to deal with them at all merely amounts to dealing with them badly. We have a given problem to solve. If we undertake the solution, there is, of course, always danger that we may not solve it aright; but to refuse to undertake the solution simply renders it certain that we cannot possibly solve it aright.

The timid man, the lazy man, the man who distrusts his country, the overcivilized man, who has lost the great fighting, masterful virtues, the ignorant man, and the man of dull mind, whose soul is incapable of feeling the mighty lift that thrills "stern men with empires in their brains" — all these, of course, shrink from seeing the nation undertake its new duties; shrink from seeing us build a navy and an army adequate to our needs; shrink from seeing us do our share of the world's work, by bringing order out of chaos in the great, fair tropic islands from which the valor of our soldiers and sailors has driven the Spanish flag. These are the men who fear the strenuous life, who fear the only national life which is really worth leading. They believe in that cloistered life which saps the hardy virtues in a nation, as it saps them in the individual; or else they are wedded to that base spirit of gain and greed which recognizes in commercialism the be-all and end-all of national life, instead of realizing that, though an indispensable element, it is, after all, but one of the many elements that go to make up true national greatness. No country can long endure if its foundations are not laid deep in the material prosperity which comes from thrift, from business energy and enterprise, from hard, unsparing effort in the fields of industrial activity; but neither was any nation ever yet truly great if it relied upon material prosperity alone. All honor must be paid to the architects of our material prosperity, to the great captains of industry who have built our factories and our railroads, to the strong men who toil for wealth with brain or hand; for great is the debt of the nation to these and their kind. But our debt is yet greater to the men whose highest type is to be found in a statesman like Lincoln, a soldier like Grant. They showed by their lives that they recognized the law of work, the law of strife; they toiled to win a competence for themselves and those dependent upon them; but they recognized that there were yet other and even loftier duties — duties to the nation and duties to the race.

We cannot sit huddled within our own borders and avow ourselves merely an assemblage of well-to-do hucksters who care nothing for what happens beyond. Such a policy would defeat even its own end; for as the nations grow to have ever wider and wider interests, and are brought into closer and closer contact, if we are to hold our own in the struggle for naval and commercial supremacy, we must build up our power without our own borders. We must build the isthmian canal,[1] and we must grasp the points of vantage which will enable us to have our say in deciding the destiny of the oceans of the East and the West. . . .

I preach to you, then, my countrymen, that our country calls not for the life of ease but for the life of strenuous endeavor. The twentieth century looms before us big with the fate of many nations. If we stand idly by, if we seek merely swollen, slothful ease and ignoble peace, if we shrink from the hard contests where men must win at hazard of their lives and at the risk of all they hold dear, then the bolder and stronger peoples will pass us by, and will win for themselves the domination of the world. Let us therefore boldly face the life of strife, resolute to do our duty well and manfully; resolute to uphold righteousness by deed and by word; resolute to be both honest and brave, to serve high ideals, yet to use practical methods. Above all, let us shrink from no strife, moral or physical, within or without the nation, provided we are certain that the strife is justified, for it is only through strife, through hard and dangerous endeavor, that we shall ultimately win the goal of true national greatness.

(1899)

Exploring the Text

1. The rhetorical situation for this speech is that Theodore Roosevelt, one of the Rough Riders in the Spanish-American War of 1898 (the invitation to the banquet referred to him as "Colonel Roosevelt") and newly elected governor of New York, was being honored at a banquet by the Hamilton Club, an exclusive members-only organization established in 1890. How does he tailor his speech to this audience (which was all male)? What ethos does he establish?
2. What is the relationship among freedom, leisure, idleness, and work as Roosevelt uses those terms in the third paragraph?

[1]What would become the Panama Canal. — Eds.

3. How does Roosevelt define gender roles in this speech? Consider his definition of "man's work" and a woman's role as described in paragraph 4. How do these assumptions guide Roosevelt's argument about the qualities most essential for national vigor and vitality?
4. How does Roosevelt interpret the Civil War as demonstrating that America was not a nation of "weaklings" (par. 5)?
5. Ultimately, what does Roosevelt believe is "most American in the American character" (par. 1)? What are "those virile qualities necessary to win in the stern strife of actual life" (par. 3)?
6. What purpose does Roosevelt achieve through his example of China (par. 6)?
7. How does Roosevelt make the transition from exhorting the virtues of "the strenuous life" for individuals to arguing that similar characteristics are necessary in the life of the nation? How convincing do you find this analogy? Consider the concluding paragraph of the excerpt in your analysis.
8. The Hamilton Club, organized in 1890, catered to an exclusive membership selected through an application process governed by its leadership. The club's objective was stated as follows: "This Club is incorporated for the advancement of political science; to promote good government—local, state and national; to develop the growth and spread of patriotism and of Republican principles; and to cultivate friendly and social relations among its members." How does Roosevelt's speech reflect these goals?
9. Roosevelt ends this exuberant speech by claiming that "our country calls not for the life of ease but for the life of strenuous endeavor" if the country is to achieve "true national greatness." To what extent do you see his perspective in today's national discourse?

Jane Addams

Jane Addams (1860–1935) was an American writer, women's rights activist, and social settlement pioneer. A daughter of Senator John Addams, she grew up in Illinois and graduated from the prestigious Rockford Female Seminary in 1881. In 1889, with her partner Ellen Gates Starr, Addams founded Hull House, a social settlement in Chicago, which brought educated middle-class and upper-middle-class "settlers" to live in poor neighborhoods and provide free services, such as day care, education, and health care, to the impoverished urban residents. From Hull House, where she lived for the rest of her life, Addams helped raise national awareness about the issues of women's rights, public health, and child welfare. In the early 1900s, she became involved in the peace movement, attending the International Congress of Women at The Hague in 1915 and helping found the Women's Peace Party (WILPF) in 1919. In 1931, Addams became the first American woman to receive the Nobel Peace Prize.

from The Subtle Problem of Charity

In "The Subtle Problem of Charity," published in the Atlantic Monthly in 1899, Addams discusses the ethics of philanthrophy in a democracy that, she believed, places too high a premium on economic success. In this excerpt, she focuses on the development of mutual understanding between those in a position to provide assistance and those in need of it.

Probably there is no relation in life which our democracy is changing more rapidly than the charitable relation,—that relation which obtains between benefactor and beneficiary: at the same time, there is no point of contact in our modern experience which reveals more clearly the lack of that equality which democracy implies. We have reached the moment when democracy has made such inroads upon this relationship that the complacency of the old-fashioned charitable man is gone forever; while the very need and existence of charity deny us the consolation and freedom which democracy will at last give.

We find in ourselves the longing for a wider union than that of family or class, and we say that we have come to include all men in our hopes; but we fail to realize that all men are hoping, and are part of the same movement of which we are a part. Many of the difficulties in philanthropy come from an unconscious division of the world into the philanthropists and those to be helped. It is an assumption of two classes, and against this class assumption our democratic training revolts as soon as we begin to act upon it.

The trouble is that the ethics of none of us are clearly defined, and we are continually obliged to act in circles of habit based upon convictions which we no longer hold. Thus, our estimate of the effect of environment and social conditions has doubtless shifted faster than our methods of administering charity have changed. Formerly when it was believed that poverty was synonymous with vice and laziness, and that the prosperous man was the righteous man, charity was administered harshly with a good conscience; for the charitable agent really blamed the individual for his poverty, and the very fact of his own superior prosperity gave him a certain consciousness of superior morality. Since then we have learned to measure by other standards, and the money-earning capacity, while still rewarded out of all proportion to any other, is not respected as exclusively as it was; and its possession is by no means assumed to imply the possession of the highest moral qualities. We have learned to judge men in general by their social virtues as well as by their business capacity, by their devotion to intellectual and disinterested aims, and by their public spirit, and we naturally resent being obliged to judge certain individuals solely upon the industrial side for no other reason than that they are poor. Our democratic instinct constantly takes alarm at this consciousness of two standards.

Of the various struggles which a decade of residence in a settlement implies, none have made a more definite impression on my mind than the incredibly painful difficulties which involve both giver and recipient when one person asks charitable aid of another.

An attempt is made in this paper to show what are some of the perplexities which harass the mind of the charity worker; to trace them to ethical survivals which are held not only by the benefactor, but by the recipients of charity as well; and to suggest wherein these very perplexities may possibly be prophetic. . . . 5

The charity visitor, let us assume, is a young college woman, well-bred and open-minded. When she visits the family assigned to her, she is embarrassed to find herself obliged to lay all the stress of her teaching and advice upon the industrial virtues, and to treat the members of the family almost exclusively as factors in the industrial system. She insists that they must work and be self-supporting; that the most dangerous of all situations is idleness; that seeking one's own pleasure, while ignoring claims and responsibilities, is the most ignoble of actions. The members of her assigned family may have charms and virtues, — they may possibly be kind and affectionate and considerate of one another, generous to their friends; but it is her business to stick to the industrial side. As she daily holds up these standards, it often occurs to the mind of the sensitive visitor, whose conscience has been made tender by much talk of brotherhood and equality which she has heard at college, that she has no right to say these things; that she herself has never been self-supporting; that, whatever her virtues may be, they are not the industrial virtues; that her untrained hands are no more fitted to cope with actual conditions than are those of her broken-down family. . . .

Added to this is a consciousness in the mind of the visitor of a genuine misunderstanding of her motives by the recipients of her charity and by their neighbors. Let us take a neighborhood of poor people, and test their ethical standards by those of the charity visitor, who comes with the best desire in the world to help them out of their distresses. A most striking incongruity, at once apparent, is the difference between the emotional kindness with which relief is given by one poor neighbor to another poor neighbor, and the guarded care with which relief is given by a charity visitor to a charity recipient. The neighborhood mind is immediately confronted not only by the difference of method, but also by an absolute clashing of two ethical standards.

A very little familiarity with the poor districts of any city is sufficient to show how primitive and frontier-like are the neighborly relations. There is the greatest willingness to lend or borrow anything, and each resident of a given tenement house knows the most intimate family affairs of all the others. The fact that the economic condition of all alike is on a most precarious level makes the ready outflow of sympathy and material assistance the most natural thing in the world. There are numberless instances of heroic self-sacrifice quite unknown in the circles where greater economic advantages make that kind of intimate knowledge of one's neighbors impossible. . . .

The charity visitor may blame the women for lack of gentleness toward their children, for being hasty and rude to them, until she learns to reflect that the standard of breeding is not that of gentleness toward the children so much as the observance of certain conventions, such as the punctilious wearing of mourning garments after the death of a child. The standard of gentleness each mother has to work out largely by herself, assisted only by the occasional shamefaced remark of a neighbor, that "they do better when you are not too hard on them"; but the wearing of mourning garments is sustained by the definitely expressed sentiment of every woman in the street.

The mother would have to bear social blame, a certain social ostracism, if she failed to comply with that requirement. It is not comfortable to outrage the conventions of those among whom we live, and if our social life be a narrow one, it is still more difficult. The visitor may choke a little when she sees the lessened supply of food and the scanty clothing provided for the remaining children, in order that one may be conventionally mourned. But she does not talk so strongly against it as she would have done during her first month of experience with the family since bereaved.

The subject of clothes, indeed, perplexes the visitor constantly, and the result of her reflections may be summed up something in this wise: The girl who has a definite social standing, who has been to a fashionable school or to a college, whose family live in a house seen and known by all her friends and associates, can afford to be very simple or even shabby as to her clothes, if she likes. But the working girl, whose family lives in a tenement or moves from one small apartment to another, who has little social standing, and has to make her own place, knows full well how much habit and style of dress have to do with her position. Her income goes into her clothing out of all proportion to that which she spends upon other things. But if social advancement is her aim, it is the most sensible thing which she can do. She is judged largely by her clothes. . . . Have we worked out our democracy in regard to clothes farther than in regard to anything else? 10

The charity visitor has been rightly brought up to consider it vulgar to spend much money upon clothes, to care so much for "appearances." . . . The poor naturally try to bridge the [class] difference[s] by reproducing the street clothes which they have seen; they therefore imitate, sometimes in more showy and often in more trying colors, in cheap and flimsy material, in poor shoes and flippant hats, the extreme fashion of the well-to-do. They are striving to conform to a common standard which their democratic training presupposes belongs to us all. The charity visitor may regret that the Italian peasant woman has laid aside her picturesque kerchief, and substituted a cheap street hat. But it is easy to recognize the first attempt toward democratic expression. . . .

A certain charity visitor is peculiarly appealed to by the weakness and pathos of forlorn old age. She is responsible for the well-being of perhaps a dozen old women, to whom she sustains a sincere and simple and almost filial relation. Some of them learn to take her benefactions quite as if they came from their own relatives, grumbling at all she does, and scolding her with a family freedom. One of these poor old women was injured in a fire years ago. She has but the fragment of a hand left, and is grievously crippled in her feet. Through years of pain she had become addicted to opium, and when she first came under the residents' care was held from the poorhouse only by the awful thought that she would there perish without her drug. Five years of tender care have done wonders for her. She lives in two neat little rooms, where with a thumb and two fingers she makes innumerable quilts, which she sells and gives away with the greatest delight. Her opium is regulated to a set amount taken each day, and she has been drawn away from much drinking. She is a voracious reader, and has her head full of strange tales made up from books and her own imagination. . . . Her neighbors are constantly shocked by the fact that she is supported and comforted by "a charity lady," while at the same time she occasionally "rushes the growler," scolding at the boys lest they jar her in her tottering walk. The care of her has broken through even that second standard, which the neighborhood had learned to recognize as the standard of charitable societies, that only the "worthy poor" are to be helped. . . . In order to disarm them, and at the same time to explain what would otherwise seem loving-kindness so colossal as to be abnormal, she tells them that during her sojourn in the suburb she discovered an awful family secret, a horrible scandal connected with the long-suffering charity visitor; that it is in order to prevent the divulgence of this that the ministrations are continued. Some of her perplexed neighbors accept this explanation as simple and offering a solution of a vexed problem. . . .

Of what use is all this striving and perplexity? Has the experience any value? It is obviously genuine, for it induces an occasional charity visitor to live in a tenement house as simply as the other tenants do. It drives others to give up visiting the poor altogether, because, they claim, the situation is untenable. . . . [T]he young charity visitor who goes from a family living upon a most precarious industrial level to her own home in a prosperous part of the city, if she is sensitive at all, is never free from perplexities which our growing democracy forces upon her.

For most of the years during a decade of residence in a settlement, my mind was sore and depressed over the difficulties of the charitable relationship. The incessant clashing of ethical standards, which had been honestly gained from widely varying industrial experience, — the misunderstandings inevitable between people whose conventions and mode of life had been so totally unlike, — made it seem reasonable to say that nothing could be done until industrial conditions were made absolutely democratic. The position of a settlement, which attempts at one and the same time to declare its belief in this eventual, industrial democracy, and to labor toward that end, to maintain a standard of living, and to deal humanely and simply with those in actual want, often seems utterly untenable and preposterous. Recently, however, there has come to my mind the suggestion of a principle, that while the painful condition of administering charity is the inevitable discomfort of a transition into a more democratic relation, the perplexing experiences of the actual administration have a genuine value of their own. . . .

The Hebrew prophet made three requirements from those who would join the great forward-moving procession led by Jehovah. "To love mercy," and at the same time "to do justly," is the difficult task. To fulfill the first requirement alone is to fall into the error of indiscriminate giving, with all its disastrous results; to fulfill the second exclusively is to obtain the stern policy of withholding, and it results in such a dreary lack of sympathy and understanding that the establishment of justice is impossible. It may be that the combination of the two can never be attained save as we fulfill still the third requirement, "to walk humbly with God," which may mean to walk for many dreary miles beside the lowliest of his creatures, not even in peace of mind, that the companionship of the humble is popularly supposed to give, but rather with the pangs and misgivings to which the poor human understanding is subjected whenever it attempts to comprehend the meaning of life. 15

(1899)

Exploring the Text

1. What occasioned this article, according to Jane Addams's explanation in the opening paragraphs?
2. What are the "difficulties in philanthropy" (par. 2) and the "incessant clashing of ethical standards" (par. 14) on which Addams focuses? Discuss how she reveals these complexities in at least one of the examples she provides.
3. Where in the text does Addams speak primarily as a scientific observer of social conditions? Where does she speak more as a passionate advocate of social reform? Do you think these voices complement or undercut each another? Cite specific text to support your responses.
4. How would you describe the ethos Addams establishes? Pay particular attention to how she presents (or avoids presenting) her own privileged background as the daughter of a wealthy family.
5. How does Addams manage to question the values of an increasingly market-driven and competitive society without criticizing American values? Or does she?
6. Identify passages or specific language choices in this essay that may have sounded condescending to Addams's audience or that you find patronizing or condescending from a contemporary perspective. In what ways is she trying to avoid ethical absolutes in her discussion of the poor, especially when referring to immigrants? Does she succeed?
7. Addams frames her discussion of the "problems of charity" in two traditions: democracy and Christianity. What purpose(s) does she achieve by threading the discussion of democracy throughout the essay but referring to Christian texts only at the end? Keep her audience in mind as you consider this question.
8. Have we solved what Addams saw as the "clashing" of ethics and morality in the relationship between benefactor and beneficiary? What tone do we attach to the word "charity" today? Is the belief that wealthy people should also be philanthropists more or less a part of our current expectations than it was a century ago? Discuss your view on these issues, using examples from contemporary life.

Katharine Lee Bates

Katharine Lee Bates (1859–1929) was an American poet and songwriter born in Falmouth, Massachusetts. After graduating from Wellesley College in 1880, she remained at her alma mater for many years as a professor of English literature. During her lifetime, Bates became known for her poetry, travel books, and children's books, and she was a regular contributor to various periodicals, including the Atlantic Monthly, the Congregationalist, the Boston Evening Transcript, and the Christian Century. Her poem "Goody Santa Claus on a Sleigh Ride," which she published in 1889, is said to have first popularized Mrs. Claus.

America the Beautiful

Bates was inspired to write the original version of this poem after seeing Pikes Peak in the summer of 1893, during a teaching stint in Colorado Springs. Bates described her experience thus: "One day some of the other teachers and I decided to go on a trip to 14,000-foot Pikes Peak. We hired a prairie wagon. Near the top we had to leave the wagon and go the rest of the way on mules. I was very tired. But when I saw the view, I felt great joy. All the wonder of America seemed displayed there, with the sea-like expanse."

The poem went through several revisions after its original publication on July 4, 1895, in the weekly journal called the Congregationalist. It appeared in the Boston Evening Transcript on November 19, 1904, and in her book America the Beautiful and Other Poems (1912). The version below is from that collection.

O beautiful for spacious skies,
For amber waves of grain,
For purple mountain majesties
Above the fruited plain!
America! America!
God shed His grace on thee
And crown thy good with brotherhood
From sea to shining sea!

O beautiful for pilgrim feet,
Whose stern, impassioned stress
A thoroughfare for freedom beat
Across the wilderness!
America! America!
God mend thine every flaw,
Confirm thy soul in self-control,
Thy liberty in law!

O beautiful for heroes proved
In liberating strife,
Who more than self their country loved,
And mercy more than life!
America! America!
May God thy gold refine,
Till all success be nobleness,
And every gain divine!

O beautiful for patriot dream
That sees beyond the years
Thine alabaster cities gleam

Undimmed by human tears!
America! America!
God shed His grace on thee
And crown thy good with brotherhood
From sea to shining sea!

(1912)

Exploring the Text

1. What element(s) of America does Katharine Lee Bates celebrate in this poem? What are the primary sources of her inspiration?
2. What is Bates calling for in the lines that read, "God mend thine every flaw, / Confirm thy soul in self-control, / Thy liberty in law!" (ll. 14–16)?
3. How do you interpret the following lines: "May God thy gold refine, / Till all success be nobleness, / And every gain divine!" (ll. 22–25)?
4. What phrases or images from the poem have become part of the national idiom, often quoted even by those who may not know their source as being this poem? Why do you think a specific phrase or image is particularly memorable or appealing?
5. Following is the original version of the poem, entitled "America." What changes do you note between this version and the revised poem that appeared in Bates's collection of poetry? What are the effects of these changes?

America. A Poem for July 4.
O beautiful for halcyon skies,
For amber waves of grain,
For purple mountain majesties
Above the enameled plain!
America! America!
God shed His grace on thee,
Till souls wax fair as earth and air
And music-hearted sea!

O beautiful for pilgrim feet
Whose stern, impassioned stress
A thoroughfare for freedom beat
Across the wilderness!
America! America!
God shed His grace on thee
Till paths be wrought through wilds of thought
By pilgrim foot and knee!

O beautiful for glory-tale
Of liberating strife,

When once or twice, for man's avail,
Men lavished precious life!
America! America!
God shed His grace on thee
Till selfish gain no longer stain,
The banner of the free!

O beautiful for patriot dream
That sees beyond the years
Thine alabaster cities gleam
Undimmed by human tears!
America! America!
God shed His grace on thee
Till nobler men keep once again
Thy whiter jubilee!

6. Many have championed and continue to champion "America the Beautiful" to be designated as a national anthem; some even argue that it should replace "The Star-Spangled Banner," which was named the official national anthem by congressional resolution in 1931. Lynn Sherr, author of America the Beautiful: The Stirring True Story behind Our Nation's Favorite Song (2001), supports that position: "I think it's simple, I think it's emotional, and I think it talks about a country, a land and its people — not just about a flag, not just about a battle. It doesn't talk about conquest. It talks about the possibilities of this nation." What is your view? You might research some of the arguments offered over the past century, including current efforts on behalf of "America the Beautiful."
7. Research different recordings of "America the Beautiful" and discuss artists' interpretations of it. Ray Charles and Buffy St. Marie are two artists whose renditions are very popular.

Zitkala-Ša

Zitkala-Ša (1876–1938), also known as Gertrude Simmons Bonnin, was a Native American writer, musician, and political activist. Born on a Sioux reservation in South Dakota and educated by Quaker missionaries in Indiana, she spent her life torn between her Sioux heritage and the dominant white culture of the time. Zitkala-Ša was awarded her first diploma from the Quaker school in 1895, and in the same year she won a scholarship to attend Earlham College in Richmond, Indiana, where she became known for her oratory talents. She moved to Boston, Massachusetts, where she played violin with the New England Conservatory of Music from 1897 to 1899. For the rest of her career, Zitkala-Ša taught English and music at various schools and became a prolific writer. Her works brought traditional Native American stories to a widespread readership, and she published several works that chronicled her struggles to reconcile her Native American culture with mainstream American culture. An avid lobbyist and supporter of Native American rights, she founded the National Council of American Indians in 1926 to advocate for Native Americans to gain American citizenship.

from The School Days of an Indian Girl

Zitkala-Ša published her autobiographical articles in the Atlantic Monthly between 1900 and 1902. Following are three sections, entitled "The Big Red Apples," "The Land of Red Apples," and "The Cutting of My Long Hair."

The Big Red Apples

The first turning away from the easy, natural flow of my life occurred in an early spring. It was in my eighth year; in the month of March, I afterward learned. At this age I knew but one language, and that was my mother's native tongue.

From some of my playmates I heard that two paleface missionaries were in our village. They were from that class of white men who wore big hats and carried large hearts, they said. Running direct to my mother, I began to question her why these two strangers were among us. She told me, after I had teased much, that they had come to take away Indian boys and girls to the East. My mother did not seem to want me to talk about them. But in a day or two, I gleaned many wonderful stories from my playfellows concerning the strangers.

"Mother, my friend Judéwin is going home with the missionaries. She is going to a more beautiful country than ours; the palefaces told her so!" I said wistfully, wishing in my heart that I too might go.

Mother sat in a chair, and I was hanging on her knee. Within the last two seasons my big brother Dawée had returned from a three years' education in the East, and his coming back influenced my mother to take a farther step from her native way of living. First it was a change from the buffalo skin to the white man's canvas that covered our wigwam. Now she had given up her wigwam of slender poles, to live, a foreigner, in a home of clumsy logs.

"Yes, my child, several others besides Judéwin are going away with the palefaces. 5
Your brother said the missionaries had inquired about his little sister," she said, watching my face very closely.

My heart thumped so hard against my breast, I wondered if she could hear it.

"Did he tell them to take me, mother?" I asked, fearing lest Dawée had forbidden the palefaces to see me, and that my hope of going to the Wonderland would be entirely blighted.

With a sad, slow smile, she answered: "There! I knew you were wishing to go, because Judéwin has filled your ears with the white man's lies. Don't believe a word they say! Their words are sweet, but, my child, their deeds are bitter. You will cry for me, but they will not even soothe you. Stay with me, my little one! Your brother Dawée says that going East, away from your mother, is too hard an experience for his baby sister."

Thus my mother discouraged my curiosity about the lands beyond our eastern horizon; for it was not yet an ambition for Letters that was stirring me. But on the following day the missionaries did come to our very house. I spied them coming up the footpath leading to our cottage. A third man was with them, but he was not my brother Dawée. It was another, a young interpreter, a paleface who had a smattering of the Indian language. I was ready to run out to meet them, but I did not dare to displease my mother. With great glee, I jumped up and down on our ground floor. I begged my mother to open the door, that they would be sure to come to us. Alas! They came, they saw, and they conquered!

Judéwin had told me of the great tree where grew red, red apples; and how we could reach out our hands and pick all the red apples we could eat. I had never seen apple trees. I had never tasted more than a dozen red apples in my life; and when I heard of the orchards of the East, I was eager to roam among them. The missionaries smiled into my eyes and patted my head. I wondered how mother could say such hard words against him.

"Mother, ask them if little girls may have all the red apples they want, when they go East," I whispered aloud, in my excitement.

The interpreter heard me, and answered: "Yes, little girl, the nice red apples are for those who pick them; and you will have a ride on the iron horse if you go with these good people."

I had never seen a train, and he knew it.

"Mother, I am going East! I like big red apples, and I want to ride on the iron horse! Mother, say yes!" I pleaded.

My mother said nothing. The missionaries waited in silence; and my eyes began to blur with tears, though I struggled to choke them back. The corners of my mouth twitched, and my mother saw me.

"I am not ready to give you any word," she said to them. "Tomorrow I shall send you my answer by my son."

With this they left us. Alone with my mother, I yielded to my tears, and cried aloud, shaking my head so as not to hear what she was saying to me. This was the first time I had ever been so unwilling to give up my own desire that I refused to hearken to my mother's voice.

There was a solemn silence in our home that night. Before I went to bed I begged the Great Spirit to make my mother willing I should go with the missionaries.

The next morning came, and my mother called me to her side. "My daughter, do you still persist in wishing to leave your mother?" she asked.

"Oh, mother, it is not that I wish to leave you, but I want to see the wonderful Eastern land," I answered.

My dear old aunt came to our house that morning, and I heard her say, "Let her try it."

I hoped that, as usual, my aunt was pleading on my side. My brother Dawée came for mother's decision. I dropped my play, and crept close to my aunt.

"Yes, Dawée, my daughter, though she does not understand what it all means, is anxious to go. She will need an education when she is grown, for then there will be fewer real Dakotas, and many more palefaces. This tearing her away, so young, from her mother is necessary, if I would have her an educated woman. The palefaces, who owe us a large debt for stolen lands, have begun to pay a tardy justice in offering some education to our children. But I know my daughter must suffer keenly in this experiment. For her sake, I dread to tell you my reply to the missionaries. Go, tell them that they may take my little daughter, and that the Great Spirit shall not fail to reward them according to their hearts."

Wrapped in my heavy blanket, I walked with my mother to the carriage that was soon to take us to the iron horse. I was happy. I met my playmates, who were also wearing their best thick blankets. We showed one another our new beaded moccasins, and the width of the belts that girdled our new dresses. Soon we were being drawn rapidly away by the white man's horses. When I saw the lonely figure of my mother vanish in the distance, a sense of regret settled heavily upon me. I felt suddenly weak, as if I might fall limp to the ground. I was in the hands of strangers whom my mother did not fully trust. I no longer felt free to be myself, or to voice my own feelings. The tears trickled down my cheeks, and I buried my face in the folds of my blanket. Now the first step, parting me from my mother, was taken, and all my belated tears availed nothing.

Having driven thirty miles to the ferryboat, we crossed the Missouri in the evening. Then riding again a few miles eastward, we stopped before a massive brick building. I looked at it in amazement, and with a vague misgiving, for in our village I had never seen so large a house. Trembling with fear and distrust of the palefaces, my teeth chattering from the chilly ride, I crept noiselessly in my soft moccasins along the narrow hall, keeping very close to the bare wall. I was as frightened and bewildered as the captured young of a wild creature. 25

The Land of Red Apples

There were eight in our party of bronzed children who were going East with the missionaries. Among us were three young braves, two tall girls, and we three little ones, Judéwin, Thowin, and I.

We had been very impatient to start on our journey to the Red Apple Country, which, we were told, lay a little beyond the great circular horizon of the Western prairie. Under a sky of rosy apples we dreamt of roaming as freely and happily as we had chased the cloud shadows on the Dakota plains. We had anticipated much pleasure from a ride on the iron horse, but the throngs of staring palefaces disturbed and troubled us.

On the train, fair women, with tottering babies on each arm, stopped their haste and scrutinized the children of absent mothers. Large men, with heavy bundles in their hands, halted near by, and riveted their glassy blue eyes upon us.

I sank deep into the corner of my seat, for I resented being watched. Directly in front of me, children who were no larger than I hung themselves upon the backs of their seats, with their bold white faces toward me. Sometimes they took their forefingers out of their mouths and pointed at my moccasined feet. Their mothers, instead of reproving such rude curiosity, looked closely at me, and attracted their children's further notice to my blanket. This embarrassed me, and kept me constantly on the verge of tears.

I sat perfectly still, with my eyes downcast, daring only now and then to shoot long glances around me. Chancing to turn to the window at my side, I was quite breathless upon seeing one familiar object. It was the telegraph pole which strode by at short paces. Very near my mother's dwelling, along the edge of a road thickly bordered with wild sunflowers, some poles like these had been planted by white men. Often I had stopped, on my way down the road, to hold my ear against the pole, and, hearing its low moaning, I used to wonder what the paleface had done to hurt it. Now I sat watching for each pole that glided by to be the last one.

In this way I had forgotten my uncomfortable surroundings, when I heard one of my comrades call out my name. I saw the missionary standing very near, tossing candies and gums into our midst. This amused us all, and we tried to see who could catch the most of the sweetmeats.

Though we rode several days inside of the iron horse, I do not recall a single thing about our luncheons.

It was night when we reached the school grounds. The lights from the windows of the large buildings fell upon some of the icicled trees that stood beneath them. We were led toward an open door, where the brightness of the lights within flooded out over the heads of the excited palefaces who blocked our way. My body trembled more from fear than from the snow I trod upon.

Entering the house, I stood close against the wall. The strong glaring light in the large whitewashed room dazzled my eyes. The noisy hurrying of hard shoes upon a bare wooden floor increased the whirring in my ears. My only safety seemed to be in keeping next to the wall. As I was wondering in which direction to escape from all this confusion, two warm hands grasped me firmly, and in the same moment I was tossed high in mid-air. A rosy-cheeked paleface woman caught me in her arms. I was both frightened and insulted by such trifling. I stared into her eyes, wishing her to let me stand on my own feet, but she jumped me up and down with increasing enthusiasm. My mother had never made a plaything of her wee daughter. Remembering this I began to cry aloud.

They misunderstood the cause of my tears, and placed me at a white table loaded with food. There our party were united again. As I did not hush my crying, one of the older ones whispered to me, "Wait until you are alone in the night."

It was very little I could swallow besides my sobs, that evening.

"Oh, I want my mother and my brother Dawée! I want to go to my aunt!" I pleaded; but the ears of the palefaces could not hear me.

From the table we were taken along an upward incline of wooden boxes, which I learned afterward to call a stairway. At the top was a quiet hall, dimly lighted. Many narrow beds were in one straight line down the entire length of the wall. In them lay sleeping brown faces, which peeped just out of the coverings. I was tucked into bed with one of the tall girls, because she talked to me in my mother tongue and seemed to soothe me.

I had arrived in the wonderful land of rosy skies, but I was not happy, as I had thought I should be. My long travel and the bewildering sights had exhausted me. I fell asleep, heaving deep, tired sobs. My tears were left to dry themselves in streaks, because neither my aunt nor my mother was near to wipe them away.

The Cutting of My Long Hair

The first day in the land of apples was a bitter-cold one; for the snow still covered the ground, and the trees were bare. A large bell rang for breakfast, its loud metallic voice crashing through the belfry overhead and into our sensitive ears. The annoying clatter of shoes on bare floors gave us no peace. The constant clash of harsh noises, with an undercurrent of many voices murmuring an unknown tongue, made a bedlam within which I was securely tied. And though my spirit tore itself in struggling for its lost freedom, all was useless. 40

A paleface woman, with white hair, came up after us. We were placed in a line of girls who were marching into the dining room. These were Indian girls, in stiff shoes and closely clinging dresses. The small girls wore sleeved aprons and shingled hair. As I walked noiselessly in my soft moccasins, I felt like sinking to the floor, for my blanket had been stripped from my shoulders. I looked hard at the Indian girls, who seemed not to care that they were even more immodestly dressed than I, in their tightly fitting clothes. While we marched in, the boys entered at an opposite door. I watched for the three young braves who came in our party. I spied them in the rear ranks, looking as uncomfortable as I felt.

A small bell was tapped, and each of the pupils drew a chair from under the table. Supposing this act meant they were to be seated, I pulled out mine and at once slipped into it from one side. But when I turned my head, I saw that I was the only one seated, and all the rest at our table remained standing. Just as I began to rise, looking shyly around to see how chairs were to be used, a second bell was sounded. All were seated at last, and I had to crawl back into my chair again. I heard a man's voice at one end of the hall, and I looked around to see him. But all the others hung their heads over their plates. As I glanced at the long chain of tables, I caught the eyes of a paleface woman upon me. Immediately I dropped my eyes, wondering why I was so keenly watched by the strange woman. The man ceased his mutterings, and then a third bell was tapped. Every one picked up his knife and fork and began eating. I began crying instead, for by this time I was afraid to venture anything more.

But this eating by formula was not the hardest trial in that first day. Late in the morning, my friend Judéwin gave me a terrible warning. Judéwin knew a few words of English; and she had overheard the paleface woman talk about cutting our long, heavy hair. Our mothers had taught us that only unskilled warriors who were captured had their hair shingled by the enemy. Among our people, short hair was worn by mourners, and shingled hair by cowards!

We discussed our fate some moments, and when Judéwin said, "We have to submit, because they are strong," I rebelled.

"No, I will not submit! I will struggle first!" I answered. 45

I watched my chance, and when no one noticed I disappeared. I crept up the stairs as quietly as I could in my squeaking shoes, — my moccasins had been exchanged for shoes. Along the hall I passed, without knowing whither I was going. Turning aside to an open door, I found a large room with three white beds in it. The windows were covered with dark green curtains, which made the room very dim. Thankful that no one was there, I directed my steps toward the corner farthest from the door. On my hands and knees I crawled under the bed, and cuddled myself in the dark corner.

From my hiding place I peered out, shuddering with fear whenever I heard footsteps near by. Though in the hall loud voices were calling my name, and I knew that even Judéwin was searching for me, I did not open my mouth to answer. Then the steps were quickened and the voices became excited. The sounds came nearer and nearer. Women and girls entered the room. I held my breath and watched them open closet doors and peep behind large trunks. Some one threw up the curtains, and the room was filled with sudden light. What caused them to stoop and look under the bed I do not know. I remember being dragged out, though I resisted by kicking and scratching wildly. In spite of myself, I was carried downstairs and tied fast in a chair.

I cried aloud, shaking my head all the while until I felt the cold blades of the scissors against my neck, and heard them gnaw off one of my thick braids. Then I lost my spirit. Since the day I was taken from my mother I had suffered extreme indignities. People had stared at me. I had been tossed about in the air like a wooden puppet. And now my long hair was shingled like a coward's! In my anguish I moaned for my mother, but no one came to comfort me. Not a soul reasoned quietly with me, as my own mother used to do; for now I was only one of many little animals driven by a herder.

(1900)

Exploring the Text

1. In the opening section, "The Big Red Apples," Zitkala-Ša acknowledges that "it was not yet an ambition for Letters that was stirring me" (par. 9). What, then, does motivate her desire to leave her mother and familiar circumstances to travel east with the missionaries?
2. Why does her mother oppose her daughter's wish to leave? At what point does the narrator realize that her mother's fears are coming true?
3. In "The Land of Red Apples," what happens that causes Zitkala-Ša to doubt her decision?
4. Having her hair cut was the most dramatic of the "extreme indignities" (par. 48) that the narrator describes, but what other measures are taken by the missionaries to distance her (and her peers) from her native culture?
5. What role does language play in the experience of young Zitkala-Ša? In what instances does she show that she is most aware of the importance of her own language?
6. Throughout these autobiographical pieces, Zitkala-Ša takes readers to the immediacy of her childhood experiences, yet these are filtered through her adult consciousness. In the opening section, for instance, discussing the missionaries she says, "Alas! They came, they saw, and they conquered!" (par. 9). What other examples of the adult "interpreter" do you find?
7. The author began her life with the given name Gertrude Simmons, reflecting the influence of her European American father, her mother's second husband, who abandoned the family soon after the birth of his daughter. She took the Lakota name Zitkala-Ša, which means Red Bird, when she began to write around 1900. After her marriage to Raymond Bonnin, she used Gertrude Simmons Bonnin as her legal name and in her dealings with the Bureau of Indian Affairs; that is the name on her grave in Arlington National Cemetery. Today, some books identify her as Gertrude Bonnin, others as Zitkala-Ša. Which name do you believe is the more appropriate primary designation for her?

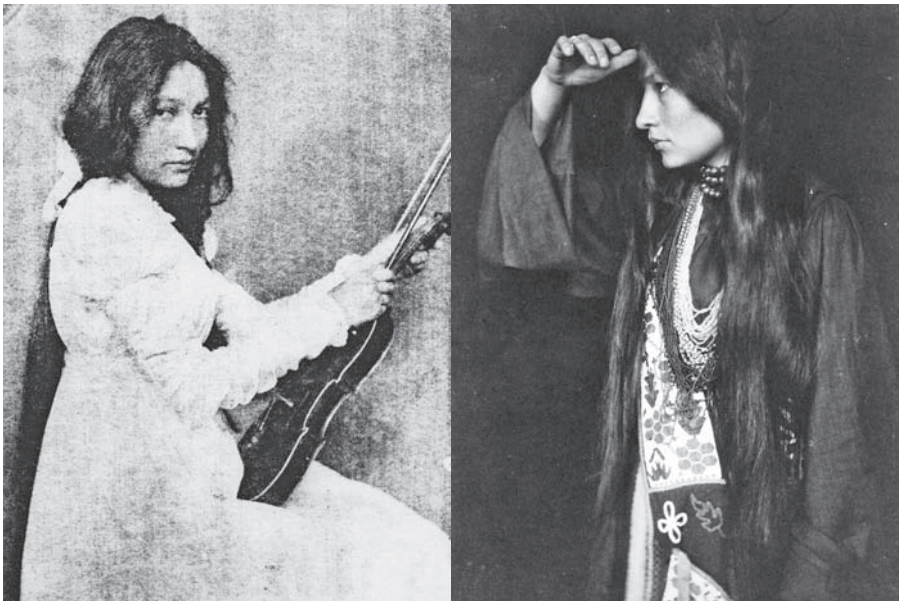
8. In her book Tender Violence: Domestic Visions in an Age of U.S. Imperialism (2000), scholar Laura Wexler characterizes the assimilationist education efforts of seemingly well-intentioned missionaries as "tender violence." Using Zitkala-Ša's autobiographical writings as a source, to what extent do you think that term captures the experience?
9. Below are two portraits of Zitkala-Ša, both taken in 1898, by the American photographer Gertrude Käsebier (1852–1934). The women became friends, and Käsebier is said to have encouraged her to select what she wanted to wear and how she wanted to pose in the portraits. How do each of these images depict Zitkala-Ša's multiple identities? What representations of both her Native American and European American cultures do you note? Does she seem to privilege one over the other or embody a blended balance? Cite specifics in the photographs to support your response, including her expression and the material objects within each image.



Gertrude Kasebier Collection, Division of Culture & the Arts, National Museum of American History, Smithsonian Institution

James Weldon Johnson

Born in Jacksonville, Florida, James Weldon Johnson (1871–1938) graduated from Atlanta University in 1894. In 1897, he passed the Florida bar exam, and for the next forty years, he served in various public capacities as an educator, a diplomat, a civil rights activist, and a writer. In the early 1900s, President Theodore Roosevelt appointed him United States consul to Venezuela and Nicaragua, and from 1916 to 1929, he served as executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing

Johnson wrote the following poem during his tenure as principal of the segregated Stanton School in Jacksonville, Florida, and it was first performed in 1900 as part of a celebration of Lincoln's birthday. A year later, his brother, Rosamond, set it to music. It gained enormous popularity and became known as the "Negro National Anthem."

Lift ev'ry voice and sing,
Till earth and heaven ring,
Ring with the harmonies of Liberty;
Let our rejoicing rise
High as the list'ning skies,
Let it resound loud as the rolling sea.
Sing a song full of the faith that the dark past has taught us,
Sing a song full of the hope that the present has brought us;
Facing the rising sun of our new day begun,
Let us march on till victory is won.

Stony the road we trod,
Bitter the chast'ning rod.
Felt in the days when hope unborn had died;
Yet with a steady beat,
Have not our weary feet
Come to the place for which our fathers sighed?
We have come over a way that with tears has been watered,
We have come, treading our path through the blood of the slaughtered,
Out from the gloomy past,
Till now we stand at last
Where the white gleam of our bright star is cast.

God of our weary years,
God of our silent tears,
Thou who hast brought us thus far on the way;
Thou who hast by Thy might,
Led us into the light,
Keep us forever in the path, we pray.

Lest our feet stray from the places, our God, where we met Thee,
Lest our hearts, drunk with the wine of the world, we forget Thee;
Shadowed beneath Thy hand,
May we forever stand,
True to our God,
True to our native land.

(1900)

Exploring the Text

1. Without referencing actual events, the poem alludes to the history of African Americans. What particulars of that historical experience might be linked to specific lines in the poem?
2. The poem is filled with tensions and dualities. Cite at least two and explain how they are developed. Do they resolve themselves into a balance, or does one triumph?
3. How would you describe the tone of the poem? Consider the final three lines in your explanation.
4. Listen to a recording or performance of "Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing." How does the music match your understanding of the poem, or does it change it? Explain with reference to specific lines or passages.
5. In Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing: A Celebration of the Negro National Anthem (2000), editors Julian Bond and Sondra Kathryn Wilson distinguish between an anthem and a "hymn":

> As a college student, Johnson had realized the glaring contradictions between white America's actions and the true aims of the United States Constitution. He believed that the Constitution meant exactly what it said, and it was his inexorable faith in the founding principles of America that inspired him to write "Lift Every Voice and Sing" not as an anthem but as a hymn. He did not conceive the song as an anthem, and at no time did he refer to it in that manner. By the 1920s the song was being pasted inside the back covers of hymnal books across the South and in many parts of the North. It is likely that around this time the "anthem" label evolved through folklore, thus sealing the song's permanent status among African Americans as their "Negro National Anthem."
>
> James Weldon Johnson was the chief executive officer of the NAACP during the 1920s, when the organization made "Lift Every Voice and Sing" its "official song." Because of his strong belief that "a nation can have but one anthem" and the NAACP's fundamental ideology of integration, labeling the song an "anthem" would have been antithetical to the organization's central objective. Johnson's main task as NAACP leader was to legally abolish the fiendish acts of lynchings that were increasingly occurring; he called for the saving of black America's bodies and white America's souls. He certainly understood that when the wide-ranging forces of racism struck, his people needed something to fall back on. And it was clear to him that African Americans made the song what they needed it to be — their anthem of hope and prayer.

After looking up the definition of the terms, explain Bond and Wilson's reasoning and why you believe that "Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing" is best characterized as an anthem or as a hymn.

6. In 2008, jazz singer Rene Martin was invited to perform the national anthem at a city event in Denver, Colorado. She sang the lyrics to "Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing" to the music of "The Star Spangled Banner." As a member of the listening audience, how would you have responded?

W. E. B. DuBois

Intellectual, philosopher, political activist, scholar, and writer W. E. B. DuBois (1868–1963) was born in Great Barrington, Massachusetts, and educated at Fisk University, Harvard University (where he earned his PhD in history in 1895), and the University of Berlin. Although during the early part of his career, he agreed with Booker T. Washington (p. 891) on issues of racial solidarity and economic autonomy, by the turn of the century DuBois had become more militant, criticizing Washington's commitment to vocational education as an accommodationist approach to change. In his seminal work, The Souls of Black Folk (1903), DuBois denounced Washington's approach to racial equality (in "Of Mr. Booker T. Washington and Others") and argued in "Of the Training of Black Men" for a cadre of liberally educated leadership. DuBois was influential as a writer as well as a founding member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and editor of the Crisis, the official publication of the group. He spent his long life in efforts to solve what he called "the problem of the twentieth century" — "the color line."

The Talented Tenth

The following excerpt is from "The Talented Tenth," an essay published in The Negro Problem (1903), an anthology of writings by African American scholars.

The Negro race, like all races, is going to be saved by its exceptional men. The problem of education, then, among Negroes must first of all deal with the Talented Tenth; it is the problem of developing the Best of this race that they may guide the mass away from the contamination and death of the Worst, in their own and other races. Now the training of men is a difficult and intricate task. Its technique is a matter for educational experts, but its object is for the vision of seers. If we make money the object of man-training, we shall develop money-makers but not necessarily men; if we make technical skill the object of education, we may possess artisans but not, in nature, men. Men we shall have only as we make manhood the object of the work of the schools — intelligence, broad sympathy, knowledge of the world that was and is, and of the relation of men to it — this is the curriculum of that Higher Education which must underlie true life. On this foundation we may build bread winning, skill of hand and quickness of brain, with never a fear lest the child and man mistake the means of living for the object of life.

If this be true — and who can deny it — three tasks lay before me; first to show from the past that the Talented Tenth as they have risen among American Negroes have been worthy of leadership; secondly, to show how these men may be educated and developed; and thirdly, to show their relation to the Negro problem. . . .

From the very first it has been the educated and intelligent of the Negro people that have led and elevated the mass, and the sole obstacles that nullified and retarded their efforts were slavery and race prejudice. . . .

And so we come to the present — a day of cowardice and vacillation, of strident wide-voiced wrong and faint hearted compromise; of double-faced dallying with Truth and Right. Who are to-day guiding the work of the Negro people? The "exceptions" of course. And yet so sure as this Talented Tenth is pointed out, the blind worshippers of the Average cry out in alarm: "These are exceptions, look here at death, disease and crime — these are the happy rule." Of course they are the rule, because a silly nation made them the rule: Because for three long centuries this people lynched Negroes who dared to be brave, raped black women who dared to be virtuous, crushed dark-hued youth who dared to be ambitious, and encouraged and made to flourish servility and lewdness and apathy. But not even this was able to crush all manhood and chastity and aspiration from black folk. A saving remnant continually survives and persists, continually aspires, continually shows itself in thrift and ability and character. Exceptional it is to be sure, but this is its chiefest promise; it shows the capability of Negro blood, the promise of black men. Do Americans ever stop to reflect that there are in this land a million men of Negro blood, well-educated, owners of homes, against the honor of whose womanhood no breath was ever raised, whose men occupy positions of trust and usefulness, and who, judged by any standard, have reached the full measure of the best type of modern European culture? Is it fair, is it decent, is it Christian to ignore these facts of the Negro problem, to belittle such aspiration, to nullify such leadership and seek to crush these people back into the mass out of which by toil and travail, they and their fathers have raised themselves?

Can the masses of the Negro people be in any possible way more quickly raised than by the effort and example of this aristocracy of talent and character? Was there ever a nation on God's fair earth civilized from the bottom upward? Never; it is, ever was and ever will be from the top downward that culture filters. The Talented Tenth rises and pulls all that are worth the saving up to their vantage ground. This is the history of human progress. . . . 5

How then shall the leaders of a struggling people be trained and the hands of the risen few strengthened? There can be but one answer: The best and most capable of their youth must be schooled in the colleges and universities of the land. . . .

All men cannot go to college but some men must; every isolated group or nation must have its yeast, must have for the talented few centers of training where men are not so mystified and befuddled by the hard and necessary toil of earning a living, as to have no aims higher than their bellies, and no God greater than Gold. This is true training, and thus in the beginning were the favored sons of the freedmen trained. Out of the colleges of the North came, after the blood of war, Ware, Cravath, Chase, Andrews, Bumstead and Spence[1] to build the foundations of knowledge and civilization in the black South. Where ought they to have begun to build? At the bottom, of course, quibbles the mole with his eyes in the earth. Aye! truly at the bottom, at the very bottom; at the bottom of knowledge, down in the very depths of knowledge there where the roots of justice strike into the lowest soil of Truth. And so they did begin; they founded colleges, and up from the colleges shot normal schools, and out from the normal schools went teachers, and around the normal teachers clustered other teachers to teach the public schools; the college trained in Greek and Latin and mathematics, 2,000 men; and these men trained full 50,000 others in morals and manners, and they in turn taught thrift and the alphabet to nine millions of men, who to-day hold $300,000,000 of property. It was a miracle — the most wonderful peace-battle of the 19th century, and yet to-day men smile at it, and in fine superiority tell us that it was all a strange mistake; that a proper way to found a system of education is first to gather the children and buy them spelling books and hoes; afterward men may look about for teachers, if haply they may find them; or again they would teach men Work, but as for Life — why, what has Work to do with Life, they ask vacantly. . . .

The college-bred Negro . . . is, as he ought to be, the group leader, the man who sets the ideals of the community where he lives, directs its thoughts and heads its social movements. It need hardly be argued that the Negro people need social leadership more than most groups; that they have no traditions to fall back upon, no long established customs, no strong family ties, no well defined social classes. All these things must be slowly and painfully evolved. The preacher was, even before the war, the group leader of the Negroes, and the church their greatest social institution. Naturally this preacher was ignorant and often immoral, and the problem of replacing the older type by better educated men has been a difficult one. Both by direct work and by direct influence on other preachers, and on congregations, the college-bred preacher has an opportunity for reformatory work and moral inspiration, the value of which cannot be overestimated.

It has, however, been in the furnishing of teachers that the Negro college has found its peculiar function. Few persons realize how vast a work, how mighty a revolution has been thus accomplished. To furnish five millions and more of ignorant people with teachers of their own race and blood, in one generation, was not only a very difficult undertaking, but a very important one, in that, it placed before the eyes of almost every Negro child an attainable ideal. It brought the masses of the blacks in contact with modern civilization, made black men the leaders of their communities and trainers of the new generation. In this work college-bred Negroes were first teachers, and then teachers of teachers. And here it is that the broad culture of college work has been of peculiar value. Knowledge of life and its wider meaning, has been the point of the Negro's deepest ignorance, and the sending out of teachers whose training has not been simply for bread winning, but also for human culture, has been of inestimable value in the training of these men. . . .

[1]Founders and presidents of Historically Black Colleges and Universities. — Eds.

The main question, so far as the Southern Negro is concerned, is: What under the present circumstance, must a system of education do in order to raise the Negro as quickly as possible in the scale of civilization? The answer to this question seems to me clear: It must strengthen the Negro's character, increase his knowledge and teach him to earn a living. Now it goes without saying, that it is hard to do all these things simultaneously or suddenly, and that at the same time it will not do to give all the attention to one and neglect the others; we could give black boys trades, but that alone will not civilize a race of ex-slaves; we might simply increase their knowledge of the world, but this would not necessarily make them wish to use this knowledge honestly; we might seek to strengthen character and purpose, but to what end if this people have nothing to eat or to wear? . . . If then we start out to train an ignorant and unskilled people with a heritage of bad habits, our system of training must set before itself two great aims — the one dealing with knowledge and character, the other part seeking to give the child the technical knowledge necessary for him to earn a living under the present circumstances. These objects are accomplished in part by the opening of the common schools on the one, and of the industrial schools on the other. But only in part, for there must also be trained those who are to teach these schools — men and women of knowledge and culture and technical skill who understand modern civilization, and have the training and aptitude to impart it to the children under them. There must be teachers, and teachers of teachers, and to attempt to establish any sort of a system of common and industrial school training, without first (and I say first advisedly) without first providing for the higher training of the very best teachers, is simply throwing your money to the winds. . . . Nothing, in these latter days, has so dampened the faith of thinking Negroes in recent educational movements, as the fact that such movements have been accompanied by ridicule and denouncement and decrying of those very institutions of higher training which made the Negro public school possible, and make Negro industrial schools thinkable. . . . 10

I would not deny, or for a moment seem to deny, the paramount necessity of teaching the Negro to work, and to work steadily and skillfully; or seem to depreciate in the slightest degree the important part industrial schools must play in the accomplishment of these ends, but I do say, and insist upon it, that it is industrialism drunk with its vision of success, to imagine that its own work can be accomplished without providing for the training of broadly cultured men and women to teach its own teachers, and to teach the teachers of the public schools.

But I have already said that human education is not simply a matter of schools; it is much more a matter of family and group life — the training of one's home, of one's daily companions, of one's social class. Now the black boy of the South moves in a black world — a world with its own leaders, its own thoughts, its own ideals. In this world he gets by far the larger part of his life training, and through the eyes of this dark world he peers into the veiled world beyond. Who guides and determines the education which he receives in his world? His teachers here are the group-leaders of the Negro people — the physicians and clergymen, the trained fathers and mothers, the influential and forceful men about him of all kinds; here it is, if at all, that the culture of the surrounding world trickles through and is handed on by the graduates of the higher schools. Can such culture training of group leaders be neglected? Can we afford to ignore it? . . . You have no choice; either you must help furnish this race from within its own ranks with thoughtful men of trained leadership, or you must suffer the evil consequences of a headless misguided rabble.

I am an earnest advocate of manual training and trade teaching for black boys, and for white boys, too. I believe that next to the founding of Negro colleges the most valuable addition to Negro education since the war, has been industrial training for black boys. Nevertheless, I insist that the object of all true education is not to make men carpenters, it is to make carpenters men; there are two means of making the carpenter a man, each equally important: the first is to give the group and community in which he works, liberally trained teachers and leaders to teach him and his family what life means; the second is to give him sufficient intelligence and technical skill to make him an efficient workman; the first object demands the Negro college and college-bred men — not a quantity of such colleges, but a few of excellent quality; not too many college-bred men, but enough to leaven the lump, to inspire the masses, to raise the Talented Tenth to leadership; the second object demands a good system of common schools, well-taught, conveniently located and properly equipped. . . .

Further than this, after being provided with group leaders of civilization, and a foundation of intelligence in the public schools, the carpenter, in order to be a man, needs technical skill. This calls for trade schools. . . .

[M]odern industry has taken great strides since the war, and the teaching of 15 trades is no longer a simple matter. Machinery and long processes of work have greatly changed the work of the carpenter, the ironworker and the shoemaker. A really efficient workman must be to-day an intelligent man who has had good technical training in addition to thorough common school, and perhaps even higher training. . . .

Thus, again, in the manning of trade schools and manual training schools we are thrown back upon the higher training as its source and chief support. There was a time when any aged and wornout carpenter could teach in a trade school. But not so to-day. Indeed the demand for college-bred men by a school like Tuskegee, ought to make Mr. Booker T. Washington the firmest friend of higher training. Here he has as helpers the son of a Negro senator, trained in Greek and the humanities, and graduated at Harvard; the son of a Negro congressman and lawyer, trained in Latin and mathematics, and graduated at Oberlin; he has as his wife, a woman who read Virgil and Homer in the same class room with me; he has as college chaplain, a classical graduate of Atlanta University; as teacher of science, a graduate of Fisk; as teacher of history, a graduate of Smith, — indeed some thirty of his chief teachers are college graduates, and instead of studying French grammars in the midst of weeds, or buying pianos for dirty cabins, they are at Mr. Washington's right hand helping him in a noble work. And yet one of the effects of Mr. Washington's propaganda has been to throw doubt upon the expediency of such training for Negroes, as these persons have had.

Men of America, the problem is plain before you. Here is a race transplanted through the criminal foolishness of your fathers. Whether you like it or not the millions are here, and here they will remain. If you do not lift them up, they will pull you down. Education and work are the levers to uplift a people. Work alone will not do it unless inspired by the right ideals and guided by intelligence. Education must not simply teach work — it must teach Life. The Talented Tenth of the Negro race must be made leaders of thought and missionaries of culture among their people. No others can do this work and Negro colleges must train men for it. The Negro race, like all other races, is going to be saved by its exceptional men.

(1903)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the claim W. E. B. DuBois makes in the opening paragraph? What assumptions underlie this claim?
2. What does DuBois mean by "exceptional" (par. 1)? Is this term synonymous with the "aristocracy of talent and character" (par. 5) that DuBois describes?
3. In paragraph 7, DuBois lists a number of educators who came from Northern colleges "after the blood of war." What point is he making by the following rhetorical question and image: "Where ought they to have begun to build? At the bottom, of course, quibbles the mole with his eyes in the earth"?
4. What, according to DuBois, is the "peculiar function" of "the Negro college" (par. 9)?
5. To what extent does DuBois argue that education for "knowledge and character" is incompatible with "the technical knowledge necessary . . . to earn a living under the present circumstances" (par. 10)? Explain why you agree or disagree with this duality in 1903 or even now.
6. In the paragraph beginning, "I would not deny, or for a moment seem to deny, the paramount necessity of teaching the Negro to work" (par. 11), how does DuBois address the counterargument by concession and refutation? Where else in this essay does he address the arguments of Booker T. Washington and his followers?
7. DuBois warns that "either you must help furnish this race from within its own ranks with thoughtful men of trained leadership, or you must suffer the evil consequences of a headless misguided rabble" (par. 12). Is this statement a logical conclusion from support previously provided, or is it an either-or fallacy? Explain your response with references to the text.
8. How — specifically — does DuBois develop the figurative assertion that "the object of all true education is not to make men carpenters, it is to make carpenters men" (par. 13)?

9. Who is the intended audience DuBois addresses in this essay? Identify specific passages and use of language to support your response. How effective do you imagine he would have been at reaching this audience? Why?

Willa Cather

Willa Cather (1873–1947) was an American novelist best known for depictions of frontier life on the Great Plains. Raised in Nebraska, she graduated from the University of Nebraska in 1894 and moved to Pittsburgh two years later to write for a women's magazine called Home Monthly. She continued to write for various magazines and publications, and in 1906 she got a job at McClure's magazine in New York City, where her first novel, Alexander's Bridge, was published. She published three more novels — known as her Prairie Trilogy — between 1913 and 1918, and in 1922 she won the Pulitzer Prize for One of Ours, a World War I novel.

The Sculptor's Funeral

"The Sculptor's Funeral" (1905) was published in McClure's magazine early in her career. It explores many of the themes Cather would develop further in the following decades.

A group of the townspeople stood on the station siding of a little Kansas town, awaiting the coming of the night train, which was already twenty minutes overdue. The snow had fallen thick over everything; in the pale starlight the line of bluffs across the wide, white meadows south of the town made soft, smoke-colored curves against the clear sky. The men on the siding stood first on one foot and then on the other, their hands thrust deep into their trousers pockets, their overcoats open, their shoulders screwed up with the cold; and they glanced from time to time toward the southeast, where the railroad track wound along the river shore. They conversed in low tones and moved about restlessly, seeming uncertain as to what was expected of them. There was but one of the company who looked as though he knew exactly why he was there, and he kept conspicuously apart, walking to the far end of the platform, returning to the station door, then pacing up the track again, his chin sunk in the high collar of his overcoat, his burly shoulders drooping forward, his gait heavy and dogged. Presently he was approached by a tall, spare, grizzled man clad in a faded Grand Army suit, who shuffled out from the group and advanced with a certain deference, craning his neck forward until his back made the angle of a jack-knife three-quarters open.

"I reckon she's a-goin' to be pretty late agin to-night, Jim," he remarked in a squeaky falsetto. "S'pose it's the snow?"

"I don't know," responded the other man with a shade of annoyance, speaking from out an astonishing cataract of red beard which grew fiercely and thickly in all directions.

The spare man shifted the quill toothpick he was chewing to the other side of his mouth. "It ain't likely that anybody from the East will come with the corpse, I s'pose?" he went on reflectively.

"I don't know," responded the other, more curtly than before.

"It's too bad he didn't belong to some lodge or other. I like an order funeral myself. They seem more appropriate for people of some repytation," the spare man continued, with an ingratiating concession in his shrill voice, as he carefully placed his toothpick in his vest pocket. He always carried the flag at the G. A. R. funerals in the town.

The heavy man turned on his heel without replying, and walked up the siding. The spare man shuffled back to the uneasy group. "Jim's ez full ez a tick, ez ushel," he commented commiseratingly.

Just then a distant whistle sounded, and there was a shuffling of feet on the platform. A number of lanky boys of all ages appeared as suddenly and slimily as eels wakened by the crack of thunder; some came from the waiting-room, where they had been warming themselves by the red stove, or half asleep on the slat benches; others uncoiled themselves from baggage trucks or slid out of express wagons. Two clambered down from the driver's seat of a hearse that stood backed up against the siding. They straightened their stooping shoulders and lifted their heads, and a flash of momentary animation kindled their dull eyes at that cold, vibrant scream, the world-wide call for men. It stirred them like the note of a trumpet, just as it had often stirred in his boyhood the man who was coming home to-night.

The night express shot, red as a rocket, out of the eastward marsh lands, and wound along the river shore under the long lines of shivering poplars that sentineled the meadows, the escaping steam hanging in gray masses against the still, pale sky and blotting out the Milky Way. In a moment the red glare from the headlight streamed up the snow-covered track before the siding and glittered on the wet, black rails. The burly man with the disheveled red beard walked swiftly up the platform toward the approaching train, uncovering his head as he went. The group of men behind him hesitated, glanced questioningly at one another, and awkwardly followed his example. The train stopped, and the crowd shuffled up to the express car just as the door was thrown open, the spare man in the G. A. R. suit thrusting his head forward with curiosity. The express messenger appeared in the doorway, accompanied by a young man in a long ulster[1] and traveling-cap.

"Are Mr. Merrick's friends here?" inquired the young man.

The group on the platform swayed and shuffled uneasily. Philip Phelps, the banker, responded with dignity: "We have come to take charge of the body. Mr. Merrick's father is very feeble and can't be about."

"Send the agent out here," growled the express messenger, "and tell the operator to lend a hand."

---

[1]Long overcoat that includes a short cape around the shoulders. — Eds.

The coffin was got out of its rough box and down on the snowy platform. The townspeople drew back enough to make room for it and then formed a close semicircle about it, looking curiously at the palm-leaf which lay across the black cover. No one said anything. The baggageman stood by his truck, waiting to get at the trunks. The engine panted heavily, and the fireman dodged in and out among the wheels with his yellow torch and long oil-can, snapping the spindle boxes. The young Bostonian, one of the dead sculptor's pupils, who had come with the body, looked about him helplessly. He turned to the banker, the only one of that black, uneasy, stoop-shouldered group who seemed enough of an individual to be addressed.

"None of Mr. Merrick's brothers are here?" he asked uncertainly.

The man with the red beard for the first time stepped up and joined the group. 15
"No, they have not come yet; the family is scattered. The body will be taken directly to the house." He stooped and took hold of one of the handles of the coffin.

"Take the long hill road up, Thompson; it will be easier on the horses," called the liveryman, as the undertaker snapped the door of the hearse and prepared to mount to the driver's seat.

Laird, the red-bearded lawyer, turned again to the stranger: "We didn't know whether there would be any one with him or not," he explained. "It's a long walk, so you'd better go up in the hack." He pointed to a single battered conveyance, but the young man replied stiffly: "Thank you, but I think I will go up with the hearse. If you don't object," turning to the undertaker, "I'll ride with you."

They clambered up over the wheels and drove off in the starlight up the long, white hill toward the town. The lamps in the still village were shining from under the low, snow-burdened roofs; and beyond, on every side, the plains reached out into emptiness, peaceful and wide as the soft sky itself, and wrapped in a tangible, white silence.

When the hearse backed up to a wooden sidewalk before a naked, weather-beaten frame house, the same composite, ill-defined group that had stood upon the station siding was huddled about the gate. The front yard was an icy swamp, and a couple of warped planks, extending from the sidewalk to the door, made a sort of rickety footbridge. The gate hung on one hinge, and was opened wide with difficulty. Steavens, the young stranger, noticed that something black was tied to the knob of the front door.

The grating sound made by the casket, as it was drawn from the hearse, was 20 answered by a scream from the house; the front door was wrenched open, and a tall, corpulent woman rushed out bareheaded into the snow and flung herself upon the coffin, shrieking: "My boy, my boy! And this is how you've come home to me!"

As Steavens turned away and closed his eyes with a shudder of unutterable repulsion, another woman, also tall, but flat and angular, dressed entirely in black, darted out of the house and caught Mrs. Merrick by the shoulders, crying sharply: "Come, come, mother; you mustn't go on like this!" Her tone changed to one of obsequious solemnity as she turned to the banker: "The parlor is ready, Mr. Phelps."

The bearers carried the coffin along the narrow boards, while the undertaker ran ahead with the coffin-rests. They bore it into a large, unheated room that smelled of dampness and disuse and furniture polish, and set it down under a hanging lamp ornamented with jingling glass prisms and before a "Rogers group" of John Alden and Priscilla, wreathed with smilax.[2] Henry Steavens stared around him with the sickening conviction that there had been some horrible mistake, and that he had somehow arrived at the wrong destination. He looked painfully about over the clover-green Brussels, the fat plush upholstery; among the hand-painted china plaques and panels and vases, for some mark of identification, for something that might once have conceivably belonged to Harvey Merrick. It was not until he recognized his friend in the crayon portrait of a little boy in kilts and curls, hanging over the piano, that he felt willing to let any of these people approach the coffin.

"Take the lid off, Mr. Thompson; let me see my boy's face," wailed the elder woman between her sobs. This time Steavens looked fearfully, almost beseechingly, into her face, red and swollen under its masses of strong, black, shiny hair. He flushed, dropped his eyes, and then, almost incredulously, looked again. There was a kind of power about her face — a kind of brutal handsomeness, even; but it was scarred and furrowed by violence, and so colored and coarsened by fiercer passions that grief seemed never to have laid a gentle finger there. The long nose was distended and knobbed at the end, and there were deep lines on either side of it; her heavy, black brows almost met across her forehead, her teeth were large and square, and set far apart — teeth that could tear. She filled the room; the men were obliterated, seemed tossed about like twigs in an angry water, and even Steavens felt himself being drawn into the whirlpool.

The daughter — the tall, raw-boned woman in crêpe, with a mourning-comb in her hair which curiously lengthened her long face — sat stiffly upon the sofa, her hands, conspicuous for their large knuckles, folded in her lap, her mouth and eyes drawn down, solemnly awaiting the opening of the coffin. Near the door stood a mulatto woman, evidently a servant in the house, with a timid bearing and an emaciated face pitifully sad and gentle. She was weeping silently, the corner of her calico apron lifted to her eyes, occasionally suppressing a long, quivering sob. Steavens walked over and stood beside her.

Feeble steps were heard on the stairs, and an old man, tall and frail, odorous of 25 pipe smoke, with shaggy, unkempt gray hair and a dingy beard, tobacco-stained about the mouth, entered uncertainly. He went slowly up to the coffin and stood rolling a blue cotton handkerchief between his hands, seeming so pained and embarrassed by his wife's orgy of grief that he had no consciousness of anything else.

"There, there, Annie, dear, don't take on," he quavered timidly, putting out a shaking hand and awkwardly patting her elbow. She turned with a cry, and sank upon his shoulder with such violence that he tottered a little. He did not even glance toward the coffin, but continued to look at her with a dull, frightened, appealing expression, as a spaniel looks at the whip. His sunken cheeks slowly reddened and burned with miserable shame. When his wife rushed from the room, her daughter strode after her with set lips. The servant stole up to the coffin, bent over it for a moment, and then slipped away to the kitchen, leaving Steavens, the lawyer, and the father to themselves. The old man stood trembling and looking down at his dead son's face. The sculptor's splendid head seemed even more noble in its rigid stillness than in life. The dark hair had crept down upon the wide forehead; the face seemed strangely long, but in it there was not that beautiful and chaste repose which we expect to find in the faces of the dead. The brows were so drawn that there were two deep lines above the beaked nose, and the chin was thrust forward defiantly. It was as though the strain of life had been so sharp and bitter that death could not at once wholly relax the tension and smooth the countenance into perfect peace — as though he were still guarding something precious and holy which might even yet be wrested from him.

[2]Genus of climbing flowering plants. — Eds.

The old man's lips were working under his stained beard. He turned to the lawyer with timid deference: "Phelps and the rest are comin' back to set up with Harve, ain't they?" he asked. "Thank 'ee, Jim, thank 'ee." He brushed the hair back gently from his son's forehead. "He was a good boy, Jim; always a good boy. He was ez gentle ez a child and the kindest of 'em all — only we didn't none of us ever onderstand him." The tears trickled slowly down his beard and dropped upon the sculptor's coat.

"Martin, Martin — Oh, Martin! come here," his wife wailed from the top of the stairs. The old man started timorously: "Yes, Annie, I'm coming." He turned away, hesitated, stood for a moment in miserable indecision; then reached back and patted the dead man's hair softly, and stumbled from the room.

"Poor old man, I didn't think he had any tears left. Seems as if his eyes would have gone dry long ago. At his age nothing cuts very deep," remarked the lawyer.

Something in his tone made Steavens glance up. While the mother had been in 30 the room the young man had scarcely seen anyone else; but now, from the moment he first glanced into Jim Laird's florid face and blood-shot eyes, he knew that he had found what he had been heart-sick at not finding before — the feeling, the understanding, that must exist in some one, even here.

The man was red as his beard, with features swollen and blurred by dissipation, and a hot, blazing blue eye. His face was strained — that of a man who is controlling himself with difficulty — and he kept plucking at his beard with a sort of fierce resentment. Steavens, sitting by the window, watched him turn down the glaring lamp, still its jangling pendants with an angry gesture, and then stand with his hands locked behind him, staring down into the master's face. He could not help wondering what link there could have been between the porcelain vessel and so sooty a lump of potter's clay.

From the kitchen an uproar was sounding; when the dining-room door opened, the import of it was clear. The mother was abusing the maid for having forgotten to make the dressing for the chicken salad which had been prepared for the watchers. Steavens had never heard anything in the least like it: it was injured, emotional, dramatic abuse, unique and masterly in its excruciating cruelty, as violent and unrestrained as had been her grief of twenty minutes before. With a shudder of disgust, the lawyer went into the dining-room and closed the door into the kitchen.

"Poor Roxy's getting it now," he remarked when he came back. "The Merricks took her out of the poor-house years ago; and if her loyalty would let her, I guess the poor old thing could tell tales that would curdle your blood. She's the mulatto woman who was standing in here a while ago, with her apron to her eyes. The old woman is a fury; there never was anybody like her for demonstrative piety and ingenious cruelty. She made Harvey's life a hell for him when he lived at home; he was so sick ashamed of it. I never could see how he kept himself so sweet."

"He was wonderful," said Steavens slowly, "wonderful; but until to-night I have never known how wonderful."

"That is the true and eternal wonder of it, anyway; that it can come even from such a dung-heap as this," the lawyer cried, with a sweeping gesture which seemed to indicate much more than the four walls within which they stood.

"I think I'll see whether I can get a little air. The room is so close I am beginning to feel rather faint," murmured Steavens, struggling with one of the windows. The sash was stuck, however, and would not yield, so he sat down dejectedly and began pulling at his collar. The lawyer came over, loosened the sash with one blow of his red fist, and sent the window up a few inches. Steavens thanked him, but the nausea which had been gradually climbing into his throat for the last half hour left him with but one desire — a desperate feeling that he must get away from this place with what was left of Harvey Merrick. Oh, he comprehended well enough now the gentle bitterness of the smile that he had seen so often on his master's lips!

He remembered that once, when Merrick returned from a visit home, he brought with him a singularly feeling and suggestive bas-relief of a thin, faded old woman, sitting and sewing something pinned to her knee; while a full-lipped, full-blooded little urchin, his trousers sustained by a single gallows,[3] stood beside her impatiently twitching her gown to call her attention to a butterfly he had caught. Steavens, impressed by the tender and delicate modeling of the thin, tired face, had asked him if it were his mother. He remembered the dull flush that had burned up in the sculptor's face.

The lawyer was sitting in a rocking-chair beside the coffin, his head thrown back and his eyes closed. Steavens looked at him earnestly, puzzled at the line of the chin, and wondering why a man should conceal a feature of such distinction under that disfiguring shock of red beard. Suddenly, as though he felt the young sculptor's keen glance, he opened his eyes.

"Was he always a good deal of an oyster?" he asked abruptly. "He was terribly shy as a boy."

"Yes, he was an oyster, since you put it so," rejoined Steavens. "Although he could be very fond of people, he always gave one the impression of being detached. He disliked violent emotion; he was reflective, and rather distrustful of himself — except, of course, as regarded his work. He was sure-footed enough there. He distrusted men pretty thoroughly, and women even more, yet somehow without believing ill of them. He was determined, indeed, to believe the best, but he seemed afraid to investigate."

"A burnt dog dreads the fire," said the lawyer grimly, and closed his eyes.

---

[3]Suspender. — Eds.

Steavens went on and on, reconstructing that whole miserable boyhood. All this raw, biting ugliness had been the portion of the man whose tastes were refined beyond the limits of the reasonable — whose mind was an exhaustless gallery of beautiful impressions, so sensitive that the mere shadow of a poplar leaf flickering against a sunny wall would be etched and held there forever. Surely, if ever a man had the magic wand in his finger-tips, it was Merrick. Whatever he touched, he revealed its holiest secret; liberated it from enchantment and restored it to its pristine loveliness, like the Arabian prince who fought the enchantress, spell for spell. Upon whatever he had come in contact with, he had left a beautiful record of the experience — a sort of ethereal signature; a scent, a sound, a color that was his own.

Steavens understood now the real tragedy of his master's life; neither love nor wine, as many had conjectured, but a blow which had fallen earlier and cut deeper than these could have done — a shame not his, and yet so unescapably his, to hide in his heart from his very boyhood. And without, the frontier warfare; the yearning of a boy, cast ashore upon a desert of newness and ugliness and sordidness, for all that is chastened and old, and noble with traditions.

At eleven o'clock the tall, flat woman in black crêpe entered and announced that the watchers were arriving, and asked them "to step into the dining-room." As Steavens rose, the lawyer said dryly: "You go on — it'll be a good experience for you, doubtless; as for me, I'm not equal to that crowd to-night; I've had twenty years of them."

As Steavens closed the door after him, he glanced back at the lawyer, sitting by 45 the coffin in the dim light, with his chin resting on his hand.

The same misty group that had stood before the door of the express-car shuffled into the room. In the light of the kerosene lamp they separated and became individuals. The minister, a pale, feeble-looking man with white hair and blond chin-whiskers, took his seat beside a small table, and placed his Bible upon it. The Grand Army man took a seat behind the stove and tilted his chair back comfortably against the wall, fishing his quill toothpick from his waistcoat pocket. The two bankers, Phelps and Elder, sat off in a corner behind the dinner-table, where they could finish their discussion of the new usury law and its effect on chattel security loans. The real estate agent, an old man with a smiling, hypocritical face, soon joined them. The coal and lumber dealer and the cattle shipper sat on opposite sides of the hard coal burner, their feet on the nickel-work. Steavens took a book from his pocket and began to read. The talk around him ranged through various topics of local interest while the house was quieting down. When it was clear that the members of the family were in bed, the Grand Army man hitched his shoulders, and untangling his long legs, caught his heels on the rounds of his chair.

"S'pose there'll be a will, Phelps?" he queried in his weak falsetto.

The banker laughed disagreeably, and began trimming his nails with a pearl-handled pocket-knife.

"There'll scarcely be any need for one, will there?" he queried in his turn.

The restless Grand Army man shifted his position again, getting his knees still 50 nearer his chin. "Why, the ole man says Harve's done right well lately," he chirped.

The other banker spoke up, "I reckon he means by that Harve ain't asked him to mortgage any more farms lately so as he could go on with his education."

"Seems like my mind don't reach back to a time when Harve wasn't bein' edycated," tittered the Grand Army man.

There was a general chuckle. The minister took out his handkerchief and blew his nose sonorously. Banker Phelps closed his knife with a snap. "It's too bad the old man's sons didn't turn out better," he remarked, with reflective authority. "They never hung together. He spent money enough on Harve to stock a dozen cattle-farms, and he might as well have poured it into Sand Creek. If Harve had stayed at home and helped nurse what little they had, and gone into stock on the old man's bottom farm, they might all have been well fixed. But the old man had to trust everything to tenants and was cheated right and left."

"Harve never could have handled stock none," interposed the cattleman. "He hadn't it in him to be sharp. Do you remember when he bought Sander's mules for eight-year olds, when everybody in town knew that Sander's father-in-law give 'em to his wife for a wedding present eighteen years before, an' they was full-grown mules then?"

Every one chuckled, and the Grand Army man rubbed his knees with a spasm of childish delight. 55

"Harve never was much account for anything practical, and he shore was never fond of work," began the coal and lumber dealer. "I mind the last time he was home; the day he left, when the old man was out to the barn helpin' his hand hitch up to take Harve to the train, and Cal. Moots was patchin' up the fence, Harve, he come out on the step and sings out, in his ladylike voice: 'Cal. Moots, Cal. Moots! please come cord my trunk.' "

"That's Harve for you," approved the Grand Army man gleefully. "I kin hear him howlin' yet, when he was a big feller in long pants, and his mother used to whale him with a rawhide in the barn for lettin' the cows git foundered in the cornfield when he was drivin' 'em home from pasture. He killed a cow of mine that-a-way once — a pure Jersey and the best milker I had, an' the ole man had to put up for her. Harve, he was watchin' the sun set acrost the marshes when the anamile got away; he argued that sunset was oncommon fine."

"Where the old man made his mistake was in sending the boy East to school," said Phelps, stroking his goatee and speaking in a deliberate, judicial tone. "There was where he got his head full of trapseing to Paris and all such folly. What Harve needed, of all people, was a course in some first-class Kansas City business college."

The letters were swimming before Steavens's eyes. Was it possible that these men did not understand, that the palm on the coffin meant nothing to them? The very name of their town would have remained forever buried in the postal guide, had it not been now and again mentioned in the world in connection with Harvey Merrick's. He remembered what his master had said to him on the day of his death, after the congestion of both lungs had shut off any probability of recovery, and the sculptor had asked his pupil to send his body home. "It's not a pleasant place to be lying while the world is moving and doing and bettering," he had said, with a feeble smile: "but it rather seems as though we ought to go back to the place we came from in the end. The townspeople will come in for a look at me; and after they have had their say, I shan't have much to fear from the judgment of God. The wings of the Victory, in there" — with a weak gesture toward his studio — "will not shelter me."

The cattleman took up the comment. "Forty's young for a Merrick to cash in; they usually hang on pretty well. Probably he helped it along with whisky." 60

"His mother's people were not long-lived, and Harvey never had a robust constitution," said the minister mildly. He would have liked to say more. He had been the boy's Sunday-school teacher, and had been fond of him; but he felt that he was not in a position to speak. His own sons had turned out badly, and it was not a year since one of them had made his last trip home in the express-car, shot in a gambling-house in the Black Hills.

"Nevertheless, there is no disputin' that Harve frequently looked upon the wine when it was red, also variegated, and it shore made an oncommon fool of him," moralized the cattleman.

Just then the door leading into the parlor rattled loudly, and everyone started involuntarily, looking relieved when only Jim Laird came out. His red face was convulsed with anger, and the Grand Army man ducked his head when he saw the spark in his blue, blood-shot eye. They were all afraid of Jim; he was a drunkard, but he could twist the law to suit his client's needs as no other man in all Western Kansas could do; and there were many who tried. The lawyer closed the door gently behind him, leaned back against it, and folded his arms, cocking his head a little to one side. When he assumed this attitude in the court-room, ears were always pricked up, as it usually foretold a flood of withering sarcasm.

"I've been with you gentlemen before," he began in a dry, even tone, "when you've sat by the coffins of boys born and raised in this town; and, if I remember rightly, you were never any too well satisfied when you checked them up. What's the matter, anyhow? Why is it that reputable young men are as scarce as millionaires in Sand City? It might almost seem to a stranger that there was some way something the matter with your progressive town. Why did Reuben Sayer, the brightest young lawyer you ever turned out, after he had come home from the university as straight as a die, take to drinking, and forge a check and shoot himself? Why did Bill Merrit's son die of the shakes in a saloon in Omaba? Why was Mr. Thomas's son, here, shot in a gambling-house? Why did young Adams burn his mill to beat the insurance companies, and go to the pen?"

The lawyer paused and unfolded his arms, laying one clenched fist quietly on the table. "I'll tell you why: because you drummed nothing but money and knavery into their ears from the time they wore knickerbockers; because you carped away at them as you've been carping here to-night, holding our friends Phelps and Elder up to them for their models, as our grandfathers held up George Washington and John Adams. But the boys, worse luck, were young, and raw at the business you put them to; and how could they match coppers with such artists as Phelps and Elder? You wanted them to be successful rascals; they were only unsuccessful ones — that's all the difference. There was only one boy ever raised in this borderland between ruffian- 65

ism and civilization who didn't come to grief, and you hated Harvey Merrick more for winning out than you hated all the other boys who got under the wheels. Lord, Lord, how you did hate him! Phelps, here, is fond of saying that he could buy and sell us all out any time he's a mind to; but he knew Harve wouldn't have given a tinker's damn for his bank and all his cattle-farms put together; and a lack of appreciation, that way, goes hard with Phelps.

"Old Nimrod, here, thinks Harve drank too much; and this from such as Nimrod and me!

"Brother Elder says Harve was too free with the old man's money — fell short in filial consideration, maybe. Well, we can all remember the very tone in which Brother Elder swore his own father was a liar, in the county court; and we all know that the old man came out of that partnership with his son as bare as a sheared lamb. But maybe I'm getting personal, and I'd better be driving ahead at what I want to say."

The lawyer paused a moment, squared his heavy shoulders, and went on: "Harvey Merrick and I went to school together, back East. We were in dead earnest, and we wanted you all to be proud of us some day. We meant to be great men. Even I, and I haven't lost my sense of humor, gentlemen, I meant to be a great man. I came back here to practise, and I found you didn't in the least want me to be a great man. You wanted me to be a shrewd lawyer — oh, yes! Our veteran here wanted me to get him an increase of pension, because he had dyspepsia; Phelps wanted a new county survey that would put the widow Wilson's little bottom farm inside his, south line; Elder wanted to lend money at 5 per cent a month and get it collected; old Stark here wanted to wheedle old women up in Vermont into investing their annuities in real-estate mortgages that are not worth the paper they are written on. Oh, you needed me hard enough, and you'll go on needing me; and that's why I'm not afraid to plug the truth home to you this once.

"Well, I came back here and became the damned shyster you wanted me to be. You pretend to have some sort of respect for me; and yet you'll stand up and throw mud at Harvey Merrick, whose soul you couldn't dirty, and whose hands you couldn't tie. Oh, you're a discriminating lot of Christians! There have been times when the sight of Harvey's name in some Eastern paper has made me hang my head like a whipped dog; and, again, times when I liked to think of him off there in the world, away from all this hog-wallow, doing his great work, and climbing the big, clean up-grade he'd set for himself.

"And we? Now that we've fought and lied and sweated and stolen and hated, as only the disappointed strugglers in a bitter, dead little Western town know how to do, what have we got to show for it? Harvey Merrick wouldn't have given one sunset over your marshes for all you've got put together, and you know it. It's not for me to say why, in the inscrutable wisdom of God, a genius should ever have been called from this place of hatred and bitter waters; but I want this Boston man to know that the drivel he's been hearing here to-night is the only tribute any truly great man could ever have from such a lot of sick, side-tracked, burnt-dog, land-poor sharks as the here-present financiers of Sand City — upon which town may God have mercy!" 70

The lawyer thrust out his hand to Steavens as he passed him, caught up his overcoat in the hall, and had left the house before the Grand Army man had found time to lift his ducked head and crane his long neck about at his fellows.

Next day Jim Laird was drunk and unable to attend the funeral services. Steavens called twice at his office, but was compelled to start East without seeing him. He had a presentiment that he would hear from him again, and left his address on the lawyer's table; but if Laird found it, he never acknowledged it. The thing in him that Harvey Merrick had loved must have gone under ground with Harvey Merrick's coffin; for it never spoke again, and Jim got the cold he died of driving across the Colorado mountains to defend one of Phelps's sons, who had got into trouble out there by cutting government timber.

(1905)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the impact of the descriptive opening scene? What mood is established? Who are the "lanky boys" who appear "slimily as eels wakened by the crack of thunder" (par. 8)? How are they connected to the story that is unfolding?
2. What physical details does Willa Cather provide of the Merricks' home — both inside and outside — that characterize the psychological environment?
3. Harvey Merrick's mother is a key figure in the story, both past and present. How does Cather depict her appearance and her personality? Is her "orgy of grief" (par. 25) at her son's death typical of her behavior? Are we led to believe it is genuine? Do you find her a three-dimensional or stereotyped character? Why?
4. What purpose does Roxy, a minor character, play in developing the themes of this story? Consider Cather's description of her, what others say of her, and her actions.
5. When we first see Merrick in his coffin, Cather writes, "It was as though the strain of life had been so sharp and bitter that death could not at once wholly relax the tension and smooth the countenance into perfect peace — as though he were still guarding something precious and holy which might even yet be wrested from him" (par. 26). What does this sentence mean? From whose perspective is it written?
6. When the "same misty group" (par. 46) of men who were at the station are in the dining room of the Merrick home, they talk about Harvey Merrick. What values do they reveal about themselves, particularly those that Harvey did not share or validate? In what ways is Jim Laird's speech a rebuke and rebuttal to this community?
7. Who is Jim Laird? This character, who is present in nearly every moment of the story from start to finish, parallels Harvey in some ways yet diverges from him in others. Why do you think Cather develops him as such a significant figure in the story?

8. Although the story is told in the third person, the perspective of Henry Steavens trying to understand his friend and mentor Merrick is closest to the reader's view. What "clues" and insights does Cather gradually reveal as Steavens tries to combine what he already knows of Merrick with the new knowledge he gained in Sand City? What, finally, does he determine was "the real tragedy of his master's life" (par. 43)?
9. Harvey Merrick's dying wish was that his body be sent "home" to Sand City because "it rather seems as though we ought to go back to the place we came from in the end" (par. 59). Given the events of the story, do you think that Cather agrees with this view? Cite specific passages and actions to support your response.
10. "The Sculptor's Funeral" challenges a romantic view of "America's heartland," as a place of plainspoken people with a strong work ethic and moral compassion. Yet, do you think that Cather categorically indicts the Midwest for hypocrisy and small-mindedness? What evidence of ambivalence toward the Midwest, specifically small-town communities, do you find in the story?

Upton Sinclair

Upton Sinclair (1878–1968) was an American novelist and politician and one of the most influential muckraker journalists of the 1900s. Born in Baltimore, Maryland, he taught himself to read at the age of five and at fourteen enrolled at New York City College. After his graduation in 1897, he attended Columbia University's law school but dropped out to pursue a writing career. Sinclair became a member of the Socialist Party in 1902, and in 1906 he was nominated as a Socialist candidate for Congress from New Jersey. During his career, he wrote many novels and articles that focused on reform and political issues, and in 1933 he ran for governor of California. After his defeat at the polls, he went on to write an eleven-volume novel series that chronicled the dealings of the U.S. government between 1913 and 1949.

from The Jungle

The following excerpt is from Sinclair's 1906 novel, The Jungle, which is his most famous work and centers on the experiences of Lithuanian immigrant Jurgis Rudkus and his family. Sinclair's purpose in The Jungle was to expose the harsh lives of immigrants, especially the grim working conditions in a capitalist economy. The public responded most viscerally to his descriptions of the meatpacking industry; calls for reform resulted in the passage of the Pure Food and Drug Act by President Theodore Roosevelt in 1906, legislation that Sinclair himself disavowed because taxpayer dollars would be used to implement regulations. The following selection is taken from Chapter 9 of the novel.

And shortly afterward one of these, a physician, made the discovery that the carcasses of steers which had been condemned as tubercular by the government inspectors, and which therefore contained ptomaines,[1] which are deadly poisons, were left upon an open platform and carted away to be sold in the city; and so he insisted that these carcasses be treated with an injection of kerosene[2] — and was ordered to resign the same week! So indignant were the packers that they went farther, and compelled the mayor to abolish the whole bureau of inspection; so that since then there has not been even a pretence of any interference with the graft. There was said to be two thousand dollars a week hush-money from the tubercular steers alone; and as much again from the hogs which had died of cholera on the trains, and which you might see any day being loaded into box-cars and hauled away to a place called Globe, in Indiana, where they made a fancy grade of lard.

Jurgis heard of these things little by little, in the gossip of those who were obliged to perpetrate them. It seemed as if every time you met a person from a new department, you heard of new swindles and new crimes. There was, for instance, a Lithuanian who was a cattle-butcher for the plant where Marija had worked, which killed meat for canning only; and to hear this man describe the animals which came to his place would have been worth while for a Dante or a Zola.[3] It seemed that they must have agencies all over the country, to hunt out old and crippled and diseased cattle to be canned. There were cattle which had been fed on "whiskey-malt," the refuse of the breweries, and had become what the men called "steerly" — which means covered with boils. It was a nasty job killing these, for when you plunged your knife into them they would burst and splash foul-smelling stuff into your face; and when a man's sleeves were smeared with blood, and his hands steeped in it, how was he ever to wipe his face, or to clear his eyes so that he could see? It was stuff such as this that made the "embalmed beef" that had killed several times as many United States soldiers as all the bullets of the Spaniards; only the army beef, besides, was not fresh canned, it was old stuff that had been lying for years in the cellars.

Then one Sunday evening, Jurgis sat puffing his pipe by the kitchen stove, and talking with an old fellow whom Jonas had introduced, and who worked in the canning-rooms at Durham's; and so Jurgis learned a few things about the great and only Durham canned goods, which had become a national institution. They were regular alchemists at Durham's; they advertised a mushroom-catsup, and the men who made it did not know what a mushroom looked like. They advertised "potted chicken," — and it was like the boarding-house soup of the comic papers, through which a chicken had walked with rubbers on. Perhaps they had a secret process for

---

[1]Compounds created by bacteria during the decomposition of protein. — Eds.

[2]Kerosene was used to intentionally taint rotten meat to ensure that it did not get into the food supply. — Eds.

[3]Emile Zola (1840–1902) was a popular French writer who wrote realistic portraits of the lives of the poor and persecuted. — Eds.

making chickens chemically — who knows? said Jurgis's friend; the things that went into the mixture were tripe, and the fat of pork, and beef suet, and hearts of beef, and finally the waste ends of veal, when they had any. They put these up in several grades, and sold them at several prices; but the contents of the cans all came out of the same hopper. And then there was "potted game" and "potted grouse," "potted ham," and "devilled ham" — de-vyled, as the men called it. "De-vyled" ham was made out of the waste ends of smoked beef that were too small to be sliced by the machines; and also tripe, dyed with chemicals so that it would not show white; and trimmings of hams and corned beef; and potatoes, skins and all, and finally the hard cartilaginous gullets of beef, after the tongues had been cut out. All this ingenious mixture was ground up and flavored with spices to make it taste like something. Anybody who could invent a new imitation had been sure of a fortune from old Durham, said Jurgis's informant; but it was hard to think of anything new in a place where so many sharp wits had been at work for so long; where men welcomed tuberculosis in the cattle they were feeding, because it made them fatten more quickly; and where they bought up all the old rancid butter left over in the grocery-stores of a continent, and "oxidized" it by a forced-air process, to take away the odor, rechurned it with skim-milk, and sold it in bricks in the cities! Up to a year or two ago it had been the custom to kill horses in the yards — ostensibly for fertilizer; but after long agitation the newspapers had been able to make the public realize that the horses were being canned. Now it was against the law to kill horses in Packingtown, and the law was really complied with — for the present, at any rate. Any day, however, one might see sharp-horned and shaggy-haired creatures running with the sheep — and yet what a job you would have to get the public to believe that a good part of what it buys for lamb and mutton is really goat's flesh!

There was another interesting set of statistics that a person might have gathered in Packingtown — those of the various afflictions of the workers. When Jurgis had first inspected the packing-plants with Szedvilas, he had marvelled while he listened to the tale of all the things that were made out of the carcasses of animals, and of all the lesser industries that were maintained there; now he found that each one of these lesser industries was a separate little inferno, in its way as horrible as the killing-beds, the source and fountain of them all. The workers in each of them had their own peculiar diseases. And the wandering visitor might be sceptical about all the swindles, but he could not be sceptical about these, for the worker bore the evidence of them about on his own person — generally he had only to hold out his hand.

There were the men in the pickle-rooms, for instance, where old Antanas had 5 gotten his death; scarce a one of these that had not some spot of horror on his person. Let a man so much as scrape his finger pushing a truck in the pickle-rooms, and he might have a sore that would put him out of the world; all the joints in his fingers might be eaten by the acid, one by one. Of the butchers and floorsmen, the beef-boners and trimmers, and all those who used knives, you could scarcely find a person who had the use of his thumb; time and time again the base of it had been slashed, till it was a mere lump of flesh against which the man pressed the knife to hold it. The hands of these men would be criss-crossed with cuts, until you could no longer pretend to count them or to trace them. They would have no nails, — they had worn them off pulling hides; their knuckles were swollen so that their fingers spread out like a fan. There were men who worked in the cooking-rooms, in the midst of steam and sickening odors, by artificial light; in these rooms the germs of tuberculosis might live for two years, but the supply was renewed every hour. There were the beef-luggers, who carried two-hundred-pound quarters into the refrigerator-cars; a fearful kind of work, that began at four o'clock in the morning, and that wore out the most powerful men in a few years. There were those who worked in the chilling-rooms, and whose special disease was rheumatism; the time-limit that a man could work in the chilling-rooms was said to be five years. There were the wool-pluckers, whose hands went to pieces even sooner than the hands of the pickle-men; for the pelts of the sheep had to be painted with acid to loosen the wool, and then the pluckers had to pull out this wool with their bare hands, till the acid had eaten their fingers off. There were those who made the tins for the canned-meat; and their hands, too, were a maze of cuts, and each cut represented a chance for blood-poisoning. Some worked at the stamping-machines, and it was very seldom that one could work long there at the pace that was set, and not give out and forget himself, and have a part of his hand chopped off. There were the "hoisters," as they were called, whose task it was to press the lever which lifted the dead cattle off the floor. They ran along upon a rafter, peering down through the damp and the steam; and as old Durham's architects had not built the killing-room for the convenience of the hoisters, at every few feet they would have to stoop under a beam, say four feet above the one they ran on; which got them into the habit of stooping, so that in a few years they would be walking like chimpanzees. Worst of any, however, were the fertilizer-men, and those who served in the cooking-rooms. These people could not be shown to the visitor, — for the odor of a fertilizer-man would scare any ordinary visitor at a hundred yards, and as for the other men, who worked in tank-rooms full of steam, and in some of which there were open vats near the level of the floor, their peculiar trouble was that they fell into the vats; and when they were fished out, there was never enough of them left to be worth exhibiting, — sometimes they would be overlooked for days, till all but the bones of them had gone out to the world as Durham's Pure Leaf Lard!

(1906)

Exploring the Text

1. In the opening paragraph, Upton Sinclair describes the outrage of workers at the physician's insistence that kerosene be used on spoiled meat. What is their chief concern?
2. What does Sinclair mean by the description "regular alchemists" (par. 3)?
3. What is the "separate little inferno, in its way as horrible as the killing-beds, the source and fountain of them all" (par. 4)?

4. How does Sinclair develop and support his argument that the work in these factories is dehumanizing because of both the nature of the work and the powerlessness of the workers?
5. What unsafe practices does Sinclair emphasize in this section? How would you characterize his descriptions? Are they exaggerated? Gruesome? Detached? Melodramatic?
6. In a 1906 issue of Cosmopolitan magazine, Sinclair wrote of his disappointment that the American public focused on food reform rather than on the larger social critique of the difficult lives of workers: "I aimed at the public's heart, and by accident I hit it in the stomach." How does this quote demonstrate Sinclair's point? Or does it?

TALKBACK

Eric Schlosser

Born in 1959 and raised in New York and Los Angeles, Eric Schlosser graduated from Princeton University with a degree in American history and studied British history at Oxford University. In addition to working as a correspondent for the Atlantic, he has published articles in such periodicals as the New Yorker, the Nation, Rolling Stone, and Vanity Fair. His 2001 book about the food industry, Fast Food Nation: The Dark Side of the American Meal, became a best seller and was adapted into a film directed by Richard Linklater in 2006. Schlosser also participated in making the 2009 documentary film Food Inc. His second best seller, Reefer Madness: Sex, Drugs, and Cheap Labor in the American Black Market (2003), grew out of his articles on the enforcement of marijuana laws and illegal immigration in California. His latest book, Command and Control (2013), discusses nuclear nonproliferation.

from Fast Food Nation

The following selection from Chapter 8 of Fast Food Nation, "The Most Dangerous Job," discusses the meatpacking industry.

One night I visit a slaughterhouse somewhere in the High Plains. The slaughterhouse is one of the nation's largest. About five thousand head of cattle enter it every day, single file, and leave in a different form. Someone who has access to the plant, who's upset by its working conditions, offers to give me a tour. The slaughterhouse is an immense building, gray and square, about three stories high, with no windows on the front and no architectural clues to what's happening inside. My friend gives me a chain-mail apron and gloves, suggesting I try them on. Workers on the line wear about eight pounds of chain mail beneath their white coats, shiny steel armor that covers their hands, wrists, stomach, and back. The chain mail's designed to protect workers from cutting themselves and from being cut by other workers. But knives somehow manage to get past it. My host hands me some Wellingtons, the kind of knee-high rubber boots that English gentlemen wear in the countryside. "Tuck your pants into the boots," he says. "We'll be walking through some blood."

I put on a hardhat and climb a stairway. The sounds get louder, factory sounds, the noise of power tools and machinery, bursts of compressed air. We start at the end of the line, the fabricating room. Workers call it "fab." When we step inside, fab seems familiar: steel catwalks, pipes along the walls, a vast room, a maze of conveyer belts. This could be the Lamb Weston plant in Idaho, except hunks of red meat ride the belts instead of french fries. Some machines assemble cardboard boxes, others vacuum-seal subprimals of beef in clear plastic. The workers look extremely busy, but there's nothing unsettling about this part of the plant. You see meat like this all the time in the back of your local supermarket.

The fab room is cooled to about 40 degrees, and as you head up the line, the feel of the place starts to change. The pieces of meat get bigger. Workers — about half of them women, almost all of them young and Latino — slice meat with long slender knives. They stand at a table that's chest high, grab meat off a conveyer belt, trim away fat, throw meat back on the belt, toss the scraps onto a conveyer belt above them, and then grab more meat, all in a matter of seconds. I'm now struck by how many workers there are, hundreds of them, pressed close together, constantly moving, slicing. You see hardhats, white coats, flashes of steel. Nobody is smiling or chatting, they're too busy, anxiously trying not to fall behind. An old man walks past me, pushing a blue plastic barrel filled with scraps. A few workers carve the meat with Whizzards, small electric knives that have spinning round blades. The Whizzards look like the Norelco razors that Santa rides in the TV ads. I notice that a few of the women near me are sweating, even though the place is freezing cold.

Sides of beef suspended from an overhead trolley swing toward a group of men. Each worker has a large knife in one hand and a steel hook in the other. They grab the meat with their hooks and attack it fiercely with their knives. As they hack away, using all their strength, grunting, the place suddenly feels different, primordial. The machinery seems beside the point, and what's going on before me has been going on for thousands of years — the meat, the hook, the knife, men straining to cut more meat.

On the kill floor, what I see no longer unfolds in a logical manner. It's one 5 strange image after another. A worker with a power saw slices cattle into halves as though they were two-by-fours, and then the halves swing by me into the cooler. It feels like a slaughterhouse now. Dozens of cattle, stripped of their skins, dangle on chains from their hind legs. My host stops and asks how I feel, if I want to go any further. This is where some people get sick. I feel fine, determined to see the whole process, the world that's been deliberately hidden. The kill floor is hot and humid. It stinks of manure. Cattle have a body temperature of about 101 degrees, and there are a lot of them in the room. Carcasses swing so fast along the rail that you have to keep an eye on them constantly, dodge them, watch your step, or one will slam you and throw you onto the bloody concrete floor. It happens to workers all the time.

I see: a man reach inside cattle and pull out their kidneys with his bare hands, then drop the kidneys down a metal chute, over and over again, as each animal passes by him; a stainless steel rack of tongues; Whizzards peeling meat off decapitated heads, picking them almost as clean as the white skulls painted by Georgia O'Keeffe. We wade through blood that's ankle deep and that pours down drains into huge vats below us. As we approach the start of the line, for the first time I hear the steady pop, pop, pop of live animals being stunned.

Now the cattle suspended above me look just like the cattle I've seen on ranches for years, but these ones are upside down swinging on hooks. For a moment, the sight seems unreal; there are so many of them, a herd of them, lifeless. And then I see a few hind legs still kicking, a final reflex action, and the reality comes hard and clear.

For eight and a half hours, a worker called a "sticker" does nothing but stand in a river of blood, being drenched in blood, slitting the neck of a steer every ten seconds or so, severing its carotid artery. He uses a long knife and must hit exactly the right spot to kill the animal humanely. He hits that spot again and again. We walk up a slippery metal stairway and reach a small platform, where the production line begins. A man turns and smiles at me. He wears safety goggles and a hardhat. His face is splattered with gray matter and blood. He is the "knocker," the man who welcomes cattle to the building. Cattle walk down a narrow chute and pause in front of him, blocked by a gate, and then he shoots them in the head with a captive bolt stunner — a compressed-air gun attached to the ceiling by a long hose — which fires a steel bolt that knocks the cattle unconscious. The animals keep strolling up, oblivious to what comes next, and he stands over them and shoots. For eight and a half hours, he just shoots. As I stand there, he misses a few times and shoots the same animal twice. As soon as the steer falls, a worker grabs one of its hind legs, shackles it to a chain, and the chain lifts the huge animal into the air. . . .

Some of the most dangerous jobs in meatpacking today are performed by the late-night cleaning crews. A large proportion of these workers are illegal immigrants. They are considered "independent contractors," employed not by the meatpacking firms but by sanitation companies. They earn hourly wages that are about one-third lower than those of regular production employees. And their work is so hard and so horrendous that words seem inadequate to describe it. The men and women who now clean the nation's slaughterhouses may arguably have the worst job in the United States. "It takes a really dedicated person," a former member of a cleaning crew told me, "or a really desperate person to get the job done."

When a sanitation crew arrives at a meatpacking plant, usually around mid- 10 night, it faces a mess of monumental proportions. Three to four thousand cattle, each weighing about a thousand pounds, have been slaughtered there that day.

The place has to be clean by sunrise. Some of the workers wear water-resistant clothing; most don't. Their principal cleaning tool is a high-pressure hose that shoots a mixture of water and chlorine heated to about 180 degrees. As the water is sprayed, the plant fills with a thick, heavy fog. Visibility drops to as little as five feet. The conveyer belts and machinery are running. Workers stand on the belts, spraying them, riding them like moving sidewalks, as high as fifteen feet off the ground. Workers climb ladders with hoses and spray the catwalks. They get under tables and conveyer belts, climbing right into the bloody muck, cleaning out grease, fat, manure, leftover scraps of meat.

Glasses and safety goggles fog up. The inside of the plant heats up; temperatures soon exceed 100 degrees. "It's hot, and it's foggy, and you can't see anything," a former sanitation worker said. The crew members can't see or hear each other when the machinery's running. They routinely spray each other with burning hot, chemical-laden water. They are sickened by the fumes. Jesus, a soft-spoken employee of DCS Sanitation Management, Inc., the company that IBP uses in many of its plants, told me that every night on the job he gets terrible headaches. "You feel it in your head," he said. "You feel it in your stomach, like you want to throw up." A friend of his vomits whenever they clean the rendering area. Other workers tease the young man as he retches. Jesus says the stench in rendering is so powerful that it won't wash off; no matter how much soap you use after a shift, the smell comes home with you, seeps from your pores.

One night while Jesus was cleaning, a coworker forgot to turn off a machine, lost two fingers, and went into shock. An ambulance came and took him away, as everyone else continued to clean. He was back at work the following week. "If one hand is no good," the supervisor told him, "use the other." Another sanitation worker lost an arm in a machine. Now he folds towels in the locker room. The scariest job, according to Jesus, is cleaning the vents on the roof of the slaughterhouse. The vents become clogged with grease and dried blood. In the winter, when everything gets icy and the winds pick up, Jesus worries that a sudden gust will blow him off the roof into the darkness.

Although official statistics are not kept, the death rate among slaughterhouse sanitation crews is extraordinarily high. They are the ultimate in disposable workers: illegal, illiterate, impoverished, untrained. The nation's worst job can end in just about the worst way. Sometimes these workers are literally ground up and reduced to nothing.

(2002)

Exploring the Text

1. How do the details of clothing (e.g., "chain-mail apron and gloves") and sounds set the scene in the opening paragraph? What feeling do the first three paragraphs establish?

2. What details and descriptions, especially in paragraphs 4 and 5, does Eric Schlosser use to help convey his vision? How would you describe his vision?
3. This chapter is written in first person. What impact does that have on the reader? Note places where Schlosser calls attention to his own reaction or "interprets" the scene. Why do you think Schlosser chose not to report in a more objective voice?
4. How does Schlosser support the claim that the "men and women who now clean the nation's slaughterhouses may arguably have the worst job in the United States" (par. 9)?
5. In the opening section of his chapter, Schlosser does not discuss any specific person, but in the second section he focuses on a member of the crew named Jesus. What effect does Schlosser achieve by describing and quoting this individual?

Making Connections

1. Compare and contrast the arguments that Upton Sinclair (p. 961) and Eric Schlosser (p. 965) develop. What are their central point(s) and major purpose(s)? How do they support these? Consider their use of authorial viewpoint, appeals to pathos and logos, and descriptive detail.
2. After researching the term "muckraker," discuss Sinclair and Schlosser as muckrakers of their time. To what extent is the term considered (and would be considered by these individuals) as pejorative or complimentary? You might address whether fiction or nonfiction is more effective when used to expose unfair practices and corruption.
3. In 2012, on the tenth anniversary of the publication of Fast Food Nation, Schlosser published an article in the Daily Beast lamenting that the book is still relevant. It included these paragraphs:

> In 2002 the Occupational Safety and Health Administration changed the form that meatpacking companies must use to report injuries. The new form had no space to report musculoskeletal disorders caused by repetitive trauma — thereby preventing a whole category of serious injury from being counted. Instantly, as if by magic, the injury rate in meatpacking dropped by almost 50 percent. "Recordable safety incident rate in plants cut in half since 1996," the American Meat Institute proudly announced in a press release, without ever mentioning that the decline was due to the change in record keeping. In a scathing report on the exploitation of American meatpacking workers, Human Rights Watch suggested that the AMI had deliberately chosen the year 1996, as a basis of comparison, to mislead the public. "A 50 percent drop in meat and poultry industry injury rates in a single year would be implausible," the report noted, "but reaching back six years creates an impressive but fictitious improvement in plant safety."
>
> A few years later the AMI claimed that "recordable injuries" had actually fallen by 70 percent, thanks to the meatpacking industry's concern for worker safety. The claim was made in an AMI pamphlet commemorating the 100th anniversary of The Jungle's publication.

The title of the pamphlet — "If Upton Sinclair Were Alive Today . . . He'd Be Amazed by the U.S. Meat Industry" — was perhaps its most accurate assertion. Sinclair would no doubt be amazed. He would be amazed by how little has fundamentally changed over the past century, by how poor immigrant workers are still routinely being injured, and by how the industry's lies, no matter how brazen, are still said with a straight face.

After researching on your own, explain whether you agree or disagree with the final sentence in Schlosser's article, asserting that Sinclair "would be amazed by how little has fundamentally changed." Refer to both excerpts in this TalkBack as part of your response.

4. What would Sinclair and Schlosser have to say to one another? Write a dialogue between the two on the topic of food safety, fast food, or a more contemporary issue, such as the slow food movement. Be creative in choosing the setting for your dialogue (e.g., a McDonald's restaurant) and the format (e.g., e-mails) it takes.
5. Assuming the persona of a contemporary muckraker, write a brief piece on a current issue. You can choose to write fiction or nonfiction, but use at least two of the rhetorical strategies that Sinclair and Schlosser employ.

Conversation

The Changing Roles of Women

With the ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment on August 18, 1920, women gained the right to vote. The amendment proclaims, "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex." The campaign for female enfranchisement, however, began decades earlier in 1848 at Seneca Falls with the Declaration of Sentiments (p. 393) and developed into a national, often heated, conversation during the next decades. The question of both the rights and the role of women in a rapidly changing social and political environment was a complex one. Some claimed that the Constitution already granted the vote to women, who need only seize their legal right; others took up economic and psychological issues related to gender identity; others looked to women's impact on the growing labor force, and that of their children as well. In this Conversation, you will explore all of these issues and investigate the changing roles of women in America through the women's rights movement of the 1960s and 1970s and into the present day.

Sources

Susan B. Anthony, Sentencing Statement (1872)
Charlotte Perkins Gilman, from Women and Economics (1898)
Thorstein Veblen, from The Theory of the Leisure Class (1899)
Edith Wharton, from The House of Mirth (1905)
Florence Kelley, Speech on Child Labor (1905)
Dunston-Weiler Lithograph Company, Suffragette Madonna and Uncle Sam, Suffragee (1909)
Bertha M. Boye, Votes for Women (1911)
Marie Jenney Howe, An Anti-Suffrage Monologue (1913)
Gail Collins, from When Everything Changed: The Amazing Journey of American Women from 1950 to the Present (2009)
Madeleine M. Kunin, from The New Feminist Agenda (2012)

Sentencing Statement

Susan B. Anthony

Born into an activist Quaker family, Susan B. Anthony (1820–1906) was a staunch abolitionist, advocate for women's suffrage, and proponent of women's labor organizations. She attended the Seneca Falls convention, where she met Elizabeth Cady Stanton, but at that time she was committed to the temperance movement. Frustrated because women were not permitted to speak at rallies, she joined the women's rights movement in 1852. In 1872, after she and sixteen other women tried to vote in a federal election in New York State, she was arrested and put on trial. She was found guilty, though without a jury's verdict, and ordered to pay a fine of $100 and the costs of prosecution. Following is a transcript of the exchange between Anthony and Judge Ward Hunt during the sentencing.

Judge Hunt: (Ordering the defendant to stand up), Has the prisoner anything to say why sentence shall not be pronounced?

Miss Anthony: Yes, your honor, I have many things to say; for in your ordered verdict of guilty, you have trampled under foot every vital principle of our government. My natural rights, my civil rights, my political rights, my judicial rights, are all alike ignored. Robbed of the fundamental privilege of citizenship, I am degraded from the status of a citizen to that of a subject; and not only myself individually, but all of my sex, are, by your honor's verdict, doomed to political subjection under this, so-called, form of government.

Judge Hunt: The Court cannot listen to a rehearsal of arguments the prisoner's counsel has already consumed three hours in presenting.

Miss Anthony: May it please your honor, I am not arguing the question, but simply stating the reasons why sentence cannot, in justice, be pronounced against me. Your denial of my citizen's right to vote, is the denial of my right of consent as one of the governed, the denial of my right of representation as one of the taxed, the denial of my right to a trial by a jury of my peers as an offender against law, therefore, the denial of my sacred rights to life, liberty, property and —

JUDGE HUNT: The Court cannot allow the prisoner to go on.

MISS ANTHONY: But your honor will not deny me this one and only poor privilege of protest against this high-handed outrage upon my citizen's rights. May it please the Court to remember that since the day of my arrest last November, this is the first time that either myself or any person of my disfranchised class has been allowed a word of defense before judge or jury —

JUDGE HUNT: The prisoner must sit down — the Court cannot allow it.

MISS ANTHONY: All of my prosecutors, from the 8th ward corner grocery politician, who entered the complaint, to the United States Marshal, Commissioner, District Attorney, District Judge, your honor on the bench, not one is my peer, but each and all are my political sovereigns; and had your honor submitted my case to the jury, as was clearly your duty, even then I should have had just cause of protest, for not one of those men was my peer; but, native or foreign born, white or black, rich or poor, educated or ignorant, awake or asleep, sober or drunk, each and every man of them was my political superior; hence, in no sense, my peer. Even, under such circumstances, a commoner of England, tried before a jury of Lords, would have far less cause to complain than should I, a woman, tried before a jury of men. Even my counsel, the Hon. Henry R. Selden, who has argued my cause so ably, so earnestly, so unanswerably before your honor, is my political sovereign. Precisely as no disfranchised person is entitled to sit upon a jury, and no woman is entitled to the franchise, so, none but a regularly admitted lawyer is allowed to practice in the courts, and no woman can gain admission to the bar — hence, jury, judge, counsel, must all be of the superior class.

JUDGE HUNT: The Court must insist — the prisoner has been tried according to the established forms of law.

MISS ANTHONY: Yes, your honor, but by forms of law all made by men, interpreted by men, administered by men, in favor of men, and against women; and hence, your honor's ordered verdict of guilty, against a United States citizen for the exercise of "that citizen's right to vote," simply because that citizen was a woman and not a man. But, yesterday, the same man made forms of law, declared it a crime punishable with $1,000 fine and six months' imprisonment, for you, or me, or any of us, to give a cup of cold water, a crust of bread, or a night's shelter to a panting fugitive as he was tracking his way to Canada. And every man or woman in whose veins coursed a drop of human sympathy violated that wicked law, reckless of consequences, and was justified in so doing. As then, the slaves who got their freedom must take it over, or under, or through the unjust forms of law, precisely so, now, must women, to get their right to a voice in this government, take it; and I have taken mine, and mean to take it at every possible opportunity.

JUDGE HUNT: The Court orders the prisoner to sit down. It will not allow another word.

MISS ANTHONY: When I was brought before your honor for trial, I hoped for a broad and liberal interpretation of the Constitution and its recent amendments, that should declare all United States citizens under its protecting ægis — that should declare equality of rights the national guarantee to all persons born or naturalized in the United States. But failing to get this justice — failing, even, to get a trial by a jury not of my peers — I ask not leniency at your hands — but rather the full rigors of the law.

JUDGE HUNT: The Court must insist —

(Here the prisoner sat down.)

JUDGE HUNT: The prisoner will stand up.

(Here Miss Anthony arose again.)

The sentence of the Court is that you pay a fine of one hundred dollars and the 15 costs of the prosecution.

MISS ANTHONY: May it please your honor, I shall never pay a dollar of your unjust penalty. All the stock in trade I possess is a $10,000 debt, incurred by publishing my paper — The Revolution — four years ago, the sole object of which was to educate all women to do precisely as I have done, rebel against your man-made, unjust, unconstitutional forms of law, that tax, fine, imprison and hang women, while they deny them the right of representation in the government; and I shall work on with might and main to pay every dollar of that honest debt, but not a penny shall go to this unjust claim. And I shall earnestly and persistently continue to urge all women to the practical recognition of the old revolutionary maxim, that "Resistance to tyranny is obedience to God."

(1872)

Questions

1. On what grounds does Susan B. Anthony claim that having a jury would still not have made her trial fair and just?
2. What is the basic logic of Anthony's stance? Develop the logic through a Toulmin analysis.
3. How would you describe Anthony's attitude toward the judge and the trial in general? Cite specific words and images to characterize the tone.
4. Anthony's arguments appeal to both logic and emotion. Which of her appeals do you find more effective and why? Do the appeals work together to further her purpose, or does one undermine the other?
5. In this exchange, do you think that Anthony primarily adds to a divide of men versus women or invokes the egalitarian tenets of democracy?

from Women and Economics

Charlotte Perkins Gilman

Charlotte Perkins Gilman (1860–1935) came from a long line of feminists and suffragists, including her grandaunt, Harriet Beecher Stowe, the author of Uncle Tom's Cabin. Born in Hartford, Connecticut, Gilman was educated mostly at home and briefly at the Rhode Island School of Design. She wrote her famous short story, "The Yellow Wallpaper" (1892), as an indictment of the rest cure prescribed to her for postpartum depression after the birth of her daughter. Following is an excerpt from Gilman's book Women and Economics, in which she makes the argument that "the economic independence and specialization of women is essential to the improvement of marriage, motherhood, domestic industry, and racial improvement." She promoted the social reform and change in cultural identity that would make women full economic partners with men by allowing them to work outside of the home.

When we make plain to ourselves that a pure, lasting, monogamous sex-union can exist without bribe or purchase, without the manacles of economic dependence, and that men and women so united in sex-relation will still be free to combine with others in economic relation, we shall not regard devotion to humanity as an unnatural sacrifice, nor collective prosperity as a thing to fear.

Besides this maintenance of primeval individualism in the growing collectivity of social economic process and the introduction of the element of sex-combat into the narrowing field of industrial competition, there is another side to the evil influence of the sexuo-economic relation upon social development. This is in the attitude of woman as a non-productive consumer.

In the industrial evolution of the human race, that marvellous and subtle drawing out and interlocking of special functions which constitute the organic life of society, we find that production and consumption go hand in hand; and production comes first. One cannot consume what has not been produced. Economic production is the natural expression of human energy, — not sex-energy at all, but race-energy, — the unconscious functioning of the social organism. Socially organized human beings tend to produce, as a gland to secrete: it is the essential nature of the relation. The creative impulse, the desire to make, to express the inner thought in outer form, "just for the work's sake, no use at all i' the work!" this is the distinguishing character of humanity. "I want to mark!" cries the child, demanding the pencil. He does not want to eat. He wants to mark. He is not seeking to get something into himself, but to put something out of himself. He generally wants to do whatever he sees done, — to make pie-crust or to make shavings, as it happens. The pie he may eat, the shavings not; but he likes to make both. This is the natural process of production, and is followed by the natural process of consumption, where practicable. But consumption is not the main end, the governing force. Under this organic social law, working naturally, we have the evolution of those arts and crafts in the exercise of which consists our human living, and on the product of which we live. So does society evolve within itself — secrete as it were — the social structure with all its complex machinery; and we function therein as naturally as so many glands, other things being equal.

But other things are not equal. Half the human race is denied free productive expression, is forced to confine its productive human energies to the same channels as its reproductive sex-energies. Its creative skill is confined to the level of immediate personal bodily service, to the making of clothes and preparing of food for individuals. No social service is possible. While its power of production is checked, its power of consumption is inordinately increased by the showering upon it of the "unearned increment" of masculine gifts. For the woman there is, first, no free production allowed; and, second, no relation maintained between what she does produce and what she consumes. She is forbidden to make, but encouraged to take. Her industry is not the natural output of creative energy, not the work she does because she has the inner power and strength to do it; nor is her industry even the measure of her gain. She has, of course, the natural desire to consume; and to that is set no bar save the capacity or the will of her husband.

Thus we have painfully and laboriously evolved and carefully maintain among us an enormous class of non-productive consumers, — a class which is half the world, and mother of the other half. We have built into the constitution of the human race the habit and desire of taking, as divorced from its natural precursor and concomitant of making. We have made for ourselves this endless array of "horse-leech's daughters, crying, Give! give!" To consume food, to consume clothes, to consume houses and furniture and decorations and ornaments and amusements, to take and take and take forever, — from one man if they are virtuous, from many if they are vicious, but always to take and never to think of giving anything in return except their womanhood, — this is the enforced condition of the mothers of the race. What wonder that their sons go into business "for what there is in it"! What wonder that the world is full of the desire to get as much as possible and to give as little as possible! What wonder, either, that the glory and sweetness of love are but a name among us, with here and there a strange and beautiful exception, of which our admiration proves the rarity! 5

Between the brutal ferocity of excessive male energy struggling in the marketplace as in a battlefield and the unnatural greed generated by the perverted condition of female energy, it is not remarkable that the industrial evolution of humanity has shown peculiar symptoms. One of the minor effects of this last condition — this limiting of female industry to close personal necessities, and this tendency of her over-developed sex-nature to overestimate the so-called "duties of her position" — has been to produce an elaborate devotion to individuals and their personal needs, — not to the understanding and developing of their higher natures, but to the intensification of their bodily tastes and pleasure. The wife and mother, pouring the rising tide of racial power into the same old channels that were allowed her primitive ancestors, constantly ministers to the physical needs of her family with a ceaseless and concentrated intensity. They like it, of course. But it maintains in the individuals of the race an exaggerated sense of the importance of food and clothes and ornaments to themselves, without at all including a knowledge of their right use and value to us all. It developes personal selfishness.

Again, the consuming female, debarred from any free production, unable to estimate the labor involved in the making of what she so lightly destroys, and her consumption limited mainly to those things which minister to physical pleasure, creates a market for sensuous decoration and personal ornament, for all that is luxurious and enervating, and for a false and capricious variety in such supplies, which operates as a most deadly check to true industry and true art. As the priestess of the temple of consumption, as the limitless demander of things to use up, her economic influence is reactionary and injurious. Much, very much, of the current of useless production in which our economic energies run waste — man's strength poured out like water on the sand — depends on the creation and careful maintenance of this false market, this sink into which human labor vanishes with no return. Woman, in her false economic position, reacts injuriously upon industry, upon art, upon science, discovery, and progress. The sexuo-economic relation in its effect on the constitution of the individual keeps alive in us the instincts of savage individualism which we should otherwise have well outgrown. . . .

(1898)

Questions

1. What is the relationship between consumption and production that is fundamental to Charlotte Perkins Gilman's argument? Why does Gilman believe that the woman "is forbidden to make, but encouraged to take" (par. 4)?
2. What are the consequences that Gilman envisions when a society includes "an enormous class of non-productive consumers" (par. 5)?
3. Gilman decries "the priestess of the temple of consumption, as the limitless demander of things to use up, [whose] economic influence is reactionary and injurious" (par. 7). To what extent do you think she is blaming women for their situation? Is she blaming the victim?
4. What does Gilman mean in the final paragraph by "this false market" and women's "false economic position"?
5. Why is Gilman so vehemently opposed to what she calls "savage individualism" (par. 7)? What is the alternative?

from The Theory of the Leisure Class

Thorstein Veblen

Thorstein Veblen (1857–1929) was an economist best known for his book The Theory of the Leisure Class (1899). He introduced the term "conspicuous consumption," which means consuming simply to demonstrate one's accomplishments or economic status. In the following excerpt, from Chapter 3 of that book, Veblen discusses the newly emerging middle class and the role of women as conspicuous consumers.

[H]ere occurs a curious inversion. It is a fact of common observation that in this lower middle class there is no pretence of leisure on the part of the head of the household. Through force of circumstances it has fallen into disuse. But the middle-class wife still carries on the business of vicarious leisure, for the good name of the household and its master. In descending the social scale in any modern industrial community, the primary fact — the conspicuous leisure of the master of the household — disappears at a relatively high point. The head of the middle-class household has been reduced by economic circumstances to turn his hand to gaining a livelihood by occupations which often partake largely of the character of industry, as in the case of the ordinary business man of to-day. But the derivative fact — the vicarious leisure and consumption rendered by the wife, and the auxiliary vicarious performance of leisure by menials — remains in vogue as a conventionality which the demands of reputability will not suffer to be slighted. It is by no means an uncommon spectacle to find a man applying himself to work with the utmost assiduity, in order that his wife may in due form render for him that degree of vicarious leisure which the common sense of the time demands.

The leisure rendered by the wife in such cases is, of course, not a simple manifestation of idleness or indolence. It almost invariably occurs disguised under some form of work or household duties or social amenities, which prove on analysis to serve little or no ulterior end beyond showing that she does not and need not occupy herself with anything that is gainful or that is of substantial use. As has already been noticed under the head of manners, the greater part of the customary round of domestic cares to which the middle-class housewife gives her time and effort is of this character. Not that the results of her attention to household matters, of a decorative and mundificatory character, are not pleasing to the sense of men trained in middle-class proprieties; but the taste to which these effects of household adornment and tidiness appeal is a taste which has been formed under the selective guidance of a canon of propriety that demands just these evidences of wasted effort. The effects are pleasing to us chiefly because we have been taught to find them pleasing. There goes into these domestic duties much solicitude for a proper combination of form and colour, and for other ends that are to be classed as æsthetic in the proper sense of the term; and it is not denied that effects having some substantial æsthetic value are sometimes attained. Pretty much all that is here insisted on is that, as regards these amenities of life, the housewife's efforts are under the guidance of traditions that have been shaped by the law of conspicuously wasteful expenditure of time and substance. If beauty or comfort is achieved, — and it is a more or less fortuitous circumstance if they are, — they must be achieved by means and methods that commend themselves to the great economic law of wasted effort. The more reputable, "presentable" portion of middle-class household paraphernalia are, on the one hand, items of conspicuous consumption, and on the other hand, apparatus for putting in evidence the vicarious leisure rendered by the housewife.

The requirement of vicarious consumption at the hands of the wife continues in force even at a lower point in the pecuniary scale than the requirement of vicarious leisure. At a point below which little if any pretence of wasted effort, in ceremonial cleanness and the like, is observable, and where there is assuredly no conscious attempt at ostensible leisure, decency still requires the wife to consume some goods conspicuously for the reputability of the household and its head. So that, as the latter-day outcome of this evolution of an archaic institution, the wife, who was at the outset the drudge and chattel of the man, both in fact and in theory, — the producer of goods for him to consume, — has become the ceremonial consumer of goods which he produces. But she still quite unmistakably remains his chattel in theory; for the habitual rendering of vicarious leisure and consumption is the abiding mark of the unfree servant.

(1899)

Questions

1. What is the irony of the "derivative fact" that Thorstein Veblen refers to in paragraph 1?
2. If the "leisure rendered by the wife" is "not a simple manifestation of idleness or indolence" (par. 2), then what is it, according to Veblen?
3. What vicious cycle is Veblen pointing out in the following two sentences: "Not that the results of her attention to household matters . . . are not pleasing. [They are] because we have been taught to find them pleasing" (par. 2)?
4. What is "the great economic law of wasted effort" (par. 2)?
5. What does Veblen mean by such descriptive phrases as "vicarious leisure" (par. 1), "conspicuous leisure" (par. 1), and "vicarious consumption" (par. 3), which he uses throughout this excerpt? Are these phrases synonymous?
6. What is the "archaic institution" (par. 3)? Why does this institution result in women who are wives remaining "chattel in theory" and having no choice but to act as "the unfree servant"?
7. What precisely is the argument Veblen is making in this excerpt? To what extent do you agree with his reasoning?

from The House of Mirth

Edith Wharton

Edith Wharton (1862–1937) was a Pulitzer Prize–winning American novelist and short-story writer. In this excerpt from early in The House of Mirth (1905), the impoverished central character, Lily Bart, reflects on the financial advantages she expects to enjoy as the wife of Percy Gryce, a member of the 1890s New York aristocracy.

Seating herself on the upper step of the terrace, Lily leaned her head against the honeysuckles wreathing the balustrade. The fragrance of the late blossoms seemed an emanation of the tranquil scene, a landscape tutored to the last degree of rural elegance. In the foreground glowed the warm tints of the gardens. Beyond the lawn, with its pyramidal pale-gold maples and velvety firs, sloped pastures dotted with cattle; and through a long glade the river widened like a lake under the silver light of September. Lily did not want to join the circle about the tea-table. They represented the future she had chosen, and she was content with it, but in no haste to anticipate its joys. The certainty that she could marry Percy Gryce when she pleased had lifted a heavy load from her mind, and her money troubles were too recent for their removal not to leave a sense of relief which a less discerning intelligence might have taken for happiness. Her vulgar cares were at an end. She would be able to arrange her life as she pleased, to soar into that empyrean[1] of security where creditors cannot penetrate. She would have smarter gowns than Judy Trenor, and far, far more jewels than Bertha Dorset. She would be free forever from the shifts, the expedients, the humiliations of the relatively poor. Instead of having to flatter, she would be flattered; instead of being grateful, she would receive thanks. There were old scores she could pay off as well as old benefits she could return. And she had no doubts as to the extent of her power. She knew that Mr. Gryce was of the small chary type most inaccessible to impulses and emotions. He had the kind of character in which prudence is a vice, and good advice the most dangerous nourishment. But Lily had known the species before: she was aware that such a guarded nature must find one huge outlet of egoism, and she determined to be to him what his Americana had hitherto been: the one possession in which he took sufficient pride to spend money on it. She knew that this generosity to self is one of the forms of meanness, and she resolved so to identify herself with her husband's vanity that to gratify her wishes would be to him the most exquisite form of self-indulgence. The system might at first necessitate a resort to some of the very shifts and expedients from which she intended it should free her; but she felt sure that in a short time she would be able to play the game in her own way. How should she have distrusted her powers? Her beauty itself was not the mere ephemeral possession it might have been in the hands of inexperience: her skill in enhancing it, the care she took of it, the use she made of it, seemed to give it a kind of permanence. She felt she could trust it to carry her through to the end.

And the end, on the whole, was worth while. Life was not the mockery she had thought it three days ago. There was room for her, after all, in this crowded selfish world of pleasure whence, so short a time since, her poverty had seemed to exclude her. These people whom she had ridiculed and yet envied were glad to make a place for her in the charmed circle about which all her desires revolved. They were not as brutal and self-engrossed as she had fancied — or rather, since it would no longer be necessary to flatter and humour them, that side of their nature became less conspicuous. Society is a revolving body which is apt to be judged according to its place in each man's heaven; and at present it was turning its illuminated face to Lily.

In the rosy glow it diffused her companions seemed full of amiable qualities. She liked their elegance, their lightness, their lack of emphasis: even the self-assurance which at times was so like obtuseness now seemed the natural sign of social ascendency.

---

[1] In Greek philosophy, the highest layer of the heavens. — Eds.

They were lords of the only world she cared for, and they were ready to admit her to their ranks and let her lord it with them. Already she felt within her a stealing allegiance to their standards, an acceptance of their limitations, a disbelief in the things they did not believe in, a contemptuous pity for the people who were not able to live as they lived.

The early sunset was slanting across the park. Through the boughs of the long avenue beyond the gardens she caught the flash of wheels, and divined that more visitors were approaching. There was a movement behind her, a scattering of steps and voices: it was evident that the party about the tea-table was breaking up. Presently she heard a tread behind her on the terrace. She supposed that Mr. Gryce had at last found means to escape from his predicament, and she smiled at the significance of his coming to join her instead of beating an instant retreat to the fire-side.

(1905)

Questions

1. What does Edith Wharton suggest with her observation that Lily's "vulgar cares were at an end. She would be able to arrange her life as she pleased, to soar into that empyrean of security where creditors cannot penetrate" (par. 1)?
2. What do you think Lily means by her reference to "the relatively poor" (par. 1)?
3. How does Lily define herself as the wife of Gryce? What was she "determined to be to him" (par. 1)?
4. What source(s) of power does Lily understand will be hers to wield as well as nurture when she is Gryce's wife?
5. What shift in attitude does the narrator portray in this passage in which Lily imagines herself as a member of the social aristocracy, a sphere which she initially thought of as a "crowded selfish world of pleasure" (par. 2)?
6. Based on this excerpt, how would you describe Wharton's view of marriage in the society of her time?

Speech on Child Labor

Florence Kelley

An early advocate of women's suffrage, Florence Kelley (1859–1932) was a social reformer known for her work against sweatshops and her efforts to pass legislation for eight-hour workdays and restrictions on child labor. She delivered the following speech before the National American Woman Suffrage Association on July 22, 1905, in Philadelphia.

We have, in this country, two million children under the age of sixteen years who are earning their bread. They vary in age from six and seven years (in the cotton mills of Georgia) and eight, nine and ten years (in the coal-breakers of Pennsylvania), to fourteen, fifteen and sixteen years in more enlightened states. No other portion of the wage earning class increased so rapidly from decade to decade as the young girls from fourteen to twenty years. Men increase, women increase, youth increase, boys increase in the ranks of the breadwinners; but no contingent so doubles from census period to census period (both by percent and by count of heads), as does the contingent of girls between twelve and twenty years of age. They are in commerce, in offices, in manufacturing.

Tonight while we sleep, several thousand little girls will be working in textile mills, all the night through, in the deafening noise of the spindles and the looms spinning and weaving cotton and wool, silks and ribbons for us to buy.

In Alabama the law provides that a child under sixteen years of age shall not work in a cotton mill at night longer than eight hours, and Alabama does better in this respect than any other southern state. North and South Carolina and Georgia place no restriction upon the work of children at night; and while we sleep little white girls will be working tonight in the mills in those states, working eleven hours at night. In Georgia there is no restriction whatever! A girl of six or seven years, just tall enough to reach the bobbins, may work eleven hours by day or by night. And they will do so tonight, while we sleep. Nor is it only in the South that these things occur. Alabama does better than New Jersey. For Alabama limits the children's work at night to eight hours, while New Jersey permits it all night long. Last year New Jersey took a long backward step. A good law was repealed which had required women and [children] to stop work at six in the evening and at noon on Friday. Now, therefore, in New Jersey, boys and girls, after their fourteenth birthday, enjoy the pitiful privilege of working all night long.

In Pennsylvania, until last May it was lawful for children, thirteen years of age, to work twelve hours at night. A little girl, on her thirteenth birthday, could start away from her home at half past five in the afternoon, carrying her pail of midnight luncheon as happier people carry their midday luncheon, and could work in the mill from six at night until six in the morning, without violating any law of the Commonwealth.

If the mothers and the teachers in Georgia could vote, would the Georgia legislature have refused at every session for the last three years to stop the work in the mills of children under twelve years of age? 5

Would the New Jersey Legislature have passed that shameful repeal bill enabling girls of fourteen years to work all night, if the mothers in New Jersey were enfranchised? Until the mothers in the great industrial states are enfranchised, we shall none of us be able to free our consciences from participation in this great evil. No one in this room tonight can feel free from such participation. The children make our shoes in the shoe factories; they knit our stockings, our knitted underwear in the knitting factories. They spin and weave our cotton underwear in the cotton mills. Children braid straw for our hats, they spin and weave the silk and velvet wherewith we trim our hats. They stamp buckles and metal ornaments of all kinds, as well as pins and hat-pins. Under the sweating system, tiny children make artificial flowers and neckwear for us to buy. They carry bundles of garments from the factories to the tenements, little beasts of burden, robbed of school life that they may work for us.

We do not wish this. We prefer to have our work done by men and women. But we are almost powerless. Not wholly powerless, however, are citizens who enjoy the right of petition. For myself, I shall use this power in every possible way until the right to the ballot is granted, and then I shall continue to use both. What can we do to free our consciences? There is one line of action by which we can do much. We can enlist the workingmen on behalf of our enfranchisement just in proportion as we strive with them to free the children. No labor organization in this country ever fails to respond to an appeal for help in the freeing of the children.

For the sake of the children, for the Republic in which these children will vote after we are dead, and for the sake of our cause, we should enlist the workingmen voters, with us, in this task of freeing the children from toil!

(1905)

Questions

1. What appeals to logos does Florence Kelley make right at the start of her speech? Why? What relationship does this establish with her audience?
2. When does Kelley appeal to pathos? What strategies does she use to make this appeal?
3. How does her explanation of conditions in Alabama and New Jersey (par. 3) anticipate (and refute) a counterargument?
4. Kelley does not get to her central claim until almost the middle of the speech (par. 5). What is her thesis? Why do you think she withheld it for so long?
5. Throughout her speech, Kelley uses the pronoun "we." What connection is she making with her audience? Why does she shift to "I" in the penultimate paragraph?
6. What do you believe is Kelley's purpose in the final two paragraphs? Is it effective to have waited until this point, or is it too late to add another issue?
7. How does Kelley balance logical and emotional appeals in this speech? Does one finally outweigh the other? How does this balance — or shifting balance — help achieve her purpose?

Suffragette Madonna and Uncle Sam, Suffragee

Dunston-Weiler Lithograph Company

As the movement to enfranchise women gained a following in the early 1900s, antisuffragette images frequently played on fears that traditional gender roles (including appearance) would be at risk. As popular means to send short, often humorous communications, some postcards in the early 1900s also presented a visual commentary about voting rights for women. In 1909, the Dunston-Weiler Lithograph Company of New York produced twelve full-color lithographic postcards presenting visual arguments against women's suffrage. The two examples on the following page are from that collection.

(See color insert, Image 29.)

(See color insert, Image 30.)

© 2013 Washington State History Society. All rights reserved. Website by SiteCrafting.

Courtesy of the Alice Marshall Women's History Collection, Series VII: Postcards, AKM 91/1.2, Archives and Special Collections, Penn State Harrisburg Library, University Libraries, Pennsylvania State University.

Questions

1. The Suffragette Madonna image was particularly popular during this time, and there were many different versions made. Why would this particular visual representation be so appealing to those who opposed enfranchisement of women?
2. How does the composition — use of space, color, placement of objects — add to the emotional appeal of this visual text? How does the expression on the baby's face contribute to this appeal?

3. In what ways is the physical appearance of the man in Suffragette Madonna feminized? Pay attention to his clothing, gaze, expression, and facial characteristics.
4. Uncle Sam, Suffragee is a parody of the Uncle Sam depictions commonly used during the period. What elements are especially noteworthy here? Consider the costume, stance, and facial expression.
5. In what ways is the feminization of Uncle Sam the same as and different from that of the man in Suffragette Madonna?
6. What exactly is the tone of the comedy in each of these postcards? Is it sarcastic humor, bitter irony, playful wit, or something else? Cite specifics from each postcard to support your perspective.
7. Are these two postcards making similar visual arguments, or do you see differences in claims or strategies? Is the chief purpose of each to discredit and denigrate women, to mock men who support enfranchising women, or something else?

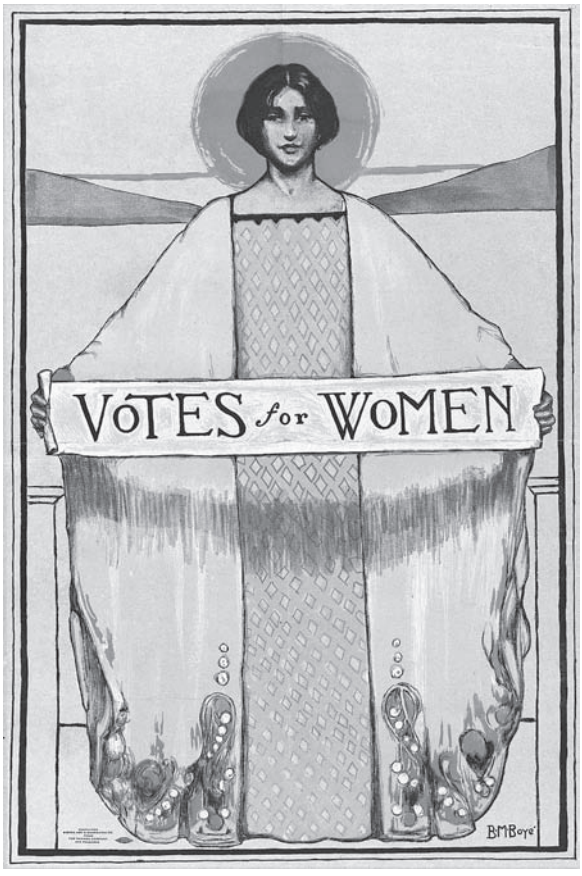
Votes for Women

Bertha M. Boye

Graphic artist Bertha M. Boye (1883–1930) won the contest for most beautiful image of the suffragette cause sponsored by the state of California to advertise the 1911 suffrage referendum. This image is an art nouveau graphic of a woman in front of the Golden Gate, the opening between San Francisco Bay and the Pacific Ocean.

Questions

1. How would you describe the mood of this poster? How do the colors, symmetry, overall setting, and representational figure contribute to the mood?
2. What does the sun symbolize in this image? Consider how its shape, placement, and color suggest multiple meanings.
3. What associations does the central statue-like figure evoke? Is she an allegorical figure? If so, allegorical of what?
4. With which negative stereotypes of suffragettes does the central figure of the painting contrast? How might she be viewed as reinforcing any of the stereotypes?
5. An art critic interpreted the banner that the figure holds as follows: "The poster's slogan appears not as an argument or battle cry, but as an unassailable truth, an 'inalienable right' whose time had come." Explain why and how your interpretation supports, challenges, or qualifies this view.



Schlesinger Library, Radcliffe Institute, Harvard University

(See color insert, Image 31.)

An Anti-Suffrage Monologue

Marie Jenney Howe

Marie Jenney Howe (1871–1934) was a Unitarian minister and founder in 1912 of the Heterodoxy Club of Greenwich Village, a group of women intellectuals. She wrote this satiric "Anti-Suffrage Monologue" in 1913 to be performed by the New York Woman's Suffrage Party's drama group.

Please do not think of me as old-fashioned. I pride myself on being a modern up-to-date woman. I believe in all kinds of broad-mindedness, only I do not believe in woman suffrage because to do that would be to deny my sex.

Woman suffrage is the reform against nature. Look at these ladies sitting on the platform. Observe their physical inability, their mental disability, their spiritual instability and general debility! Could they walk up to the ballot box, mark a ballot, and drop it in? Obviously not. Let us grant for the sake of argument that they could mark a ballot. But could they drop it in? Ah, no. All nature is against it. The laws of man cry out against it. The voice of God cries out against it — and so do I.

Enfranchisement is what makes man man. Disfranchisement is what makes woman woman. If women were enfranchised every man would be just like every woman and every woman would be just like every man. There would be no difference between them. And don't you think this would rob life of just a little of its poetry and romance?

Man must remain man. Woman must remain woman. If man goes over and tries to be like woman, if woman goes over and tries to be like man, it will become so very confusing and so difficult to explain to our children. Let us take a practical example. If a woman puts on a man's coat and trousers, takes a man's cane and hat and cigar, and goes out on the street, what will happen to her? She will be arrested and thrown into jail. Then why not stay at home?

I know you begin to see how strongly I feel on this subject, but I have some reasons as well. These reasons are based on logic. Of course, I am not logical. I am a creature of impulse, instinct, and intuition — and I glory in it. But I know that these reasons are based on logic because I have culled them from the men whom it is my privilege to know.

My first argument against suffrage is that the women would not use it if they had it. You couldn't drive them to the polls. My second argument is, if the women were enfranchised they would neglect their homes, desert their families, and spend all their time at the polls. You may tell me that the polls are only open once a year. But I know women. They are creatures of habit. If you let them go to the polls once a year, they will hang round the polls all the rest of the time.

I have arranged these arguments in couplets. They go together in such a way that if you don't like one you can take the other. This is my second anti-suffrage couplet. If the women were enfranchised they would vote exactly as their husbands do and only double the existing vote. Do you like that argument? If not, take this one. If the women were enfranchised they would vote against their own husbands, thus creating dissension, family quarrels, and divorce.

My third anti-suffrage couplet is — women are angels. Many men call me an angel and I have a strong instinct which tells me it is true; that is why I am an anti, because "I want to be an angel and with the angels stand." And if you don't like that argument take this one. Women are depraved. They would introduce into politics a vicious element which would ruin our national life.

Fourth anti-suffrage couplet: women cannot understand politics. Therefore there would be no use in giving women political power, because they would not know what to do with it. On the other hand, if the women were enfranchised, they would mount rapidly into power, take all the offices from all the men, and soon we would have women governors of all our states and dozens of women acting as President of the United States.

Fifth anti-suffrage couplet: women cannot band together. They are incapable of organization. No two women can even be friends. Women are cats. On the other hand, if women were enfranchised, we would have all the women banded together on one side and all the men banded together on the other side, and there would follow a sex war which might end in bloody revolution.

Just one more of my little couplets: the ballot is greatly over-estimated. It has never done anything for anybody. Lots of men tell me this. And the corresponding argument is — the ballot is what makes man man. It is what gives him all his dignity and all of his superiority to women. Therefore if we allow women to share this privilege, how could a woman look up to her own husband? Why, there would be nothing to look up to.

I have talked to many woman suffragists and I find them very unreasonable. I say to them: "Here I am, convince me." I ask for proof. Then they proceed to tell me of Australia and Colorado and other places where women have passed excellent laws to improve the condition of working women and children. But I say, "What of it?" These are facts. I don't care about facts. I ask for proof.

Then they quote the eight million women of the United States who are now supporting themselves, and the twenty-five thousand married women in the City of New York who are self-supporting. But I say again, what of it? These are statistics. I don't believe in statistics. Facts and statistics are things which no truly womanly woman would ever use.

I wish to prove anti-suffrage in a womanly way — that is, by personal example. This is my method of persuasion. Once I saw a woman driving a horse, and the horse ran away with her. Isn't that just like a woman? Once I read in the newspapers about a woman whose house caught on fire, and she threw the children out of the window and carried the pillows downstairs. Does that show political acumen, or does it not? Besides, look at the hats that women wear! And have you ever known a successful woman governor of a state? Or have you ever known a really truly successful woman president of the United States? Well, if they could they would, wouldn't they? Then, if they haven't, doesn't that show they couldn't? As for the militant suffragettes, they are all hyenas in petticoats. Now do you want to be a hyena and wear petticoats?

Now, I think I have proved anti-suffrage; and I have done it in a womanly way — 15 that is, without stooping to the use of a single fact or argument or a single statistic. . . .

I know the suffragists reply that all our activities have been taken out of the home. The baking, the washing, the weaving, the spinning are all long since taken out of the home. But I say, all the more reason that something should stay in the home. Let it be woman. Besides, think of the great modern invention, the telephone. That has been put into the home. Let woman stay at home and answer the telephone.

We antis have so much imagination! Sometimes it seems to us that we can hear the little babies in the slums crying to us. We can see the children in factories and mines reaching out their little hands to us, and the working women in the sweated industries, the underpaid, underfed women, reaching out their arms to us — all, all crying as with one voice, "Save us, save us, from Woman Suffrage." Well may they make this appeal to us, for who knows what woman suffrage might not do for such as these. It might even alter the conditions under which they live.

We antis do not believe that any conditions should be altered. We want everything to remain just as it is. All is for the best. Whatever is, is right. . . .

(1913)

Questions

1. What stereotypes does Marie Jenney Howe play on in this monologue? Cite specific passages for at least four different characteristics that would argue against women becoming responsible voters.
2. What examples of logical fallacies do you find in this monologue? Consider circular reasoning, red herring, hasty generalization, false dilemma, bandwagon appeal, and others.
3. What elements of satire — such as understatement, hyperbole, and humor — do you find in this monologue?
4. What does Howe mean by her repeated phrase "a womanly way"?
5. An effective satire causes us to laugh, but it also causes us to think; its purpose is to bring about some kind of change, usually social or political. What exactly is Howe satirizing? How effective do you believe her satire is?

from When Everything Changed
The Amazing Journey of American Women from 1950 to the Present

Gail Collins

With a BA in journalism and an MA in government, Gail Collins (b. 1945) became the first woman to serve as editor of the New York Times editorial page (2001–2007). She continues today as an op-ed columnist. Collins is the author of several books, including Scorpion Tongues: Gossip, Celebrity and American Politics (1998); and America's Women: Four Hundred Years of Dolls, Drudges, Helpmates, and Heroines (2003). The following is an excerpt from Chapter 1 of her 2009 book, When Everything Changed: The Amazing Journey of American Women from 1950 to the Present.

1. Repudiating Rosie

"Some of you DO wear a cautious face."

In January 1960, Mademoiselle welcomed in a new decade for America's young women by urging them to be . . . less boring. "Some of you do wear a cautious face," the editors admitted. "But are you really — cautious, unimaginative, determined to play it safe at any price?" Mademoiselle certainly hoped not. But its readers had good reason to set their sights low. The world around them had been drumming one message into their heads since they were babies: women are meant to marry and let their husbands take care of all the matters relating to the outside world. They were not supposed to have adventures or compete with men for serious rewards. ("I think that when women are encouraged to be competitive too many of them become disagreeable," said Dr. Benjamin Spock, whose baby book had served as the bible for the postwar generation of mothers.) Newsweek, decrying a newly noticed phenomenon of dissatisfied housewives in 1960, identified the core of the issue: menstruation. "From the beginning of time, the female cycle has defined and confined woman's role," the newsmagazine wrote. "As Freud was credited with saying: 'Anatomy is destiny.' "

Though no group of women has ever pushed aside these natural restrictions as far as the American wife, it seems that she still cannot accept them in good grace. Most girls grew up without ever seeing a woman doctor, lawyer, police officer, or bus driver. Jo Freeman, who went to Berkeley in the early '60s, realized only later that while she had spent four years "in one of the largest institutions of higher education in the world — and one with a progressive reputation," she had never once had a female professor. "I never even saw one. Worse yet, I didn't notice." If a young woman expressed interest in a career outside the traditional teacher/nurse/secretary, her mentors carefully shepherded her back to the proper path. As a teenager in Pittsburgh, Angela Nolfi told her guidance counselor that she wanted to be an interior decorator, but even that very feminine pursuit apparently struck her adviser as too high-risk or out of the ordinary. "He said, 'Why don't you be a home-economics teacher?' " she recalled. And once Mademoiselle had finished urging its readers to shoot for the sky, it celebrated the end of the school year with an article on careers that seemed to suggest most new college graduates would be assuming secretarial duties, and ended with tips on "pre-job hand-beautifying" for a new generation of typists.

Whenever things got interesting, women seemed to vanish from the scene. There was no such thing as a professional female athlete — even in schools, it was a given that sports were for boys. An official for the men-only Boston Marathon opined that it was "unhealthy for women to run long distances." When Mademoiselle selected seven "headstrong people who have made names for themselves lately" to comment on what the 1960s would bring, that magazine for young women managed to find only one headstrong woman to include in the mix — playwright Lorraine Hansberry, who did double duty as the panel's only minority.

"Women used to be the big stars, but these days it's men."

Nothing sent the message about women's limited options more forcefully than television, which had just finished conquering the nation with a speed that made Alexander the Great look like an underachiever. In 1950 only about 9 percent of American homes boasted a set, but by 1960 nearly 90 percent of families had a TV, and those who didn't were feeling very deprived indeed. Beverly Burton, a Wyoming farm wife, had been estranged throughout the 1950s from a mother who had once told her she was sorry Beverly had ever been born. When her mother decided to mend fences, she sent Burton a note saying, "I hope this will cover the past" — attached to a television set. And it did indeed become a turning point in the relationship.

The postwar generation that was entering adolescence in the 1960s had grown up watching Howdy Doody, the must-see TV for the first wave of baby boomers. Howdy was a raucous puppet show in which the human performers interspersed broad physical comedy with endless pitches for the sponsors' products. "But all the slapstick stopped when they brought out Princess Summerfall Winterspring," remembered Stephen Davis, a childhood fan whose father worked on the show. The princess, played by a teenage singer named Judy Tyler, was the only long-running female character in Howdy Doody's crowded cast. The role had been created when a producer realized "we could sell a lot of dresses if only we had a girl on the show," and the princess spent most of her time expressing concern about plot developments taking place while she was offstage. Adults approved. "The harshness and crudeness which so many parents objected to in Howdy Doody now appears to have largely been a case of too much masculinity," said Variety. But the stuff that made kids love the show — the broad comedy and bizarre plots — was all on the male side of the equation. Princess Summerfall Winterspring sang an occasional song — and watched.

The more popular and influential television became, the more efficiently women were swept off the screen. In the 1950s, when the medium was still feeling its way, there were a number of shows built around women — mainly low-budget comedies such as Our Miss Brooks, Private Secretary, and My Little Margie. None of the main characters were exactly role models — Miss Brooks was a teacher who spent most of her time mooning over a hunky biology instructor, and Margie lived off her rich father. Still, the shows were unquestionably about them. And the most popular program of all was I Love Lucy, in which Lucille Ball was the focus of every plotline, ever striving to get out of her three-room apartment and into her husband Ricky's nightclub show.

But by 1960 television was big business, and if women were around at all, they were in the kitchen, where they decorously stirred a single pot on the stove while their husbands and children dominated the action. (In 1960 the nominees for the Emmy for best comedy series were The Bob Cummings Show, The Danny Thomas Show, The Jack Benny Show, The Red Skelton Show, The Phil Silvers Show, and Father Knows Best.) When a script did turn its attention to the wife, daughter, or mother, it was frequently to remind her of her place and the importance of letting boys win. On Father Knows Best, younger daughter Kathy was counseled by her dad on how to deliberately lose a ball game. Teenage daughter Betty found happiness when she agreed to stop competing with a male student for a junior executive job at the local department store and settled for the more gender-appropriate task of modeling bridal dresses.

In dramatic series, women stood on the sidelines, looking worried. When Betty Friedan asked why there couldn't be a female lead in Mr. Novak — which was, after all, a series about a high school teacher — she said the producer explained, "For drama, there has to be action, conflict. . . . For a woman to make decisions, to triumph over anything, would be unpleasant, dominant, masculine." Later in the decade, the original Star Trek series would feature a story about a woman so desperate to become a starship captain — a post apparently restricted to men — that she arranged to have her brain transferred into Captain Kirk's body. The crew quickly noticed that the captain was manicuring his nails at the helm and having hysterics over the least little thing.

Cowboy action series were the best-loved TV entertainment in 1960. Eleven of the top twenty-five shows were Westerns, and they underlined the rule that women did not have adventures, except the ones that involved getting kidnapped or caught in a natural disaster. "Women used to be the big stars, but these days it's men," said Michael Landon, one of the leads in Bonanza, the long-running story of an all-male family living on a huge Nevada ranch after the Civil War. Perhaps to emphasize their heterosexuality, the Cartwright men had plenty of romances. But the scriptwriters killed their girlfriends off at an extraordinarily speedy clip. The family patriarch, Ben, had been widowed three times, and his three sons all repeatedly got married or engaged, only to quickly lose their mates to the grim reaper. A rather typical episode began with Joe (Landon) happily dancing with a new fiancée. Before the first commercial, the poor girl was murdered on her way home from the hoedown.

(2009)

Questions

1. What preconceptions about the role of women does Gail Collins allude to in the opening paragraph? What authorities does she cite to support her allegations?
2. Although Collins gives Mademoiselle, a magazine geared to young women, some credit for encouraging its readers to look beyond society's expectations, she also indicates ways the magazine reflects those expectations. What evidence does she cite to illustrate what she perceives as Mademoiselle's ambivalence toward the changing role of women in the 1960s?
3. What examples does she cite to support her assertion that "[n]othing sent the message about women's limited options more forcefully than television" (par. 4)?
4. To what extent do women in today's television shows challenge the stereotypes Collins describes? Cite at least one program or series that does challenge and another that is a remnant of the late 1950s shows Collins refers to.

from The New Feminist Agenda

Madeleine M. Kunin

Madeleine M. Kunin (b. 1933) was the first woman governor of Vermont and the first woman in the United States to serve three terms. Author of Living a Political Life (1994), she served as the ambassador to Switzerland from 1996 to 1999 and currently is a professor at the University of Vermont. Following is "Time for a Revolution," the opening chapter of The New Feminist Agenda: Defining the Next Revolution for Women, Work, and Family (2012).

Five of us were meeting for lunch and reminiscing about the women's movement. "I was never one of those angry women," one said. "I'm still angry," I blurted. My reaction surprised both me and my friends. Where did that come from? A source I hadn't tapped before. Upon reflection, I realized that I'm not angry enough to carry a placard down hot macadam streets in front of the nation's Capitol, like I did in my thirties when I marched for women's rights. But now in my seventies I'm still dissatisfied with the status quo and harbor a passion for change. Old age allows me the luxury of being impatient — there is not so much time left — and it permits me to say what I think, to be demanding, and, best of all, to imagine a different world where there is true gender equality in the workplace, the home, and the political arena.

Why the anger? What did I expect?

I expected that the women's movement of the 1970s would give me a good answer to the question my students regularly asked: how do you manage to have a family and a career?

I expected that affordable, quality child care would be widely available, that paid family leave would be the law, and that equal pay for equal work would be a reality. I did not expect that women would still make 77 cents for every dollar that men earn.

I expected that one-third to one-half of our Congress, governors, state legislatures, and mayors would be female. I did not expect that in 2010 that number would be 17 percent in the Congress, and the United States would be tied at 69th place in the percentage of women in parliaments, out of 178 countries.

I expected that one-third to one-half of corporate board members would be women. I did not expect to see that proportion stuck at 17 percent.

I expected that a high percentage of the Fortune 500 companies would be led by women. I did not expect that figure to be 3 percent.

I expected that misogyny, rape, and other acts of violence against women would be widely condemned and sharply reduced. I did not expect that a female journalist could be sexually abused in the middle of Cairo's Tahrir Square and then blamed for bringing it on herself, as Lara Logan of CBS News experienced in February 2011.

I expected that Roe v. Wade would remain the law of the land. I did not expect that it would be eroded, state by state.

I expected that by the year 2011 grandmothers like myself would be able to tell their grandchildren of how life used to be "long ago," when families had to figure out for themselves how to be both wage earners and caregivers.

Some changes occurred that I had not expected and could not have imagined: that women would comprise nearly 60 percent of college undergraduates, that women would comprise half of the medical and law students, that women would enter the workforce in record numbers, and that the traditional family supported by the father would be overtaken by the two-wage-earner family.

That's the good news. The bad news is that many women who have careers that we never could have imagined for ourselves are still flummoxed by the most age-old problem: how to have a job and take care of the children, the elderly, the sick, and the disabled. Until we find a way to sort out how to share these responsibilities — between spouses, partners, employers, and governments — gender equality will remain an elusive goal. Progress for women will remain stalled. But it's not only about gender anymore. As I write, Italy is in an economic crisis, in danger of defaulting on its government debt. One reason given for its economic woes is that it has the lowest percentage of women in the workforce in all of Europe. Why? Whether because of the country's macho culture or lack of family support programs, Italy offers little in the way of encouragement or assistance for working families.

Time for Change, Again

The countries that do support working families benefit from greater productivity and social well-being. It is time for another social revolution, not for the benefit of women alone, but for the most traditional of reasons: for the sake of the family. We need to reweave the fabric of society to provide the love and care necessary for the more fragile members of our families. The workplace must be reconfigured to harmonize with these responsibilities. The urgency for change is felt by families at all income levels, even those who are able to negotiate flexibility for themselves and can afford to pay for quality child care. Middle- and low-income employees are most starkly affected by today's work/life stress. They cannot make ends meet, financially or emotionally. They experience a severe time deficit that does not allow them to give enough of themselves at work or at home. These frustrations are commonplace. If the kitchen table, the water cooler, or Twitter could talk, these stories would overwhelm all other conversation. If one family's text messages about who is picking up the children or shopping for dinner were gathered in a book over a few years, it would be too heavy to lift.

The question families ponder is: how can we be better parents and employees without neglecting either our families or our jobs? We are beginning to understand the individual cost that the schism between work and family exacts. We have not added up the national cost. Our reluctance, or outright refusal, to enact policies that would bridge the gap between family and work has contributed to disturbing national statistics: alarmingly high child poverty rates, declining college graduation rates and test scores, and a growing chasm between the rich, the middle class, and the poor. Our inability — for political, economic, or cultural reasons — to invest in families leaves us vulnerable to being reduced to second-rate status in the global economy. Impossible to measure, but not to be ignored, is the moral cost we pay by depriving so many young Americans of the chance to realize the American Dream.

It is time to mobilize a constituency for change. Who is to be charged with calling 15 a halt to the "push-me, pull-me" tug-of-war game that families are forced to play? The obvious answer is: women, as part of a broad coalition, attending to the unfinished business of feminism.

As New York Times columnist Gail Collins concluded in her book When Everything Changed, "The feminist movement of the late twentieth century created a new United States in which women ran for president, fought for their country, argued before the Supreme Court, performed heart surgery, directed movies, and flew into space. But it did not resolve the tensions of trying to raise children and hold down a job at the same time. . . . They had not remade the world the way the revolutionaries had hoped."

Do feminists have an obligation to complete their mission of gender equality? Yes, but not single-handedly. The issue of accommodating both work and family has outgrown the parameters of our current perception of feminism. The entire family is affected when women and men cannot find equanimity in their lives: women, men, children, grandparents, and uncles and aunts. The new constituency for work/life policies is inclusive. We have left the female ghetto of family/work issues and moved into every neighborhood.

Women have traditionally led the charge on family issues, in part because of experience: fatigue from too many late-night feedings, red knees from too much scrubbing, and creased brows from too much worrying about where the children are and what they might be doing. Women spoke up because they knew what they were talking about, but more often they were out front because no one else would volunteer. Women remain the key sponsors of legislation affecting women and families, both in Congress and in state legislatures, because they understand the chapters of their own lives. But women alone can no longer complete the mission. We need that other half — men — to march at our sides, linked arm-in arm as we approach the Capitol steps. What demands will we make? Let's translate the easy rhetoric of "family values" into tough action. Enough sweet talk; we want results that will enable us to be good parents, good caregivers, and good workers.

When women try to figure out the conundrum of finding a good match between work and family, we believe it is only a question of balance. We add an ounce or two on one side of the work/life scale, and subtract an ounce from the other. Perfect — for one moment, but not for the next, when a child gets sick or a new supervisor changes the schedule, or there is an unexpected pregnancy. Suddenly we're out of kilter. And the responsibility for being out of balance is ours and ours alone. We have failed.

We are not alone. When we fall, we bring our families down with us. They bear the consequences of either less income or less care, or both. A minority of highly skilled, highly paid women can negotiate paid family leave and flexible schedules, but the majority cannot because they don't have the power to ask without fear of losing their jobs, and they rightly fear that they are easily replaceable. 20

One by one, women's and men's requests for policies that support families have been denied. Demands made by a broad and diverse coalition are harder to ignore. This has been the pattern of change throughout history: when the "I" becomes "we," a cause begins to move from the fringe to the center, as has been exemplified by the social changes brought about by movements for disability rights and gay and lesbian civil rights.

Who are "we"? We are the disparate constituencies — children, women (all women, not only those who call themselves feminists, but also those who shudder at the idea of being called feminists), the elderly, the handicapped, the sick — who can give one loud shout out for change. Such a large chorus will increase the volume, but noise is not enough. To build strong bonds among constituencies that have not often worked together, we have to start by redefining ourselves. Can we mobilize under the banner of Feminists for Families?

(2012)

Questions

1. Madeleine M. Kunin begins with an anecdote about herself and her friends in which she calls attention to her history as a feminist and, hence, her age. What ethos is she establishing with this personal opening?
2. What rhetorical strategies is she employing in paragraphs 2–10 when she lists all the things she "expected"?
3. What concessions does she make to possible counterarguments? How effective is her refutation?
4. What is Kunin's principal claim? This is an argument of policy that calls for a change. What is that change?
5. What does she mean when she writes that we "are beginning to understand the individual cost that the schism between work and family exacts. We have not added up the national cost" (par. 14)? Does she support her statement later in that same paragraph that our inability "to invest in families leaves us vulnerable to being reduced to second-rate status in the global economy"?
6. How does she answer her question, "Do feminists have an obligation to complete their mission of gender equality" (par. 17)?
7. How effective do you find her analogy that her call to action for policies "that support families" is similar to "the social changes brought about by movements for disability rights and gay and lesbian civil rights" (par. 21)?

Making Connections

1. Would Susan B. Anthony (p. 971) more likely be in agreement with the thinking of Florence Kelley (p. 980) or of Marie Jenney Howe (p. 985)? Are there areas of agreement among all three of these women?
2. What similarities do you find between the arguments of Charlotte Perkins Gilman (p. 974) and Thorstein Veblen (p. 976)?
3. In what ways does the passage from The House of Mirth by Edith Wharton (p. 978) illustrate the ideas of Gilman or Veblen?
4. What concerns do Kelley and Madeleine M. Kunin (p. 991) share, despite their separation in time of more than a century?
5. In what ways are the graphics Suffragette Madonna (p. 983) and Votes for Women (p. 985) alike and different in terms of viewpoint and rhetorical strategy?
6. Which of the stereotypes that Howe satirizes do you see in the antisuffragette postcards?
7. Which issues raised by either Anthony or Wharton are touched upon again in Gail Collins's analysis (p. 988) of society's expectations of women at the start of the 1960s?

Entering the Conversation

As you respond to each of the following prompts, support your position with appropriate evidence, including at least three sources in this Conversation on the changing roles of women, unless otherwise indicated.

1. Which of the goals of the early advocates for a more meaningful political and economic role and personal life for women do you believe have been achieved?
2. Some of the authors during the late 1800s and early 1900s advocated social change by arguing that the enfranchisement of women would strengthen the existing culture rather than overturn or even change it. Discuss at least three different arguments put forth to articulate this position. Which do you find the most effective and why?
3. Many of the suffragists emphasized the plight of the working woman and, implicitly or explicitly, argued for a natural alliance between the suffragists and workers. Discuss how the texts in this Conversation argue that the women's suffrage movement would not only benefit women but also all workers and, thus, the entire economy.
4. In the 1960s, during the so-called Women's Liberation Movement, the Virginia Slims cigarette manufacturers launched an advertising campaign with the slogan, "You've come a long way, baby!" This campaign continued for more than a decade, with many of the ads depicting fictional historical events involving women during the suffrage period of the early nineteenth century. Many showed women smoking as an act of rebellion and poked fun at the men who tried to censure them. Ultimately, concern over the health risks of smoking led to shifts in approaches to the ads, but during their heyday this campaign was very successful. Find some of these ads online and discuss how images of women's suffrage were interpreted to serve the purposes of the advertiser.
5. In "The End of Men," an article by Hanna Rosin in the Atlantic in 2012, she asks, "What if the postindustrial economy is simply more congenial to women than to men?" Rosin cites the fact that during the recession of 2008, "three quarters of the eight million jobs lost were lost by men," and that many of those jobs in construction and manufacturing are unlikely to return to a position of prominence. Further, Rosin points out that today women outnumber men in colleges and professional schools and that the qualities most valued in the early twenty-first century economy — "social intelligence, open communication, the ability to sit still and focus" — are qualities that women, because of society's prevailing values, are more likely than men to develop. She concludes:

   > Yes, the U.S. still has a wage gap, one that can be convincingly explained — at least in part — by discrimination. Yes, women still do most of the child care. And yes, > the upper reaches of society are still dominated by men. But given the power of the forces pushing at the economy, this setup feels like the last gasp of a dying age rather than the permanent establishment. Dozens of college women I interviewed for this story assumed that they very well might be the ones working while their husbands stayed at home, either looking for work or minding the children. Guys, one [college] senior remarked to me, "are the new ball and chain." It may be happening slowly and unevenly, but it's unmistakably happening: in the long view, the modern economy is becoming a place where women hold the cards.

Explain why you agree or disagree with Rosin's argument that the workplace has shifted to favor women.

Conversation

Immigration: The Lure of America

America is a land of immigrants. Unless you are a native American Indian, you are descended from immigrants. While the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries saw fewer than one million immigrants to the United States, most of them from the British Isles, the numbers increased dramatically in the middle of the nineteenth century. During the period between 1840 and 1930, nearly thirty million Europeans came to settle in America. In the first decade of the twentieth century, over a million people came per year.

But immigrants were not always welcome, and throughout our history certain groups have been excluded and citizenship restricted. The U.S. Naturalization Law of 1790 states that "any Alien being a free white person, who shall have resided within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States for the term of two years, may be admitted to become a citizen thereof." In 1875, the Page Act, named for California congressman Horace F. Page, specifically restricted Asian immigration in order to end "cheap Chinese labor." The 1882 Chinese Exclusion Act was even more restrictive.

While these early restrictions were attempts to exclude Asians and Africans, new restrictions would apply to Southern and Eastern Europeans. In order to "preserve" the national and ethnic character of the country, the 1921 Emergency Immigration Act restricted the number of immigrants admitted from any country annually to "3 percent of the number of residents from that same country living in the United States," and the Immigration Act of 1924 reduced that to 2 percent.

A national debate on this issue continues to rage today. How open do we want our borders to be? How restrictive should we be? How welcome are immigrants today? What threats do we perceive from immigrants? What contributions can we expect? Is the United States still a melting pot? Is this still the "Promised Land"? What continues to be the lure of America? Consider these questions as you read the sources and enter this Conversation on immigration and the lure of America.

Sources

Emma Lazarus, The New Colossus (1883)
Dennis Kearney and H. L. Knight, Appeal from California. The Chinese Invasion. Workingman's Address (1878)
Joseph McDonnell, The Chinese Must Go (1878)
Joseph Keppler, Looking Backward (1893)
Robert H. Clancy, An Un-American Bill (1924)
Ellison DuRant Smith, Shut the Door (1924)
Mary Gordon, More than Just a Shrine (1985)
Charles Bowden, Our Wall (2007)
Christoph Niemann, Promised Land (2011)
Walter Russell Mead, America's New Tiger Immigrants (2012)

The New Colossus

Emma Lazarus

Written in 1883 and engraved on a bronze plaque inside the Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor in 1903, the following sonnet is by Jewish American poet Emma Lazarus (1849–1887).

Not like the brazen giant of Greek fame,
With conquering limbs astride from land to land;
Here at our sea-washed, sunset gates shall stand
A mighty woman with a torch, whose flame
Is the imprisoned lightning, and her name
Mother of Exiles. From her beacon-hand
Glows world-wide welcome; her mild eyes command
The air-bridged harbor that twin cities frame.
"Keep, ancient lands, your storied pomp!" cries she
With silent lips. "Give me your tired, your poor,
Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free,
The wretched refuse of your teeming shore.
Send these, the homeless, tempest-tost to me,
I lift my lamp beside the golden door!"

(1883)

Questions

1. Notice that Emma Lazarus begins with an image of what the Statue of Liberty is not like. How does its contrast with the ancient Colossus of Rhodes affect the meaning of the poem?
2. How do the statue's welcoming words to the oppressed contribute to the American idea of the country as a "melting pot"?
3. Do you see an irony in welcoming the "huddled masses" (l. 11) and "wretched refuse" (l. 12) through the "golden door" (l. 14)? Do you think Americans still hold to that welcoming idea today? Why or why not?

Appeal from California. The Chinese Invasion. Workingman's Address

Dennis Kearney and H. L. Knight

Dennis Kearney and H. L. Knight were labor leaders, respectively president and secretary of California's Workingmen's Party. In this article, which appeared in the Indianapolis Times on February 28, 1878, they argue for the exclusion of Chinese workers.

Our moneyed men have ruled us for the past thirty years. Under the flag of the slaveholder they hoped to destroy our liberty. Failing in that, they have rallied under the banner of the millionaire, the banker and the land monopolist, the railroad king and the false politician, to effect their purpose.

We have permitted them to become immensely rich against all sound republican policy, and they have turned upon us to sting us to death. They have seized upon the government by bribery and corruption. They have made speculation and public robbery a science. They have loaded the nation, the state, the county, and the city with debt. They have stolen the public lands. They have grasped all to themselves, and by their unprincipled greed brought a crisis of unparalleled distress on forty millions of people, who have natural resources to feed, clothe, and shelter the whole human race.

Such misgovernment, such mismanagement, may challenge the whole world for intense stupidity, and would put to shame the darkest tyranny of the barbarous past.

We, here in California, feel it as well as you. We feel that the day and hour has come for the Workingmen of America to depose capital and put Labor in the Presidential chair, in the Senate and Congress, in the State House, and on the Judicial Bench. We are with you in this work. Workingmen must form a party of their own, take charge of the government, dispose gilded fraud, and put honest toil in power.

In our golden state all these evils have been intensified. Land monopoly has 5 seized upon all the best soil in this fair land. A few men own from ten thousand to two hundred thousand acres each. The poor Laborer can find no resting place, save on the barren mountain, or in the trackless desert. Money monopoly has reached its grandest proportions. Here, in San Francisco, the palace of the millionaire looms up above the hovel of the starving poor with as wide a contrast as anywhere on earth.

To add to our misery and despair, a bloated aristocracy has sent to China — the greatest and oldest despotism in the world — for a cheap working slave. It rakes the slums of Asia to find the meanest slave on earth — the Chinese coolie — and imports him here to meet the free American in the Labor market, and still further widen the breach between the rich and the poor, still further to degrade white Labor.

These cheap slaves fill every place. Their dress is scant and cheap. Their food is rice from China. They hedge twenty in a room, ten by ten. They are whipped curs, abject in docility, mean, contemptible, and obedient in all things. They have no wives, children, or dependents.

They are imported by companies, controlled as serfs, worked like slaves, and at last go back to China with all their earnings. They are in every place, they seem to have no sex. Boys work, girls work; it is all alike to them.

The father of a family is met by them at every turn. Would he get work for himself? Ah! A stout Chinaman does it cheaper. Will he get a place for his oldest boy? He can not. His girl? Why, the Chinaman is in her place too! Every door is closed. He can only go to crime or suicide, his wife and daughter to prostitution, and his boys to hoodlumism and the penitentiary.

Do not believe those who call us savages, rioters, incendiaries, and outlaws. We seek our ends calmly, rationally, at the ballot box. So far good order has marked all our proceedings. But, we know how false, how inhuman, our adversaries are. We know that if gold, if fraud, if force can defeat us, they will all be used. And we have resolved that they shall not defeat us. We shall arm. We shall meet fraud and falsehood with defiance, and force with force, if need be. 10

We are men, and propose to live like men in this free land, without the contamination of slave labor, or die like men, if need be, in asserting the rights of our race, our country, and our families.

California must be all American or all Chinese. We are resolved that it shall be American, and are prepared to make it so. May we not rely upon your sympathy and assistance?

With great respect for the Workingman's Party of California.
Dennis Kearney, President
H.L. Knight, Secretary
(1878)

Questions

1. Identify three appeals that Dennis Kearney and H. L. Knight make in paragraphs 1–3. How do they contribute to the effectiveness of the argument?

2. How do the authors characterize American workers? How do they characterize Chinese workers?
3. Where do the authors exaggerate? How does the hyperbole affect their position? Is it helpful or dissuasive? Explain.
4. In paragraph 10, the authors shift their stance to address the readers directly. Do you read that paragraph more as a promise or a threat? Explain.
5. What in the piece elicits your sympathy? What elicits your aversion? To what extent do you agree or disagree with the argument presented? Explain.
6. Apply the Toulmin model to the selection. How does that analysis affect your view of the argument?

The Chinese Must Go

Joseph McDonnell

Born in Ireland, Joseph McDonnell became an American labor leader. In this June 30, 1878, editorial in the New York Labor Standard, he defends the rights of all workers and argues against exclusion based on nationality.

The cry that the "Chinese must go" is both narrow and unjust. It represents no broad or universal principle. It is merely a repetition of the cry that was raised years ago by native Americans against the immigration of Irishmen, Englishmen, Germans and others from European nations. It now ill becomes those, or the descendants of those, against whom this cry was raised in past years, to raise a similar tocsin against a class of foreigners who have been degraded by ages of oppression.

The "Know Nothing" movement had its REAL origin in the dread of native workmen that they would be undersold in the labor market by the cheap labor of Great Britain, Germany and other European countries. The American workingmen were accustomed to wear better clothes, live in better habitations, eat better food, and consequently, received better wages than the workingmen of Europe. For these reasons they dreaded the immigration of Europeans, whose habits were not so independent, and whose style of living was so inferior, because they saw clearly that the new comers would be satisfied with a rate of wages that would provide them with the class of living they had been accustomed to.

The feeling at the bottom of the "Know Nothing" movement IN ITS EARLY DAYS was certainly a general one against low wages, and if it had raised the cry: "No low wages," "No cheap labor!" instead of sounding the intolerant, silly and shameful cry against Irishmen, Englishmen, Germans and all other "foreigners," it would have accomplished incalculable good. As it was it fell into the hands of infamous, scheming politicians, who pandered to the worst prejudices of the masses by raising a cry against men of various religious faiths and foreign nationalities. This policy suited them; it raised them to prominence and office and allowed what they IN THEIR HEARTS desired, the onward march of low wages.

In our day we must commit no such blunders. We have certainly a right to protect and use every available means against the capitalistic combinations through which thousands of poor and ill-fed beings are imported to this country from China, Italy and elsewhere, but we have no right to raise a cry against any class of human beings because of their nationality. The workingmen of England have given us an example in this respect which we would do well to follow. Instead of raising a cry throughout all England against the American Chinese who have been brought over there to cut down wages, the workingmen have distinctly stated that they welcome workingmen from all nations, and that their warfare is only against the system of low wages and all who support it.

Let us do in a like manner. Let us organize and raise our voices against low wages and long hours. Let us use our organized power against the capitalistic combinations which carry on a slave trade between this country and China and elsewhere, by importing thousands for the purpose of reducing wages in America. Let our first stand be against those rich and intelligent thieves who strive to perpetuate and establish a system of overwork and starvation pay. And then against all those, whether they be Chinese or American, Irish or English, French or German, Spanish or Italian who refuse to cooperate with us for their good and ours, and that of the whole human family.

We must not forget that in Pennsylvania, and other States, where there are no Chinese, there is absolutely a worse state of affairs than exists even in China, and furthermore that America is now doing unto England, what China has been doing unto America.

We favor every effort against the conspiracy of the rich to import cheap labor from Europe and Asia, but we warn the workingmen that no action but International Labor action, and no cry but that of high wages and short hours will lead us into the promised land of peace, plenty and happiness.

(1878)

Questions

1. What is the basis of Joseph McDonnell's appeal in the first paragraph?
2. McDonnell attacks demands for exclusion of Chinese workers. How effectively does his editorial address the argument made by Dennis Kearney and H. L. Knight (p. 999)?
3. Identify the features of classical arrangement (pp. 116–17) that you find in McDonnell's argument. How do they contribute to its effectiveness?
4. McDonnell is an immigrant. How does that information affect his ethos? Explain.
5. What do you consider McDonnell's most compelling statement? Explain why you find it so powerful.
6. Apply the Toulmin model to McDonnell's editorial. How does that analysis affect your view of his argument?

Looking Backward

Joseph Keppler

The following political cartoon by Vienna-born Austrian American cartoonist Joseph Keppler (1838–1894) appeared on January 11, 1893, in Puck, a magazine of humor and satire founded by Keppler and published in St. Louis, Missouri.

The Art Archive at Art Resource, NY

(See color insert, Image 32.)

Questions

1. How would you describe the man on the gangplank? The men on the dock? What do the characters depict?
2. What do the shadows behind the figures represent? Explain.
3. How does Joseph Keppler's use of irony contribute to the argument that the cartoon presents?
4. This cartoon was originally accompanied by a caption that read, "They would close to the new-comer the bridge that carried them and their fathers over." Apply the Toulmin model to it. How would you paraphrase the meaning of the cartoon after such an analysis?

An Un-American Bill

Robert H. Clancy

The following speech was delivered on April 8, 1924, by Congressman Robert H. Clancy of Michigan during the debate over the Johnson Reed Act, which would become U.S. immigration law in 1924. The new law would establish quotas and restrict immigration much more than previous legislation had, effectively banning immigration from Asia.

Since the foundations of the American commonwealth were laid in colonial times over 300 years ago, vigorous complaint and more or less bitter persecution have been aimed at newcomers to our shores. Also the congressional reports of about 1840 are full of abuse of English, Scotch, Welsh immigrants as paupers, criminals, and so forth.

Old citizens in Detroit of Irish and German descent have told me of the fierce tirades and propaganda directed against the great waves of Irish and Germans who came over from 1840 on for a few decades to escape civil, racial, and religious persecution in their native lands.

The "Know-Nothings,"[1] lineal ancestors of the Ku-Klux Klan, bitterly denounced the Irish and Germans as mongrels, scum, foreigners, and a menace to our institutions, much as other great branches of the Caucasian race of glorious history and antecedents are berated to-day. All are riff-raff, unassimilables, "foreign devils," swine not fit to associate with the great chosen people — a form of national pride and hallucination as old as the division of races and nations.

But to-day it is the Italians, Spanish, Poles, Jews, Greeks, Russians, Balkanians, and so forth, who are the racial lepers. And it is eminently fitting and proper that so many Members of this House with names as Irish as Paddy's pig, are taking the floor these days to attack once more as their kind has attacked for seven bloody centuries the fearful fallacy of chosen peoples and inferior peoples. The fearful fallacy is that one is made to rule and the other to be abominated. . . .

In this bill we find racial discrimination at its worst — a deliberate attempt to go back 34 years in our census taken every 10 years so that a blow may be aimed at peoples of eastern and southern Europe, particularly at our recent allies in the Great War — Poland and Italy.

Jews in Detroit Are Good Citizens

Of course the Jews too are aimed at, not directly, because they have no country in Europe they can call their own, but they are set down among the inferior peoples. Much of the animus against Poland and Russia, old and new, with the countries that have arisen from the ruins of the dead Czar's European dominions, is directed against the Jew.

[1] A nineteenth-century anti-immigrant political party. Members who were asked about the secret organization were supposed to respond, "I know nothing." — Eds.

We have many American citizens of Jewish descent in Detroit, tens of thousands of them — active in every profession and every walk of life. They are particularly active in charities and merchandising. One of our greatest judges, if not the greatest, is a Jew. Surely no fair-minded person with a knowledge of the facts can say the Jews of Detroit are a menace to the city's or the country's well-being. . . .

Italian Citizens Are Not Inferior

Forty or fifty thousand Italian-Americans live in my district in Detroit. They are found in all walks and classes of life — common hard labor, the trades, business, law, medicine, dentistry, art, literature, banking, and so forth.

They rapidly become Americanized, build homes, and make themselves into good citizens. They brought hardihood, physique, hope, and good humor with them from their outdoor life in Sunny Italy, and they bear up under the terrific strain of life and work in busy Detroit.

One finds them by thousands digging streets, sewers, and building foundations, 10 and in the automobile and iron and steel fabric factories of various sorts. They do the hard work that the native-born American dislikes. Rapidly they rise in life and join the so-called middle and upper classes. . . .

The Italian-Americans of Detroit played a glorious part in the Great War. They showed themselves as patriotic as the native born in offering the supreme sacrifice.

In all, I am informed, over 300,000 Italian-speaking soldiers enlisted in the American Army, almost 10 per cent of our total fighting force. Italians formed about 4 per cent of the population of the United States and they formed 10 per cent of the American military force. Their casualties were 12 per cent. . . .

Detroit Satisfied with the Poles

I wish to take the liberty of informing the House that from my personal knowledge and observation of tens of thousands of Polish-Americans living in my district in Detroit that their Americanism and patriotism are unassailable from any fair or just standpoint.

The Polish-Americans are as industrious and as frugal and as loyal to our institutions as any class of people who have come to the shores of this country in the past 300 years. They are essentially home builders, and they have come to this country to stay. They learn the English language as quickly as possible, and take pride in the rapidity with which they become assimilated and adopt our institutions.

Figures available to all show that in Detroit in the World War the proportion of 15 American volunteers of Polish blood was greater than the proportion of Americans of any other racial descent. . . .

Polish-Americans do not merit slander nor defamation. If not granted charitable or sympathetic judgment, they are at least entitled to justice and to the high place they have won in American and European history and citizenship.

The forces behind the Johnson bill and some of its champions in Congress charge that opposition to the racial discrimination feature of the 1890 quota basis arises from "foreign blocs." They would give the impression that 100 per cent Americans are for it and that the sympathies of its opponents are of the "foreign-bloc" variety, and bear stigma of being "hyphenates." I meet that challenge willingly. I feel my Americanism will stand any test.

Every American Had Foreign Ancestors

The foreign born of my district writhe under the charge of being called "hyphenates." The people of my own family were all hyphenates — English-Americans, German-Americans, Irish-Americans. They began to come in the first ship or so after the Mayflower. But they did not come too early to miss the charge of anti-Americanism. Roger Williams was driven out of the Puritan colony of Salem to die in the wilderness because he objected "violently" to blue laws and the burning or hanging of rheumatic old women on witchcraft charges. He would not "assimilate" and was "a grave menace to American institutions and democratic government."

My family put 11 men and boys into the Revolutionary War, and I am sure they and their women and children did not suffer so bitterly and sacrifice until it hurt to establish the autocracy of bigotry and intolerance which exists in many quarters to-day in this country. Some of these men and boys shed their blood and left their bodies to rot on American battle fields. To me real Americanism and the American flag are the product of the blood of men and of the tears of women and children of a different type than the rampant "Americanizers" of to-day.

My mother's father fought in the Civil War, leaving his six small children in Detroit when he marched away to the southern battle fields to fight against racial distinctions and protect his country. 20

My mother's little brother, about 14 years old, and the eldest child, fired by the traditions of his family, plodded off to the battle fields to do his bit. He aspired to be a drummer boy and inspire the men in battle, but he was found too small to carry a drum and was put at the ignominious task of driving army mules, hauling cannons and wagons.

I learned more of the spirit of American history at my mother's knee than I ever learned in my four years of high-school study of American history and in my five and a half years of study at the great University of Michigan.

All that study convinces me that the racial discriminations of this bill are un-American. . . .

It must never be forgotten also that the Johnson bill, although it claims to favor the northern and eastern European peoples only, does so on a basis of comparison with the southern and eastern European peoples. The Johnson bill cuts down materially the number of immigrants allowed to come from northern and western Europe, the so-called Nordic peoples. . . .

Then I would be true to the principles for which my forefathers fought and true 25 to the real spirit of the magnificent United States of to-day. I can not stultify myself by voting for the present bill and overwhelm my country with racial hatreds and racial lines and antagonisms drawn even tighter than they are to-day. [Applause.]

(1924)

Questions

1. In the fourth paragraph, Congressman Robert H. Clancy refers to "Italians, Spanish, Poles, Jews, Greeks, Russians, Balkanians, and so forth, who are the racial lepers." Why do you think he uses the phrase "racial lepers"? Is such language appropriate? What might be the response if a congressperson used such language today? Explain.
2. Clancy specifically considers the cases of Jews, Italians, and Poles. How effectively do these examples support his position?
3. What is the rhetorical effect of Clancy's reference to Roger Williams (par. 18)?
4. Does Clancy's reference to his own family appeal to ethos, logos, or pathos? Explain.
5. Congressman Clancy says that "the racial discriminations of this bill are un-American" (par. 23). How effectively has he supported that claim?

Shut the Door

Ellison DuRant Smith

The following speech was delivered on April 9, 1924, by Senator Ellison DuRant Smith of South Carolina during the debate over the Johnson Reed Act, which would become U.S. immigration law in 1924.

It seems to me the point as to this measure — and I have been so impressed for several years — is that the time has arrived when we should shut the door. We have been called the melting pot of the world. We had an experience just a few years ago, during the great World War, when it looked as though we had allowed influences to enter our borders that were about to melt the pot in place of us being the melting pot.

I think that we have sufficient stock in America now for us to shut the door, Americanize what we have, and save the resources of America for the natural increase of our population. We all know that one of the most prolific causes of war is the desire for increased land ownership for the overflow of a congested population. We are increasing at such a rate that in the natural course of things in a comparatively few years the landed resources, the natural resources of the country, shall be taken up by the natural increase of our population. It seems to me the part of wisdom now that we have throughout the length and breadth of continental America a population which is beginning to encroach upon the reserve and virgin resources of the country to keep it in trust for the multiplying population of the country.

I do not believe that political reasons should enter into the discussion of this very vital question. It is of greater concern to us to maintain the institutions of America, to maintain the principles upon which this Government is founded, than to develop and exploit the undeveloped resources of the country. There are some things that are dearer to us, fraught with more benefit to us, than the immediate development of the undeveloped resources of the country. I believe that our particular ideas, social, moral, religious, and political, have demonstrated, by virtue of the progress we have made and the character of people that we are, that we have the highest ideals of any member of the human family or any nation. We have demonstrated the fact that the human family, certainly the predominant breed in America, can govern themselves by a direct government of the people. If this Government shall fail, it shall fail by virtue of the terrible law of inherited tendency. Those who come from the nations which from time immemorial have been under the dictation of a master fall more easily by the law of inheritance and the inertia of habit into a condition of political servitude than the descendants of those who cleared the forests, conquered the savage, stood at arms and won their liberty from their mother country, England.

I think we now have sufficient population in our country for us to shut the door and to breed up a pure, unadulterated American citizenship. I recognize that there is a dangerous lack of distinction between people of a certain nationality and the breed of the dog. Who is an American? Is he an immigrant from Italy? Is he an immigrant from Germany? If you were to go abroad and some one were to meet you and say, "I met a typical American," what would flash into your mind as a typical American, the typical representative of that new Nation? Would it be the son of an Italian immigrant, the son of a German immigrant, the son of any of the breeds from the Orient, the son of the denizens of Africa? We must not get our ethnological distinctions mixed up with our anthropological distinctions. It is the breed of the dog in which I am interested. I would like for the Members of the Senate to read that book just recently published by Madison Grant, The Passing of a Great Race. Thank God we have in America perhaps the largest percentage of any country in the world of the pure, unadulterated Anglo-Saxon stock; certainly the greatest of any nation in the Nordic breed. It is for the preservation of that splendid stock that has characterized us that I would make this not an asylum for the oppressed of all countries, but a country to assimilate and perfect that splendid type of manhood that has made America the foremost Nation in her progress and in her power, and yet the youngest of all the nations. I myself believe that the preservation of her institutions depends upon us now taking counsel with our condition and our experience during the last World War.

Without offense, but with regard to the salvation of our own, let us shut the door 5 and assimilate what we have, and let us breed pure American citizens and develop our own American resources. I am more in favor of that than I am of our quota proposition. Of course, it may not meet the approbation of the Senate that we shall shut the door — which I unqualifiedly and unreservedly believe to be our duty — and develop what we have, assimiliate and digest what we have into pure Americans, with American aspirations, and thoroughly familiar with the love of American institutions, rather than the importation of any number of men from other countries. If we may not have that, then I am in favor of putting the quota down to the lowest possible point, with every selective element in it that may be.

The great desideratum of modern times has been education not alone book knowledge, but that education which enables men to think right, to think logically, to think truthfully, men equipped with power to appreciate the rapidly developing conditions that are all about us, that have converted the world in the last 50 years into a brand new world and made us masters of forces that are revolutionizing production. We want men not like dumb, driven cattle from those nations where the progressive thought of the times has scarcely made a beginning and where they see men as mere machines; we want men who have an appreciation of the power of the individual and a like appreciation of the responsibility brought about by the manifestation of the power of that individual. We have not that in this country to-day. We have men here to-day who are selfishly utilizing the enormous forces discovered by genius, and if we are not careful as statesmen, if we are not careful in our legislation, these very masters of the tremendous forces that have been made available to us will bring us under their domination and control by virtue of the power they have in multiplying their wealth.

We are struggling to-day against the organized forces of man's brain multiplied a million times by materialized thought in the form of steam and electricity as applied in the everyday affairs of man. We have enough in this country to engage the brain of every lover of his country in solving the problems of a democratic government in the midst of the imperial power that genius is discovering and placing in the hands of man. We have population enough to-day without throwing wide our doors and jeopardizing the interests of this country by pouring into it men who willingly become the slaves of those who employ them in manipulating these forces of nature, and they few reap the enormous benefits that accrue therefrom.

We ought to Americanize not only our population but our forces. We ought to Americanize our factories and our vast material resources, so that we can make each contribute to the other and have an abundance for us under the form of the government laid down by our fathers.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. Harris] has introduced an amendment to shut the door. It is not a question of politics. It is a question of maintaining that which has made you and me the beneficiaries of the greatest hope that ever burned in the human breast for the most splendid future that ever stood before mankind, where the boy in the gutter can look with confidence to the seat of the Presidency of the United States; where the boy in the gutter can look forward to the time when, paying the price of a proper citizen, he may fill a seat in this hall; where the boy to-day poverty-stricken, standing in the midst of all the splendid opportunities of America, should have and, please God, if we do our duty, will have an opportunity to enjoy the marvelous wealth that the genius and brain of our country is making possible for us all.

We do not want to tangle the skein of America's progress by those who imperfectly understand the genius of our Government and the opportunities that lie about 10 us. Let us keep what we have, protect what we have, make what we have the realization of the dream of those who wrote the Constitution.

I am more concerned about that than I am about whether a new railroad shall be built or whether there shall be diversified farming next year or whether a certain coal mine shall be mined. I would rather see American citizenship refined to the last degree in all that makes America what we hope it will be than to develop the resources of America at the expense of the citizenship of our country. The time has come when we should shut the door and keep what we have for what we hope our own people to be.

(1924)

Questions

1. In the third paragraph, Ellison DuRant Smith mentions four ideas. What are they? In your view, which of them are supported by the content of his speech?
2. Look particularly closely at the diction Senator Smith uses in paragraph 4. List several examples of powerful diction. What is the nature of the imagery developed by his word choices? How do you respond to them? How do you think his audience might have reacted to them?
3. Does Senator Smith offer to compromise? Explain.
4. What appeals does Smith make in paragraph 9? How effective are they?
5. What assumptions does Smith make in paragraphs 3, 6, and 10? How do they affect the cogency of his arguments?

More than Just a Shrine

MARY GORDON

The following essay by journalist and novelist Mary Gordon appeared in the New York Times Magazine on November 3, 1985.

I once sat in a hotel in Bloomsbury trying to have breakfast alone. A Russian with a habit of compulsively licking his lips asked if he could join me. I was afraid to say no; I thought it might be bad for detente. He explained to me that he was a linguist, and that he always liked to talk to Americans to see if he could make any connection between their speech and their ethnic background. When I told him about my mixed ancestry — my mother is Irish and Italian, my father a Lithuanian Jew — he began jumping up and down in his seat, rubbing his hands together and licking his lips even more frantically.

"Ah," he said, "so you are really somebody who comes from what is called the boiling pot of America." Yes, I told him, yes I was, but I quickly rose to leave. I thought it would be too hard to explain to him the relation of the boiling potters to the main course, and I wanted to get to the British Museum. I told him that the only thing I could think of that united people whose backgrounds, histories, and points of view were utterly diverse was that their people had landed at a place called Ellis Island.

I didn't tell him that Ellis Island was the only American landmark I'd ever visited. How could I describe to him the estrangement I'd always felt from the kind of traveler who visits shrines to America's past greatness, those rebuilt forts with muskets behind glass and sabers mounted on the walls and gift shops selling maple sugar candy in the shape of Indian headdresses, those reconstructed villages with tables set for 50 and the Paul Revere silver gleaming? All that Americana — Plymouth Rock, Gettysburg, Mount Vernon, Valley Forge — it all inhabits for me a zone of blurred abstraction with far less hold on my imagination than the Bastille or Hampton Court. I suppose I've always known that my uninterest in it contains a large component of the willed: I am American, and those places purport to be my history. But they are not mine.

Ellis Island is, though; it's the one place I can be sure my people are connected to. And so I made a journey there to find my history, like any Rotarian[1] traveling in his Winnebago to Antietam to find his. I had become part of that humbling democracy of people looking in some site for a past that has grown unreal. The monument I traveled to was not, however, a tribute to some old glory. The minute I set foot upon the island I could feel all that it stood for: insecurity, obedience, anxiety, dehumanization, the terrified and careful deference of the displaced. I hadn't traveled to the Battery and boarded a ferry across from the Statue of Liberty to raise flags or breathe a richer, more triumphant air. I wanted to do homage to the ghosts.

I felt them everywhere, from the moment I disembarked and saw the building 5 with its high-minded brick, its hopeful little lawn, its ornamental cornices. The place was derelict when I arrived; it had not functioned for more than 30 years — almost as long as the time it had operated at full capacity as a major immigration center. I was surprised to learn what a small part of history Ellis Island had occupied. The main building was constructed in 1892, then rebuilt between 1898 and 1900 after a fire. Most of the immigrants who arrived during the latter half of the 19th century, mainly northern and western Europeans, landed not at Ellis Island but on the western tip of the Battery at Castle Garden, which had opened as a receiving center for immigrants in 1855.

By the 1880s the facilities at Castle Garden had grown scandalously inadequate. Officials looked for an island on which to build a new immigration center because they thought that on an island immigrants could be more easily protected from swindlers and quickly transported to railroad terminals in New Jersey. Bedloe's Island was considered, but New Yorkers were aghast at the idea of a "Babel" ruining their beautiful new treasure, Liberty Enlightening the World. The statue's sculptor, Frederic Auguste Bartholdi, reacted to the prospect of immigrants landing near his masterpiece in horror; he called it a "monstrous plan." So much for Emma Lazarus.

Ellis Island was finally chosen because the citizens of New Jersey petitioned the federal government to remove from the island an old naval powder magazine that they thought dangerously close to the Jersey shore. The explosives were removed; no one wanted the island for anything. It was the perfect place to build an immigration center.

[1]Member of the Rotary Club, a popular service organization. — Eds.

I thought about the island's history as I walked into the building and made my way to the room that was the center in my imagination of the Ellis Island experience: the Great Hall. It had been made real for me in the stark, accusing photographs of Louis Hine and others who took those pictures to make a point. It was in the Great Hall that everyone had waited — waiting, always, the great vocation of the dispossessed. The room was empty, except for me and a handful of other visitors and the Park Ranger who showed us around. I felt myself grow insignificant in that room, with its huge semicircular windows, its air, even in dereliction, of solid and official probity.

I walked in the deathlike expansiveness of the room's disuse and tried to think of what it might have been like, filled and swarming. More than 16 million immigrants came through that room; approximately 250,000 were rejected. Not really a large proportion, but the implications for the rejected were dreadful. For some, there was nothing to go back to, or there was certain death; for others, who left as adventurers, to return would be to adopt in local memory the fool's role, and the failure's. No wonder that the island's history includes reports of 3,000 suicides.

Sometimes immigrants could pass through Ellis Island in mere hours, though for some the process took days. The particulars of the experience in the Great Hall were often influenced by the political events and attitudes on the mainland. In the 1890s and the first years of the new century, when cheap labor was needed, the newly built receiving center took in its immigrants with comparatively little question. But as the century progressed, the economy worsened, eugenics became both scientifically respectable and popular and World War I made American xenophobia seem rooted in fact. 10

Immigration acts were passed; newcomers had to prove, besides moral correctness and financial solvency, their ability to read. Quota laws came into effect, limiting the number of immigrants from southern and eastern Europe to less than 14 percent of the total quota. Intelligence tests were biased against all non-English-speaking persons and medical examinations became increasingly strict, until the machinery of immigration nearly collapsed under its own weight. The Second Quota Law of 1924 provided that all immigrants be inspected and issued visas at American consular offices in Europe, rendering the center almost obsolete.

On the day of my visit, my mind fastened upon the medical inspections, which had always seemed to me most emblematic of the ignominy and terror the immigrants endured. The medical inspectors, sometimes dressed in uniforms like soldiers, were particularly obsessed with a disease of the eyes called trachoma, which they checked for by flipping back the immigrants' top eyelids with a hook used for buttoning gloves — a method that sometimes resulted in the transmission of the disease to healthy people. Mothers feared that if their children cried too much, their red eyes would be mistaken for a symptom of the disease and the whole family would be sent home. Those immigrants suspected of some physical disability had initials chalked on their coats. I remembered the photographs I'd seen of people standing, dumbstruck and innocent as cattle, with their manifest numbers hung around their necks and initials marked in chalk upon their coats: "E" for eye trouble, "K" for hernia, "L" for lameness, "X" for mental defects, "H" for heart disease.

I thought of my grandparents as I stood in the room; my 17-year-old grandmother, coming alone from Ireland in 1896, vouched for by a stranger who had found her a place as a domestic servant to some Irish who had done well. I tried to imagine the assault it all must have been for her; I've been to her hometown, a collection of farms with a main street — smaller than the athletic field of my local public school. She must have watched the New York skyline as the first- and second-class passengers were whisked off the gangplank with the most cursory of inspections while she was made to board a ferry to the new immigration center.

What could she have made of it — this buff-painted wooden structure with its towers and its blue slate roof, a place Harper's Weekly described as "a latter-day watering place hotel"? It would have been the first time she'd have heard people speaking something other than English. She would have mingled with people carrying baskets on their heads and eating foods unlike any she had ever seen — dark-eyed people, like the Sicilian she would marry 10 years later, who came over with his family at 13, the man of the family, responsible even then for his mother and sister. I don't know what they thought, my grandparents, for they were not expansive people, nor romantic; they didn't like to think of what they called "the hard times," and their trip across the ocean was the single adventurous act of lives devoted after landing to security, respectability and fitting in.

What is the potency of Ellis Island for someone like me — an American, obvi- 15 ously, but one who has always felt that the country really belonged to the early settlers, that, as J. F. Powers wrote in Morte D'Urban, it had been "handed down to them by the Pilgrims, George Washington and others, and that they were taking a risk in letting you live in it." I have never been the victim of overt discrimination; nothing I have wanted has been denied me because of the accidents of blood. But I suppose it is part of being an American to be engaged in a somewhat tiresome but always self-absorbing process of national definition. And in this process, I have found in traveling to Ellis Island an important piece of evidence that could remind me I was right to feel my differentness. Something had happened to my people on that island, a result of the eternal wrongheadedness of American protectionism and the predictabilities of simple greed. I came to the island, too, so I could tell the ghosts that I was one of them, and that I honored them — their stoicism, and their innocence, the fear that turned them inward, and their pride. I wanted to tell them that I liked them better than the Americans who made them pass through the Great Hall and stole their names and chalked their weaknesses in public on their clothing. And to tell the ghosts what I have always thought: that American history was a very classy party that was not much fun until they arrived, brought the good food, turned up the music and taught everyone to dance.

(1985)

Questions

1. How does Mary Gordon establish her ethos in the first paragraph?
2. How does the author characterize Ellis Island? Based on your reading or experience, does her description of the place match your impression?
3. What is the rhetorical effect of Gordon's shift to personal experience in paragraph 13?
4. Gordon writes, "But I suppose it is part of being an American to be engaged in a somewhat tiresome but always self-absorbing process of national definition" (par. 15). Do you agree? Why or why not?
5. What does Gordon imply about America with her final sentence?

Our Wall

Charles Bowden

The following is an excerpt from an essay by American journalist Charles Bowden that appeared in National Geographic magazine in May 2007.

A border wall seems to violate a deep sense of identity most Americans cherish. We see ourselves as a nation of immigrants with our own goddess, the Statue of Liberty, a symbol so potent that dissident Chinese students fabricated a version of it in 1989 in Tiananmen Square as the visual representation of their yearning for freedom.

Walls are curious statements of human needs. Sometimes they are built to keep restive populations from fleeing. The Berlin Wall was designed to keep citizens from escaping from communist East Germany. But most walls are for keeping people out. They all work for a while, until human appetites or sheer numbers overwhelm them. The Great Wall of China, built mostly after the mid-14th century, kept northern tribes at bay until the Manchu conquered China in the 17th century. Hadrian's Wall, standing about 15 feet (5 meters) high, 9 feet (3 meters) wide, and 73 miles (117 kilometers) long, kept the crazed tribes of what is now Scotland from running amok in Roman Britain — from A.D. 122 until it was overrun in 367. Then you have the Maginot Line, a series of connected forts built by France after World War I to keep the German army from invading. It was a success, except for one flaw: The troops of the Third Reich simply went around its northwestern end and invaded France through the Netherlands and Belgium. Now tourists visit its labyrinth of tunnels and underground barracks.

In 1859 a rancher named Thomas Austin released 24 rabbits in Australia because, he noted, "the introduction of a few rabbits could do little harm and might provide a touch of home, in addition to a spot of hunting." By that simple act, he launched one of the most extensive barriers ever erected by human beings: the rabbit fences of Australia, which eventually reached 2,023 miles (3,256 kilometers). Within 35 years, the rabbits had overrun the continent, a place lacking sufficient and dedicated rabbit predators. For a century and a half, the Australian government has tried various solutions: imported fleas, poisons, trappers. Nothing has dented the new immigrants. The fences themselves failed almost instantly — rabbits expanded faster than the barriers could be built, careless people left gates open, holes appeared, and, of course, the rabbits simply dug under them.

In Naco all the walls of the world are present in one compact bundle. You have Hadrian's Wall or the Great Wall of China because the barrier is intended to keep people out. You have the Maginot Line because a 15-minute walk takes you to the end of the existing steel wall. You have the rabbit fences of Australia because people still come north illegally, as do the drugs.

Perhaps the closest thing to the wall going up on the U.S.-Mexico border is the separation wall being built by Israel in the West Bank. Like the new American wall, it is designed to control the movement of people, but it faces the problem of all walls — rockets can go over it, tunnels can go under it. It offends people, it comforts people, it fails to deliver security. And it keeps expanding. 5

Rodolfo Santos Esquer puts out El Mirador, a weekly newspaper in Naco, Sonora, and he finds the wall hateful. He stands in his cramped office — a space he shares with a small shop peddling underwear — and says, "It looks like the Berlin Wall. It is horrible. It is ugly. You feel more racism now. It is a racist wall. If people get close to the wall, the Border Patrol calls the Mexican police, and they go and question people."

And then he lightens up because he is a sunny man, and he says it actually hasn't changed his life or the lives of most people in town. Except that the coyotes[1] now drive to the end of the wall before crossing. And as the wall grows in length, the coyotes raise their rates. Santos figures half the town is living off migrants going north — either feeding them and housing them or guiding them into the U.S. Passage to Phoenix, about 200 miles (320 kilometers) away, is now $1,500 and rising. He notes that after the wall went up in 1996, the migration mushroomed. He wonders if there is a connection, if the wall magically beckons migrants. Besides, he says, people just climb over it with ropes.

Santos fires up his computer and shows an image he snapped in the cemetery of a nearby town. There, there, he points as he enlarges a section of the photo. Slowly a skull-shaped blur floats into view against the black of the night — a ghost, he believes. The border is haunted by ghosts — the hundreds who die each year from heat and cold, the ones killed in car wrecks as the packed vans of migrants flee the Border Patrol, and the increasing violence erupting between smugglers and the agents of Homeland Security. Whenever heat is applied to one part of the border, the migration simply moves to another part. The walls in southern California drove immigrants into the Arizona desert and, in some cases, to their deaths. We think of walls as statements of foreign policy, and we forget the intricate lives of the people we wall in and out.

---

[1]People who smuggle immigrants across the border for a fee. — Eds.

Emanuel Castillo Erúnez, 23, takes crime and car wreck photos for El Mirador. He went north illegally when he was 17, walked a few days, then was picked up and returned to Mexico. He sits on a bench in the plaza, shielded by a New York Yankees cap, and sums up the local feeling about the wall simply: "Some are fine with it, some are not." He thinks of going north again, but then he thinks of getting caught again. And so he waits.

There is a small-town languor about Naco, Sonora, and the wall becomes unnoticeable in this calm. The Minutemen and National Guard terrify people. At the Hospedaje Santa María, four people wait for a chance to go over the wall and illegally enter the wealth of the United States. It is a run-down, two-story building, one of many boarding houses for migrants in Naco. Salvador Rivera, a solid man in his early 30, has been here about a year. He worked in Washington State, but, when his mother fell ill, he returned home to Nayarit, Mexico, and is now having trouble getting past the increased security. He left behind an American girlfriend he can no longer reach. 10

"For so many years, we Mexicans have gone to the U.S. to work. I don't understand why they put up a wall to turn us away. It's not like we're robbing anybody over there, and they don't pay us very much."

But talk of the wall almost has to be prompted. Except for those engaged in smuggling drugs or people, border crossers in Naco, Sonora, continue to enter through the main gate, as they always have. They visit relatives on the other side, as they always have. What has changed is this physical statement, a big wall lined with bright lights, that says, yes, we are two nations.

Jesús Gastelum Ramírez lives next door to the wall, makes neon signs, and looks like Willie Nelson. He watches people climb the wall and he understands a reality forgotten by most U.S. lawmakers — that simply to go through the wire instantly raises a person's income tenfold. Gastelum knows many of his neighbors smuggle people, and he understands.

Until recently, a volleyball team from the Mexican Naco and a team from the U.S. Naco used to meet once a year at the point where the wall ends on the west side of town, put up a net on the line, bring kegs of beer, and play a volleyball game. People from both Nacos would stream out to the site and watch. And then the wall would no longer exist for a spell. But it always confronts the eye.

Dan Duley, 50, operates heavy equipment and is a native of the Naco area. He was living in Germany after serving in the Air Force when the Berlin Wall came down, and he thought that was a fine thing. But here he figures something has to be done. "We need help," he says. "We're being invaded. They've taken away our jobs, our security. I'm just a blue-collar man living in a small town. And I just wish the government cared about a man who was blue." 15

But then, as in many conversations on the border, the rhetoric calms down. Duley, along with many other Naco residents, believes the real solution has to be economic, that jobs must be created in Mexico. There is an iron law on this border: The closer one gets to the line, the more rational the talk becomes because everyone has personal ties to people on the other side. Everyone realizes the wall is a police solution to an economic problem. The Mexicans will go over it, under it, or try to tear holes in it. Or, as is often the case, enter legally with temporary visiting papers and then melt into American communities. Of the millions of illegal immigrants living in the United States, few would have come if there wasn't a job waiting for them.

(2007)

Questions

1. Why does Charles Bowden begin with a discussion of different borders and walls before focusing on the wall between the United States and Mexico?
2. Bowden offers the perspectives of Rodolfo Santos Esquer, Emanuel Castillo Erúnez, Salvador Rivera, and Dan Duley. How do those perspectives differ? Which one resonates most with you? Why?
3. Bowden says that there is "a reality forgotten by most U.S. lawmakers — that simply to go through the wire instantly raises a person's income tenfold" (par. 13). He also says, "Everyone realizes the wall is a police solution to an economic problem" (par. 16). What are the implications of these statements? Do you think the tension on the Mexico-U.S. border is an issue of law and order or of economics? Explain.
4. What does the wall suggest about American identity and character?

Promised Land

Christoph Niemann

The cartoon on the next page by illustrator and author Christoph Niemann appeared on the cover of the New Yorker magazine on November 28, 2011.

Questions

1. What do you see in the cartoon? How would you describe what it depicts?
2. How does the cartoon use analogy to make its point?
3. About Promised Land, Christoph Niemann says, "Too often in politics, very complex subjects are being turned into sound bites, so it's easy to take them apart. . . . Cartoonists, not politicians, should be the ones who condense political discussions into simple images." Has the cartoonist succeeded with his stated objective? Explain.
4. How would you paraphrase the message of the cartoon according to the Toulmin model?
5. What might a Native American say about Promised Land? Explain.

Copyright © Condé Nast. From The New Yorker Magazine. All rights reserved. Cover by Christoph Niemann. Reprinted by Permission.

(See color insert, Image 33.)

America's New Tiger Immigrants

WALTER RUSSELL MEAD

Walter Russell Mead is professor of foreign affairs at Bard College and editor at large of American Interest magazine. The following article appeared in the Wall Street Journal on June 30, 2012.

No Country on earth is in the same league as the U.S. when it comes to the quantity of immigrants who have come here and the quality of their contributions. But lately, in our generally sour mood, Americans have been questioning the benefits of immigration. Many worry that today's immigrants differ from those of the past: less ambitious, less skilled, less willing and able to assimilate.

The conventional picture is of an unstoppable wave of unskilled, mostly Spanish-speaking workers — many illegal — coming across the Mexican border. People who see immigration this way fear that, instead of America assimilating the immigrants, the immigrants will assimilate us. But this picture is both out of date and factually wrong.

A report released this month by the Pew Research Center shows just how much the face of immigration has changed in the past few years. Since 2008, more newcomers to the U.S. have been Asian than Hispanic (in 2010, it was 36% of the total, versus 31%). Today's typical immigrant is not only more likely to speak English and have a college education, but also to have come to the U.S. legally, with a job already in place.

What's responsible for the change? The reasons include a rapidly falling birthrate in Mexico, dramatic economic growth there and the collapse of the U.S. residential construction industry — a traditional market for low-skilled, non-English speaking immigrants whose documentation was often subject to question.

A great deal of mythology has grown up around American immigration. Images of 5
Irish and Italians forced by starvation to emigrate, Jews fleeing Russian persecution — this was all real, but just part of the story. Waves of educated and professional middle-class people also arrived — men like Albert Gallatin fleeing the radicalism of the French Revolution, disappointed liberals abandoning Europe after the failure of the revolutions of 1848, and of course the generations of educated exiles from the terrible totalitarianisms of the 20th century.

America needs and benefits from both kinds of immigration. Like all waves, the Asian influx mixes the skilled and the unskilled. But overall it resembles earlier waves of educated and already urbanized immigrants more than the desperate and often unskilled rural groups from Europe and Latin America.

The Pew study found that the new Asian immigrants identify themselves, surprisingly, as 22% Protestant and 19% Catholic, but whatever their religion, most of them have in spades what Max Weber called the Protestant work ethic. Arguably, in America's long history of immigration, the group that the new immigrants resemble most is the original cohort of Puritans who settled New England.

Like them, the Asians tend to be better-educated than most of the people in their countries of origin. Steeped in the culture of enterprise and capitalism, they're more likely than native-born Americans to have a bachelor of arts degree. While family sponsorship is still the most important entry route for Asians (as for all immigrants), this group is three times more likely than other recent immigrants to come to the U.S. on visas arranged through employers.

In many cases, they're not coming to the U.S. because of the economic conditions back home. After all, places like China, Korea, and India have experienced jumps in prosperity and an explosion in opportunity for the skilled and the hardworking. But most of the new immigrants like it here and want to stay (only 12% wish they had stayed home).

More Asian-Americans (69%) than other Americans (58%) believe that you will get ahead with hard work. Also 93% say that their ethnic group is "hardworking." 10

There also seems to be some truth in the "Tiger Mom" syndrome described by author Amy Chua. While 39% of Asian-Americans say their group puts "too much" pressure on kids to succeed in school, 60% of Asian-Americans think that other Americans don't push their kids hard enough.

Other family values are strong as well, according to Pew. Only 16% of Asian-American babies are born out of wedlock, in contrast to 41% for the general population. In the U.S., 63% of all children grow up in a household with two parents; the figure for Asian-Americans is 80%. Some 66% of Asian-Americans believe parents should have some input into what careers their children select and 61% think that parents have something useful to say about their children's choice of a spouse. The hard work and strong family values appear to pay off: Asian-Americans' median household income is $66,000 (national median: $49,800) and their median household wealth is $83,500 (national median: $68,529).

Nor does the community seem to be inward-looking or unwilling to assimilate. While just over half of first-generation Asian immigrants say that they speak English "very well," 95% of those born in the U.S. say they do. Only 17% of second-generation Asian-Americans say that their friends are mostly members of their own ethnic group.

Perhaps reflecting this social integration, Asian-Americans are the most likely of all American racial groups to marry outside their own race: 29% married non-Asians between 2008 and 2010; the comparable figure for Hispanics was 26%, for blacks 17% and for whites 9%.

Immigration from Asia wasn't always this smooth, and for many years the federal government, often prodded by politicians from the West Coast, tried to keep Asians out. By 1870, Chinese workers accounted for 20% of California's labor force; the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882 cut Chinese immigration from 39,500 that year to just 10 people in 1887. 15

With the Chinese excluded, thousands of Japanese, Koreans and Indians replaced them as cheap labor, but public opinion soon turned against these immigrants as well. In 1906 the San Francisco school board ordered the segregation of Japanese students in its public schools. The news sparked riots in Japan, and President Theodore Roosevelt scrambled to make what was called the "Gentleman's Agreement" by which the Japanese government agreed to stop immigration to the U.S. In 1917 India was added to the "Pacific-Barred Zone" from which no immigrants to the U.S. were allowed, and from 1924 until 1965 Asian immigration into the United States was essentially banned.

The ensuing 37 years of legal immigration are making an impact. In 1965, Asian-Americans accounted for less than 1% of the population; today they are almost at 6% and growing, with the biggest numbers from China, the Philippines and India, followed by Vietnam, Korea and Japan. (Almost one out of four Asian-Americans has roots in either mainland China or Taiwan.)

The honor roll of American immigration is long. Names like Alexander Hamilton, Albert Einstein, Andrew Carnegie, Madeleine Albright and Sergey Brin speak for themselves. Those who worry today whether we have what it takes to meet the challenges of this new and difficult century need to look at the people who continue to join their fates to ours. The world's best, the world's hardest-working and the world's most ambitious are still coming our way.

(2012)

Questions

1. Walter Russell Mead says that the conventional picture Americans have regarding immigration is "both out of date and factually wrong" (par. 2). How effectively does he support that assertion?
2. Do you agree with Mead that "America needs and benefits from both kinds of immigration" (par. 6)? Why or why not?
3. Despite the restrictions and hardships inflicted on would-be Asian immigrants throughout U.S. history, as Mead reports (pars. 15–17), they continue to come to America and have in fact surpassed Hispanics or Latinos as the largest and fastest-growing group to do so. Are you surprised to learn this? Why do you suppose it is so?
4. Mead concludes, "The world's best, the world's hardest-working and the world's most ambitious are still coming our way." What is the effect of the word "still" in that sentence? Do you agree with Mead? What does this piece suggest about the future of immigration in the United States?

Making Connections

1. Compare Senator Ellison DuRant Smith's descriptions of immigrants (p. 1007) with those by Dennis Kearney and H. L. Knight (p. 999). What similarities do you see?
2. Compare the perspective of Congressman Robert H. Clancy (p. 1004) with that of Joseph McDonnell (p. 1001). How are they similar or different?
3. Compare the similarities and differences between the 1893 cartoon Looking Backward (p. 1003) and the 2011 cartoon Promised Land (p. 1018)? How might you paraphrase the message of both in a single sentence?
4. Compare the rhetorical purposes of Joseph Keppler's cartoon and Congressman Clancy's speech. How might Clancy respond to Looking Backward? How might Senator Smith?

5. How might Mary Gordon (p. 1010) or Walter Russell Mead (p. 1019) respond to the speeches by Senator Smith and Congressman Clancy?
6. How might Mead respond to the article by Kearney and Knight? How might he respond to the editorial by McDonnell?

Entering the Conversation

As you respond to each of the following prompts, support your position with appropriate evidence, including at least three sources in this Conversation on immigration and the lure of America, unless otherwise indicated.

1. To distinguish it from others throughout history, Charles Bowden (p. 1014) calls the wall between Mexico and the United States "our wall." What else does he suggest through the use of "our"? How does the barrier made by the wall compare with the "world-wide welcome" (l. 7) promised in "The New Colossus" (p. 998)? Or with the "process of national definition" (par. 15) that Gordon undergoes at Ellis Island? How can we reconcile as expressions of our national identity the values of freedom and security expressed by the Statue of Liberty on the one hand and the border wall and other barriers, both literal and figurative, on the other?
2. In his 1791 book, The Rights of Man, Thomas Paine made the following observation about America:

> If there is a country in the world, where concord, according to common calculation, would be least expected, it is America. Made up, as it is, of people from different nations*, accustomed to different forms and habits of government, speaking different languages, and more different in their modes of worship, it would appear that the union of such a people was impracticable; but by the simple operation of constructing government on the principles of society and the rights of man, every difficulty retires, and all the parts are brought into cordial unison.

*That part of America which is generally called New-England, including New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, is peopled chiefly by English descendants. In the state of New York, about half are Dutch, the rest English, Scotch, and Irish. In New-Jersey, a mixture of English and Dutch, with some Scotch and Irish. In Pennsylvania, about one third are English, another Germans, and the remainder are Scotch and Irish, with some Swedes. The states to the southward have a greater proportion of English than the middle states, but in all of them there is a mixture; and besides those enumerated, there are a considerable number of French, and some few of all the European nations lying on the coast. The most numerous religious denomination are the Presbyterians; but no one sect is established above another, and all men are equally citizens.

Today we might be amused at what Paine saw as great diversity in 1791. (We might note that even such a progressive thinker as Paine — perhaps ahead of his time, he was against slavery and for women's rights — does not mention Blacks or Native Americans.) He could not imagine the great "melting pot" that America would become. Write an essay in which you examine the extent to which Paine's observations hold true today.

3. As Gordon wittily reminds us in her essay, America is known worldwide as a nation of immigrants. What is the lure of America? Despite hardships, why do people keep coming to the United States today?

4. Angel Island operated as the immigration center in San Francisco Bay from 1910 to 1940. Sometimes called the "Ellis Island of the West," it was the chief entrance point for immigrants from Asia, many of whom were detained for days, weeks, and in a few cases, years. Research the history of Angel Island and its significance for Asian Americans, considering the conditions of the center and taking particular note of the poetry that the detainees carved on the walls. Write an essay on Angel Island's place in the story of American immigration.

5. This Conversation explores not only the lure of America but also efforts throughout our nation's history to stem the tide of immigration. How has this historical perspective influenced your views on the current immigration debate? Should we continue to expand inclusiveness? Should we restrict the number of immigrants that we accept into the country? Develop a position on the issue.

6. How does immigration in the United States today compare with that in other countries? Are other countries experiencing tension between their citizenry and people from other countries and cultures who wish to enter? Choose a foreign country and compare the immigration issues there with those in the United States.

7. Paul Taylor, executive vice president of the Pew Research Center and co-author of the 2012 Pew Report "The Rise of Asian Americans," writes: "Like immigrants throughout American history, the new arrivals from Asia are strivers. What's distinctive about them is their educational credentials. These aren't the tired, poor, huddled masses of Emma Lazarus's famous inscription on the Statue of Liberty. They are the highly skilled workforce of the 21st century." Compare the issues and realities of immigration today with those of over a century ago.

Conversation

The American Cowboy

Whether fact, fiction, or a little of both, the cowboy is a complex figure in American history and popular culture. Few know of the cowboy's origins in the vaquero tradition of Mexico that was brought to California in the seventeenth century, or the role of African American cowboys after the Civil War. When they think of a cowboy, many people picture a gunslinger of the Wild West, a loner, an adventurer, and often a rebel. Yet the reality is that most cowboys were hired by ranchers to manage, protect, and drive cattle herds. The "range wars" of the late 1870s and 1880s contributed to the view of cowboys as the gunslingers of the American West. Land ownership was not as clear-cut in that period, leading many ranchers to fight over control of open range. Perhaps the cowboy is best known to us through movies: the Western is the quintessential American genre, starting in 1903 with The Great Train Robbery and continuing up to the present day in the interpretations of directors like Quentin Tarantino and the Coen brothers. Film stars such as John Wayne and Clint Eastwood are synonymous with the Western. Cowboys in film and literature have influenced our definition of manhood, and the battles between "cowboys and Indians" in cinema and print are responsible, many would argue, for damaging stereotypes that persist.

The written and visual texts you'll explore in this Conversation, ranging from the late nineteenth to the twenty-first century, may challenge your perspective or enlarge it and, ideally, will lead you to consider who the cowboy was or is and why it matters to our national identity. Your investigations might even explain why contemporary Western singers Waylon Jennings and Willie Nelson advise, "Mammas, don't let your babies grow up to be cowboys."

Sources

Joseph Nimmo Jr., from The American Cowboy (1886)
Frederic S. Remington, A Dash for the Timber (1889)
Frederick Jackson Turner, from The Significance of the Frontier in American History (1893)
Buffalo Bill Cody, Buffalo Bill's Wild West (program, 1893)
Owen Wister, from The Virginian: A Horseman of the Plains (1902)
E. E. Cummings, Buffalo Bill 's (1920)
Leonard McCombe, Marlboro Man (1949)
Gretel Ehrlich, About Men (1984)
Sherman Alexie, My Heroes Have Never Been Cowboys (1993)
Joy Kasson, Buffalo Bill's Wild West: Celebrity, Memory, and Popular History (2000)
Benjamin Percy, The Virginian Teaches the Merit of a Man (2007)

from The American Cowboy

Joseph Nimmo Jr.

Joseph Nimmo Jr. (1830–1909) was a statistician, an economist, and a civil engineer who served as chief of both the United States Division of Internal Commerce and the Bureau of Statistics. A selection from his article "The American Cowboy" follows. It was published in 1886 in Harper's New Monthly magazine, the nineteenth-century version of today's Harper's.

During the last fifteen years the American cow-boy has occupied a place sufficiently important to entitle him to a considerable share of public attention. His occupation is unique. In the exercise of his function he is always a man on horseback. His duty as a worker in the cattle business is at times to ride over the range in order to see that straying cattle do not rove too far from the assigned limits of the herd of which he has charge; at times to drive the herd from one locality to another; and at times to "round up" the dispersed cattle, by which is meant to collect them together for the purpose of branding calves, or of selecting beef cattle, which latter are driven to railroad stations for shipment to market. The chief qualifications of efficiency in this calling are courage, physical alertness, ability to endure exposure and fatigue, horsemanship, and skill in the use of the lariat.

The original cow-boy of this country was essentially a creature of circumstance, and mainly a product of western and southwestern Texas. Armed to the teeth, booted and spurred, long-haired, and covered with the broad-brimmed sombrero — the distinctive badge of his calling — his personal appearance proclaimed the sort of man he was.

The Texas cow-boys were frontiersmen, accustomed from their earliest childhood to the alarms and the struggles incident to forays of Indians of the most ferocious and warlike nature. The section of the State in which they lived was also for many years exposed to incursions of bandits from Mexico, who came with predatory intent upon the herds and the homes of the people of Texas. The carrying of fire-arms and other deadly weapons was consequently a prevalent custom among them. And being scattered over vast areas, and beyond the efficient protection and restraints of civil law, they of necessity became a law unto themselves.

It is not a strange thing that such an occupation and such environment should have developed a class of men whom persons accustomed to the usages of cultivated society would characterize as ruffians of the most pronounced type. But among the better disposed of the Texas cow-boys, who constitute, it is believed, much more than a majority of them, there were true and trusty men, in whom the dangers and fortunes of their lives developed generous and heroic traits of character. The same experiences, however, led the viciously inclined to give free vent to the worst passions. Upon slight provocation they would shoot down a fellow-man with almost as little compunction as they fired upon the wild beasts.

But the peculiar characteristics of the Texas cow-boys qualified them for an 5 important public service. By virtue of their courage and recklessness of danger, their excellent horsemanship, and skill in the use of fire-arms, and by virtue also of the influence which they have exerted upon their gentler brethren of the northern ranges, they have been an efficient instrumentality in preventing Indian outbreaks, and in protecting the frontier settlements of the entire range and ranch cattle area against predatory incursions and massacres by Indians. This has been a natural result of the fact that the cowboys constitute throughout that region a corps of mounted scouts, armed and equipped, twenty thousand strong. They traverse vast ranges, ford rivers, and search for cattle amid mountain fastnesses and in lurking places of the river bottoms. . . .

It is only twenty years since the discovery was made that between the line of settlement in Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas at the east, and the Sierra Nevada and Coast ranges at the west, there was an area as large as the portion of the United States which is situated east of the Mississippi River, throughout which cattle could be raised and fattened on the open range, seeking their own food, water, and shelter without any aid from man, from the time they were dropped until they were in condition to be driven to a railroad station for shipment to market. This discovery, greater in its importance than the discovery of gold in California, or silver in Nevada, or petroleum in Pennsylvania, happened, according to the most reliable accounts, in this wise. Early in December, 1864, a government trader, with a wagon train of supplies drawn by oxen, was on his way west to Camp Douglas, in the Territory of Utah, but being overtaken on the Laramie Plains by an unusually severe snowstorm, he was compelled at once to go into winter-quarters. He turned his cattle adrift, expecting, as a matter of course, they would soon perish from exposure and starvation, but they remained about the camp, and as the snow was blown off the highlands the dried grass afforded them an abundance of forage. When the spring opened they were found to be in even better condition than when turned out to die four months previously. This at once led to the experiment of herding cattle on the northern ranges. But it was for years a slow and hazardous business. At that time it was the custom to allow the Indians upon the reservations to wander off during the summer months throughout the present range and ranch cattle area, in order that they might hunt buffaloes and other large game, and thus sustain themselves in their accustomed way until the approach of winter, when they returned to their reservations to be again provided for by the government. Permission to depart on these expeditions was always given upon the promise made to the military and civil officers of the United States that while absent they would be "good Indians." But as cattle were more easily caught than buffaloes, they found it greatly to their advantage to swoop down upon the herds, stampede them, and slaughter at their leisure as many as their needs required. Oftentimes, by way of amusement, they lifted the scalp of a stray cowboy. In many instances they massacred whole camps of settlers, whose chief occupation was cattle herding. Occasionally these "wards of the nation" so far forgot themselves as to put on war-paint and set the United States at defiance. The massacre of General Custer and his detachment, on the 25th of June, 1876, at Little Big Horn, Dakota, near the present location of Fort Custer, led, however, to the adoption of a more stringent policy on the part of the United States government with respect to requiring the Indians to remain upon their reservations. During the five years following that tragic event our valiant little army, widely scattered over a vast area, had many bloody encounters with the savages. At last the spirit of resistance was broken, and Montana, Idaho, and Dakota became comparatively safe for the introduction of the range cattle business, which had already become known in Colorado and Wyoming as a highly attractive enterprise and a speedy avenue to wealth. As the work of the army drew nigh to completion the cow-boy galloped in, and became the mounted policeman of a vast area, always on patrol.

But even after the red man had retired to his reservation the lot of the cattle-men was not entirely serene. From time immemorial the horse-thief and the cattle-thief seem to have been a sort of parasitic growth upon frontier life, apparently begotten of its conditions. So it was on the range. For several years the entire region from Kansas and Colorado at the south to Montana and Dakota at the north was infested by cattle-thieves. The country afforded apparently illimitable scope for this nefarious traffic. It seemed at one time somewhat a matter of doubt as to which should prosper most, the herdsmen or the cattle-thieves. As the cattle of many proprietors intermingled freely on vast ranges, it was comparatively easy and safe for a few marauders to pounce down upon detached groups of cattle here and there separated from the main body of the herds, and drive them off over some mountain range to a distant valley or range where grazing was abundant, and there brand the calves with a chosen hieroglyphic representative of a separate ownership, and change the marks of cattle already branded, by one or more dashes with a red-hot iron. It was clearly seen that in order to stamp out this new and threatening evil recourse must be had to a drastic remedy. Accordingly the various cattle associations organized a detective service, composed mainly of brave and trusty cow-boys, who were charged with the duty of reconnoitring the whole country in order to discover the miscreants in their lairs, also to watch for altered and surreptitious brands at the railroad shipping stations. In this way a large number of stolen cattle was recovered, and many cattle-thieves were apprehended. When the latter were arrested within the limits of the efficient administration of the law, they were handed over to the civil authorities. But when caught beyond the limits of organized counties, administrative justice was extemporized. The cattle-men and the cow-boys themselves supplied judges, jurymen, witnesses, attorneys, constables, and executioners. Sometimes a level-headed cow-boy was placed upon the judicial bench. The cattle-men assert that the extreme and only penalty was never inflicted except upon the clearest evidence of guilt.

When the verdict of guilty was pronounced, a short shrift, and a stout rope, and a grave without a coffin or a winding-sheet, ended the proceedings.

But a great change has taken place. On the northern ranges cattle stealing has become almost entirely a thing of the past. . . .

(1886)

Questions

1. Why does Joseph Nimmo Jr. open the article with an explanation of the "function" of the cowboy and his "qualifications" rather than with a discussion of the cowboy's temperament and personality traits? What does this approach suggest about Nimmo's intended purpose?
2. As he develops the article, Nimmo explains to his reading audience, who were largely Easterners at this point in the magazine's history, the kind of man drawn to the life of the mid-nineteenth-century cowboy. What are these qualities?
3. Nimmo emphasizes the work of the cowboys as a group — "a class of men" (par. 4) — rather than as individuals. Why? What is it that they do as "an important public service" (par. 5)?

4. How are Native Americans depicted in this article? What motivation does Nimmo attribute to their actions? Cite specific passages to support your response.
5. Nimmo builds an argument in this passage about cowboys and violence. What is his major claim? How does he support it? Where does he address counterarguments?
6. How does the diction of this passage suggest a mythic struggle between good and evil? Refer to specific words and images to explain your response. Why do you believe such language would or would not have been persuasive to his audience?

A Dash for the Timber

Frederic S. Remington

An influential painter and sculptor of the American West, Frederic S. Remington (1861–1909) grew up in New York State and received his artistic training at Yale College of Art and the Art Students League in New York City. He made his first trip to the western United States as a twenty-year-old vacationing in Montana. He lived for a few years in Kansas but returned to New York City in 1885 as an illustrator for Harper's Weekly. He traveled to the American Southwest several times between 1885 and 1888, primarily to cover the U.S. cavalry and the Apache Indians. In A Dash for the Timber (1889), a classic Western battle ensues as the cowboys rush for cover. The painting appealed to the American public who felt nostalgic for a rapidly disappearing world of action and adventure in the so-called Wild West, and it launched Remington's career as a major painter.

Amon Carter Museum of American Art, Fort Worth, Texas

Frederic S. Remington, A Dash for the Timber, 1889, oil on canvas, 84" × 48", Amon Carter Museum of American Art, Fort Worth, Texas.
(See color insert, Image 34.)

Questions

1. What is the narrative, or the story line, of this scene? Pay attention to the figures, the spatial arrangement and color, and the interaction among landscape, humans, and animals. How does the title relate to the narrative?
2. During his trips West, Frederic S. Remington is reputed to have kept detailed diaries, made numerous field sketches, and taken photographs with the latest equipment of the day. How does the painting reflect his commitment to a realistic depiction of the action and geography of this scene?
3. The Web site of the Amon Carter Museum of American Art, which owns this painting, describes the "truly cinematic" effect of the piece and the influence of Remington's Western images on "the popular imagination." In what ways is this still image "cinematic"? What examples of the influence of this image can you identify in popular culture today or from the twentieth century?
4. From its inception at the turn of the century through the present, this painting has been criticized by some as being sentimental and even racist. Why? What specific details in the painting might support such an interpretation? Do you agree or disagree with that interpretation? Explain.

from The Significance of the Frontier in American History

Frederick Jackson Turner

A prominent scholar of U.S. history, Frederick Jackson Turner (1861–1932) was born in Wisconsin and received his doctorate from Johns Hopkins University. He was a professor of history at the University of Wisconsin and at Harvard University. Turner delivered his lecture "The Significance of the Frontier in American History" to a gathering of the American Historical Society in 1893, at the World's Columbian Exposition, a vast fair that celebrated the four hundredth anniversary of Columbus's voyage. Dubbed the "Frontier Thesis," Turner's argument that westward expansion shaped American individualistic democracy and the national character is one of the most influential as well as most debated interpretations of U.S. history. In it, he reflects on the role of the frontier in shaping the "dominant individualism" of American character and warns that "the closing of a great historical movement" would have dire consequences on that character. Following is an excerpt from the speech, which was expanded and published as a book in 1920.

In a recent bulletin of the Superintendent of the Census for 1890 appear these significant words: "Up to and including 1880 the country had a frontier of settlement, but at present the unsettled area has been so broken into by isolated bodies of settlement that there can hardly be said to be a frontier line. In the discussion of its extent, its westward movement, etc., it can not, therefore, any longer have a place in the census reports." This brief official statement marks the closing of a great historic movement. Up to our own day American history has been in a large degree the history of the colonization of the Great West. The existence of an area of free land, its continuous recession, and the advance of American settlement westward, explain American development.

Behind institutions, behind constitutional forms and modifications, lie the vital forces that call these organs into life and shape them to meet changing conditions. The peculiarity of American institutions is the fact that they have been compelled to adapt themselves to the changes of an expanding people — to the changes involved in crossing a continent, in winning a wilderness, and in developing at each area of this progress out of the primitive economic and political conditions of the frontier into the complexity of city life. Said Calhoun in 1817, "We are great, and rapidly — I was about to say fearfully — growing!"[1] So saying, he touched the distinguishing feature of American life. All peoples show development; the germ theory of politics has been sufficiently emphasized. In the case of most nations, however, the development has occurred in a limited area; and if the nation has expanded, it has met other growing peoples whom it has conquered. But in the case of the United States we have a different phenomenon. Limiting our attention to the Atlantic coast, we have the familiar phenomenon of the evolution of institutions in a limited area, such as the rise of representative government; the differentiation of simple colonial governments into complex organs; the progress from primitive industrial society, without division of labor, up to manufacturing civilization. But we have in addition to this a recurrence of the process of evolution in each western area reached in the process of expansion. Thus American development has exhibited not merely advance along a single line, but a return to primitive conditions on a continually advancing frontier line, and a new development for that area. American social development has been continually beginning over again on the frontier. This perennial rebirth, this fluidity of American life, this expansion westward with its new opportunities, its continuous touch with the simplicity of primitive society, furnish the forces dominating American character. The true point of view in the history of this nation is not the Atlantic coast, it is the Great West. Even the slavery struggle, which is made so exclusive an object of attention by writers . . . , occupies its important place in American history because of its relation to westward expansion.

In this advance, the frontier is the outer edge of the wave — the meeting point between savagery and civilization. Much has been written about the frontier from the point of view of border warfare and the chase, but as a field for the serious study of the economist and the historian it has been neglected. . . .

In the settlement of America we have to observe how European life entered the continent, and how America modified and developed that life and reacted on Europe. Our early history is the study of European germs developing in an American environment. Too exclusive attention has been paid by institutional students to the Germanic origins, too little to the American factors. The frontier is the line of most rapid and effective Americanization. The wilderness masters the colonist. It finds him a European in dress, industries, tools, modes of travel, and thought. It takes him from the railroad car and puts him in the birch canoe. It strips off the garments of civilization and arrays him in the hunting shirt and the moccasin. It puts him in the log cabin of the Cherokee and Iroquois and runs an Indian palisade around him. Before long he has gone to planting Indian corn and plowing with a sharp stick; he shouts the war cry and takes the scalp in orthodox Indian fashion. In short, at the frontier the environment is at first too strong for the man. He must accept the conditions which it furnishes, or perish, and so he fits himself into the Indian clearings and follows the Indian trails. Little by little he transforms the wilderness, but the outcome is not the old Europe, not simply the development of Germanic germs, any more than the first phenomenon was a case of reversion to the Germanic mark. The fact is, that here is a new product that is American. At first, the frontier was the Atlantic coast. It was the frontier of Europe in a very real sense. Moving westward, the frontier became more and more American. As successive terminal moraines result from successive glaciations, so each frontier leaves its traces behind it, and when it becomes a settled area the region still partakes of the frontier characteristics. Thus the advance of the frontier has meant a steady movement away from the influence of Europe, a steady growth of independence on American lines. And to study this advance, the men who grew up under these conditions, and the political, economic, and social results of it, is to study the really American part of our history. . . .

[1]"Abridgment of Debates of Congress," v, p. 706.

But the most important effect of the frontier has been in the promotion of democracy here and in Europe. As has been indicated, the frontier is productive of individualism. Complex society is precipitated by the wilderness into a kind of primitive organization based on the family. The tendency is anti-social. It produces antipathy to control, and particularly to any direct control. The tax-gatherer is viewed as a representative of oppression. Prof. Osgood, in an able article,[2] has pointed out that the frontier conditions prevalent in the colonies are important factors in the explanation of the American Revolution, where individual liberty was sometimes confused with absence of all effective government. The same conditions aid in explaining the difficulty of instituting a strong government in the period of the confederacy. The frontier individualism has from the beginning promoted democracy. 5

So long as free land exists, the opportunity for a competency exists, and economic power secures political power. But the democracy born of free land, strong in selfishness and individualism, intolerant of administrative experience and education, and pressing individual liberty beyond its proper bounds, has its dangers as well as its benefits. Individualism in America has allowed a laxity in regard to governmental affairs which has rendered possible the spoils system and all the manifest evils that follow from the lack of a highly developed civic spirit. In this connection may be noted also the influence of frontier conditions in permitting lax business honor, inflated paper currency, and wild-cat banking. The colonial and revolutionary frontier was the region whence emanated many of the worst forms of an evil currency.[3] The West in the War of 1812 repeated the phenomenon on the frontier of that day, while the speculation and wild-cat banking of the period of the crisis of 1837 occurred on the new frontier belt of the next tier of States. Thus each one of the periods of lax financial integrity coincides with periods when a new set of frontier communities had arisen, and coincides in area with these successive frontiers, for the most part. The recent Populist agitation is a case in point. Many a State that now declines any connection with the tenets of the Populists, itself adhered to such ideas in an earlier stage of the development of the State. A primitive society can hardly be expected to show the intelligent appreciation of the complexity of business interests in a developed society. The continual recurrence of these areas of paper-money agitation is another evidence that the frontier can be isolated and studied as a factor in American history of the highest importance.[4]

[2]Political Science Quarterly, ii, p. 457. Compare Sumner, "Alexander Hamilton," chs. ii–vii.
[3]On the relation of frontier conditions to Revolutionary taxation, see Sumner, "Alexander Hamilton," ch. iii.

The East has always feared the result of an unregulated advance of the frontier, and has tried to check and guide it. The English authorities would have checked settlement at the headwaters of the Atlantic tributaries and allowed the "savages to enjoy their deserts in quiet lest the peltry trade should decrease." This called out Burke's[5] splendid protest:

> If you stopped your grants, what would be the consequence? The people would occupy without grants. They have already so occupied in many places. You can not station garrisons in every part of these deserts. If you drive the people from one place, they will carry on their annual tillage and remove with their flocks and herds to another. Many of the people in the back settlements are already little attached to particular situations. Already they have topped the Appalachian Mountains. From thence they behold before them an immense plain, one vast, rich, level meadow; a square of five hundred miles. Over this they would wander without a possibility of restraint; they would change their manners with their habits of life; would soon forget a government by which they were disowned; would become hordes of English Tartars; and, pouring down upon your unfortified frontiers a fierce and irresistible cavalry, become masters of your governors and your counselers, your collectors and comptrollers, and of all the slaves that adhered to them. Such would, and in no long time must, be the effect of attempting to forbid as a crime and to suppress as an evil the command and blessing of Providence, "Increase and multiply." Such would be the happy result of an endeavor to keep as a lair of wild beasts that earth which God, by an express charter, has given to the children of men. . . .

From the conditions of frontier life came intellectual traits of profound importance. The works of travelers along each frontier from colonial days onward describe

---

[4]I have refrained from dwelling on the lawless characteristics of the frontier, because they are sufficiently well known. The gambler and desperado, the regulators of the Carolinas, and the vigilantes of California, are types of that line of scum that the waves of advancing civilization bore before them, and of the growth of spontaneous organs of authority where legal authority was absent. Compare Barrows, "United States of Yesterday and To-morrow"; Shinn, "Mining Camps"; and Bancroft, "Popular Tribunals." The humor, bravery, and rude strength, as well as the vices of the frontier in its worst aspect, have left traces on American character, language, and literature, not soon to be effaced.

[5]Edmund Burke (1729–1797), Irish statesman and philosopher who supported the American Revolution. — Eds.

certain common traits, and these traits have, while softening down, still persisted as survivals in the place of their origin, even when a higher social organization succeeded. The result is that to the frontier the American intellect owes its striking characteristics. That coarseness and strength combined with acuteness and inquisitiveness; that practical, inventive turn of mind, quick to find expedients; that masterful grasp of material things, lacking in the artistic but powerful to effect great ends; that restless, nervous energy;[6] that dominant individualism, working for good and for evil, and withal that buoyancy and exuberance which comes with freedom — these are traits of the frontier, or traits called out elsewhere because of the existence of the frontier. Since the days when the fleet of Columbus sailed into the waters of the New World, America has been another name for opportunity, and the people of the United States have taken their tone from the incessant expansion which has not only been open but has even been forced upon them. He would be a rash prophet who should assert that the expansive character of American life has now entirely ceased. Movement has been its dominant fact, and, unless this training has no effect upon a people, the American energy will continually demand a wider field for its exercise. But never again will such gifts of free land offer themselves. For a moment, at the frontier, the bonds of custom are broken and unrestraint is triumphant. There is not tabula rasa. The stubborn American environment is there with its imperious summons to accept its conditions; the inherited ways of doing things are also there; and yet, in spite of environment, and in spite of custom, each frontier did indeed furnish a new field of opportunity, a gate of escape from the bondage of the past; and freshness, and confidence, and scorn of older society, impatience of its restraints and its ideas, and indifference to its lessons, have accompanied the frontier. What the Mediterranean Sea was to the Greeks, breaking the bond of custom, offering new experiences, calling out new institutions and activities, that, and more, the ever retreating frontier has been to the United States directly, and to the nations of Europe more remotely. And now, four centuries from the discovery of America, at the end of a hundred years of life under the Constitution, the frontier has gone, and with its going has closed the first period of American history.

(1893, 1920)

Questions

1. What was the rhetorical situation of this speech when it was delivered at the World's Columbian Exposition? How does that context affect the approach Frederick Jackson Turner takes and the tone he uses? Pay special attention to the relationship between him and his initial audience.

---

[6]Colonial travelers agree in remarking on the phlegmatic characteristics of the colonists. It has frequently been asked how such a people could have developed that strained nervous energy now characteristic of them. Compare Sumner, "Alexander Hamilton," p. 98, and Adams, "History of the United States," i, p. 60; ix, pp. 240, 241. The transition appears to become marked at the close of the War of 1812, a period when interest centered upon the development of the West, and the West was noted for restless energy. Grund, "Americans," ii, ch. i.

2. Turner uses the word "primitive" with relative frequency. What does it mean in this essay? Is it a synonym for "savagery"? How does its juxtaposition with "civilization" add to its meaning?
3. What does Turner mean in the following statement: "The frontier is the line of most rapid and effective Americanization. The wilderness masters the colonist" (par. 4)? In what way is this point fundamental to Turner's argument?
4. How, according to Turner, has "frontier individualism . . . promoted democracy" (par. 5)? What are the "dangers as well as . . . benefits" of this "democracy born of free land" (par. 6)?
5. What point does Turner emphasize with the lengthy quotation from Edmund Burke's 1775 "Speech for Conciliation with America" (par. 7)?
6. Turner claims that "the American intellect owes its striking characteristics" (par. 8) to the frontier. What are those characteristics, and what are their consequences to Turner's claim about American "exceptionalism" — that is, the distinctive American character? What evidence does he provide for his argument?
7. Turner bookends his speech-turned-essay with references to "the closing of a great historic movement" (par. 1) and "the ever retreating frontier" (par. 8). Is his essay more of an elegy for the West, a celebration of the opportunities of the present moment, or an argument to move on to the next "frontier"? Cite two specific passages to support your response.

Buffalo Bill's Wild West

Buffalo Bill Cody

Born William Cody (1846–1917), Buffalo Bill Cody was a soldier, a gold prospector, a Pony Express rider, a showman, and an impresario. Born in Ohio, he lived in Canada and the Kansas Territory while growing up. He received the Medal of Honor in 1872 for service as a scout in the army. During that same year, Ned Buntline, author of a number of Westerns and creator of the character Buffalo Bill, persuaded Cody to go onstage portraying himself. In 1883, Cody organized Buffalo Bill's Wild West, a show that proved enormously successful in the United States and Europe. It included dramatizations of such Wild West scenes as a buffalo hunt with real buffaloes, Custer's Last Stand with some Lakota who had actually fought in the battle, and colorful figures and sharpshooters such as Annie Oakley and Wild Bill Hickok. The image on the following page is the cover of an 1893 program from Buffalo Bill's Wild West.

Questions

1. How is the West portrayed in this poster? Specifically, how are cowboys and Native Americans depicted?
2. Based on his image in this advertisement, how do you think Cody sees himself?
3. What are the values prized in the West according to this image?

The Newberry Library, Chicago

(See color insert, Image 35.)

4. Cody insisted that his show be called simply "The Wild West" or "Buffalo Bill's Wild West" without the word "Show." Why? To what extent was this choice a wise one on the part of this consummate showman?

from The Virginian
A Horseman of the Plains

Owen Wister

Owen Wister (1860–1938) was born into an affluent Philadelphia family, worked for a while in a bank, went to Harvard College, and was preparing to enter Harvard Law School when he suffered a series of mysterious health problems, including vertigo and hallucinations. In 1885, at his doctor's urging to travel west to restore his health, he went to Wyoming, where, as a 2002 article in Harvard Magazine says, his "real life was about to begin." He made additional trips over the next fifteen years as he began writing short fiction, and in 1902, he published The Virginian. The novel sold 200,000 copies its first year, making its author an instant celebrity, and has never gone out of print; it has been made into five movies and a television series. Following are selections from Chapters 1 and 2 of The Virginian, which is narrated by an unnamed easterner on his first westward journey.

I. Enter the Man

Some notable sight was drawing the passengers, both men and women, to the window; and therefore I rose and crossed the car to see what it was. I saw near the track an enclosure, and round it some laughing men, and inside it some whirling dust, and amid the dust some horses, plunging, huddling, and dodging. They were cow ponies in a corral, and one of them would not be caught, no matter who threw the rope. We had plenty of time to watch this sport, for our train had stopped that the engine might take water at the tank before it pulled us up beside the station platform of Medicine Bow. We were also six hours late, and starving for entertainment. The pony in the corral was wise, and rapid of limb. Have you seen a skilful boxer watch his antagonist with a quiet, incessant eye? Such an eye as this did the pony keep upon whatever man took the rope. The man might pretend to look at the weather, which was fine; or he might affect earnest conversation with a bystander: it was bootless. The pony saw through it. No feint hoodwinked him. This animal was thoroughly a man of the world. His undistracted eye stayed fixed upon the dissembling foe, and the gravity of his horse-expression made the matter one of high comedy. Then the rope would sail out at him, but he was already elsewhere; and if horses laugh, gayety must have abounded in that corral. Sometimes the pony took a turn alone; next he had slid in a flash among his brothers, and the whole of them like a school of playful fish whipped round the corral, kicking up the fine dust, and (I take it) roaring with laughter. Through the window-glass of our Pullman the thud of their mischievous hoofs reached us, and the strong, humorous curses of the cow-boys. Then for the first time I noticed a man who sat on the high gate of the corral, looking on. For he now climbed down with the undulations of a tiger, smooth and easy, as if his muscles flowed beneath his skin. The others had all visibly whirled the rope, some of them even shoulder high. I did not see his arm lift or move. He appeared to hold the rope down low, by his leg. But like a sudden snake I saw the noose go out its length and fall true; and the thing was done. As the captured pony walked in with a sweet, church-door expression, our train moved slowly on to the station, and a passenger remarked, "That man knows his business."

But the passenger's dissertation upon roping I was obliged to lose, for Medicine Bow was my station. I bade my fellow-travellers good-by, and descended, a stranger, into the great cattle land. And here in less than ten minutes I learned news which made me feel a stranger indeed.

My baggage was lost; it had not come on my train; it was adrift somewhere back in the two thousand miles that lay behind me. And by way of comfort, the baggage-man remarked that passengers often got astray from their trunks, but the trunks mostly found them after a while. Having offered me this encouragement, he turned whistling to his affairs and left me planted in the baggage-room at Medicine Bow. I stood deserted among crates and boxes, blankly holding my check, furious and forlorn. I stared out through the door at the sky and the plains; but I did not see the antelope shining among the sage-brush, nor the great sunset light of Wyoming. Annoyance blinded my eyes to all things save my grievance: I saw only a lost trunk. And I was muttering half-aloud, "What a forsaken hole this is!" when suddenly from outside on the platform came a slow voice: —

"Off to get married again? Oh, don't!"

The voice was Southern and gentle and drawling; and a second voice came in immediate answer, cracked and querulous: — 5

"It ain't again. Who says it's again? Who told you, anyway?"

And the first voice responded caressingly: —

"Why, your Sunday clothes told me, Uncle Hughey. They are speakin' mighty loud o' nuptials."

"You don't worry me!" snapped Uncle Hughey, with shrill heat.

And the other gently continued, "Ain't them gloves the same yu' wore to your last weddin'?" 10

"You don't worry me! You don't worry me!" now screamed Uncle Hughey.

Already I had forgotten my trunk; care had left me; I was aware of the sunset, and had no desire but for more of this conversation. For it resembled none that I had heard in my life so far. I stepped to the door and looked out upon the station platform.

Lounging there at ease against the wall was a slim young giant, more beautiful than pictures. His broad, soft hat was pushed back; a loose-knotted, dull-scarlet handkerchief sagged from his throat; and one casual thumb was hooked in the cartridge-belt that slanted across his hips. He had plainly come many miles from somewhere across the vast horizon, as the dust upon him showed. His boots were white with it. His overalls were gray with it. The weather-beaten bloom of his face shone through it duskily, as the ripe peaches look upon their trees in a dry season. But no dinginess of travel or shabbiness of attire could tarnish the splendor that radiated from his youth and strength. The old man upon whose temper his remarks were doing such deadly work was combed and curried to a finish, a bridegroom swept and garnished; but alas for age! Had I been the bride, I should have taken the giant, dust and all.

He had by no means done with the old man. . . .

II. "When You Call Me That, Smile!"

. . . I think that Steve was more curious even than myself. Time was on the wing. His bet must be decided, and the drinks enjoyed. He stood against the grocery counter, contemplating the Virginian. But it was to me that he spoke. The Virginian, however, listened to every word.

"Your first visit to this country?"

I told him yes.

"How do you like it?"

I expected to like it very much.

"How does the climate strike you?"

I thought the climate was fine.

"Makes a man thirsty though."

This was the sub-current which the Virginian plainly looked for. But he, like Steve, addressed himself to me.

"Yes," he put in, "thirsty while a man's soft yet. You'll harden."

"I guess you'll find it a drier country than you were given to expect," said Steve.

"If your habits have been frequent that way," said the Virginian.

"There's parts of Wyoming," pursued Steve, "where you'll go hours and hours before you'll see a drop of wetness."

"And if yu' keep a-thinkin' about it," said the Virginian, "it'll seem like days and days."

Steve, at this stroke, gave up, and clapped him on the shoulder with a joyous chuckle. "You old son-of-a——!" he cried affectionately.

"Drinks are due now," said the Virginian. "My treat, Steve. But I reckon your suspense will have to linger a while yet."

Thus they dropped into direct talk from that speech of the fourth dimension where they had been using me for their telephone.

"Any cyards going to-night?" inquired the Virginian.

"Stud and draw," Steve told him. "Strangers playing."

"I think I'd like to get into a game for a while," said the Southerner. "Strangers, yu' say?"

And then, before quitting the store, he made his toilet for this little hand at poker. It was a simple preparation. He took his pistol from its holster, examined it, then shoved it between his overalls and his shirt in front, and pulled his waistcoat over it. He might have been combing his hair for all the attention any one paid to this, except myself. Then the two friends went out, and I bethought me of that epithet which Steve again had used to the Virginian as he clapped him on the shoulder. Clearly this wild country spoke a language other than mine — the word here was a term of endearment. Such was my conclusion.

The drummers had finished their dealings with the proprietor, and they were gossiping together in a knot by the door as the Virginian passed out.

"See you later, old man!" This was the American drummer accosting his prospective bed-fellow.

"Oh, yes," returned the bed-fellow, and was gone.

The American drummer winked triumphantly at his brethren. "He's all right," he observed, jerking a thumb after the Virginian. "He's easy. You got to know him to work him. That's all."

"Und vat is your point?" inquired the German drummer.

"Point is — he'll not take any goods off you or me; but he's going to talk up the killer to any consumptive he runs acrost. I ain't done with him yet. Say," (he now addressed the proprietor), "what's her name?"

"Whose name?"

"Woman runs the eating-house."

"Glen. Mrs. Glen."

"Ain't she new?"

"Been settled here about a month. Husband's a freight conductor."

"Thought I'd not seen her before. She's a good-looker."

"Hm! Yes. The kind of good looks I'd sooner see in another man's wife than mine."

"So that's the gait, is it?"

"Hm! well, it don't seem to be. She come here with that reputation. But there's been general disappointment."

"Then she ain't lacked suitors any?"

"Lacked! Are you acquainted with cow-boys?"

"And she disappointed 'em? Maybe she likes her husband?"

"Hm! well, how are you to tell about them silent kind?"

"Talking of conductors," began the drummer. And we listened to his anecdote. It was successful with his audience; but when he launched fluently upon a second I strolled out. There was not enough wit in this narrator to relieve his indecency, and I felt shame at having been surprised into laughing with him.

I left that company growing confidential over their leering stories, and I sought the saloon. It was very quiet and orderly. Beer in quart bottles at a dollar I had never met before; but saving its price, I found no complaint to make of it. Through folding doors I passed from the bar proper with its bottles and elk head back to the hall with its various tables. I saw a man sliding cards from a case, and across the table from him another man laying counters down. Near by was a second dealer pulling cards from the bottom of a pack, and opposite him a solemn old rustic piling and changing coins upon the cards which lay already exposed.

But now I heard a voice that drew my eyes to the far corner of the room.

"Why didn't you stay in Arizona?"

Harmless looking words as I write them down here. Yet at the sound of them I noticed the eyes of the others directed to that corner. What answer was given to them I did not hear, nor did I see who spoke. Then came another remark.

"Well, Arizona's no place for amatures."

This time the two card dealers that I stood near began to give a part of their attention to the group that sat in the corner. There was in me a desire to leave this room. So far my hours at Medicine Bow had seemed to glide beneath a sunshine of merriment, of easy-going jocularity. This was suddenly gone, like the wind changing to north in the middle of a warm day. But I stayed, being ashamed to go.

Five or six players sat over in the corner at a round table where counters were piled. Their eyes were close upon their cards, and one seemed to be dealing a card at a time to each, with pauses and betting between. Steve was there and the Virginian; the others were new faces.

"No place for amatures," repeated the voice; and now I saw that it was the dealer's. There was in his countenance the same ugliness that his words conveyed.

"Who's that talkin'?" said one of the men near me, in a low voice.

"Trampas."

"What's he?"

"Cow-puncher, bronco-buster, tin-horn, most anything."

"Who's he talkin' at?"

"Think it's the black-headed guy he's talking at."

"That ain't supposed to be safe, is it?"

"Guess we're all goin' to find out in a few minutes."

"Been trouble between 'em?"

"They've not met before. Trampas don't enjoy losin' to a stranger."

"Fello's from Arizona, yu' say?"

"No. Virginia. He's recently back from havin' a look at Arizona. Went down there last year for a change. Works for the Sunk Creek outfit." And then the dealer lowered his voice still further and said something in the other man's ear, causing him to grin. After which both of them looked at me.

There had been silence over in the corner; but now the man Trampas spoke again.

"And ten," said he, sliding out some chips from before him. Very strange it was to hear him, how he contrived to make those words a personal taunt. The Virginian was looking at his cards. He might have been deaf.

"And twenty," said the next player, easily.

The next threw his cards down.

It was now the Virginian's turn to bet, or leave the game, and he did not speak at once.

Therefore Trampas spoke. "Your bet, you son-of-a——."

The Virginian's pistol came out, and his hand lay on the table, holding it unaimed. And with a voice as gentle as ever, the voice that sounded almost like a caress, but drawling a very little more than usual, so that there was almost a space between each word, he issued his orders to the man Trampas: —

"When you call me that, smile." And he looked at Trampas across the table.

Yes, the voice was gentle. But in my ears it seemed as if somewhere the bell of death was ringing; and silence, like a stroke, fell on the large room. All men present, as if by some magnetic current, had become aware of this crisis. In my ignorance, and the total stoppage of my thoughts, I stood stock-still, and noticed various people crouching, or shifting their positions.

"Sit quiet," said the dealer, scornfully to the man near me. "Can't you see he don't want to push trouble? He has handed Trampas the choice to back down or draw his steel." 85

Then, with equal suddenness and ease, the room came out of its strangeness. Voices and cards, the click of chips, the puff of tobacco, glasses lifted to drink, — this level of smooth relaxation hinted no more plainly of what lay beneath than does the surface tell the depth of the sea.

For Trampas had made his choice. And that choice was not to "draw his steel." If it was knowledge that he sought, he had found it, and no mistake! We heard no further reference to what he had been pleased to style "amatures." In no company would the black-headed man who had visited Arizona be rated a novice at the cool art of self-preservation.

One doubt remained: What kind of a man was Trampas? A public back-down is an unfinished thing, — for some natures at least. I looked at his face, and thought it sullen, but tricky rather than courageous.

Something had been added to my knowledge also. Once again I had heard applied to the Virginian that epithet which Steve so freely used. The same words, identical to the letter. But this time they had produced a pistol. "When you call me that, smile!" So I perceived a new example of the old truth, that the letter means nothing until the spirit gives it life.

(1902)

Questions

1. How does the opening scene characterize the Virginian? Consider the way he is described (physical appearance and personality traits) and his interaction with other characters. What is so alluring about him?
2. In the second chapter, how does Owen Wister portray the Medicine Bow community? How does the dialogue contribute to this portrayal?
3. Wister is said to have based the scene in Chapter 2 on a remark he actually overheard in a similar setting. Why do you think the remark made such an impression on him? What values do you see revealed in the way the Virginian responds to the same "epithet" in the two different contexts? What insight does the narrator gain from the two incidents?
4. The Virginian is from the South and of an age that he could have fought for the Confederacy during the Civil War. What does Wister achieve by giving him this background rather than making him a New Englander?
5. The narrator is an easterner, a city person unfamiliar with the customs and culture of the West. What evidence does Wister give to emphasize the narrator's outsider status? Why might Wister have chosen a narrator with this background rather than use a Westerner or an omniscient narrator?

6. In his introduction to the novel, Wister writes of the "vanished world" of the West during the last quarter of the nineteenth century:

> What is become of the horseman, the cow-puncher, the last romantic figure upon our soil? For he was romantic. Whatever he did, he did with his might. The bread that he earned was earned hard, the wages that he squandered were squandered hard, — half a year's pay sometimes gone in a night, — "blown in," as he expressed it, or "blowed in," to be perfectly accurate. Well, he will be here among us always, invisible, waiting his chance to live and play as he would like. His wild kind has been among us, since the beginning: a young man with his temptations, a hero without wings.

   What does Wister mean in his answer to the question he poses at the start of this paragraph? How do the society of Medicine Bow in general and the Virginian in particular illustrate the point(s) he is making?
7. Writing in Harvard Magazine, Castle Freeman Jr. calls The Virginian "the template on which every Western since has been cut" — a viewpoint echoed by numerous readers and critics as well as filmmakers. Why? What characteristics of the cowboy and the American Western genre do you see in this selection that make this novel a "template"?

Buffalo Bill 's

E. E. Cummings

Edward Estlin (E. E.) Cummings (1894–1962) was a prolific poet famous for defying traditional rules of typography, capitalization, and punctuation in pursuit of poetry that is both provocative and whimsical. "Buffalo Bill 's" was published in the Dial in 1920, three years after the death of William Cody.

Buffalo Bill 's defunct who used to ride a watersmooth-silver stallion
and break onetwothreefourfive pigeonsjustlikethat
                Jesus

he was a handsome man
                and what i want to know is how do you like your blueeyed boy
Mister Death

(1920)

Questions

1. Characterize the speaker in this poem. What is his attitude toward Buffalo Bill (aka William Cody)? Is the poem meant to admire or disparage him? Explain your answer by referring to specific words and images in the text.
2. What is the difference between "Buffalo Bill is dead" and "Buffalo Bill 's defunct" (ll. 1–2)? How does the word "defunct" work in collaboration with (or opposition to) the lines that follow — about riding a stallion and shooting clay pigeons?
3. What is the effect of the isolated single-word line "Jesus" (l. 7)? How can it be read in several different ways?
4. Literary critic David Ray comments that "though the poem appears to be a simple elegy, it must be placed in the context of Cummings's obstinate attitude of hatred toward an American culture that invites children (and even men) to create an unworthy gallery of heroes. . . . [H]e has long attacked our society's worst indulgences in materialism, hypocrisy . . . and the following of false heroes and tawdry ideals." Taking into account how you would characterize the tone of this poem, support, challenge, or qualify Ray's interpretation.

Marlboro Man

Leonard McCombe

This iconic photograph, taken by Leonard McCombe, was used by the Philip Morris Company to transform Marlboro cigarettes from the feminine appeal of being "Mild as May" to a more rugged image that appealed to men. When this campaign began in 1955, sales were at $5 billion; by 1957, they had jumped to $20 billion despite growing health concerns over cigarettes. McCombe took this photo of Clarence Hailey Long, a ranch foreman in Texas, in 1949.

Leonard McCombe/Getty Images

Questions

1. How does the composition of the photograph contribute to its effect? Why is the focus exclusively on the face rather than a longer shot that would include the entire body?
2. What is the effect of the subject's gaze not meeting the eyes of the viewer?
3. Life magazine assigned McCombe to do a story that dispelled the glamorous image of cowboys seen in Hollywood movies of the period and, instead, documented the hardworking life of ranchers. What stereotypes about cowboys or the West does the photo exploit — or combat?
4. Why do you think that this photo caught the eye of legendary advertising executive Leo Burnett as a good choice for his campaign to transform the image of Marlboro cigarettes?

About Men

Gretel Ehrlich

In the following essay from The Solace of Open Spaces (1984), author and documentary filmmaker Gretel Ehrlich compares the popular view of the cowboy with the cowboys she knows from her own experiences living in Wyoming.

When I'm in New York but feeling lonely for Wyoming I look for the Marlboro ads in the subway. What I'm aching to see is horseflesh, the glint of a spur, a line of distant mountains, brimming creeks, and a reminder of the ranchers and cowboys I've ridden with for the last eight years. But the men I see in those posters with their stern, humorless looks remind me of no one I know here. In our hell-bent earnestness to romanticize the cowboy we've ironically disesteemed his true character. If he's "strong and silent" it's because there's probably no one to talk to. If he "rides away into the sunset" it's because he's been on horseback since four in the morning moving cattle and he's trying, fifteen hours later, to get home to his family. If he's "a rugged individualist" he's also part of a team: ranch work is teamwork and even the glorified open-range cowboys of the 1880s rode up and down the Chisholm Trail in the company of twenty or thirty other riders. Instead of the macho, trigger-happy man our culture has perversely wanted him to be, the cowboy is more apt to be convivial, quirky, and softhearted. To be "tough" on a ranch has nothing to do with conquests and displays of power. More often than not, circumstances — like the colt he's riding or an unexpected blizzard — are overpowering him. It's not toughness but "toughing it out" that counts. In other words, this macho, cultural artifact the cowboy has become is simply a man who possesses resilience, patience, and an instinct for survival. "Cowboys are just like a pile of rocks — everything happens to them. They get climbed on, kicked, rained and snowed on, scuffed up by wind. Their job is 'just to take it,'" one old-timer told me.

A cowboy is someone who loves his work. Since the hours are long — ten to fifteen hours a day — and the pay is $30 he has to. What's required of him is an odd mixture of physical vigor and maternalism. His part of the beef-raising industry is to birth and nurture calves and take care of their mothers. For the most part his work is done on horseback and in a lifetime he sees and comes to know more animals than people. The iconic myth surrounding him is built on American notions of heroism: the index of a man's value as measured in physical courage. Such ideas have perverted manliness into a self-absorbed race for cheap thrills. In a rancher's world, courage has less to do with facing danger than with acting spontaneously — usually on behalf of an animal or another rider. If a cow is stuck in a boghole he throws a loop around her neck, takes his dally (a half hitch around the saddle horn), and pulls her out with horsepower. If a calf is born sick, he may take her home, warm her in front of the kitchen fire, and massage her legs until dawn. One friend, whose favorite horse was trying to swim a lake with hobbles on, dove under water and cut her legs loose with a knife, then swam her to shore, his arm around her neck lifeguard-style, and saved her from drowning. Because these incidents are usually linked to someone or something outside himself, the westerner's courage is selfless, a form of compassion.

The physical punishment that goes with cowboying is greatly underplayed. Once fear is dispensed with, the threshold of pain rises to meet the demands of the job. When Jane Fonda asked Robert Redford (in the film Electric Horseman) if he was sick as he struggled to his feet one morning, he replied, "No, just bent." For once the movies had it right. The cowboys I was sitting with laughed in agreement. Cowboys are rarely complainers; they show their stoicism by laughing at themselves.

If a rancher or cowboy has been thought of as a "man's man" — laconic, hard-drinking, inscrutable — there's almost no place in which the balancing act between male and female, manliness and femininity, can be more natural. If he's gruff, handsome, and physically fit on the outside, he's androgynous at the core. Ranchers are midwives, hunters, nurturers, providers, and conservationists all at once. What we've interpreted as toughness — weathered skin, calloused hands, a squint in the eye, and a growl in the voice — only masks the tenderness inside. "Now don't go telling me these lambs are cute," one rancher warned me the first day I walked into the football-field-sized lambing sheds. The next thing I knew he was holding a black lamb. "Ain't this little rat good-lookin'?"

So many of the men who came to the West were southerners — men looking for work and a new life after the Civil War — that chivalrousness and strict codes of honor were soon thought of as western traits. There were very few women in Wyoming during territorial days, so when they did arrive (some as mail-order brides from places like Philadelphia) there was a stand-offishness between the sexes and a formality that persists now. Ranchers still tip their hats and say, "Howdy, ma'am" instead of shaking hands with me. 5

Even young cowboys are often evasive with women. It's not that they're Jekyll and Hyde creatures — gentle with animals and rough on women — but rather, that they don't know how to bring their tenderness into the house and lack the vocabulary to express the complexity of what they feel. Dancing wildly all night becomes a metaphor for the explosive emotions pent up inside, and when these are, on occasion, released, they're so battery-charged and potent that one caress of the face or one "I love you" will peal for a long while.

The geographical vastness and the social isolation here make emotional evolution seem impossible. Those contradictions of the heart between respectability, logic, and convention on the one hand, and impulse, passion, and intuition on the other, played out wordlessly against the paradisical beauty of the West, give cowboys a wide-eyed but drawn look. Their lips pucker up, not with kisses but with immutability. They may want to break out, staying up all night with a lover just to talk, but they don't know how and can't imagine what the consequences will be. Those rare occasions when they do bare themselves result in confusion. "I feel as if I'd sprained my heart," one friend told me a month after such a meeting.

My friend Ted Hoagland wrote, "No one is as fragile as a woman but no one is as fragile as a man." For all the women here who use "fragileness" to avoid work or as a sexual ploy, there are men who try to hide theirs, all the while clinging to an adolescent dependency on women to cook their meals, wash their clothes, and keep the ranch house warm in winter. But there is true vulnerability in evidence here. Because these men work with animals, not machines or numbers, because they live outside in landscapes of torrential beauty, because they are confined to a place and a routine embellished with awesome variables, because calves die in the arms that pulled others into life, because they go to the mountains as if on a pilgrimage to find out what makes a herd of elk tick, their strength is also a softness, their toughness, a rare delicacy.

(1984)

Questions

1. Gretel Ehrlich opens with a reference to the Marlboro Man (p. 1043), a lone and rugged-looking cowboy who represented Marlboro in its cigarette advertising for many years. With this reference and her description of the Wyoming landscape, what effect does she achieve in the first three sentences of her essay?
2. In the first paragraph, Ehrlich claims that by romanticizing the cowboy, we have "disesteemed his true character" (par. 1). How does she define that "true character"?
3. What does Ehrlich mean when she calls the cowboy "an odd mixture of physical vigor and maternalism" (par. 2)?
4. In paragraphs 5 and 6, Ehrlich analyzes the cowboy's relationship with women. How has the cowboy's history defined the way he interacts with women?
5. How does the paradoxical statement by Ted Hoagland that "[n]o one is as fragile as a woman but no one is as fragile as a man" (par. 8) distill the points Ehrlich makes throughout the essay?

My Heroes Have Never Been Cowboys

SHERMAN ALEXIE

Sherman J. Alexie Jr. (b. 1966), a member of the Spokane and the Coeur d'Alene tribes, grew up on the Spokane Reservation in Washington State. A graduate of Washington State University, he has published more than twenty books, most notably The Lone Ranger and Tonto Fistfight in Heaven (1993), The Absolutely True Diary of a Part-Time Indian (2007), and War Dances (2009), which won the PEN/Faulkner Award for best American fiction. One of the stories in the Lone Ranger collection was the basis for the movie Smoke Signals (1999), for which Alexie wrote the screenplay. The following selection appeared in First Indian on the Moon, a collection of poetry and short prose published in 1993.

1.

In the reservation textbooks, we learned Indians were invented in 1492 by a crazy mixed-blood named Columbus. Immediately after class dismissal, the Indian children traded in those American stories and songs for a pair of tribal shoes. These boots are made for walking, babe, and that's just what they'll do. One of these days these boots are gonna walk all over you.

2.

Did you know that in 1492 every Indian instantly became an extra in the Great American Western? But wait, I never wondered what happened to Randolph Scott or Tom Mix. The Lone Ranger was never in my vocabulary. On the reservation, when we played Indians and cowboys, all of us little Skins fought on the same side against the cowboys in our minds. We never lost.

3.

Indians never lost their West, so how come I walk into the supermarket and find a dozen cowboy books telling me How The West Was Won? Curious, I travel to the world's largest shopping mall, find the Lost and Found Department. "Excuse me," I say. "I seem to have lost the West. Has anybody turned it in?" The clerk tells me I can find it in the Sears Home Entertainment Department, blasting away on fifty televisions.

4.

On Saturday morning television, the cowboy has fifty bullets in his six-shooter; he never needs to reload. It's just one more miracle for this country's heroes.

5.

My heroes have never been cowboys; my heroes carry guns in their minds.

6.

Win their hearts and minds and we win the war. Can you hear that song echo across history? If you give the Indian a cup of coffee with six cubes of sugar, he'll be your servant. If you give the Indian a cigarette and a book of matches, he'll be your friend. If you give the Indian a can of commodities, he'll be your lover. He'll hold you tight in his arms, cowboy, and two-step you outside.

7.

Outside it's cold and a confused snow falls in May. I'm watching some western on TBS, colorized, but the story remains the same. Three cowboys string telegraph wire across the plains until they are confronted by the entire Sioux nation. The cowboys, 19th century geniuses, talk the Indians into touching the wire, holding it in their hands and mouths. After a dozen or so have hold of the wire, the cowboys crank the portable generator and electrocute some of the Indians with a European flame and chase the rest of them away, bareback and burned. All these years later, the message tapped across my skin remains the same.

8.

It's the same old story whispered on the television in every HUD house on the reservation. It's 500 years of that same screaming song, translated from the American.

9.

Lester FallsApart found the American dream in a game of Russian Roulette: one bullet and five empty chambers. "It's Manifest Destiny," Lester said just before he pulled the trigger five times quick. "I missed," Lester said just before he reloaded the pistol: one empty chamber and five bullets. "Maybe we should call this Reservation Roulette," Lester said just before he pulled the trigger once at his temple and five more times as he pointed the pistol toward the sky.

10.

Looking up into the night sky, I asked my brother what he thought God looked like and he said "God probably looks like John Wayne."

11.

We've all killed John Wayne more than once. When we burned the ant pile in our backyard, my brother and I imagined those ants were some cavalry or another. When Brian, that insane Indian boy from across the street, suffocated neighborhood dogs and stuffed their bodies into the reservation high school basement, he must have imagined those dogs were cowboys, come back to break another treaty.

12.

Every frame of the black and white western is a treaty; every scene in this elaborate serial is a promise. But what about the reservation home movies? What about the reservation heroes? I remember this: Down near Bull's Pasture, Eugene stood on the pavement with a gallon of tequila under his arm. I watched in the rearview mirror as he raised his arm to wave goodbye and dropped the bottle, glass and dreams of the weekend shattered. After all these years, that moment is still the saddest of my whole life.

13.

Your whole life can be changed by the smallest pain.

14.

Pain is never added to pain. It multiplies. Arthur, here we are again, you and I, fancy-dancing through the geometric progression of our dreams. Twenty years ago, we never believed we'd lose. Twenty years ago, television was our way of finding heroes and spirit animals. Twenty years ago, we never knew we'd spend the rest of our lives in the reservation of our minds, never knew we'd stand outside the gates of the Spokane Indian Reservation without a key to let ourselves back inside. From a distance, that familiar song. Is it country and western? Is it the sound of hearts breaking? Every song remains the same here in America, this country of the Big Sky and Manifest Destiny, this country of John Wayne and broken treaties. Arthur, I have no words which can save our lives, no words approaching forgiveness, no words flashed across the screen at the reservation drive-in, no words promising either of us top billing. Extras, Arthur, we're all extras.

(1993)

Questions

1. What does Sherman Alexie mean by the statement, "On the reservation, when we played Indians and cowboys, all of us little Skins fought on the same side against the cowboys in our minds" (par. 2)?
2. In this text, Alexie refers to "Manifest Destiny" (pars. 9 and 12). How would you define this term or concept from his perspective?

3. How do you interpret his assertion that "[e]very frame of the black and white western is a treaty; every scene in this elaborate serial is a promise" (par. 12)?
4. Violence — physical, emotional, and psychological — pervades this text. Identify examples of each type. What is Alexie's purpose in invoking violence?
5. Alexie refers to "the cowboys in our minds" (par. 2) and "the reservation of our minds" (par. 14). What is the significance of this division between the external perceived reality of his life and his internal understandings? How do film and references to film stars, such as John Wayne, help the author develop this conflict?
6. How does Alexie link the cowboy as symbol with his references to "story"?
7. Critic Ron McFarland describes Alexie's work as "a rhetoric . . . that reflects pain and anger, a rhetoric that could give way to bitterness. What keeps that from happening and makes the pain and anger bearable for the reader . . . is not so much the hope, love, and compassion . . . but humor. Predictably, this humor is rarely gentle or playful (though it can be that at times), but most often satirical." To what extent do you agree with this assessment? Refer to specifics in the text to support your response.

Buffalo Bill's Wild West
Celebrity, Memory, and Popular History

Joy Kasson

Joy Kasson (b. 1944), author of several books on American history, is professor of American studies and English at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill. She received her BA from Radcliffe College and her PhD from Yale University and was a Fulbright Scholar. Following is an excerpt from the concluding chapter, "Performing National Identity," from her book Buffalo Bill's Wild West: Celebrity, Memory, and Popular History (2000).

Buffalo Bill's Wild West helped to shape both the substance of an American national identity and the tools for its cultural dissemination. Before Frederick Jackson Turner wrote a word about the frontier, and before Theodore Roosevelt established that the virtues of the strenuous life should be the basis for national pride and political success, Buffalo Bill had brilliantly propounded the thesis that American identity was founded on the Western experience: triumphant conquest of wildness through virtue, skill, and firepower. At the same time, and equally important, the Wild West sanitized this narrative. In its fictionalized historical representation, Americans could savor the thrill of danger without risking its consequences, could believe that struggle and conflict inflicted no lasting wounds, and could see for themselves that the enemy "other" would rise from the dust, wave to the crowd, and sell souvenir photographs at the end of the day.

Buffalo Bill's frontier thesis was never an explicit, coherent theory about what America was. Rather, its power came from being a spectacle so gripping, so encompassing, so sensuous that it became part of its spectators' own experience. Buffalo Bill's showmanship created American memory through the medium of popular entertainment. In doing so, it heralded the opening of a new age in mass communications in which both political and economic authority would accrue to those who could most effectively spin a message, sell a product, and shape popular perceptions. Not only did Buffalo Bill's Wild West promulgate a particular interpretation of American identity, but it also demonstrated the power of mass media to formulate values.

The substance of Buffalo Bill's frontier thesis infused American thinking for most of the twentieth century. From patriotic parades to football cheers, from tourist promotions to cigarette advertising, the image of the virile Western hero never lost its allure as a symbol of the American spirit. A recent book featuring beautiful photographs of artifacts from the largest private collection of Buffalo Bill memorabilia makes plain its authors' nostalgia for the Wild West's notion of American life. The authors acknowledge their love for the "romance and ethos of the Old West." That ethos seems to them still operative: "Not only is American culture the richer and more fascinating because of [Buffalo Bill's] unique legacy, but so is the rest of the world's." At the same time, these admiring collectors specifically associate the legacy of the Old West with a set of values threatened by late-twentieth-century transformations, those of their own childhood, when nation and family seemed to follow the script so carefully crafted by Cody and his associates: "an age of heroes, when there was still widespread respect for parental authority."[1] As the authors tacitly acknowledge, the considerable cynicism in public life in the late twentieth century worked against the tradition of uncritical hero worship. A chorus of voices raised questions about the values that underlay the romance of the Old West — from Stanley Kubrick, whose Dr. Strangelove envisioned the doomsday nuclear bomb falling with a hat-waving cowboy riding it like a bucking bronco, to critics of the Vietnam War who associated American military arrogance with the Wild West Texas drawl of President Lyndon Johnson.[2] Yet Ronald Reagan, the most popular of American presidents after the Vietnam War, took office on the strength of a cowboy image and a promise to make America ride "tall in the saddle" once again. . . .

The romance of the West has also been memorably transmitted to the present through twentieth-century America's most influential medium: motion pictures. More than seven thousand Western films and thousands more television Westerns have been produced, viewed, and re-viewed around the world.[3] Not only did Cody participate in the making of early Westerns himself, but the plot, characters, incidents, and personnel of the Wild West made an almost seamless leap from the arena to the early film studio. Edwin Porter's 1903 Great Train Robbery drew on the familiar Wild West story of the robbery of the stagecoach. Scenes from the Indian wars, narratives of captivity and rescue, Indian attack and cavalry charge, all set pieces from Buffalo Bill's Wild West, formed the backbone of many early film Westerns.

Similarly, Buffalo Bill's Wild West provided many of the performers for early 5 Western films. Not coincidentally, a leading producer named his company the Bison Company when it moved its operations to California in 1909. Its paraphernalia and personnel were supplied by an entertainment organization that drew upon and competed with Cody's exhibitions, the Miller Brothers 101 Ranch Wild West Show, based in Oklahoma. Miller Brothers hired many show Indians from the same Pine Ridge and Rosebud reservations where Cody recruited.[4] Within a few years, Bison productions were also using the same stock and materials spectators had seen in Buffalo Bill's Wild West. Miller Brothers and Bison were among the major buyers of animals and equipment at the bankruptcy sale after the failure of the Two Bills show.[5]

The marks of Buffalo Bill's Wild West are everywhere on the film Western. The generalized "Indian" dressed in feather headdress, war paint, and mounted on a racing pony moved directly into film from the Wild West, where differences between tribes were minimized and all Indians took on a generalized Plains Indian identity. The Stetson hat, which Buffalo Bill popularized (and advertised), became part of the standard costume for the Western film star. As Western films took on a life of their own at the mid-century, they began to depart from the Wild West's cast of characters. The figure of the cowboy, the focus for Western films and novels, had occupied a relatively small place in Buffalo Bill's Wild West, and the gunfighter, a Western film and television staple, never appeared. But to the extent that he was heroic, the Western film protagonist presented the frontier virtues that Buffalo Bill's performances had made famous: masculinity, courage, self-possession. As the critic Lee Clark Mitchell has written, the Western film is defined by "a set of problems recurring in endless combination: the problem of progress, . . . the problem of honor, . . . the problem of law or justice, . . . the problem of violence, . . . and subsuming all, the problem of what it means to be a man."[6] Thematically, Buffalo Bill's Wild West had set the stage for all these preoccupations. . . .

The substance of Buffalo Bill's legacy, then, lies in the dramatization of the cultural issues that have been basic to American national identity: the use of violence and conquest in the formation of the American nation, Americans' love-hate relationship with unspoiled nature and native peoples, gender and the meaning of heroism, and the role of the individual in an increasingly urban, industrial, and corporate society. But the Wild West's importance also lies in its very form: a mass medium that blurs the lines between fact and fiction, history and melodrama, truth and entertainment. Buffalo Bill's Wild West became the truth about America when it was believed as the truth by Americans and others around the world.

The organizers and promoters of Buffalo Bill's Wild West understood and deployed techniques of image creation, salesmanship, and promotion that would soon become standard for everything from breakfast cereal to political candidates. They created a thoroughly modern celebrity and made him into a brand name, instantly recognizable around the world. The sophisticated mass media of the twentieth century extended and elaborated upon the Wild West's ability to convince viewers they had seen "the real thing." By the time of Cody's death, Edward L. Bernays had embarked on his trailblazing career in "publicity direction," and the advertising boom of the 1920s transformed the ways in which products were marketed and designed. . . .

Despite his claims to historical significance, Buffalo Bill finally knew that he would be remembered as a showman: "Let my show go on," he was supposed to have said on his deathbed.[7] Certainly, Cody tried until the very end to keep alive not only his mortal body but his heroic self as well. Always hoping a fortune would be just around the corner, always eager to provide a good show and to connect with the public, he played those last seasons not just to pay the bills but, perhaps more importantly, to sustain the narrative of his life. Performing in Iowa in 1915, Cody gallantly stayed in the ring to help spectators endangered by a sudden flood while four hundred workers and performers fled to higher ground.[8] If the real man had become the stage persona, the opposite was also true.

Cody's position, subsumed into his own constructed image, was remarkably modern, a fact that was recognized in a tribute by one of the most self-conscious of modernist poets, E. E. Cummings. One of Cummings's first published poems, printed in the Dial in January 1920, was an elegy to Buffalo Bill: 10

Buffalo Bill 's
defunct
who used to ride a watersmooth-silver stallion
and break onetwothreefourfive pigeonsjustlikethat
Jesus
he was a handsome man
and what i want to know is how do you like your blueeyed boy
Mister Death[9]

Manuscript pages of notes show that Cummings began the poem early in 1917, probably in response to a newspaper headline announcing Buffalo Bill's death.[10] As a child, Cummings had gone to circuses and made up his own animal acts. His library included a book about Buffalo Bill, and his childhood drawings included a picture of Sitting Bull and Buffalo Bill.[11] The poem evokes the energy and glamour of the Wild West, and suggests his own childhood fascination with performance and a willingness to be swept up in the excitement. The coinage watersmooth-silver suggests both the color and the rippling motion of Cody's big gray horse, Isham, his favorite mount in his later years, and the run-on phrases onetwothreefourfive and pigeonsjustlikethat suggest the breathlessness of an admiring fan.

The poem, simple and straightforward as it may first appear, resonates with the complexity of Buffalo Bill's own position in American culture. Cummings opens the poem with a worldly, ironic, modern voice. The word defunct, with its detached, clinical sound, also seems deflationary and harsh. Cummings's notes show that he first jotted down the phrase "Buffalo Bill is Dead," which he could have read in a newspaper.[12] The poem's terse, gruff opening refuses to participate in the heroic vocabulary with which Buffalo Bill identified himself with his own myth or in the gushingly sentimental accounts of his death.

But in the final three lines the irreverent modernist creates his own mythicized fantasy, imagining Buffalo Bill entering the afterlife, still the favored, blue-eyed boy, now performing not for the cheering public but for the mysterious "Mister Death."

The famous buffalo hunter and Indian fighter has always been the killer, but now he has become the prey. Yet the star is not knocked off his horse, dragged unceremoniously offstage and deprived of a red flannel scalp. In the courtly formality of the final phrase, Cummings suggests a Buffalo Bill whose heroism survives his death. Not a defunct corpse now but a handsome man who will be a blue-eyed boy forever, Cummings's hero rides offstage, radiating complexity, not unlike the living showman. Lighting out for the territory like Huck Finn, "going West" in the colloquial sense of dying, Cummings's Buffalo Bill is indeed an apt hero for the modern era, an age when images have become indistinguishable from what they purport to represent and the content of national identity seems identical to its performance.

Notes

1. R. L. Wilson, with Greg Martin, Buffalo Bill's Wild West, An American Legend (New York: Random House, 1998), pp. vii, 256.
2. Stanley Kubrick, dir., Dr. Strangelove, or, How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb, 1964; J. William Fulbright, The Arrogance of Power (New York: Random House, 1967).
3. Edward Buscombe, ed., The BFI Companion to the Western (London: André Deutsch, Ltd., 1988), p. 13.
4. L. C. Moses, Wild West Shows and the Images of American Indians 1883–1933 (Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1996), p. 179.
5. Don Russell, The Lives and Legends of Buffalo Bill (Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1960), p. 456.
6. Lee Clark Mitchell, Westerns: Making the Man in Fiction and Film (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996), p. 3.
7. Russell reports this claim, but doubts its accuracy, in Lives and Legends, p. 473.
8. Ibid., p. 460.
9. E. E. Cummings, Complete Poems: 1904–1962, Edited by George James Firmage (New York: Liveright, 1923, 1951, 1991), p. 90. Reprinted by permission of Liveright Publishing Corporation.
10. Rushworth M. Kidder, "'Buffalo Bill's'—An Early Cummings Manuscript," Harvard Library Bulletin 24 (Oct. 1976), pp. 373–80.
11. Richard S. Kennedy, Dreams in the Mirror: A Biography of E. E. Cummings (New York: Liveright, 1980), pp. 23, 31, 32.
12. Kidder, "'Buffalo Bill's.'" plate 1.

(2000)

Questions

1. What does Joy Kasson mean when she states that the Wild West show "sanitized" (par. 1) the narrative of the Western experience?
2. According to Kasson, what is "the script so carefully crafted by Cody and his associates" (par. 3)?

3. What influences of Buffalo Bill's Wild West does Kasson see in the cowboy of Western films? What qualities does she ascribe to the cowboy as film protagonist?
4. What is the purpose of Kasson's analysis of the poem on Buffalo Bill by E. E. Cummings? In what ways does it serve as evidence for a point she is making?
5. What does Kasson see as the "legacy" of Buffalo Bill? What is the logic behind her claim that his show "became the truth about America when it was believed as the truth by Americans and others around the world" (par. 7)? How persuasive do you find this interpretation?
6. What is Kasson's attitude toward William Cody/Buffalo Bill? Would you describe it as admiring, critical, ambivalent, objective, something other, or a combination of these?

The Virginian Teaches the Merit of a Man

Benjamin Percy

Benjamin Percy (b. 1979) is the author of the novels Red Moon (2013) and The Wilding (2010) and the short-story collections Refresh, Refresh (2010) and The Language of Elk (2007). Following is a transcript of a segment from All Things Considered on National Public Radio in 2007.

My father was 50, mustached, and as deeply tan as a piece of jerky. The book was just as weather-beaten. He handed it to me and said, "Reading this will make a man out of you."

He had said the same when whipping fastball after fastball at me, teaching me to stand tough in the batter's box. Have to admit, I greeted The Virginian with as much enthusiasm as a knuckleball to the teeth.

But he pestered me and I began it. And once I began, the pages fluttered by so swiftly they made a breeze on my face. Then, more than anything, I wanted to tug on my metaphorical chaps and spur my horse forward at such a speed his hooves would rise off the pasture and we would be flying — 150 years into the past — when poker games inevitably went sour, when the six-shooter was the tool to fix all problems, when "days [looked] alike, and often [lost] their very names in the quiet depths of Cattle Land."

I don't know how to say it any better than this: the book made me ridiculously happy.

Published in 1902, Owen Wister's The Virginian is the first fully realized Western. 5
The mythical cowboy figure — the man of few words, the man who gets the girl and brings justice to the frontier, the man we know from countless films and pulp novels — first appears here.

He is the Virginian, a nameless and "slim young giant," who has "plainly come many miles from . . . across the vast horizon." If you imagine a yellowed map of the United States, and if you imagine a red arrow moving across it — accompanied by old-time piano music — tracing the passage of the thousands who heard the call "Go West!" and went, you have the Virginian's journey to Wyoming.

Immediately I felt a profound jealousy for the way the Virginian lights off for the territories, where every breath is "pure as water and strong as wine," and where he earns a reputation as a horseman.

By God, I wanted that!

I was 18 at the time, a legal adult — but a man? Could I be called that in earnest?

Owen Wister, like some great and terrible Moses draped in leather and carrying a buffalo gun, taught me to re-examine what it meant to be a man. It meant more than earning a diploma or getting married or buying a house. It meant living simply, respecting women, holding congress with nature. It meant making decisions informed by a moral code so that you were never the one to start trouble, but oh, could you finish it. In our world of hydrogenated soybean oil and sport utility vehicles and Pottery Barn and grubless lawns, the novel is a welcome shot to the arm, a much needed antidote to all the plastic and phoniness. 10

Reading The Virginian helps me better appreciate honor and nature and life and testosterone, in the same way the Bible helps so many better appreciate God.

When trying to explain to his beloved why he must gunplay with a no-good rotten scoundrel of a cattle-thief, the Virginian says, "Can't yu' see how it must be about a man?" In many ways this is the novel's central concern — the merit of a man — and for a long time I have wandered in the Virginian's incompatible world, comparing myself to him. Quick draw, talented horseman, resilient drinker, feared by men and cherished by women. I like to think of us — together — hunting buffalo or warming beans over a campfire. Whenever I crack open the book, it almost seems possible — I am almost there.

(2007)

Questions

1. What is it about The Virginian that appealed to a young, twenty-first-century reader? Why does the book make Benjamin Percy "ridiculously happy" (par. 4)?
2. Percy says the novel made him "re-examine what it meant to be a man" (par. 10). What is his conclusion about what it does mean, and how does the character of the Virginian, "[t]he mythical cowboy figure" (par. 5), guide him to this understanding?
3. Do you find any of these descriptions hyperbolic: "Reading The Virginian helps me better appreciate honor and nature and life and testosterone, in the same way the Bible helps so many better appreciate God" (par. 11); Owen Wister was "like some great and terrible Moses draped in leather and carrying a buffalo gun" (par. 10); "In our world of hydrogenated soybean oil and sport utility vehicles and Pottery Barn and grubless lawns, the novel is a welcome shot to the arm, a much needed antidote to all the plastic and phoniness" (par. 10)? Why do you think these are or are not exaggerations? In what ways are they effective?
4. Based on Percy's response and the excerpts you read from The Virginian (p. 1036), why do you agree or disagree that the novel offers insights on what manhood means in the twenty-first century?

Making Connections

1. Is Frederic S. Remington's depiction of the West (p. 1028) more congruent with that of Joseph Nimmo Jr. in "The American Cowboy" (p. 1024) or of Owen Wister in The Virginian (p. 1036)?
2. Based on his poem "Buffalo Bill 's" (p. 1042), would E. E. Cummings be more in agreement with Frederick Jackson Turner's (p. 1029) or Sherman Alexie's (p. 1047) view of the cowboy?
3. How would Joy Kasson (p. 1050) view the Marlboro Man (p. 1043)? What might be her analysis of the photo's appeal?
4. How do you think Alexie would respond to Gretel Ehrlich's (p. 1044) depiction of the American cowboy?
5. Why do you agree or disagree with Kasson's assertion that Cummings's poem "resonates with the complexity of Buffalo Bill's own position in American culture" (par. 11)?
6. Used as an adjective, the word "cowboy" can be a pejorative, meaning someone who acts irresponsibly without regard for consequences (e.g., cowboy diplomacy). Do you find more support for this negative meaning in the selection by Nimmo or by Wister?

Entering the Conversation

As you respond to each of the following prompts, support your position with appropriate evidence, including at least three sources in this Conversation on the American cowboy, unless otherwise indicated.

1. Consider the following thoughts on the difference between myth and history from historian John Mack Faragher:

   > Think of the word "myth" here not as a synonym for erroneous belief, but as the body of tales, fables, and fantasies that help a people make sense of its history. Like history, myth finds meaning in the events of the past. But unlike history, myth is less concerned with facts than with ideological essences.

   How much of what we know — and feel — about the American cowboy is myth and how much is fact? Is it important to distinguish between the two?
2. How have the myth and reality of the cowboy shaped today's definition of masculinity? Consider examples from popular culture along with at least two of the texts in this Conversation.
3. View a classic Western film — such as The Oxbow Incident (1943), High Noon (1952), The Searchers (1956), or True Grit (1969, 2010) — and discuss the characterization of the cowboy in the American West. How does the film's depiction of this figure reflect or dispute at least three of the texts in this Conversation?

4. Other countries, particularly those in South America, have figures analogous to American cowboys: e.g., gauchos on the plains of the southern cone of South America; the llaneros on the plains of Colombia and Venezuela; the vaqueiros of the Brazilian northeast; and the Mexican vaqueros. Research one or more of these and discuss in what respects they are similar to and different from the myth and/or reality of the American cowboy.

5. What about the cowgirls? The National Cowgirl Museum and Hall of Fame explains its mission: to "honor and celebrate women, past and present, whose lives exemplify the courage, resilience, and independence that helped shape the American West, and foster an appreciation of the ideals and spirit of self-reliance they inspire." Who were these women? What made them famous? After researching this topic, compare and contrast the depiction of the cowgirl and that of the cowboy in American popular culture.

6. Imagine Sherman Alexie going to Buffalo Bill's Wild West. Write a monologue from Alexie's viewpoint, describing what he sees. You might do additional research into William Cody to inform your response.

Grammar as Rhetoric and Style

Modifiers

A modifier may be a one-word adverb or adjective; a phrase, such as a prepositional or participial phrase; or a clause, such as an adjective clause. At its best, a modifier describes, focuses, or qualifies the nouns, pronouns, and verbs it modifies. But when a writer overuses or incorrectly uses modifiers, the result may be verbose or even flowery writing.

Notice how Theodore Roosevelt uses modifiers to describe the virtues of "The Strenuous Life":

> We do not admire the man of timid peace. We admire the man who embodies victorious effort; the man who never wrongs his neighbor, who is prompt to help a friend, but who has those virile qualities necessary to win in the stern strife of actual life.

With simple but precise adjectives, he sets up a contrast: the man of "timid peace" versus one of "victorious effort." He follows with three relative clauses further defining the admirable man ("who . . . who . . . but who . . ."). He stresses at the end of the sentence the "virile qualities" of such a person and adds alliteration to the adjective-noun combination to leave us thinking about the "stern strife of actual life." Roosevelt's subject itself argues for muscular, concise writing as he defines an ethic of masculinity. His careful use of modifiers establishes a tension between passive and active responses to life's struggles.

In Life on the Mississippi, Mark Twain employs modifiers to convey the difficulty of learning "the shape of the river" when he was a cub riverboat pilot:

> I went to work now to learn the shape of the river; and of all the eluding and ungraspable objects that ever I tried to get mind or hands on, that was the chief. I would fasten my eyes upon a sharp, wooded point that projected far into the river some miles ahead of me, and go to laboriously photographing its shape upon my brain; and just as I was beginning to succeed to my satisfaction, we would draw up toward it and the exasperating thing would begin to melt away and fold back into the bank! If there had been a conspicuous dead tree standing upon the very point of the cape, I would find that tree inconspicuously merged into the general forest, and occupying the middle of a straight shore, when I got abreast of it! No prominent hill would stick to its shape long enough for me to make up my mind what its form really was, but it was as dissolving and changeful as if it had been a mountain of butter in the hottest corner of the tropics.

Twain seems almost to struggle to find the language to describe the river: trying to plumb its mysteries is more difficult than understanding any of "the eluding and ungraspable objects" he has encountered. The adjectives "eluding" and "ungraspable" evoke the difficulty and contrast with "a sharp, wooded point" that he sees miles ahead, a point whose shape he tries "laboriously" to photograph on his brain. Twain juxtaposes two words — an adjective and an adverb — with opposite meanings to emphasize his frustration: "a conspicuous dead tree standing upon the very point" that seems a "tree inconspicuously merged into the general forest." These modifiers help us feel what seems to him like a mirage, a "dissolving and changeful" form that echoes the "eluding and ungraspable objects" at the start of this description. The final simile may be the most striking image in the passage, but the modifiers have given us as readers a sense of how inadequate Twain feels trying to navigate what seems like the dreamscape of the Mississippi River.

Rhetorical and Stylistic Strategy

Like most language choices skilled writers make, picking the right modifiers contributes to achieving a particular effect and purpose. A clinical modifier has a different rhetorical effect than a lyrical one. Further, rhetorical strategies such as repetition and parallel structure apply to adjectives and adverbs, participial and prepositional phrases, and relative clauses.

Modifiers can enliven, focus, or qualify ideas. In this passage from Fast Food Nation, Eric Schlosser brings the scene in the slaughterhouse to life for his readers through modifiers that appeal to the senses:

> Sides of beef suspended from an overhead trolley swing toward a group of men. Each worker has a large knife in one hand and a steel hook in the other. They grab the meat with their hooks and attack it fiercely with their knives. As they hack away, using all their strength, grunting, the place suddenly feels different, primordial. The machinery seems beside the point, and what's going on before me has been going on for thousands of years — the meat, the hook, the knife, men straining to cut more meat.

In the first few sentences, Schlosser appeals to our visual and aural sensibilities to give us a vivid rendering of the gruesome scene. The sides of beef are "suspended from an overhead trolley." Each worker is armed with a "large knife . . . and a steel hook" that allow him to attack the meat "fiercely." We hear workers "grunting" as they hack at the meat until Schlosser says that despite the up-to-date machinery, the slaughterhouse feels "primordial" — a modifier meaning at the beginning of time, in an original state. Such an unusual modifier is likely to make us stop for a moment to think about the scene. Is Schlosser suggesting primordial as merely ancient, or does the word suggest a savagery out of sync with contemporary times?

Modifiers can add precision to a simple statement. In "The Subtle Problems of Charity," Jane Addams describes the affluent woman who wants to be of assistance to the poor:

> The charity visitor, let us assume, is a young college woman, well-bred and open-minded.

A few sentences later, Addams describes this woman's awareness that > whatever her virtues may be, they are not the industrial virtues; that her untrained hands are no more fitted to cope with actual conditions than are those of her broken-down family.

In the first sentence, "young college woman" would identify the person, but the modifiers "well-bred and open-minded" give us a better sense of the perspective she brings to her situation. Similarly, in the second example, "untrained" and "broken-down" add vividness to the point Addams is making. Without the modifiers, we could understand the ideas Addams is expressing, but the emphasis and immediacy brought by those descriptive details would be missing.

Modifiers add concrete detail in both of the previous examples, but they can also add a sort of poetry to description and narration. In Life on the Mississippi, Mark Twain reflects on his loss of wonder for and sense of mystery about the river once he became a skilled pilot.

> All the grace, the beauty, the poetry, had gone out of the majestic river! I still kept in mind a certain wonderful sunset which I witnessed when steamboating > was new to me. A broad expanse of the river was turned to blood; in the middle distance the red hue brightened into gold, through which a solitary log came floating, black and conspicuous; one place a long, slanting mark lay sparkling upon the water; in another the surface was broken by boiling, tumbling rings, that were as many-tinted as an opal; where the ruddy flush was faintest, was a smooth spot that was covered with graceful circles and radiating lines, ever so delicately traced; the shore on our left was densely wooded, and the somber shadow that fell from this forest was broken in one place by a long, ruffled trail that shone like silver; and high above the forest wall a clean-stemmed dead tree waved a single leafy bough that glowed like a flame in the unobstructed splendor that was flowing from the sun. There were graceful curves, reflected images, woody heights, soft distances; and over the whole scene, far and near, the dissolving lights drifted steadily, enriching it every passing moment with new marvels of coloring.

Twain describes the sunset through the eyes of the boy who was awed by the mystery of the landscape. The ordinary, even vague adjective "wonderful" is qualified by the description that follows: "red hue brightened into gold," a "solitary log" that was "black and conspicuous," and a mark that "lay sparkling." Twain describes patterns on the water's surface being "broken by boiling, tumbling rings" and "graceful circles and radiating lines, ever so delicately traced." Throughout the passage, these modifiers lead us to see the "new marvels of coloring" that the sunset impressed on the young Twain.

Modifiers can work through juxtaposition to emphasize contrast and through parallel structure to add emphasis. Let's look at this passage by Joy Kasson about Buffalo Bill Cody:

> Despite his claims to historical significance, Buffalo Bill finally knew that he would be remembered as a showman: "Let my show go on," he was supposed to have said on his deathbed. Certainly, Cody tried until the very end to keep alive not only his mortal body but his heroic self as well. Always hoping a fortune would be just around the corner, always eager to provide a good show and to connect with the public, he played those last seasons not just to pay the bills but, perhaps more importantly, to sustain the narrative of his life.

Through juxtaposition of contrasting adjectives, she emphasizes the contrast of Cody's "mortal body" with his "heroic self" — that is, his physical presence versus the legend. She emphasizes similarity by repeating the adverb "always" before two participial phrases: "Always hoping" and "always eager."

Cautions

Studying how accomplished writers use modifiers helps us understand how to use them effectively. Following are some cautions to keep in mind when using modifiers in your own writing.

1. Do not use too many modifiers. Mark Twain gives a clear image of how he felt as a cub pilot on the mighty Mississippi River. However, less experienced writers may overwrite by including too many adjectives, as shown in the following example:

   > The bright yellow compact car with the pun-laden, out-of-state vanity plates was like beautiful, warm sunshine on the gray, dreary Tuesday afternoon.

2. Do not rely on adjectives when strong verbs would be more effective. Instead of writing "Elani walked with a confident and quick stride," perhaps write, "Elani strutted."
3. Beware of adding too many qualifiers. Be especially careful about really and very. "Troy felt really sad" might be expressed as "Troy felt discouraged" or "despondent." Or it might simply be stated as "Troy felt sad." Similarly, "The mockingbird's song is very beautiful" is probably just as well stated as "The mockingbird's song is beautiful" or, introducing a strong verb, as "The mockingbird serenades."

You need not avoid qualifiers altogether, but if you find yourself using them over and over, it's time to check whether they're really very effective.

• EXERCISE 1 •

Rewrite each of the following sentences to make the modifiers more effective.

1. Dolores offered a perfectly unique view of the situation.
2. I really had difficulty understanding my teacher because he talked so quickly and softly.
3. Michael was so very excited about the beginning of lacrosse season that he could barely sleep.
4. Susan talked with self-assurance about movies she hadn't even seen.
5. The skyline was amazing on the beautiful evening.

• EXERCISE 2 •

Identify the modifiers, both words and phrases, in the following paragraphs from "The Cutting of My Long Hair" by Zitkala-Ša. Are the modifiers effective or excessive? Cite specific examples to support your view of whether the modifiers support or distract from Zitkala-Ša's achieving her purpose.

> The first day in the land of apples was a bitter-cold one; for the snow still covered the ground, and the trees were bare. A large bell rang for breakfast, its loud metallic voice crashing through the belfry overhead and into our sensitive ears. The annoying clatter of shoes on bare floors gave us no peace. The constant clash of harsh noises, with an undercurrent of many voices murmuring an unknown tongue, made a bedlam within which I was securely tied. And though my spirit tore itself in struggling for its lost freedom, all was useless.

A paleface woman, with white hair, came up after us. We were placed in a line of girls who were marching into the dining room. These were Indian girls, in stiff shoes and closely clinging dresses. The small girls wore sleeved aprons and shingled hair. As I walked noiselessly in my soft moccasins, I felt like sinking to the floor, for my blanket had been stripped from my shoulders. I looked hard at the Indian girls, who seemed not to care that they were even more immodestly dressed than I, in their tightly fitting clothes.

• EXERCISE 3 •

Focus on the use of modifiers in the following passage from "The Talented Tenth" by W. E. B. DuBois. Look carefully at the adjectives he uses to characterize the present moment as well as the past. Consider how the use of repetition and parallel structure adds to the impact of adjective clauses and adverbs. How do the modifiers contribute to the dramatic effect DuBois builds?

And so we come to the present—a day of cowardice and vacillation, of strident wide-voiced wrong and fainthearted compromise; of double-faced dallying with Truth and Right. Who are to-day guiding the work of the Negro people? The "exceptions" of course. And yet so sure as this Talented Tenth is pointed out, the blind worshippers of the Average cry out in alarm: "These are exceptions, look here at death, disease and crime—these are the happy rule." Of course they are the rule, because a silly nation made them the rule: Because for three long centuries this people lynched Negroes who dared to be brave, raped black women who dared to be virtuous, crushed dark-hued youth who dared to be ambitious, and encouraged and made to flourish servility and lewdness and apathy. But not even this was able to crush all manhood and chastity and aspiration from black folk. A saving remnant continually survives and persists, continually aspires, continually shows itself in thrift and ability and character.

• EXERCISE 4 •

We have removed many of the modifiers in the following passage from Life on the Mississippi, in which Mark Twain describes how he felt as a young pilot taking the helm on his own, unaware that his mentor Mr. Bixby was watching nearby.

- Read the paragraph aloud, and listen to its cadence (the combination of the text's rhythm with the rise and fall in the inflection of the speaker's voice).
- Add the following modifiers: frightful, easy, calmly, deadly, blind, vainglori-ously, sole, gaily, awful, entirely, prodigiously. (Check the meaning of any unfa-miliar words.) Use these adjectives and adverbs to improve the paragraph's effectiveness.
- Compare your version to the original (see pp. 852–53, par. 57).
- Discuss the rhetorical effect of the modifiers in this passage.

I did not know that he was hiding behind a chimney to see how I would perform. I went along, getting prouder and prouder, for he had never left the boat in my charge such a length of time before. I even got to "setting" her and letting the wheel go, while I turned my back and inspected the stern marks and hummed a tune, a sort of indifference which I had admired in Bixby and other great pilots. Once I inspected rather long, and when I faced to the front again my heart flew into my mouth so suddenly that if I hadn't clapped my teeth together I should have lost it. One of those bluff reefs was stretching its length right across our bows! My head was gone in a moment; I did not know which end I stood on; I gasped and could not get my breath; I spun the wheel down with such rapidity that it wove itself together like a spider's web; the boat answered and turned square away from the reef, but the reef followed her! I fled, but still it followed, still it kept — right across my bows! I never looked to see where I was going, I only fled. The crash was imminent. Why didn't that villain come? If I committed the crime of ringing a bell I might get thrown overboard. But better that than kill the boat. So in desperation I started such a rattling "shivaree" down below as never had astounded an engineer in this world before, I fancy. Amidst the frenzy of the bells the engines began to back and fill in a furious way, and my reason forsook its throne — we were about to crash into the woods on the other side of the river. Just then Mr. Bixby stepped into view on the hurricane deck.

• EXERCISE 5 •

Following are examples of authors' skillful use of modifiers, both single words and phrases. In each, identify the modifier or modifiers, and discuss the effect they create. Then write a sentence or passage of your own, emulating the writer's technique.

1. [W]e shall contribute one-third to the business and industrial prosperity of the South, or we shall prove a veritable body of death, stagnating, depressing, retarding every effort to advance the body politic.

— Booker T. Washington

2. Although official statistics are not kept, the death rate among slaughterhouse sanitation crews is extraordinarily high. They are the ultimate in disposable workers: illegal, illiterate, impoverished, untrained.

— Eric Schlosser

3. A thorough knowledge and judicious exercise of this power in lynching localities could many times effect a bloodless revolution.

— Ida B. Wells-Barnett

4. The injured captain, lying in the bow, was at this time buried in that profound dejection and indifference which comes, temporarily at least, to even the bravest and most enduring when, willy nilly, the firm fails, the army loses, the ship goes down.

— Stephen Crane

5. We are beginning to understand the individual cost that the schism between work and family exacts. We have not added up the national cost.

— Madeleine M. Kunin

6. Instead of the macho, trigger-happy man our culture has perversely wanted him to be, the cowboy is more apt to be convivial, quirky, and softhearted.

— Gretel Ehrlich

7. Half a mile from home, at the farther edge of the woods, where the land was highest, a great pine-tree stood, the last of its generation.

— Sarah Orne Jewett

Suggestions for Writing

Reconstructing America

1. This period in U.S. history is often characterized as a time of "a loss of innocence" brought about by the divisions and bloodshed of the Civil War. How would you define that phrase in this context? Write an essay explaining how the literature of the era reflects "a loss of innocence" in the spirit of the nation. Feel free to use texts that pose or suggest a counterargument.

2. During the era covered by this chapter, fiction flourished, and with the growth of periodicals, the short story gained enormous popularity and influence. Using at least three of the pieces of fiction from this chapter, write an essay discussing why you believe short stories had such popular appeal for the American public.

3. Immigration, industrialization, and urbanization characterize this time period and widened social divisions based on wealth, religion, race, and ethnicity. Write an essay discussing the increasing divides in American culture as illustrated in several of the texts in this chapter.

4. With newly freed African Americans and a growing immigrant population, educating a larger populace that was more diverse than an elite group of affluent white men became problematic for the states. What approaches were suggested, or tried, during this era? What were the main issues that educating an expanding democracy posed? Refer to several of the texts in this chapter in your response.

5. After the Civil War, how did Americans promote the idea of "re-union"—of bringing the nation back together? Develop a discussion that includes at least four authors from this period who address the question, How can the wounds of war be healed?

6. One of the tensions during this period was between the desire to assimilate into mainstream culture and the desire to preserve tradition and heritage. In some instances, assimilation was made more difficult because of discrimination. Based on the texts you've read in this chapter, discuss how this tension manifested itself and at least two different responses to it. Which inclination do you think ultimately dominated this period?

7. A powerful symbol of western expansion, the railroad, particularly the transcontinental railroad, was both idealized and demonized. While to many it demonstrated America's technological prowess and the power of industrialization, to others it brought into high relief exploitation of low-cost labor, including immigrants, that resulted from corporate greed. Using texts from this chapter and others from your research, discuss how the building of railroads to link the established East and the developing West embodied both of these perspectives.

8. Following is an excerpt from the Brooklyn Daily Eagle on May 23, 1883, celebrating the opening of the Brooklyn Bridge, one of the most amazing engineering feats of its day:

> Brooklyn, if not New York also, will turn aside from all ordinary business tomorrow to celebrate one of the noblest achievements of modern times. The bridge about to be opened to the public is a work as characteristic of our civilization as the Pyramid of Cheops was of Egypt. The colossal pile of stone which still excites the wonder of travelers in the land of the Pharaohs recalls the magnificence of a tyrannical dynasty, the vast influence of a hierarchy buttressed by superstition and the practical enslavement of millions of industrious people. The bridge is a monument to the skill of a free people, to the arts of peace, to liberal thought and to the spirit which makes the promotion of the common welfare the chief end of government. It is possible for the Americans to rear pyramids if he were so minded; it was not possible for the combined intellect of antiquity to spin a yard of the 14,361 miles of wire by which two cities are bound together.

Discuss how this description of the Brooklyn Bridge defined America's sense of itself in the world at that time. How does this view compare with other perspectives, similar or different, in other texts you've read in this chapter?

9. In a previous chapter you analyzed the history and lyrics of "The Star-Spangled Banner," and in this chapter you read "America the Beautiful" and "Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing." We have a history of debate over the concept and choice of a national anthem in this country. Some argue that "The Star-Spangled Banner" places too strong an emphasis on war and that "America the Beautiful" would, thus, be preferable. Others argue that the diversity of the country makes any single national anthem inappropriate and meaningless. Discuss whether the current national anthem should be retained, replaced, or abandoned entirely. If you believe change is appropriate, what do you suggest should be the U.S. anthem?

10. In 1872, John Gast painted American Progress (p. 825), commissioned by George Crofutt, who published a popular series of western travel guides. Discuss how this image reflects or disputes "progress" as defined during this period in American history.

this page left intentionally blank

9

America in the Modern World

1913–1945

The decades surrounding the turn of the twentieth century were a time of unprecedented change. The world was still wrestling with the groundbreaking ideas of the late nineteenth century: Sigmund Freud's notion of the unconscious mind (the id), Karl Marx's socialism, Charles Darwin's theory of evolution, and Friedrich Nietzsche's nihilist mantra "God is dead" that announced a growing secularization in society. Meanwhile, the United States, and much of the Western world, was experiencing rapid industrialization, a boom in urban populations, and a flurry of scientific and technological breakthroughs that would lay the foundation for modern life. Inasmuch as humanity had ever been confident that it understood itself, life, or the world we live in, these destabilizing forces shattered that confidence. Traditional art forms suddenly seemed incapable of representing the mystery, complexity, and uncertainty of modern life. Not to mention the fact that Kodak's invention of the simple, affordable "Brownie" camera in 1900 meant that making representative visual art no longer required years of training, but just a simple click of the shutter. The response to these changes was a movement called modernism — marked by abstract art, symbolic poetry, and stream-of-consciousness prose — that tried to represent the subjective experience of modern life rather than the objective reality of it. It was driven by innovation in form and content. As poet Ezra Pound declared, "Make it new!" The unofficial starting point of modernism in America was the 1913 Armory Show, officially titled the International Exhibition of Modern Art, which introduced American audiences to the works of European modern artists such as Henri Matisse, Marcel Duchamp, and Pablo Picasso. In this chapter, you will study works by Ezra Pound, Marsden Hartley, Wallace Stevens, T. S. Eliot, William Carlos Williams, Charles Demuth, and other modernist pioneers who made American art and literature new.

Amid this cultural tumult came what President Woodrow Wilson called "the war to end all wars." Urging Congress to declare war on Germany in 1917, Wilson called for America to spread liberty across the world, which must be "made safe for democracy." World War I was one of the bloodiest wars in recorded history, with a deadly combination of primitive trench-warfare tactics and modern weaponry taking nearly 9 million lives. It was also one of the most politically bewildering, beginning as a struggle between the Austro-Hungarian Empire and Serbia before a tangled web of alliances dragged Russia, Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, the Ottoman

The Museum of Modern Art/Licensed by SCALA/Artists Rights Society (ARS), Art Resource, NY. © 2013 Georgia O'Keeffe Museum/Artists Rights Society (ARS), New York

GEORGIA O'KEEFE, NEW YORK. SPECIAL NO. 12, 1916, CHARCOAL ON PAPER, 24"×19", MUSEUM OF MODERN ART, NEW YORK.

Empire, Japan, Bulgaria, and ultimately the United States into the conflict. Although World War I began in 1914, the United States did not get involved until April 1917, spurred to action by the 1915 German sinking of the British ocean liner Lusitania, which killed 128 Americans, and the sinking of seven American merchant ships in January 1917. The United States remained actively engaged in the conflict until its conclusion in November 1918, mobilizing more than 4 million troops and suffering approximately 110,000 casualties — 43,000 of which stemmed from an influenza epidemic. World War I ushered in a new era of American military might and American industrialization; through its presence in the war, America made good on Wilson's promise, as it spread its principles of reform, freedom, and democracy.

The United States emerged from World War I into a period of relative peace and prosperity. Cities were burgeoning, reforms were taking hold, and success in the war gave rise to a feeling of American security and self-confidence. The so-called Roaring Twenties epitomized this sentiment. The 1920s saw a dramatic increase in Americans' use of cars, telephones, and electricity; we turned our attention to celebrity culture through the movies and sports through the construction of giant stadiums. Industries boomed as American consumers demanded new and better innovations. Women gained the right to vote in 1920, giving them a voice in American political life for the first time. "Flapper" culture encouraged women to shake off the constraints of nineteenth-century fashion; women stopped wearing corsets, showed off their arms and legs, cut their hair short, and wore makeup.

Corbis

American troops on the front line in the Meuse valley, north of Verdun, France, in 1916.

During the 1920s, American literature, art, and music changed dramatically. New York City's uptown Harlem neighborhood was the center of the New Negro Movement, later called the Harlem Renaissance, as art, literature, and music by African Americans found new expression. Harlem was a destination for many migrant African Americans seeking work and economic opportunity; it was also home to a new African American middle class. The works by Langston Hughes, Claude McKay, Zora Neale Hurston, and Richard Wright in this chapter will ask you to consider issues of equality, racial pride, stereotyping, integration, and identity. In this chapter's Conversation on the influence of jazz, we will explore the cultural impact of this music and how other arts were inspired by its new, experimental, and genuinely American form of expression.

Bettmann/Corbis

A "Hooverville" of makeshift shacks in New York City's Central Park, c. 1931.

The Roaring Twenties came to a screeching halt when the stock market crashed on October 29, 1929, the day known as "Black Tuesday." Wall Street collapsed, and the United States slipped into a severe economic downturn that led to the Great Depression. The Great Depression dragged on throughout the 1930s, with unemployment rates reaching nearly 25 percent. To make matters worse, a catastrophic drought and erosion from poor farming practices caused a dust bowl in the American Midwest, where agricultural production halted and farmers were displaced from their land.

President Franklin Delano Roosevelt was inaugurated in 1933, and his series of progressive reforms and programs, known as the New Deal, slowly began to improve the lives of suffering Americans. Roosevelt's second inaugural address and his First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt's speech "What Libraries Mean to the Nation" will help you understand the circumstances of American life during the Great Depression, as well as the enduring role of literature throughout difficult periods of our history. Works by John Steinbeck and William Faulkner also explore rural American life during the 1930s.

By the end of the 1930s, another war was raging throughout Europe. As in the previous conflict, the United States at first chose not to engage in the war. However, on December 7, 1941, Japan attacked the American naval fleet stationed at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, and thrust America into the Second World War, fighting against Japan, Germany, and Italy. World War II ended up being the deadliest, costliest, and most sprawling war in recorded history. Over 16 million Americans fought in the military — 290,000 were killed and 670,000 were wounded. Randall Jarrell's famous poem "The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner" takes us into the world of one soldier.

Everyday life on the home front was dramatically altered during World War II. Food, clothing, and gas were rationed. Women joined the war effort by taking jobs as electricians, riveters, and welders in factories producing goods for the war. The lives of Japanese Americans were shattered when they were forced into internment camps on the off chance they might be spies, a wartime policy now universally regarded as one of the most egregious stains on our nation's history and reputation. A cluster of texts in this chapter asks you to investigate the internment of Japanese Americans and to consider if it is possible to right the wrongs of the past through reparations.

The Second World War ended with a bang. And that bang would change the world forever. Atomic bombs dropped by the United States on Hiroshima and Nagasaki not only ended the war in the Pacific but also propelled the nation into the atomic age.

Bettmann/Corbis

A view of Hiroshima after the explosion of the atomic bomb.

In this chapter, you will read the speech President Harry S Truman gave announcing this destructive event and the arrival of America as a global superpower.

As it turned out, despite the great loss of life and widespread destruction, World War II was exactly the economic stimulus that America needed to end the Great Depression. The country emerged from the war as a global military and economic superpower primed for a new era of prosperity.

Ezra Pound

Ezra Pound (1885–1972) was an American poet, critic, and editor and a major figure of the early modernist movement. Though he was born in Hailey, Idaho, it wasn't until he moved to Europe in 1908 that he published several books of poetry and found success. In the early twentieth century, while working in London as a foreign editor for several American literary magazines, Pound heralded a modernist movement in English and American literature, helping to discover and shape the work of contemporaries such as T. S. Eliot, James Joyce, Robert Frost, and Ernest Hemingway. Pound moved to Italy after World War I, where his pro-Fascist broadcasts and publications led to his arrest by American forces in 1945 and more than a decade of incarceration. His most famous works include Ripostes (1912), Hugh Selwyn Mauberley (1920), and his unfinished 120-section epic, The Cantos (1917–1969), some sections of which he wrote in prison.

In a Station of the Metro

Published in January 1913 in the magazine Poetry, "In a Station of the Metro" describes Pound's experience in a Paris subway (called the Metro) station.

The apparition of these faces in the crowd;
Petals on a wet, black bough.

(1913)

Exploring the Text

1. Do you think this poem is happy or sad? Explain your answer.
2. What sensory associations do you make when you read this poem?
3. What exactly do you think the speaker is looking at? Explain your answer.
4. What is the effect of juxtaposing flowers with a subway station?
5. You may recognize this poem as a form of haiku (or hokku, as Ezra Pound called it). In what ways is it like a traditional haiku and in what ways is it different? Hint: consider the function of the title.

6. Pound was an imagist, one of a group of English and American poets who wrote free verse and believed in the simple clarity of an image. "In a Station of the Metro" is considered a prime example of imagism. Looking at this brief poem, consider how Pound uses metaphor to make us see something new in a train station and how it came to be an iconic imagist poem.

A Few Don'ts by an Imagiste

Ezra Pound coined the term "imagist" when he was editing the work of his friend Hilda Doolittle (HD). In part a rebellion against the rules of rhyme and meter in traditional English poetry, the imagist's goal was to allow the images to create the poem. Up until this time, literary movements originated in France, which was why Pound gave the new movement a French name in this piece. "A Few Don'ts by an Imagiste" was published in Poetry magazine, just a couple of months after "In a Station of the Metro," in March 1913.

An "Image" is that which presents an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time. I use the term "complex" rather in the technical sense employed by the newer psychologists, such as Hart, though we might not agree absolutely in our application.

It is the presentation of such a "complex" instantaneously which gives that sense of sudden liberation; that sense of freedom from time limits and space limits; that sense of sudden growth, which we experience in the presence of the greatest works of art.

It is better to present one Image in a lifetime than to produce voluminous works.

All this, however, some may consider open to debate. The immediate necessity is to tabulate A LIST OF DON'TS for those beginning to write verses. But I can not put all of them into Mosaic negative.

To begin with, consider the three rules recorded by Mr. Flint, not as dogma — never consider anything as dogma — but as the result of long contemplation, which, even if it is some one else's contemplation, may be worth consideration. 5

Pay no attention to the criticism of men who have never themselves written a notable work. Consider the discrepancies between the actual writing of the Greek poets and dramatists, and the theories of the Graeco-Roman grammarians, concocted to explain their metres.

Language

Use no superflous word, no adjective, which does not reveal something.

Don't use such an expression as "dim lands of peace." It dulls the image. It mixes an abstraction with the concrete. It comes from the writer's not realizing that the natural object is always the adequate symbol.

Go in fear of abstractions. Don't retell in mediocre verse what has already been done in good prose. Don't think any intelligent person is going to be deceived when you try to shirk all the difficulties of the unspeakably difficult art of good prose by chopping your composition into line lengths.

What the expert is tired of today the public will be tired of tomorrow.

Don't imagine that the art of poetry is any simpler than the art of music, or that you can please the expert before you have spent at least as much effort on the art of verse as the average piano teacher spends on the art of music.

Be influenced by as many great artists as you can, but have the decency either to acknowledge the debt outright, or to try to conceal it.

Don't allow "influence" to mean merely that you mop up the particular decorative vocabulary of some one or two poets whom you happen to admire. A Turkish war correspondent was recently caught red-handed babbling in his dispatches of "dove-gray" hills, or else it was "pearl-pale," I can not remember.

Use either no ornament or good ornament.

Rhythm and Rhyme

Let the candidate fill his mind with the finest cadences he can discover, preferably in a foreign language so that the meaning of the words may be less likely to divert his attention from the movement; e.g., Saxon charms, Hebridean Folk Songs,[1] the verse of Dante, and the lyrics of Shakespeare — if he can dissociate the vocabulary from the cadence. Let him dissect the lyrics of Goethe coldly into their component sound values, syllables long and short, stressed and unstressed, into vowels and consonants.

It is not necessary that a poem should rely on its music, but if it does rely on its music that music must be such as will delight the expert.

Let the neophyte know assonance and alliteration, rhyme immediate and delayed, simple and polyphonic, as a musician would expect to know harmony and counterpoint and all the minutiae of his craft. No time is too great to give to these matters or to any one of them, even if the artist seldom have need of them.

Don't imagine that a thing will "go" in verse just because it's too dull to go in prose.

Don't be "viewy" — leave that to the writers of pretty little philosophic essays. Don't be descriptive; remember that the painter can describe a landscape much better than you can, and that he has to know a deal more about it.

When Shakespeare talks of the "Dawn in russet mantle clad" he presents something which the painter does not present. There is in this line of his nothing that one can call description; he presents.

Consider the way of the scientists rather than the way of an advertising agent for a new soap.

The scientist does not expect to be acclaimed as a great scientist until he has discovered something. He begins by learning what has been discovered already. He goes from that point onward. He does not bank on being a charming fellow personally. He does not expect his friends to applaud the results of his freshman class work. Freshmen in poetry are unfortunately not confined to a definite and recognizable class room. They are "all over the shop." Is it any wonder "the public is indifferent to poetry"?

[1]The Hebrides are a series of islands off the northwest tip of Scotland. — Eds.

Don't chop your stuff into separate iambs. Don't make each line stop dead at the end, and then begin every next line with a heave. Let the beginning of the next line catch the rise of the rhythm wave, unless you want a definite longish pause.

In short, behave as a musician, a good musician, when dealing with that phase of your art which has exact parallels in music. The same laws govern, and you are bound by no others.

Naturally, your rhythmic structure should not destroy the shape of your words, or their natural sound, or their meaning. It is improbable that, at the start, you will be able to get a rhythm-structure strong enough to affect them very much, though you may fall a victim to all sorts of false stopping due to line ends and caesurae.

The musician can rely on pitch and the volume of the orchestra. You can not. The term harmony is misapplied to poetry; it refers to simultaneous sounds of different pitch. There is, however, in the best verse a sort of residue of sound which remains in the ear of the hearer and acts more or less as an organ-base. A rhyme must have in it some slight element of surprise if it is to give pleasure; it need not be bizarre or curious, but it must be well used if used at all.

Vide[2] further Vildrac and Duhamel's notes on rhyme in Technique Poetique.

That part of your poetry which strikes upon the imaginative eye of the reader will lose nothing by translation into a foreign tongue; that which appeals to the ear can reach only those who take it in the original.

Consider the definiteness of Dante's presentation, as compared with Milton's rhetoric. Read as much of Wordsworth as does not seem too unutterably dull.

If you want the gist of the matter go to Sappho, Catullus, Villon, Heine when he is in the vein, Gautier when he is not too frigid; or, if you have not the tongues, seek out the leisurely Chaucer. Good prose will do you no harm, and there is good discipline to be had by trying to write it.

Translation is likewise good training, if you find that your original matter "wobbles" when you try to rewrite it. The meaning of the poem to be translated can not "wobble."

If you are using a symmetrical form, don't put in what you want to say and then fill up the remaining vacuums with slush.

Don't mess up the perception of one sense by trying to define it in terms of another. This is usually only the result of being too lazy to find the exact word. To this clause there are possibly exceptions.

The first three simple proscriptions will throw out nine-tenths of all the bad poetry now accepted as standard and classic; and will prevent you from many a crime of production.

". . . Mais d'abord il faut etre un poete,"[3] as MM. Duhamel and Vildrac have said at the end of their little book, Notes sur la Technique Poetique; but in an American one

[2]Latin. "See." — Eds.

[3]French. "But first you have to be a poet." — Eds.

takes that at least for granted, otherwise why does one get born upon that august continent!

(1913)

Exploring the Text

1. Describe the tone of "A Few Don'ts by an Imagiste."
2. What do you think is the purpose of this essay?
3. We know that Ezra Pound had a long (and controversial) career as a poet, a critic, and an editor. He was only twenty-eight when he wrote this essay. How does he establish ethos?
4. Do you think Pound's ideas in this essay are conservative or revolutionary? Explain your answer.
5. English poet and critic F. S. Flint (par. 5) put forth three rules to write good poetry: (1) to directly treat the "thing," whether subjectively or objectively; (2) to use absolutely no word that does not contribute to the presentation; and (3) with regard to rhythm, to compose in sequence of the musical phrase, not in sequence of the metronome. What other rules does Pound lay out in this essay? In what ways do they support Flint's rules and in what ways do they run counter to them?
6. In what ways does Pound suggest applying his suggestions and rules to areas other than poetry? What other applications can you think of? How might you apply them to your own writing, for example?

Robert Frost

Though Robert Frost (1874–1963) is considered the quintessential New England poet, he was born in San Francisco. After the death of his father when Frost was eleven years old, the family moved to Massachusetts. Frost attended Dartmouth College and Harvard University, but in both cases he left early to support his family. He delivered newspapers, farmed, worked in a factory, and taught high school and college, but he considered poetry his true calling. Frost won four Pulitzer Prizes for his collections New Hampshire: A Poem with Notes and Grace Notes (1924), Collected Poems (1931), A Further Range (1937), and A Witness Tree (1943). In 1961, Frost recited one of his poems at the inauguration of President John F. Kennedy.

Reluctance

Published in 1914, "Reluctance" was inspired somewhat by a trip Frost made to North Carolina's Dismal Swamp after Elinor White, who later became his wife, refused his first marriage proposal.

Out through the fields and the woods
And over the walls I have wended;
I have climbed the hills of view
And looked at the world, and descended;
I have come by the highway home,
And lo, it is ended.

The leaves are all dead on the ground,
Save those that the oak is keeping
To ravel them one by one
And let them go scraping and creeping
Out over the crusted snow,
When others are sleeping.

And the dead leaves lie huddled and still,
No longer blown hither and thither;
The last lone aster is gone;
The flowers of the witch hazel wither;
The heart is still aching to seek,
But the feet question "Whither?"

Ah, when to the heart of man
Was it ever less than a treason
To go with the drift of things,
To yield with a grace to reason,
And bow and accept the end
Of a love or a season?

(1914)

Exploring the Text

1. How does Robert Frost use the natural world to make an argument?
2. What do you make of the play on words with "wither" (l. 16) and "whither" (l. 18)? What do you think is the answer to the question of "Whither," which means "where"?
3. Frost is considered a modernist poet, which means, among other things, that his work has an economy and a directness to it. On the other hand, he used many of the traditional tools of the nineteenth-century poets — this poem rhymes, for example. Does "Reluctance" seem to be a contemporary, or modern, poem or does it feel old-fashioned to you? Explain.
4. What is the tone of "Reluctance"? Does the tone jibe with the poem's subject or is there a bit of a disconnect? Explain your answer.
5. Poet and critic William Stafford said of Frost's poetry that "the bland voice quietly carrying readers across chasms cannot prevent terrible glimpses. The poems often veil and, at the same time, hint at elements too abrupt, too full of hurt, for direct presentation." Does this description apply to "Reluctance"? Explain why or why not.

Mending Wall

"Mending Wall" was the opening poem in Frost's second collection, North of Boston, published in 1914.

Something there is that doesn't love a wall,
That sends the frozen-ground-swell under it,
And spills the upper boulders in the sun;
And makes gaps even two can pass abreast.
The work of hunters is another thing:
I have come after them and made repair
Where they have left not one stone on a stone,
But they would have the rabbit out of hiding,
To please the yelping dogs. The gaps I mean,
No one has seen them made or heard them made,
But at spring mending-time we find them there.
I let my neighbor know beyond the hill;
And on a day we meet to walk the line
And set the wall between us once again.
We keep the wall between us as we go.
To each the boulders that have fallen to each.
And some are loaves and some so nearly balls
We have to use a spell to make them balance:
"Stay where you are until our backs are turned!"
We wear our fingers rough with handling them.
Oh, just another kind of outdoor game,
One on a side. It comes to little more:
There where it is we do not need the wall:
He is all pine and I am apple orchard.
My apple trees will never get across
And eat the cones under his pines, I tell him.
He only says, "Good fences make good neighbors."
Spring is the mischief in me, and I wonder
If I could put a notion in his head:
"Why do they make good neighbors? Isn't it
Where there are cows? But here there are no cows.
Before I built a wall I'd ask to know
What I was walling in or walling out,
And to whom I was like to give offense.

Something there is that doesn't love a wall,
That wants it down." I could say "Elves" to him,
But it's not elves exactly, and I'd rather
He said it for himself. I see him there Bringing a stone grasped firmly by the top
In each hand, like an old-stone savage armed.
He moves in darkness as it seems to me,
Not of woods only and the shade of trees.
He will not go behind his father's saying,
And he likes having thought of it so well
He says again, "Good fences make good neighbors."

(1914)

Exploring the Text

1. Is there a conflict in the poem? Explain.
2. Read lines 12–15 carefully. How could the different meanings of the word "between," which is repeated twice, change the meaning of the poem?
3. Why do you think Robert Frost allows the neighbor to offer the proverb "Good fences make good neighbors" twice? Do you think the speaker agrees with this adage? Why do you think the neighbor gets the last word?
4. "Mending Wall" questions whether a wall that has no function in the modern world still fulfills a ritualistic need. When Frost was asked about the poem's meaning, he said his poems are "all set to trip the reader head foremost into the boundless." In what way does trying to answer the poem's question trip you "into the boundless"? Which of the poem's two characters trips "into the boundless"?
5. When President Kennedy visited the Berlin Wall, he quoted the first line of "Mending Wall." His audience knew what he meant, of course. Later, when Frost visited Russia, he found that the Russian translation of the poem left off the first line. He said he could have done better for them by saying: "Something there is that doesn't love a wall, / Something there is that does." Does that potential change alter the meaning of the poem for you? Explain.

Fire and Ice

"Fire and Ice" was first published in Harper's magazine in December 1920.

Some say the world will end in fire,
Some say in ice.
From what I've tasted of desire
I hold with those who favor fire.

But if it had to perish twice,
I think I know enough of hate
To say that for destruction ice
Is also great
And would suffice.

(1920)

Exploring the Text

1. What do you think "fire" and "ice" represent in this poem?
2. What is the effect of the repetition "Some say" in the first two lines?
3. Do you think "Fire and Ice" is about the end of the world or about something else altogether? Explain your answer.
4. Characterize the speaker of "Fire and Ice." Try reading the poem aloud a few different ways, changing your intonation to put stress on different parts of each line. What effect does that have on your perception of the speaker?
5. Frost scholar Tom Hansen refutes the claim of Harlow Shapley, an American astronomer and teacher, that his conversation with Robert Frost about the possible ways the world might end inspired "Fire and Ice." Hansen instead believes that the poem is "an astute diagnosis of the chronic malfunction of the human heart." What do you think? Which interpretation resonates more with you?

Marsden Hartley

Marsden Hartley (1877–1943) was an American modernist painter. Originally from Lewiston, Maine, Hartley was raised in Cleveland, Ohio, but he traveled extensively throughout his life and studied at various institutions, including the Cleveland School of Art and the National Academy of Design. His work went through several stylistic phases, including neoimpressionist, expressionist, cubist, and representational. His most well-known works are part of a series of German military paintings, entitled The War Motifs, which he painted during the first years of World War I while living in Berlin, Germany.

Portrait of a German Officer

Portrait of a German Officer (1914) is an example of Hartley's use of both the geometric juxtapositions of cubism and the coarse brushwork and dramatic hues of German expressionism. In honor of his friend Karl von Freyburg, a cavalry officer who was killed in action during the war, Hartley included in this painting Freyburg's initials (Kv.F), his regiment number (4), and his age (24).

Image copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Image source: Art Resource, NY.

MARSDEN HARTLEY, PORTRAIT OF A GERMAN OFFICER, 1914, OIL ON CANVAS, 68¼" × 41⅜", METROPOLITAN MUSEUM OF ART, NEW YORK.
(See color insert, Image 36.)

Exploring the Text

1. Look first at the painting's lines, shapes, colors, and composition (where and how the objects are placed on the canvas). What is your first impression? Then look at the iconography (the recognizable objects). Do they change your first impression?

2. Portrait of a German Officer is one of a series of abstract portraits of German officers. What evidence of war do you see in the painting? What do you think Marsden Hartley's opinion was of the military and the war culture he saw in Berlin during those years?
3. What do you think this painting says about Karl von Freyburg? About Hartley's relationship with him?
4. How did Hartley communicate emotion in this painting?
5. This painting is inspired by both cubism (visual fragments composed as if in a collage) and German expressionism (coarse brushwork and bright colors contrasted with black). What is the effect of this combination of techniques? Consider both the physical and the psychological effects of the work.

Wallace Stevens

Wallace Stevens (1879–1955), an important American modernist poet, was born in Reading, Pennsylvania, studied at Harvard University, and graduated from New York Law School. He worked as a lawyer in New York and became vice president of one of the largest insurance companies in Hartford, Connecticut. In addition to being a successful businessman, Stevens is considered one of the great poets of the twentieth century. His poetry collections include Harmonium (1923), The Man with the Blue Guitar and Other Poems (1937), A Primitive like an Orb (1948), and Transport to Summer (1947). Collected Poems (1954) brought Stevens both a Pulitzer Prize and the National Book Award. Stevens's work is often described as meditative and philosophical. He was a poet of ideas, with a strong belief in the poet as someone with heightened powers. Stevens favored precision of imagery and clear, sharp language, rejecting the sentiment favored by the Romantic and the Victorian poets.

Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird

With its haiku-like austerity and abstract form, "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird" has been associated with the cubist painters, such as Pablo Picasso and Georges Braque, whose work depicted subjects from many viewpoints by breaking them up and reassembling them in an abstract form.

I

Among twenty snowy mountains
The only moving thing
Was the eye of the blackbird.

II

I was of three minds,
Like a tree
In which there are three blackbirds.

III

The blackbird whistled in the autumn winds.
It was a small part of the pantomime.

IV

A man and a woman
Are one.
A man and a woman and a blackbird
Are one.

V

I do not know which to prefer,
The beauty of inflections
Or the beauty of innuendoes,
The blackbird whistling
Or just after.

VI

Icicles filled the long window
With barbaric glass.
The shadow of the blackbird
Crossed it, to and fro.
The mood
Traced in the shadow
An indecipherable cause.

VII

O thin men of Haddam,
Why do you imagine golden birds?
Do you not see how the blackbird Walks around the feet
Of the women about you?

VIII

I know noble accents
And lucid, inescapable rhythms;
But I know, too,
That the blackbird is involved
In what I know.

IX

When the blackbird flew out of sight,
It marked the edge
Of one of many circles.

X

At the sight of blackbirds
Flying in a green light,
Even the bawds of euphony
Would cry out sharply.

XI

He rode over Connecticut
In a glass coach.
Once, a fear pierced him,
In that he mistook
The shadow of his equipage
For blackbirds.

XII

The river is moving.
The blackbird must be flying.

XIII

It was evening all afternoon.
It was snowing
And it was going to snow.
The blackbird sat
In the cedar-limbs.

(1917)

Exploring the Text

1. Each of the thirteen stanzas of "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird" might be a complete poem. What, besides the blackbird, connects them?
2. "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird" has a cinematic quality that is introduced in the first stanza, when the eye of the speaker moves from a long establishing shot of snowy mountains to a close-up of the eye of a blackbird. What other film techniques do you find as you work through the poem? Consider the use of framing, close-ups, even sound.
3. Haddam, a town in Connecticut, is mentioned in stanzas VII and XI. What are some possible explanations for the Connecticut references? What comment might Stevens be making by contrasting Connecticut life to blackbirds?
4. Is there logic to the order of the stanzas? Try reshuffling them to see if the meaning of the poem changes.
5. Wallace Stevens said that this group of poems was "not meant to be a collection of epigrams or of ideas, but of sensations." What sensations does the poem produce in you as you read it? How does Stevens achieve his purpose of creating sensations?

TALKBACK

Aaron A. Abeyta

A graduate of the MFA program at Colorado State University and professor of English at Adams State College, Aaron A. Abeyta (b. 1971) is the author of Colcha (2001); As Orion Falls (2005); and Rise, Do Not Be Afraid (2007).

Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Tortilla

"Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Tortilla" is from Abeyta's 2001 collection Colcha, which received an American Book Award and the Colorado Book Award.

i.

among twenty different tortillas the only thing moving was the mouth of the niño

ii.

i was of three cultures
like a tortilla for which there are three bolios

iii.

the tortilla grew on the wooden table it was a small part of the earth

iv.

a house and a tortilla are one a man a woman and a tortilla are one

v.

i do not know which to prefer the beauty of the red wall or the beauty of the green wall the tortilla fresh or just after

vi.

tortillas filled the small kitchen with ancient shadows the shadow of Maclovia cooking long ago the tortilla rolled from the shadow the innate roundness

vii.

o thin viejos of chimayo why do you imagine biscuits do you not see how the tortilla lives with the hands of the women about you

viii.

i know soft corn and beautiful inescapable sopapillas
but i know too that the tortilla has taught me what i know

ix.

when the tortilla is gone it marks the end of one of many tortillas

x.

at the sight of tortillas browning on a black comal even the pachucos of española would cry out sharply

xi.

he rode over new mexico in a pearl low rider once he got a flat
in that he mistook
the shadow of his spare for a tortilla

xii.

the abuelitas are moving the tortilla must be baking

xiii.

it was cinco de mayo all year it was warm and it was going to get warmer the tortilla sat on the frijolito plate

(2001)

Exploring the Text

1. Why do you think Aaron A. Abeyta chose the tortilla as his subject for a "Thirteen Ways" poem?
2. How does he introduce the tortilla? What do the "twenty different tortillas" in the first verse suggest to you? How is the image extended with the open mouth of the niño (child)? How does it set up one of the themes of the poem?

3. Identify some of the poem's images. How does Abeyta create them? What senses do the images appeal to?
4. Abeyta made the decision not to translate some Spanish expressions into English. How does that affect your reading of the poem? Try translating them and see how that changes the poem's meaning and form.

Making Connections

1. Aside from the subject matter, what do you think is the biggest difference between "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird" (p. 1084) and "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Tortilla" (p. 1087)?
2. Is Aaron A. Abeyta's purpose to honor the Wallace Stevens poem or to satirize it? Or is it a combination of the two? Explain your answer.
3. Stevens locates at least part of his poem in Connecticut; Abeyta places his in Chimayo, a small village near Santa Fe, New Mexico. How are these two settings different? Are there any similarities? How do they add layers of meaning to the two poems? How do they separate the two poems?
4. Using these poems as a model, write your own version that looks at a familiar object thirteen different ways.

Edna St. Vincent Millay

Edna St. Vincent Millay (1892–1950) was born in Maine. In 1912, she entered her poem "Renascence" in a competition, winning fourth place and inclusion in The Lyric Year, which earned her acclaim and a scholarship to Vassar College. The poem would be included in her first collection, Renascence and Other Poems, published in 1917. After graduating, Vincent (as she insisted on being called) moved to Greenwich Village — then New York City's bohemian district. To this period belong her poetry collection A Few Figs from Thistles (1920); her first verse play, The Lamp and the Bell (1921); and a play in one act, Aria da Capo (1920). After an extended trip to Europe, she returned to New York and published The Harp Weaver and Other Poems (1923). That year she won the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry, the first woman to be so honored. She also wrote the libretto of one of the few American grand operas, The King's Henchman (1927). Sympathetic to Marxism-Leninism, she was active in protests against the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti, addressing the issue in Buck in the Snow (1928).

First Fig

This poem was originally published in Poetry in June 1918 and then collected in the book A Few Figs from Thistles (1920).

My candle burns at both ends;
  It will not last the night;
But ah, my foes, and oh, my friends —
  It gives a lovely light!

(1918)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the effect of the poem's rhyme? Do you think it contradicts the poem's meaning or supports it? Explain your answer.
2. The phrase "burn the candle at both ends" used to be a reference to waste: candles were expensive and valuable — not to be used carelessly. It has since come to refer to a life lived frantically, in which one enjoys oneself late into the night only to begin again the next morning. How do both of these meanings work in this short poem?
3. Why do you think Edna St. Vincent Millay used "ah" to address her foes and "oh" to address her friends?
4. Millay wrote the following poem, called "Second Fig":

   > Safe upon the solid rock the ugly houses stand:
   > Come and see my shining palace built upon the sand.

   What does it have in common with "First Fig"? Why do you think she called it "Second Fig"? What connections do you make with figs? Why do you think Millay used fig twice in her titles?
5. Critic Carl Van Doren wrote that since the ancient Greek poet Sappho few women had "written as outspokenly as Millay." Why might this poem have been considered outspoken? Could "Second Fig," found in question 4, also be considered outspoken? How do you think these poems hold up to that characterization today?

Marianne Moore

Marianne Moore (1887–1972) was an American modernist poet born in Kirkwood, Missouri. After graduating from Pennsylvania's Bryn Mawr College in 1909, she eventually moved to New York City, where she took a job at the New York Public Library in 1921 and befriended fellow poets such as William Carlos Williams and Wallace Stevens. Moore's poems appeared in prestigious literary magazines such as the Egoist and the Dial, where she served as editor from 1925 to 1929. In 1921, Moore's first book, Poems, was published by fellow poet and Bryn Mawr classmate Hilda Doolittle. Among Moore's many honors were the Bollingen Prize, the National Book Award, and the Pulitzer Prize, all for her 1951 work, Collected Poems.

Poetry

One of Moore's most well-known poems, "Poetry" is famous for having been revised and republished many times, changing from a five-stanza to a one-stanza poem and back again. The version here is from 1919 and was published in the collection Others.

I too, dislike it: there are things that are important beyond all this fiddle.
Reading it, however, with a perfect contempt for it, one discovers that there is in it after all, a place for the genuine.
Hands that can grasp, eyes that can dilate, hair that can rise if it must, these things are important not because a high sounding interpretation can be put upon them but because they are useful; when they become so derivative as to become unintelligible, the same thing may be said for all of us — that we do not admire what we cannot understand. The bat, holding on upside down or in quest of something to eat, elephants pushing, a wild horse taking a roll, a tireless wolf under a tree, the immovable critic twinkling his skin like a horse that feels a flea, the baseball fan, the statistician — case after case could be cited did one wish it; nor it is valid to discriminate against "business documents and school-books"; all these phenomena are important.

One must make a distinction however: when dragged into prominence by half poets, the result is not poetry, nor till the autocrats among us can be "literalists of the imagination" — above insolence and triviality and can present for inspection, "imaginary gardens with real toads in them," shall we have

it. In the meantime, if you demand on one hand, in defiance of their opinion — the raw material of poetry in all its rawness and that which is on the other hand, genuine then you are interested in poetry.

(1919)

Exploring the Text

1. What argument does Marianne Moore make about poetry in this poem?
2. Read "Poetry" grammatically. That is, read it in complete sentences without paying attention to line breaks. What changes? What stays the same? Why do you think Moore broke the lines as she did?
3. In lines 30–31, Moore paraphrases William Butler Yeats, who described the poet William Blake as a "literalist of the imagination." The other places she uses quotations marks, such as "imaginary gardens with real toads in them" (l. 32) are from her imagination. What do you think is the effect of this combination? How might it suit Moore's purpose?
4. "[T]he vastness of the particular" is how poet William Carlos Williams described Moore's signature mode. "So that in looking at some apparently small object, one feels the swirl of great events," he added. How does "Poetry" illustrate Williams's observation?
5. Moore was well-known for being a baseball fan. How does her allusion to baseball in lines 20–21 help her develop her ideas about what poetry is and isn't?
6. This version of the poem was published in 1919. In 1967, Moore revised it, reducing the poem to just three lines:

   > I, too, dislike it.
   > Reading it, however with a perfect contempt for it, one discovers in it, after all, a place for the genuine.

   How do the two versions "annotate, challenge, and criticize one another," as poet Robert Pinsky suggests?

Claude McKay

Poet, novelist, and journalist Claude McKay was born in 1890 in Jamaica. The youngest of eleven children, he was sent to live with an older brother — a schoolteacher — who took charge of his education, introducing him to the classics of British literature, such as works by John Milton, Alexander Pope, and the Romantics. McKay began writing poetry at the age of ten, and by the time he immigrated to the United States at age twenty-two, he had published two volumes of verse. In America, McKay faced the harsh realities of racism and, despite his education, took on menial jobs to make a living. McKay became known for his protest poetry, which spoke directly about racial issues and the trials of the working class. Langston Hughes and Countee Cullen considered McKay an inspirational voice during the Harlem Renaissance. McKay's novels include Home to Harlem (1922), Banjo: A Story without a Plot (1929), and Banana Bottom (1933). He lived abroad, in England and France, on and off for years, but returned to the United States in 1934, where he worked in Chicago as a journalist, writing mostly for left-leaning publications. McKay died in 1948, having never returned to Jamaica.

If We Must Die

Inspired by a wave of lynchings, "If We Must Die" encourages resistance, even if a fight seems doomed. While some people believe that Winston Churchill quoted lines from "If We Must Die," there is no evidence to support that claim. Nevertheless, "If We Must Die," first published in the July 1919 issue of the Liberator, shares many qualities with Churchill's World War II speeches.

If we must die, let it not be like hogs
Hunted and penned in an inglorious spot,
While round us bark the mad and hungry dogs,
Making their mock at our accurséd lot.
If we must die, O let us nobly die,
So that our precious blood may not be shed
In vain; then even the monsters we defy
Shall be constrained to honor us though dead!
O Kinsmen! we must meet the common foe!
Though far outnumbered let us show us brave,
And for their thousand blows deal one deathblow!
What though before us lies the open grave?
Like men we'll face the murderous, cowardly pack,
Pressed to the wall, dying, but fighting back!

(1919)

Exploring the Text

1. Identify the form of "If We Must Die." Why do you think Claude McKay chose that form for his message? How does the rhyme scheme add a level of meaning to the poem?
2. Who do you think is the speaker of "If We Must Die"? What is his persona?

3. What argument does McKay make by beginning "If We Must Die" with images of animals and starting the penultimate line with "Like men we'll face the murderous, cowardly pack" (l. 13)?
4. McKay wrote this poem in response to a series of antiblack riots and lynchings in the summer of 1919. How do you think the poem was received by whites? By blacks?
5. Do you think "If We Must Die" is a plea for martyrdom? How else might it be explained?
6. Critic William Maxwell notes that though "If We Must Die" is considered to be the "inaugural address of the Harlem Renaissance," McKay unveiled it first to the black employees of the Pennsylvania Railroad, where McKay was a waiter. Why do you think he chose them as his first audience?

Theodore Dreiser

Novelist and journalist Theodore Dreiser (1871–1945) was born in Terre Haute, Indiana. A prolific writer in many genres, he is most famous for his frank (and at the time, shocking) novels about urban life, Sister Carrie (1900) and An American Tragedy (1925). His fiction was frequently inspired by his lifelong work as a journalist. Dreiser is considered one of the greatest American naturalist writers. Naturalism was an offshoot of realism that tried to faithfully reproduce human events and experiences and also explain how they were influenced by heredity, social conditions, or the environment.

A Certain Oil Refinery

This article was first published in New York Call, a socialist daily paper, in 1919 under the title "The Standard Oil Works of Bayonne." It was retitled in Dreiser's collected writings, The Colors of the Great City, in 1923.

There is a section of land very near New York, lying at the extreme southern point of the peninsula known as Bayonne, which is given up to a peculiar business. The peninsula is a long neck of land lying between those two large bays which extend a goodly distance on either hand, one toward the city of Newark, the other toward the vast and restless ocean beyond Brooklyn. Stormy winds sweep over it at many periods of the year. The seagull and the tern fly high over its darksome roof-tops. Tall stacks and bare, red buildings and scores of rounded tanks spread helter-skelter over its surface, give it a dreary, unkempt and yet not wholly inartistic appearance which appeals, much as a grotesque deformity appeals or a masque intended to represent pain.

This section is the seat of a most prosperous manufacturing establishment, a single limb of a many-branched tree, and its business is the manufacturing, or rather refining, of oil. Of an ordinary business day you would not want a more inspiring picture of that which is known as manufacture. Great ships, inbound and outbound, from all ports of the world, lie anchored at its docks. Long trains of oil cars are backed in on many spurs of tracks, which branch from main-line arteries and stand like caravans of steel, waiting to carry new burdens of oil to the uttermost parts of the land. There are many buildings and outhouses of all shapes and dimensions which are continually belching forth smoke in a solid mass, and if you stand and look in any direction on a gloomy day you may see red fires which burn and gleam in a steady way, giving a touch of somber richness to a scene which is otherwise only a mass of black and gray.

This region is remarkable for the art, as for the toil of it, if nothing more. A painter could here find a thousand contrasts in black and gray and red and blue, which would give him ample labor for his pen or brush. These stacks are so tall, the building from which they spring so low. Spread out over a marshy ground which was once all seaweed and which now shows patches of water stained with iridescent oil, broken here and there with other patches of black earth to match the blacker buildings which abound upon it, you have a combination in shades and tones of one color which no artist could resist. A Whistler could make wonderful blacks and whites of this. A Vierge or a Shinn could show us what it means to catch the exact image of darkness at its best. A casual visitor, if he is of a sensitive turn, shudders or turns away with a sense of depression haunting him. It is a great world of gloom, done in lines of splendid activity, but full of the pathos of faint contrasts in gray and black.

At that, it is not so much the art of it that is impressive as the solemn life situation which it represents. These people who work in it — and there are thousands of them — are of an order which you would call commonplace. They are not very bright intellectually, of course, or they would not work here. They are not very attractive physically, for nature suits body to mind in most instances, and these bodies as a rule reflect the heaviness of the intelligence which guides them. They are poor Swedes and Poles, Hungarians and Lithuanians, people who in many instances do not speak our tongue as yet, and who are used to conditions so rough and bare that those who are used to conditions of even moderate comfort shudder at the thought of them. They live in tumbledown shacks next to "the works" and they arrange their domestic economies heaven only knows how. Wages are not high (a dollar or a dollar and a half a day is good pay in most instances), and many of them have families to support, large families, for children in all the poorer sections are always numerous. There are dark, minute stores, and as dark and meaner saloons, where many of them (the men) drink. Looking at the homes and the saloons hereabout, it would seem to you as though any grade of intelligence ought to do better than this, as if an all-wise, directing intelligence, which we once assumed nature to possess, could not allow such homely, claptrap things to come into being. And yet here they are.

Taken as a mass, however, and in extreme heat or cold, under rain or snow, when 5 the elements are beating about them, they achieve a swart solemnity, rise or fall to a somber dignity or misery for which nature might well be praised. They look so grim, so bare, so hopeless. Artists ought to make pictures of them. Writers ought to write of them. Musicians should get their inspiration for what is antiphonal and contra-puntal from such things. They are of the darker moods of nature, its meanest inspiration.

However, it is not of these houses alone that this picture is to be made, but of the work within the plant, its nature, its grayness, its intricacy, its rancidity, its commonplaceness, its mental insufficiency; for it is a routine, a process, lacking from one year's end to another any trace of anything creative — the filling of one vat and another, for instance, and letting the same settle; introducing into one vat and another a given measure of chemicals which are known to bring about separation and purifications or, in other words, the process called refining; opening gates in tubes and funnels which drain the partially refined oils into other vats and finally into barrels and tanks, which are placed on cars or ships. You may find the how of it in any encyclopedia. But the interesting thing to me is that men work and toil here in a sickening atmosphere of blackness and shadow, of vile odors, of vile substances, of vile surroundings. You could not enter this yard, nor glance into one of these buildings, nor look at these men tramping by, without feeling that they were working in shadow and amid foul odors and gases, which decidedly are not conducive to either health or the highest order of intelligence.

Refuse tar, oil, and acids greet the nostrils and sight everywhere. The great chimneys on either hand are either belching huge columns of black or blue smoke, or vapory blue gases, which come in at the windows. The ground under your feet is discolored by oil, and all the wagons, cars, implements, machinery, buildings, and the men, of course, are splotched and spotted with it. There seems to be no escape. The very air is full of smoke and oil.

It is in this atmosphere that thousands of men are working. You may see them trudging in in the morning, their buckets or baskets over their arms, a consistent pallor overspreading their faces, an irritating cough in some instances indicating their contact with the smoke and fumes; and you may see them trudging out again at night, marked with the same pallor, coughing with the same cough; a day of peculiar duties followed by a night in the somber, gray places which they call home. Another line of men is always coming in as they go out. It is a line of men which straggles over all of two miles and is coming or going during an hour, either of the morning or the night. There is no gayety in it, no enthusiasm. You may see depicted on these faces only the mental attitude which ensues where one is compelled to work at some thing in which there is nothing creative. It is really, when all is said and done, not a pleasant picture.

I will not say, however, that it is an unrelieved hardship for men to work so. "The Lord tempereth the wind to the shorn lamb" is an old proverb and unquestionably a true one. Indubitably these men do not feel as keenly about these things as some of the more exalted intellectual types in life, and it is entirely possible that a conception of what we know as "atmosphere" may never have found lodgment in their brains. Nevertheless, it is true that their physical health is affected to a certain extent, and it is also true that the home life to which they return is what it is, whether this be due to low intelligence or low wages, or both. The one complements the other, of course. If any attempt were made to better their condition physically or mentally, it might well be looked upon by them as meddling. At the same time it is true that up to this time nothing has been done to improve their condition. Doing anything more for them than paying them wages is not thought of.

A long trough, for instance, a single low wooden tub, in a small boarded-off space, in the boss teamsters' shanty, with neither soap nor towels and only the light that comes from a low door, is all the provision made for the host of "still-cleaners," the men who are engaged in the removal of the filthy refuse — tar, acids, and vile residuums from the stills and agitators. In connection with the boiler-room, where over three hundred men congregate at noontime and at night, there is to be found nothing better. You may see rows of grimy men congregate at noontime and at night, to eat their lunch or dinner, there is to be found nothing better. You may see rows of grimy men in various departments attempting to clean themselves under such circumstances, and still others walking away without any attempt at cleaning themselves before leaving. It takes too long. The idea of furnishing a clean dining-room in which to eat or a place to hang coats has never occurred to any one. They bring their food in buckets. 10

However, that vast problem, the ethics of employment, is not up for discussion in this instance: only the picture which this industry presents. On a gray day or a stormy one, if you have a taste for the somber, you have here all the elements of a gloomy labor picture which may not long endure, so steadily is the world changing. On the one hand, masters of great force and wealth, penurious to a degree, on the other the victims of this same penuriousness and indifference, dumbly accepting it, and over all this smoke and gas and these foul odors about all these miserable chambers. Truly, I doubt if one could wish a better hell for one's enemies than some of the wretched chambers here, where men rove about like troubled spirits in a purgatory of man's devising; nor any mental state worse than that in which most of these victims of Mother Nature find themselves. At the bottom nothing but darkness and thickness of wit, and dullness of feeling, let us say, and at the top the great brilliant blooms known to the world as the palaces and the office buildings and the private cars and the art collections of the principal owners of the stock of this concern. For those at the top, the brilliancy of the mansions of Fifth Avenue, the gorgeousness of the resorts of Newport and Palm Beach, the delights of intelligence and freedom; for those beneath, the dark chamber, the hanging smoke, pallor, foul odors, wretched homes. Yet who shall say that this is not the foreordained order of life? Can it be changed? Will it ever be, permanently? Who is to say?

(1919)

Questions

1. What do you think is Theodore Dreiser's purpose in this piece?
2. Do you consider "A Certain Oil Refinery" a sketch or an exposé? Explain your answer, keeping Dreiser's purpose in mind.
3. Examine the way Dreiser uses contrasts in "A Certain Oil Refinery." What is the effect of the contrasts?

4. What do you make of the aesthetic considerations in this piece? Why do you think Dreiser suggests that artists, such as James McNeill Whistler, Everett Shinn, and Daniel Vierge, might have been inspired by the setting to create works of art? Do you think those suggestions are appropriate to the purpose of the piece? Explain why or why not.
5. What picture does Dreiser paint of the refinery workers? Where does he place them on the social scale? What suggestions or hope for improving their conditions does Dreiser offer?
6. Dreiser was what we might call a social Darwinist, someone who applied Charles Darwin's ideas about evolution to human behavior and interaction. What evidence do you see in this piece of Dreiser's ideas about the "survival of the fittest"?

E. E. Cummings

Edward Estlin (E. E.) Cummings (1894–1962) was a prolific poet famous for his experimental style. Born and raised in an affluent family in Cambridge, Massachusetts, he graduated from Cambridge Latin High School and received both a BA and an MA in English and classical studies from Harvard University. Before the United States entered World War I, Cummings, an avowed pacifist, volunteered as an ambulance driver in France, where he was held for a time in a detention camp — an experience that deepened his distrust of authority. The Enormous Room (1922), his first published work, is a fictional account of his imprisonment, which was followed in 1923 by his first collection of poems, Tulips and Chimneys.

in Just-

Cummings is famous for defying traditional rules of typography, capitalization, and punctuation in pursuit of poetry that is both provocative and whimsical. Originally published in the Dial in May 1920, "in Just-" is a fine example of his iconoclastic style.

in Just-spring when the world is mud-luscious the little lame balloonman

whistles far and wee and eddieandbill come running from marbles and piracies and it's spring

when the world is puddle-wonderful the queer old balloonman whistles far and wee and bettyandisbel come dancing from hop-scotch and jump-rope and it's spring

and the goat-footed balloonMan whistles far and wee

(1920)

Exploring the Text

1. Characterize the speaker of "in Just-." Try to describe him or her in as much detail as possible.
2. What games does this poem play with rhythm? Look especially at the spacing, or lack of spacing, between words. What is the effect of the rhythmic changes?
3. E. E. Cummings is known for his unconventional punctuation and typography. Identify the ways that the arrangement of the words functions as punctuation.
4. According to critic Albert C. Labriola, "in Just-" is grouped with poems called "Chansons Innocentes," an allusion to William Blake's Songs of Innocence and its partner Songs of Experience. What aspects of the poem do you consider innocent? What parts are more about experience?

Langston Hughes

Langston Hughes (1902–1967) was born in the African American community of Joplin, Missouri, and raised in Lawrence, Kansas. He spent a year at Columbia University and became involved with the Harlem Renaissance movement but was shocked by the endemic racial prejudice at the university and subsequently left.

Hughes traveled for several years, spending some time in Paris before returning to the United States. He completed his BA at Pennsylvania's Lincoln University in 1929, after which he returned to Harlem for the remainder of his life. Hughes was prolific in verse, prose, and drama. His first volume of poetry, The Weary Blues, was published in 1926. His first novel, Not Without Laughter (1930), won the Harmon Gold Medal for literature. He is remembered for his celebration of the uniqueness of African American culture, which found expression in "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" (1926), published in the Nation, and in the poem "The Negro Speaks of Rivers."

The Negro Speaks of Rivers

"The Negro Speaks of Rivers" was Langston Hughes's first published poem — in the Crisis, in 1921 — written when he was eighteen. It was later included in his first volume of poetry, The Weary Blues (1926). Hughes dedicated it to activist and historian W. E. B. DuBois.

I've known rivers:
I've known rivers ancient as the world and older than the flow of human blood in human veins.

My soul has grown deep like the rivers.

I bathed in the Euphrates when dawns were young.
I built my hut near the Congo and it lulled me to sleep.
I looked upon the Nile and raised the pyramids above it.
I heard the singing of the Mississippi when Abe Lincoln went down to New Orleans, and I've seen its muddy bosom turn all golden in the sunset.

I've known rivers:
Ancient, dusky rivers.

My soul has grown deep like the rivers.

(1921)

Exploring the Text

1. Who do you think is the "I" of the poem?
2. What is the central metaphor of this poem? Are there secondary metaphors? Describe them.
3. What do three of the four rivers Hughes mentions have in common? Why is the fourth one different? What does this tell us about Hughes's purpose in "The Negro Speaks of Rivers"?

4. Characterize the diction of "The Negro Speaks of Rivers."
5. Abraham Lincoln is said to have formed his antislavery views after boat trips down the Mississippi to New Orleans, where he saw the slave trade firsthand. How does Hughes characterize that connection in lines 8–9?
6. What arguments does "The Negro Speaks of Rivers" make about the African American experience in the United States? How does the structure of the poem help Hughes develop them?

The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain

In 1926, the Nation published "The Negro-Art Hokum," by conservative African American journalist George Schuyler, who argued that African American artists should not limit themselves to working with subject matter or genres that were racially specific or traditional. He said, "Negroes and whites from the same localities in this country talk, think, and act about the same. Because a few writers with a paucity of themes have seized upon imbecilities of the Negro rustics and clowns and palmed them off as authentic and characteristic Aframerican behavior, the common notion that the black American is so 'different' from his white neighbor has gained wide currency." A week later, the magazine published Hughes's response, which appears here.

One of the most promising of the young Negro poets said to me once, "I want to be a poet — not a Negro poet," meaning, I believe, "I want to write like a white poet"; meaning subconsciously, "I would like to be a white poet"; meaning behind that, "I would like to be white." And I was sorry the young man said that, for no great poet has ever been afraid of being himself. And I doubted then that, with his desire to run away spiritually from his race, this boy would ever be a great poet. But this is the mountain standing in the way of any true Negro art in America — this urge within the race toward whiteness, the desire to pour racial individuality into the mold of American standardization, and to be as little Negro and as much American as possible.

But let us look at the immediate background of this young poet. His family is of what I suppose one would call the Negro middle class: people who are by no means rich yet never uncomfortable nor hungry — smug, contented, respectable folk, members of the Baptist church. The father goes to work every morning. He is a chief steward at a large white club. The mother sometimes does fancy sewing or supervises parties for the rich families of the town. The children go to a mixed school. In the home they read white papers and magazines. And the mother often says "Don't be like niggers" when the children are bad. A frequent phrase from the father is, "Look how well a white man does things." And so the word white comes to be unconsciously a symbol of all the virtues. It holds for the children beauty, morality, and money. The whisper of "I want to be white" runs silently through their minds. This young poet's home is, I believe, a fairly typical home of the colored middle class. One sees immediately how difficult it would be for an artist born in such a home to interest himself in interpreting the beauty of his own people. He is never taught to see that beauty. He is taught rather not to see it, or if he does, to be ashamed of it when it is not according to Caucasian patterns.

For racial culture the home of a self-styled "high-class" Negro has nothing better to offer. Instead there will perhaps be more aping of things white than in a less cultured or less wealthy home. The father is perhaps a doctor, lawyer, landowner, or politician. The mother may be a social worker, or a teacher, or she may do nothing and have a maid. Father is often dark but he has usually married the lightest woman he could find. The family attend a fashionable church where few really colored faces are to be found. And they themselves draw a color line. In the North they go to white theaters and white movies. And in the South they have at least two cars and a house "like white folks." Nordic manners, Nordic faces, Nordic hair, Nordic art (if any), and an Episcopal heaven. A very high mountain indeed for the would-be racial artist to climb in order to discover himself and his people.

But then there are the low-down folks, the so-called common element, and they are the majority — may the Lord be praised! The people who have their nip of gin on Saturday nights and are not too important to themselves or the community, or too well fed, or too learned to watch the lazy world go round. They live on Seventh Street in Washington or State Street in Chicago and they do not particularly care whether they are like white folks or anybody else. Their joy runs, bang! into ecstasy. Their religion soars to a shout. Work maybe a little today, rest a little tomorrow. Play awhile. Sing awhile. O, let's dance! These common people are not afraid of spirituals, as for a long time their more intellectual brethren were, and jazz is their child. They furnish a wealth of colorful, distinctive material for any artist because they still hold their own individuality in the face of American standardizations. And perhaps these common people will give to the world its truly great Negro artist, the one who is not afraid to be himself. Whereas the better-class Negro would tell the artist what to do, the people at least let him alone when he does appear. And they are not ashamed of him — if they know he exists at all. And they accept what beauty is their own without question.

Certainly there is, for the American Negro artist who can escape the restrictions 5 the more advanced among his own group would put upon him, a great field of unused material ready for his art. Without going outside his race, and even among the better classes with their "white" culture and conscious American manners, but still Negro enough to be different, there is sufficient matter to furnish a black artist with a lifetime of creative work. And when he chooses to touch on the relations between Negroes and whites in this country with their innumerable overtones and undertones, surely, and especially for literature and the drama, there is an inexhaustible supply of themes at hand. To these the Negro artist can give his racial individuality, his heritage of rhythm and warmth, and his incongruous humor that so often, as in the Blues, becomes ironic laughter mixed with tears. But let us look again at the mountain.

A prominent Negro clubwoman in Philadelphia paid eleven dollars to hear Raquel Meller sing Andalusian popular songs. But she told me a few weeks before she would not think of going to hear "that woman," Clara Smith, a great black artist, sing Negro folksongs. And many an upper-class Negro church, even now, would not dream of employing a spiritual in its services. The drab melodies in white folks' hymnbooks are much to be preferred. "We want to worship the Lord correctly and quietly. We don't believe in 'shouting.' Let's be dull like the Nordics," they say, in effect.

The road for the serious black artist, then, who would produce a racial art is most certainly rocky and the mountain is high. Until recently he received almost no encouragement for his work from either white or colored people. The fine novels of Chestnutt go out of print with neither race noticing their passing. The quaint charm and humor of Dunbar's dialect verse brought to him, in his day, largely the same kind of encouragement one would give a sideshow freak (A colored man writing poetry! How odd!) or a clown (How amusing!).

The present vogue in things Negro, although it may do as much harm as good for the budding colored artist, has at least done this: it has brought him forcibly to the attention of his own people among whom for so long, unless the other race had noticed him beforehand, he was a prophet with little honor. I understand that Charles Gilpin acted for years in Negro theaters without any special acclaim from his own, but when Broadway gave him eight curtain calls, Negroes, too, began to beat a tin pan in his honor. I know a young colored writer, a manual worker by day, who had been writing well for the colored magazines for some years, but it was not until he recently broke into the white publications and his first book was accepted by a prominent New York publisher that the "best" Negroes in his city took the trouble to discover that he lived there. Then almost immediately they decided to give a grand dinner for him. But the society ladies were careful to whisper to his mother that perhaps she'd better not come. They were not sure she would have an evening gown.

The Negro artist works against an undertow of sharp critcism and misunderstanding from his own group and unintentional bribes from the whites. "O, be respectable, write about nice people, show how good we are," say the Negroes. "Be stereotyped, don't go too far, don't shatter our illusions about you, don't amuse us too seriously. We will pay you," say the whites. Both would have told Jean Toomer not to write "Cane." The colored people did not praise it. The white people did not buy it. Most of the colored people who did read "Cane" hate it. They are afraid of it. Although the critics gave it good reviews the public remained indifferent. Yet (excepting the work of DuBois) "Cane" contains the finest prose written by a Negro in America. And like the singing of Robeson, it is truly racial.

But in spite of the Nordicized Negro intelligentsia and the desires of some white editors we have an honest American Negro literature already with us. Now I await the rise of the Negro theater. Our folk music, having achieved world-wide fame, offers itself to the genius of the great individual American Negro composer who is to come. And within the next decade I expect to see the work of a growing school of colored artists who paint and model the beauty of dark faces and create with new technique the expressions of their own soul-world. And the Negro dancers who will dance like flame and the singers who will continue to carry our songs to all who listen — they will be with us in even greater numbers tomorrow. 10

Most of my own poems are racial in theme and treatment, derived from the life I know. In many of them I try to grasp and hold some of the meanings and rhythms of jazz. I am sincere as I know how to be in these poems and yet after every reading I answer questions like these from my own people: Do you think Negroes should always write about Negroes? I wish you wouldn't read some of your poems to white folks. How do you find anything interesting in a place like a cabaret? Why do you write about black people? You aren't black. What makes you do so many jazz poems?

But jazz to me is one of the inherent expressions of Negro life in America: the eternal tom-tom beating in the Negro soul — the tom-tom of revolt against weariness in a white world, a world of subway trains, and work, work, work; the tom-tom of joy and laughter, and pain swallowed in a smile. Yet the Philadelphia clubwoman is ashamed to say that her race created it and she does not like me to write about it. The old subconscious "white is best" runs through her mind. Years of study under white teachers, a lifetime of white books, pictures, and papers, and white manners, morals, and Puritan standards made her dislike the spirituals. And now she turns up her nose at jazz and all its manifestations — likewise almost everything else distinctly racial. She doesn't care for the Winold Reiss portraits of Negroes because they are "too Negro." She does not want a true picture of herself from anybody. She wants the artist to flatter her, to make the white world believe that all Negroes are as smug and as near white in soul as she wants to be. But, to my mind, it is the duty of the younger Negro artist, if he accepts any duties at all from outsiders, to change through the force of his art that old whispering "I want to be white," hidden in the aspirations of his people, to "Why should I want to be white? I am a Negro — and beautiful!"

So I am ashamed for the black poet who says, "I want to be a poet, not a Negro poet," as though his own racial world were not as interesting as any other world. I am ashamed, too, for the colored artist who runs from the painting of Negro faces to the painting of sunsets after the manner of the academicians because he fears the strange un-whiteness of his own features. An artist must be free to choose what he does, certainly, but he must also never be afraid to do what he might choose.

Let the blare of Negro jazz bands and the bellowing voice of Bessie Smith singing Blues penetrate the closed ears of the colored near-intellectuals until they listen and perhaps understand. Let Paul Robeson singing "Water Boy," and Rudolph Fisher writing about the streets of Harlem, and Jean Toomer holding the heart of Georgia in his hands, and Aaron Douglas drawing strange black fantasies cause the smug Negro middle class to turn from their white, respectable, ordinary books and papers to catch a glimmer of their own beauty. We younger Negro artists who create now intend to express our individual dark-skinned selves without fear or shame. If white people are pleased we are glad. If they are not, it doesn't matter. We know we are beautiful. And ugly too. The tom-tom cries and the tom-tom laughs. If colored people are pleased we are glad. If they are not, their displeasure doesn't matter either. We build our temples for tomorrow, strong as we know how, and we stand on top of the mountain, free within ourselves.

(1926)

Questions

1. Langston Hughes opens his essay by introducing a quote from a "promising . . . young Negro" poet who said that he wanted to "be a poet — not a Negro poet." Why do you think Hughes begins his argument with this young man's declaration? How does he carry that thread through the piece? Do you agree with Hughes's take on the quote from the young poet? How might the quote be interpreted differently?
2. What is the "mountain" that Hughes refers to in the title of his essay? How does he sustain that metaphor throughout the essay?
3. What two different types of African Americans does Hughes compare and contrast? Which one does he believe has more influence on the arts? Why?
4. What or who is the "clubwoman in Philadelphia" in paragraph 6 meant to represent? What purpose does she serve in Hughes's argument?
5. What part does Hughes suggest that jazz plays in the way he describes his art and the art of African Americans that he admires?
6. What do you think? Should artists base their choice of genre and subject on their race? Is race an effective way to classify art? What do you think defines African American art and culture? Is it a matter of subject, or is it more a matter of style, as cultural critic Cornel West has suggested?

William Carlos Williams

William Carlos Williams (1883–1963) was a doctor, a poet, an essayist, a novelist, and a playwright famous for his unique and succinct modernist poems. Williams studied medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, where he befriended Ezra Pound, whose imagist ideas greatly influenced Williams's early work. Later in his writing career, Williams forged his own path, trying to create a uniquely American poetry that emphasized the importance of the everyday. His most influential collections include Spring and All (1923), The Desert Music and Other Poems (1954), Pictures from Brueghel and Other Poems (1962), and his six-book epic, Paterson (1963).

The Great Figure

William Carlos Williams's poem "The Great Figure" was published in Sour Grapes: A Book of Poems in 1921.

Among the rain and lights
I saw the figure 5 in gold on a red firetruck moving tense unheeded to gong clangs siren howls and wheels rumbling through the dark city.

(1921)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the central image of the poem? What are the secondary images? How did William Carlos Williams create the imagery in this very short poem?
2. Do you consider "The Great Figure" literal or figurative — or a little bit of both? Explain your answer by describing which aspects of the poem are figurative and which are literal.
3. What expectations does the poem's title, "The Great Figure," create? In what ways are those expectations met in the poem? In what ways are they defied?
4. Compare this poem to Ezra Pound's "In a Station of the Metro" (p. 1074). Both examine "found" moments. How are the poems the same? How are they different?
5. According to Williams's autobiography, he was on his way to visit the painter Marsden Hartley when he "heard a great clatter of bells and the roar of a fire engine passing the end of the street down Ninth Avenue. [He] turned just in time to see a golden figure 5 on a red background flash by. The impression was so sudden and forceful that [he] took a piece of paper out of [his] pocket and wrote a short poem about it." Do you see any evidence of a connection in style between Williams and Hartley, whose work is on page 1082? Consider also the work by Charles Demuth featured in the following TalkBack.

TALKBACK

Charles Demuth

Charles Demuth (1883–1935) was an American painter from Lancaster, Pennsylvania. He graduated from Franklin and Marshall Academy and went on to study at Drexel University and the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. As a young man, he traveled to Paris, where he attended the Académie Colarossi and the Académie Julian and became a part of the avant-garde art movement. Though he was plagued by illness throughout his life, Demuth produced more than one thousand works of art and was able to live on the proceeds of his work.

I Saw the Figure 5 in Gold

Demuth's painting I Saw the Figure Five in Gold (1928), one of a series of eight abstract portraits of his friends, was inspired by William Carlos Williams's poem "The Great Figure."

Image copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Image source: Art Resource, NY.

CHARLES DEMUTH, I SAW THE FIGURE 5 IN GOLD, 1928, 35½" × 30", OIL ON CARDBOARD, METROPOLITAN MUSEUM OF ART, NEW YORK.
(See color insert, Image 37.)

Exploring the Text

1. What aspects of I Saw the Figure 5 in Gold make it a portrait? What aspects make it abstract?
2. Charles Demuth was part of a group of artists called the precisionists, who were interested in the precision of industrialization and the modernization of the American landscape. How is this painting both a landscape and a meditation on industrialization?

3. What is the effect of the geometric shapes? How does Demuth use them to re-create the motion of the fire engine from William Carlos Williams's poem, "The Great Figure" (p. 1106)?
4. I Saw the Figure 5 in Gold is considered a precursor to pop art, a twentieth-century genre that challenged the traditions of fine art by using imagery from popular culture — such as is seen in Andy Warhol's paintings of Campbell soup cans. How does Demuth's painting challenge the traditions of fine art?

Making Connections

1. In what ways is Demuth's I Saw the Figure 5 in Gold (p. 1108) an illustration of Williams's "The Great Figure"? In what ways does it depart from the poem?
2. What stylistic choices did Demuth make to illustrate Williams's poem? Consider Demuth's use of color, shape, line, perspective, and light.
3. Ekphrasis is a term used to describe a piece of writing that comments on another art form — for example, a poem about a piece of artwork or a novel about a film. In the case of these two works, the writing came first. How precisely does the painting comment on the poem?
4. Why do you think Demuth painted the number 5 three times? What part of Williams's poem does that particular element illustrate?
5. According to Peter Halter in The Revolution in the Visual Arts and the Poetry of William Carlos Williams, when Demuth sent I Saw the Figure 5 in Gold to the photographer and promoter of modern art Alfred Stieglitz, Demuth said, "I hope you like it. It looks almost American." What do you think he meant? Why do you think it was important to Demuth that his work look American?

William Carlos Williams

This Is Just to Say

"This Is Just to Say" appeared in Williams's Collected Poems 1921–1931 (1934).

I have eaten the plums that were in the icebox

and which you were probably saving for breakfast

Forgive me they were delicious
so sweet and so cold

(1934)

Exploring the Text

1. How would you describe the tone of "This Is Just to Say"?
2. This poem is notable for its complete lack of punctuation. What effect does that have on the tone of "This Is Just to Say"?
3. "This Is Just to Say" is considered a "found" poem. It takes the form of a note left on a kitchen table. Its very informal nature leaves its theme wide open. What do you think is its message?
4. What effect does the poem's typography (the way it looks on the page) have?
5. William Carlos Williams is considered an imagist, a poet who writes in free verse and believes first and foremost in the simple clarity of an image. How does this poem fit that definition? How does it compare to Ezra Pound's "In a Station of the Metro" (p. 1074)?
6. Love notes between husbands and wives are often the subject or even the form of poetry. Could "This Is Just to Say" be considered a love note? Explain your answer.
7. Williams's wife, Florence, wrote the following reply to "This Is Just to Say":

> Reply
>
> (crumped on her desk)
>
> Dear Bill: I've made a > couple of sandwiches for you.
> In the ice-box you'll find > blue-berries — a cup of grapefruit > a glass of cold coffee.
>
> On the stove is the tea-pot > with enough tea leaves > for you to make tea if you > prefer — Just light the gas — > boil the water and put it in the tea
>
> Plenty of bread in the bread-box > and butter and eggs —

I didn't know just what to make for you. Several people called up about office hours —

See you later. Love. Floss.

Please switch off the telephone.

Compare and contrast Florence's note with "This Is Just to Say." Can you make a case that Florence's note is also a poem? Explain your answer.

TALKBACK

Kenneth Koch

Kenneth Koch (1925–2002) was considered part of the New York school of poetry, a group of poets that included Frank O'Hara and that moved away from the introspective poetry of the early twentieth century. Koch graduated from Harvard and taught at Columbia University for over forty years. In addition to The Art of Love: Poems (1975), On the Great Atlantic Railway: Selected Poems 1950–1988 (1994), and One Train (1994), for which he won the Bollingen Prize, Koch is also well-known for Wishes, Lies and Dreams: Teaching Children to Write Poetry (1970).

Variations on a Theme by William Carlos Williams

This poem first appeared in Koch's 1962 collection Thank You and Other Poems. When an interviewer asked about the playfulness of his work, Koch responded, "I don't intend for my poetry to be mainly funny or satiric, but it seems to me that high spirits and sort of a comic view are part of being serious."

1

I chopped down the house that you had been saving to live in next summer.
I am sorry, but it was morning, and I had nothing to do and its wooden beams were so inviting.

2

We laughed at the hollyhocks together and then I sprayed them with lye.
Forgive me. I simply do not know what I am doing.

3

I gave away the money that you had been saving to live on for the next ten years.
The man who asked for it was shabby and the firm March wind on the porch was so juicy and cold.

4

Last evening we went dancing and I broke your leg.
Forgive me. I was clumsy, and I wanted you here in the wards, where I am the doctor!

(1962)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the tone of "Variations on a Theme by William Carlos Williams"?
2. The expression "variations on a theme" comes from music, where it means that material is repeated in an altered form. Why do you think Kenneth Koch called his parody of the William Carlos Williams poem a variation on a theme?
3. Do you consider this poem a love note? Explain your reasons.
4. Williams was a doctor. How does knowing that change the meaning of the last line of Koch's poem?
5. What is the effect of the undertone of violence in this poem?

Making Connections

1. The Koch poem (p. 111) is punctuated quite conventionally, while Williams's poem (p. 1109) has no punctuation at all. Compare and contrast the effects of the punctuation choices. How do those choices affect each poem's tone?
2. Compare the speakers in the two poems. As you compare, consider whether the speakers are men or women. What other qualities are revealed about them? How can you tell?
3. The Williams poem's title is also its first line — "This is just to say" being a way we sometimes start notes or e-mails — while the Koch poem forgoes that nicety. How does that difference affect meaning in the two poems?
4. Do you think the Koch poem is more than just a parody? How do you think the speaker feels about Williams?
5. Compose a couple of your own versions of "This Is Just to Say." Make one a straightforward "love note"; make another a parody.

T. S. Eliot

Poet, dramatist, and critic Thomas Stearns Eliot (1888–1965) was born and raised in St. Louis, Missouri. He moved to England when he was twenty-five and eventually became a British subject. He once said that his poetry was a combination of American and British influences but that "in its sources, in its emotional springs, it comes from America." Eliot studied philosophy at Harvard and Oxford, even learning Sanskrit to study Buddhism and other Indic religions. He later worked at Lloyds Bank in London and eventually became a director of Faber & Faber, an English publishing house. His most famous works include "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (1917), The Waste Land (1922), "Ash Wednesday" (1930), "Burnt Norton" (1941), "Little Gidding" (1942), The Four Quartets (1943), and the play Murder in the Cathedral (1935). The musical Cats was based on Eliot's Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats (1939), which earned him posthumous Tony Awards in 1983 for best book and best score. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1948. Eliot is considered one of the great poetic innovators of the twentieth century and is closely associated with the modernist movement — especially with regard to his use of stream of consciousness.

The Hollow Men

Published in 1925 in Eliot's Poems: 1909–1925, some people consider "The Hollow Men" an addendum to Eliot's famous poem The Waste Land (1922). Four of the five sections of "The Hollow Men" had been previously published in literary journals, such as the Dial.

Mistah Kurtz — he dead.[1]
A penny for the Old Guy[2]

I

We are the hollow men
We are the stuffed men
Leaning together
Headpiece filled with straw. Alas!
Our dried voices, when

[1]Line from Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness announcing the death of Kurtz, the ivory hunter whom the novel's protagonist has been searching for in Africa. — Eds.
[2]Common saying in England around Guy Fawkes Day, as children beg for money for fireworks. Guy Fawkes was implicated in the failed Gunpowder Plot of 1605, in which he attempted to blow up the British Parliament. His capture and demise are celebrated every year with fireworks and bonfires used to burn straw effigies. — Eds.

We whisper together
Are quiet and meaningless
As wind in dry grass
Or rats' feet over broken glass
In our dry cellar

Shape without form, shade without colour,
Paralysed force, gesture without motion;

Those who have crossed
With direct eyes, to death's other Kingdom
Remember us — if at all — not as lost
Violent souls, but only
As the hollow men
The stuffed men.

II

Eyes I dare not meet in dreams
In death's dream kingdom
These do not appear:
There, the eyes are Sunlight on a broken column
There, is a tree swinging
And voices are
In the wind's singing
More distant and more solemn
Than a fading star.

Let me be no nearer
In death's dream kingdom
Let me also wear
Such deliberate disguises
Rat's coat, crowskin, crossed staves
In a field
Behaving as the wind behaves
No nearer —

Not that final meeting
In the twilight kingdom

III

This is the dead land
This is cactus land

Here the stone images
Are raised, here they receive
The supplication of a dead man's hand
Under the twinkle of a fading star.

Is it like this
In death's other kingdom
Waking alone
At the hour when we are Trembling with tenderness
Lips that would kiss
Form prayers to broken stone.

IV

The eyes are not here
There are no eyes here
In this valley of dying stars
In this hollow valley
This broken jaw of our lost kingdoms

In this last of meeting places
We grope together
And avoid speech
Gathered on this beach of the tumid river

Sightless, unless
The eyes reappear
As the perpetual star
Multifoliate rose
Of death's twilight kingdom
The hope only
Of empty men.

V

Here we go round the prickly pear
Prickly pear prickly pear
Here we go round the prickly pear
At five o'clock in the morning.

Between the idea
And the reality
Between the motion
And the act

Falls the Shadow
For Thine is the Kingdom

Between the conception
And the creation
Between the emotion
And the response
Falls the Shadow
Life is very long

Between the desire
And the spasm
Between the potency
And the existence
Between the essence
And the descent
Falls the Shadow
For Thine is the Kingdom
For Thine is Life is For Thine is the

This is the way the world ends
This is the way the world ends
This is the way the world ends
Not with a bang but a whimper.

(1925)

Exploring the Text

1. How would you describe the mood or atmosphere of "The Hollow Men"?
2. What image patterns do you notice in "The Hollow Men"? Consider how often each one is repeated. How do the images — and their repetition — add to the deeper meaning of the poem?
3. "The Hollow Men" has two epigraphs. How do you think these are connected to the rest of the poem?
4. "The Hollow Men" borrows from several genres. What "sampling" can you pick out? In what ways does this technique help T. S. Eliot develop his ideas?
5. How does the last section of "The Hollow Men" differ from the first four sections? Why do you think "prickly pear" (a kind of cactus) replaces "mulberry bush" in his rewording of the nursery rhyme?
6. In "Tradition and the Individual Talent," Eliot writes, "To proceed to a more intelligible exposition of the relation of the poet to the past: he can neither take the past as a lump, an indiscriminate bolus, nor can he form himself wholly on one or two private admirations, nor can he form himself wholly upon one preferred period. The first course is inadmissible, the second is an important experience of youth, and the third is a pleasant and highly desirable supplement." How does "The Hollow Men" illustrate this idea?

7. Some critics consider "The Hollow Men" a response to World War I, while others see it as a reflection of Eliot's failing marriage and personal religious crisis. What are your thoughts about those two possibilities? Could the poem be both? Explain your answer.

Zora Neale Hurston

Zora Neale Hurston (1891–1960) came to prominence in the 1920s during the Harlem Renaissance. A novelist, a folklorist, and an anthropologist, she first gained attention with her short stories, including "Sweat" and "Spunk." She is best known for her novel Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937), set in Eatonville, Florida, where Hurston grew up; the town was the first incorporated African American community in the United States. Hurston graduated from Barnard College and lived most of her life in the New York area, though she traveled extensively in the Caribbean doing anthropological research. Her writing is known for its celebration of African American folk culture, as well as its use of authentic vernacular speech. Hurston, who died in poverty, was all but forgotten until Alice Walker took an interest in her. Walker's 1971 essay "Looking for Zora" describes her personal journey to find Hurston's unmarked grave. The publication of that essay prompted a resurgence of interest in Hurston, including republication of many of her books.

How It Feels to Be Colored Me

"How It Feels to Be Colored Me" was first published in The World Tomorrow in May 1928.

I am colored but I offer nothing in the way of extenuating circumstances except the fact that I am the only Negro in the United States whose grandfather on the mother's side was not an Indian chief.

I remember the very day that I became colored. Up to my thirteenth year I lived in the little Negro town of Eatonville, Florida. It is exclusively a colored town. The only white people I knew passed through the town going to or coming from Orlando. The native whites rode dusty horses, the Northern tourists chugged down the sandy village road in automobiles. The town knew the Southerners and never stopped cane chewing when they passed. But the Northerners were something else again. They were peered at cautiously from behind curtains by the timid. The more venturesome would come out on the porch to watch them go past and got just as much pleasure out of the tourists as the tourists got out of the village.

The front porch might seem a daring place for the rest of the town, but it was a gallery seat for me. My favorite place was atop the gate-post. Proscenium box for a born first-nighter. Not only did I enjoy the show, but I didn't mind the actors knowing that I liked it. I usually spoke to them in passing. I'd wave at them and when they returned my salute, I would say something like this: "Howdy-do-well-I-thank-you-where-you-goin'?" Usually automobile or the horse paused at this, and after a queer exchange of compliments, I would probably "go a piece of the way" with them, as we say in farthest Florida. If one of my family happened to come to the front in time to see me, of course negotiations would be rudely broken off. But even so, it is clear that I was the first "welcome-to-our-state" Floridian, and I hope the Miami Chamber of Commerce will please take notice.

During this period, white people differed from colored to me only in that they rode through town and never lived there. They liked to hear me "speak pieces" and sing and wanted to see me dance the parse-me-la, and gave me generously of their small silver for doing these things, which seemed strange to me for I wanted to do them so much that I needed bribing to stop. Only they didn't know it. The colored people gave no dimes. They deplored any joyful tendencies in me, but I was their Zora nevertheless. I belonged to them, to the nearby hotels, to the county — everybody's Zora.

But changes came in the family when I was thirteen, and I was sent to school in 5
Jacksonville. I left Eatonville, the town of the oleanders, as Zora. When I disembarked from the river-boat at Jacksonville, she was no more. It seemed that I had suffered a sea change. I was not Zora of Orange County any more, I was now a little colored girl. I found it out in certain ways. In my heart as well as in the mirror, I became a fast brown — warranted not to rub nor run.

But I am not tragically colored. There is no great sorrow dammed up in my soul, nor lurking behind my eyes. I do not mind at all. I do not belong to the sobbing school of Negrohood who hold that nature somehow has given them a lowdown dirty deal and whose feelings are all hurt about it. Even in the helter-skelter skirmish that is my life, I have seen that the world is to the strong regardless of a little pigmentation more or less. No, I do not weep at the world — I am too busy sharpening my oyster knife.

Someone is always at my elbow reminding me that I am the granddaughter of slaves. It fails to register depression with me. Slavery is sixty years in the past. The operation was successful and the patient is doing well, thank you. The terrible struggle that made me an American out of a potential slave said "On the line!" The Reconstruction said "Get set!"; and the generation before said "Go!" I am off to a flying start and I must not halt in the stretch to look behind and weep. Slavery is the price I paid for civilization, and the choice was not with me. It is a bully adventure and worth all that I have paid through my ancestors for it. No one on earth ever had a greater chance for glory. The world to be won and nothing to be lost. It is thrilling to think — to know that for any act of mine, I shall get twice as much praise or twice as much blame. It is quite exciting to hold the center of the national stage, with the spectators not knowing whether to laugh or to weep.

The position of my white neighbor is much more difficult. No brown specter pulls up a chair beside me when I sit down to eat. No dark ghost thrusts its leg against mine in bed. The game of keeping what one has is never so exciting as the game of getting.

I do not always feel colored. Even now I often achieve the unconscious Zora of Eatonville before the Hegira.[1] I feel most colored when I am thrown against a sharp white background.

For instance at Barnard. "Beside the waters of the Hudson" I feel my race. 10
Among the thousand white persons, I am a dark rock surged upon, and overswept, but through it all, I remain myself. When covered by the waters, I am; and the ebb but reveals me again.

Sometimes it is the other way around. A white person is set down in our midst, but the contrast is just as sharp for me. For instance, when I sit in the drafty basement that is The New World Cabaret with a white person, my color comes. We enter chatting about any little nothing that we have in common and are seated by the jazz waiters. In the abrupt way that jazz orchestras have, this one plunges into a number. It loses no time in circumlocutions, but gets right down to business. It constricts the thorax and splits the heart with its tempo and narcotic harmonies. This orchestra grows rambunctious, rears on its hind legs and attacks the tonal veil with primitive fury, rending it, clawing it until it breaks through to the jungle beyond. I follow those heathen — follow them exultingly. I dance wildly inside myself; I yell within, I whoop; I shake my assegai[2] above my head, I hurl it true to the mark yeeeeooww! I am in the jungle and living in the jungle way. My face is painted red and yellow and my body is painted blue. My pulse is throbbing like a war drum. I want to slaughter something — give pain, give death to what, I do not know. But the piece ends. The men of the orchestra wipe their lips and rest their fingers. I creep back slowly to the veneer we call civilization with the last tone and find the white friend sitting motionless in his seat, smoking calmly.

"Good music they have here," he remarks, drumming the table with his fingertips.

Music. The great blobs of purple and red emotion have not touched him. He has only heard what I felt. He is far away and I see him but dimly across the ocean and the continent that have fallen between us. He is so pale with his whiteness then and I am so colored.

At certain times I have no race, I am me. When I set my hat at a certain angle and saunter down Seventh Avenue, Harlem City, feeling as snooty as the lions in front of the Forty-Second Street Library, for instance. So far as my feelings are concerned,

---

[1]Journey to escape danger. Specifically, Muhammad's departure from Mecca in 622 C.E. to escape an assassination plot. — Eds.

[2]African spear. — Eds.

Peggy Hopkins Joyce[3] on the Boule Mich[4] with her gorgeous raiment, stately carriage, knees knocking together in a most aristocratic manner, has nothing on me. The cosmic Zora emerges. I belong to no race nor time. I am the eternal feminine with its string of beads.

I have no separate feeling about being an American citizen and colored. I am merely a fragment of the Great Soul that surges within the boundaries. My country, right or wrong. 15

Sometimes, I feel discriminated against, but it does not make me angry. It merely astonishes me. How can any deny themselves the pleasure of my company? It's beyond me.

But in the main, I feel like a brown bag of miscellany propped against a wall. Against a wall in company with other bags, white, red, and yellow. Pour out the contents, and there is discovered a jumble of small things priceless and worthless. A first-water diamond, an empty spool, bits of broken glass, lengths of string, a key to a door long since crumbled away, a rusty knife-blade, old shoes saved for a road that never was and never will be, a nail bent under the weight of things too heavy for any nail, a dried flower or two still a little fragrant. In your hand is the brown bag. On the ground before you is the jumble it held — so much like the jumble in the bags, could they be emptied, that all might be dumped in a single heap and the bags refilled without altering the content of any greatly. A bit of colored glass more or less would not matter. Perhaps that is how the Great Stuffer of Bags filled them in the first place — who knows?

(1928)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the function of the first paragraph of "How It Feels to Be Colored Me" in setting the tone of the essay? What is its effect on you, the reader?
2. What arguments does Zora Neale Hurston counter in this essay?
3. What is the effect of Hurston's metaphor describing the end of slavery in paragraph 7?
4. How would you characterize the language Hurston uses in paragraph 11 to describe her reaction to the music in the New World Cabaret?
5. Hurston divides her essay into four sections. What is the purpose of these divisions?
6. Who do you think is Hurston's audience for this essay?
7. The term colored was considered somewhat pejorative even during Hurston's time. Why does Hurston use it in her title and throughout her essay? Note other words and descriptions of skin color. What might Hurston be suggesting by the range of terms she uses?

---

[3]American actress known for her extravagant lifestyle, including a famous million-dollar shopping spree in 1920. — Eds.

[4] Boulevard Saint-Michel, one of the main streets in Paris's Latin Quarter. — Eds.

Ernest Hemingway

American novelist, journalist, and short-story writer Ernest Hemingway (1899–1961) was born in Illinois and became a reporter for the Kansas City Star after high school. During World War I, he volunteered as an ambulance driver in Italy, where he was wounded and hospitalized. After the war, Hemingway worked as a reporter for American newspapers and then as a foreign correspondent in Europe. Among his most famous works are the novels The Sun Also Rises (1926), A Farewell to Arms (1929), and The Old Man and the Sea (1955). He was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1954, and the influence of his "simple," "journalistic" style on modern writing has been incalculable.

A Clean, Well-Lighted Place

This short story was first published in Scribner's magazine in 1933.

It was late and everyone had left the café except an old man who sat in the shadow the leaves of the tree made against the electric light. In the day time the street was dusty, but at night the dew settled the dust and the old man liked to sit late because he was deaf and now at night it was quiet and he felt the difference. The two waiters inside the café knew that the old man was a little drunk, and while he was a good client they knew that if he became too drunk he would leave without paying, so they kept watch on him.

"Last week he tried to commit suicide," one waiter said.

"Why?"

"He was in despair."

"What about?"

"Nothing."

"How do you know it was nothing?"

"He has plenty of money."

They sat together at a table that was close against the wall near the door of the café and looked at the terrace where the tables were all empty except where the old man sat in the shadow of the leaves of the tree that moved slightly in the wind. A girl and a soldier went by in the street. The street light shone on the brass number on his collar. The girl wore no head covering and hurried beside him.

"The guard will pick him up," one waiter said.

"What does it matter if he gets what he's after?"

"He had better get off the street now. The guard will get him. They went by five minutes ago."

The old man sitting in the shadow rapped on his saucer with his glass. The younger waiter went over to him.

"What do you want?"

The old man looked at him. "Another brandy," he said.

"You'll be drunk," the waiter said. The old man looked at him. The waiter went away.

"He'll stay all night," he said to his colleague. "I'm sleepy now. I never get into bed before three o'clock. He should have killed himself last week."

The waiter took the brandy bottle and another saucer from the counter inside the café and marched out to the old man's table. He put down the saucer and poured the glass full of brandy.

"You should have killed yourself last week," he said to the deaf man. The old man motioned with his finger. "A little more," he said. The waiter poured on into the glass so that the brandy slopped over and ran down the stem into the top saucer of the pile. "Thank you," the old man said. The waiter took the bottle back inside the café. He sat down at the table with his colleague again.

"He's drunk now," he said.

"He's drunk every night."

"What did he want to kill himself for?"

"How should I know."

"How did he do it?"

"He hung himself with a rope."

"Who cut him down?"

"His niece."

"Why did they do it?"

"Fear for his soul."

"How much money has he got?"

"He's got plenty."

"He must be eighty years old."

"Anyway I should say he was eighty."

"I wish he would go home. I never get to bed before three o'clock. What kind of hour is that to go to bed?"

"He stays up because he likes it."

"He's lonely. I'm not lonely. I have a wife waiting in bed for me."

"He had a wife once too."

"A wife would be no good to him now."

"You can't tell. He might be better with a wife."

"His niece looks after him. You said she cut him down."

"I know."

"I wouldn't want to be that old. An old man is a nasty thing."

"Not always. This old man is clean. He drinks without spilling. Even now, drunk. Look at him."

"I don't want to look at him. I wish he would go home. He has no regard for those who must work."

The old man looked from his glass across the square, then over at the waiters.

"Another brandy," he said, pointing to his glass. The waiter who was in a hurry came over.

"Finished," he said, speaking with that omission of syntax stupid people employ when talking to drunken people or foreigners. "No more tonight. Close now."

"Another," said the old man.

"No. Finished." The waiter wiped the edge of the table with a towel and shook his head.

The old man stood up, slowly counted the saucers, took a leather coin purse from his pocket and paid for the drinks, leaving half a peseta tip.

The waiter watched him go down the street, a very old man walking unsteadily but with dignity.

"Why didn't you let him stay and drink?" the unhurried waiter asked. They were putting up the shutters. "It is not half-past two."

"I want to go home to bed."

"What is an hour?"

"More to me than to him."

"An hour is the same."

"You talk like an old man yourself. He can buy a bottle and drink at home."

"It's not the same."

"No, it is not," agreed the waiter with a wife. He did not wish to be unjust. He was only in a hurry.

"And you? You have no fear of going home before your usual hour?"

"Are you trying to insult me?"

"No, hombre, only to make a joke."

"No," the waiter who was in a hurry said, rising from pulling down the metal shutters. "I have confidence. I am all confidence."

"You have youth, confidence, and a job," the older waiter said. "You have everything."

"And what do you lack?"

"Everything but work."

"You have everything I have."

"No. I have never had confidence and I am not young."

"Come on. Stop talking nonsense and lock up."

"I am of those who like to stay late at the café," the older waiter said. "With all those who do not want to go to bed. With all those who need a light for the night."

"I want to go home and into bed."

"We are of two different kinds," the older waiter said. He was now dressed to go home. "It is not only a question of youth and confidence although those things are very beautiful. Each night I am reluctant to close up because there may be some one who needs the café."

"Hombre, there are bodegas open all night long."

"You do not understand. This is a clean and pleasant café. It is well lighted. The light is very good and also, now, there are shadows of the leaves."

"Good night," said the younger waiter.

"Good night," the other said. Turning off the electric light he continued the conversation with himself. It is the light of course but it is necessary that the place be clean and pleasant. You do not want music. Certainly you do not want music. Nor can you stand before a bar with dignity although that is all that is provided for these hours. What did he fear? It was not fear or dread. It was a nothing that he knew too well. It was all a nothing and a man was nothing too. It was only that and light was all it needed and a certain cleanness and order. Some lived in it and never felt it but he knew it was nada y pues nada y pues nada.[1] Our nada who art in nada, nada be thy name thy kingdom nada thy will be nada in nada as it is in nada. Give us this nada our daily nada and nada us our nada as we nada our nadas and nada us not into nada but deliver us from nada; pues nada. Hail nothing full of nothing, nothing is with thee. He smiled and stood before a bar with a shining steam pressure coffee machine.

"What's yours?" asked the barman.

"Nada."

"Otro loco más,"[2] said the barman and turned away.

"A little cup," said the waiter.

The barman poured it for him.

"The light is very bright and pleasant but the bar is unpolished," the waiter said.

The barman looked at him but did not answer. It was too late at night for conversation.

"You want another copita?" the barman asked.

"No, thank you," said the waiter and went out. He disliked bars and bodegas. A clean, well-lighted café was a very different thing. Now, without thinking further, he would go home to his room. He would lie in the bed and finally, with daylight, he would go to sleep. After all, he said to himself, it is probably only insomnia. Many must have it.

(1933)

Exploring the Text

1. Describe the setting of "A Clean, Well-Lighted Place."
2. Describe the story's six characters. What do they have in common? What differentiates them?
3. Look carefully at the story's mentions of light and dark. What patterns emerge? How do those patterns develop the deeper meanings of "A Clean, Well-Lighted Place"?
4. Why do you think the older waiter inserts the word "nada" (nothing, in Spanish) in the Lord's Prayer and at the beginning of the Hail Mary? What words has he replaced with "nada"? Read the two prayers in their original form and compare them to the versions here.
5. What do you think the old man's deafness represents in "A Clean, Well-Lighted Place"?

[1]Spanish. "Nothing, and then nothing, and then nothing." — Ed.
[2]Spanish. "Another crazy one." — Eds.

6. Compare and contrast the two waiters based on the dialogue between them. How are their needs different? What does each one represent?
7. This story takes place in a café in Europe. In what ways are its themes American? In what ways might you consider them European?
8. James Joyce is said to have considered "A Clean, Well-Lighted Place" one of the best short stories ever written. He said that Ernest Hemingway "reduced the veil between literature and life." Do you agree with Joyce? Explain your answer.

TALKBACK

Yiyun Li

Originally from Beijing, China, Yiyun Li (b. 1972) moved to the United States in 1996 to study immunology and writing at the University of Iowa. She made a name for herself with her first collection of short stories, the award-winning A Thousand Years of Good Prayers (2005). This was followed by a novel, The Vagrants (2009), and another collection of stories, Golden Boy, Emerald Girl (2010). Li currently lives in Oakland, California, and teaches at the University of California–Davis.

A Clean, Well-Lighted Place

This piece was published in the April 18, 2011, issue of the New Yorker, which was dedicated to journeys, in a section called "Coming to America."

"Here's a fact for you America-philes," a certain Major Tang, in the Army in which I had once served, liked to say when he caught us memorizing English vocabulary. "The moon in America is no bigger or brighter than the moon in China." A scientifically sound statement, though what a surprise it was to find that the moon in Iowa, where I landed in 1996 to go to graduate school, did seem much bigger and brighter. In my native Beijing, the moon looked faded behind the smog, remote and melancholy.

Equally astonishing was American lighting: in many places, lights stayed on from morning till night. At home, our family, conscious of saving every penny, would not turn on a single lamp until the last ray of daylight had vanished. Lights in public places were sound-controlled. The residents in our building had developed the habit of clapping or stomping to turn on a lamp, and to announce their presence; a few, like me, preferred a stealthy, unnoticeable passing in the dark.

How does one live in such a well-lighted country? Before I left China, I had prepared myself with a four-cassette course in American English. Phrases like "Be there or be square" and "Stop running around like a chicken with its head cut off" stayed with me because of their imperativeness.

No one told me to "be there or be square," but everyone I met, it seemed, expected me to have fun. After I had planned a set of immunology experiments with my adviser, he said, "Have fun." The nurse I met biweekly over a six-month period, because I had not passed the TB skin test required for enrollment at the university, always wished me a "good time" with the pills. A sorority mother in her sixties, a member of a local group that befriended international students, asked repeatedly, "Did you have fun?" after I visited the sorority house and dined with her girls. How could I explain that it was not memories of fun that would stay with me but what I saw in her bedroom: an oil painting of her, at eighteen, riding a prize horse; a black-and-white wedding photograph of her and her husband, a Navy officer who had died four years earlier; the thirty-seven stuffed animals on her bed, one for each year of her marriage?

As part of a program to help foreign students understand America, I signed 5 up to patrol the town with the police on a shift between midnight and 3 A.M. An officer drove us around and talked about his family: his wife, who had grown up in Correctionville, Iowa; his childhood, in a farmhouse outside the Quad Cities; their three children. He asked about my studies at the university, and about China. When we had exhausted those topics, we cruised in silence.

A little before two that morning, a call came in. A man had been seen buying cold medicine on two consecutive nights. The officer sped to a Walmart at the edge of town, where three more police cars arrived within minutes. The man in question, we were told, was playing pinball in the store. After half an hour, he walked out of the store, a plastic bag with a yellow smiley face dangling from his hand. Just as he unlocked his car, the four police vehicles surrounded him.

From where I sat, I could not see much besides the officers in their black uniforms, worn over bulky bulletproof vests. Twenty minutes passed. Finally, two of the officers moved their cars, and the man drove away.

The store's undercover security guard, the officer explained when he returned, had noticed a hypodermic needle at the entrance of the store. He had not seen the man drop it, but he suspected that he had. "We ran a search of his vehicle registration," the officer said. "If there's one thing coming up, we could bring him back for more questions. Or if the security guard saw him with the needle. As it stands now . . ." He shrugged, and then said it was time I ended my shift.

In parting, I said goodbye to the officer, and he wished me "a fun time in America."

What a strange country, I thought, where fun, like good lighting, seemed 10 mandatory. Was it fun that had kept the man at the pinball machine when he could have left with his suspicious purchase before the police arrived? Had someone told the security guard to have fun before he went to work, watching sleepless souls wander among the aisles? The other people I had seen on this night shift — the few customers in the diner where we stopped for coffee, the custodian of a water plant, a man behind the counter in a gas station — looked as though they had walked out of the paintings of Edward Hopper, yet the characters in those paintings, lacking an escape from the harsh, hard-edged light, had the choice of silence. They did not exhort one another to have a good time; they did not need to step out of their loneliness to tackle the task of having fun.

(2011)

Exploring the Text

1. How does the first paragraph set up expectations for the rest of "A Clean, Well-Lighted Place"? Does the essay fulfill those expectations or defy them? Explain your answer.
2. What meaning does "American lighting" (par. 2) have for Yiyun Li?
3. What do the phrases Li remembers from her "four-cassette course in American English" (par. 3) have in common with the very American expectation to have fun that she encounters everywhere? Why do you think that connection is significant to her?
4. Do you think Li answers the question she asks in paragraph 3: "How does one live in such a well-lighted country?" Explain your answer.
5. Edward Hopper is known for his paintings of landscapes and people that highlight their isolation. Nighthawks, his painting of a coffee shop late at night, in which four people seem to be in their own worlds, is especially famous. How does Li's allusion to Hopper help her comment on what she finds strange about life in America?

Making Connections

1. Why do you think Yiyun Li titled her essay "A Clean, Well-Lighted Place"?
2. Both Ernest Hemingway's story (p. 1121) and Li's essay (p. 1125) make assumptions about the values of others. How are those assumptions similar? How are they different?
3. Do you think the well-lighted Walmart in Li's piece has anything to do with the well-lit café in Hemingway's story? Explain your answer.

Edith Wharton

Edith Wharton (1862–1937) was a Pulitzer Prize–winning American novelist and short-story writer. Between 1900 and 1938, Wharton published twenty-two novels, including The House of Mirth (1905), which first gained her literary fame, and The Age of Innocence (1920), for which she won a Pulitzer Prize, the first awarded to a woman for literature. During World War I (1914–1918), Wharton stayed in Paris and devoted her time to helping those displaced by the war. Her efforts included finding (and, in some cases, providing) employment for refugees, opening tuberculosis hospitals, and serving as a founder of the American Hostels for Belgian refugees. When the war ended in 1918, Wharton officially moved to France, returning to America only once more in her lifetime to receive an honorary doctorate from Yale University in 1923.

Roman Fever

"Roman Fever" was first published in Liberty in 1934; its title plays on the multiple meanings of Roman fever: in a literal sense, malaria — caught from mosquitoes in the damp Roman ruins — but also the "misbehavior" that American women might have indulged in when they were away from the stultifying mores and traditions of home.

I

From the table at which they had been lunching two American ladies of ripe but well-cared-for middle age moved across the lofty terrace of the Roman restaurant and, leaning on its parapet, looked first at each other, and then down on the outspread glories of the Palatine and the Forum, with the same expression of vague but benevolent approval.

As they leaned there a girlish voice echoed up gaily from the stairs leading to the court below. "Well, come along, then," it cried, not to them but to an invisible companion, "and let's leave the young things to their knitting" and a voice as fresh laughed back: "Oh, look here, Babs, not actually knitting—" "Well, I mean figuratively," rejoined the first. "After all, we haven't left our poor parents much else to do . . ." and at that point the turn of the stairs engulfed the dialogue.

The two ladies looked at each other again, this time with a tinge of smiling embarrassment, and the smaller and paler one shook her head and colored slightly.

"Barbara!" she murmured, sending an unheard rebuke after the mocking voice in the stairway.

The other lady, who was fuller, and higher in color, with a small determined nose supported by vigorous black eyebrows, gave a good-humored laugh. "That's what our daughters think of us!" 5

Her companion replied by a deprecating gesture. "Not of us individually. We must remember that. It's just the collective modern idea of Mothers. And you see—" Half guiltily she drew from her handsomely mounted black handbag a twist of crimson silk run through by two fine knitting needles. "One never knows," she murmured. "The new system has certainly given us a good deal of time to kill; and sometimes I get tired just looking—even at this." Her gesture was now addressed to the stupendous scene at their feet.

The dark lady laughed again, and they both relapsed upon the view, contemplating it in silence, with a sort of diffused serenity which might have been borrowed from the spring effulgence of the Roman skies. The luncheon-hour was long past, and the two had their end of the vast terrace to themselves. At its opposite extremity a few groups, detained by a lingering look at the outspread city, were gathering up guidebooks and fumbling for tips. The last of them scattered, and the two ladies were alone on the air-washed height.

"Well, I don't see why we shouldn't just stay here," said Mrs. Slade, the lady of the high color and energetic brows. Two derelict basket-chairs stood near, and she pushed them into the angle of the parapet, and settled herself in one, her gaze upon the Palatine. "After all, it's still the most beautiful view in the world."

"It always will be, to me," assented her friend Mrs. Ansley, with so slight a stress on the "me" that Mrs. Slade, though she noticed it, wondered if it were not merely accidental, like the random underlinings of old-fashioned letter-writers.

"Grace Ansley was always old-fashioned," she thought; and added aloud, with a 10 retrospective smile: "It's a view we've both been familiar with for a good many years. When we first met here we were younger than our girls are now. You remember?"

"Oh, yes, I remember," murmured Mrs. Ansley, with the same undefinable stress — "There's that head-waiter wondering," she interpolated. She was evidently far less sure than her companion of herself and of her rights in the world.

"I'll cure him of wondering," said Mrs. Slade, stretching her hand toward a bag as discreetly opulent-looking as Mrs. Ansley's. Signing to the head-waiter, she explained that she and her friend were old lovers of Rome, and would like to spend the end of the afternoon looking down on the view — that is, if it did not disturb the service? The head-waiter, bowing over her gratuity, assured her that the ladies were most welcome, and would be still more so if they would condescend to remain for dinner. A full moon night, they would remember. . . .

Mrs. Slade's black brows drew together, as though references to the moon were out-of-place and even unwelcome. But she smiled away her frown as the head-waiter retreated. "Well, why not? We might do worse. There's no knowing, I suppose, when the girls will be back. Do you even know back from where? I don't!"

Mrs. Ansley again colored slightly. "I think those young Italian aviators we met at the Embassy invited them to fly to Tarquinia for tea. I suppose they'll want to wait and fly back by moonlight."

"Moonlight — moonlight! What a part it still plays. Do you suppose they're as 15 sentimental as we were?"

"I've come to the conclusion that I don't in the least know what they are," said Mrs. Ansley. "And perhaps we didn't know much more about each other."

"No; perhaps we didn't."

Her friend gave her a shy glance. "I never should have supposed you were sentimental, Alida."

"Well, perhaps I wasn't." Mrs. Slade drew her lids together in retrospect; and for a few moments the two ladies, who had been intimate since childhood, reflected how little they knew each other. Each one, of course, had a label ready to attach to the other's name; Mrs. Delphin Slade, for instance, would have told herself, or any one who asked her, that Mrs. Horace Ansley, twenty-five years ago, had been exquisitely lovely — no, you wouldn't believe it, would you? . . . though, of course, still charming, distinguished. . . . Well, as a girl she had been exquisite; far more beautiful than her daughter Barbara, though certainly Babs, according to the new standards at any rate, was more effective — had more edge, as they say. Funny where she got it, with those two nullities as parents. Yes; Horace Ansley was — well, just the duplicate of his wife. Museum specimens of old New York. Good-looking, irreproachable, exemplary. Mrs. Slade and Mrs. Ansley had lived opposite each other — actually as well as figuratively — for years. When the drawing-room curtains in No. 20 East 73rd Street were renewed, No. 23, across the way, was always aware of it. And of all the movings, buyings, travels, anniversaries, illnesses — the tame chronicle of an estimable pair. Little of it escaped Mrs. Slade. But she had grown bored with it by the time her husband made his big coup in Wall Street, and when they bought in upper Park Avenue had already begun to think: "I'd rather live opposite a speakeasy for a change; at least one might see it raided." The idea of seeing Grace raided was so amusing that (before the move) she launched it at a woman's lunch. It made a hit, and went the rounds — she sometimes wondered if it had crossed the street, and reached Mrs. Ansley. She hoped not, but didn't much mind. Those were the days when respectability was at a discount, and it did the irreproachable no harm to laugh at them a little.

A few years later, and not many months apart, both ladies lost their husbands. 20
There was an appropriate exchange of wreaths and condolences, and a brief renewal of intimacy in the half-shadow of their mourning; and now, after another interval, they had run across each other in Rome, at the same hotel, each of them the modest appendage of a salient daughter. The similarity of their lot had again drawn them together, lending itself to mild jokes, and the mutual confession that, if in old days it must have been tiring to "keep up" with daughters, it was now, at times, a little dull not to.

No doubt, Mrs. Slade reflected, she felt her unemployment more than poor Grace ever would. It was a big drop from being the wife of Delphin Slade to being his widow. She had always regarded herself (with a certain conjugal pride) as his equal in social gifts, as contributing her full share to the making of the exceptional couple they were: but the difference after his death was irremediable. As the wife of the famous corporation lawyer, always with an international case or two on hand, every day brought its exciting and unexpected obligation: the impromptu entertaining of eminent colleagues from abroad, the hurried dashes on legal business to London, Paris or Rome, where the entertaining was so handsomely reciprocated; the amusement of hearing in her wake: "What, that handsome woman with the good clothes and the eyes is Mrs. Slade — the Slade's wife? Really? Generally the wives of celebrities are such frumps."

Yes; being the Slade's widow was a dullish business after that. In living up to such a husband all her faculties had been engaged; now she had only her daughter to live up to, for the son who seemed to have inherited his father's gifts had died suddenly in boyhood. She had fought through that agony because her husband was there, to be helped and to help; now, after the father's death, the thought of the boy had become unbearable. There was nothing left but to mother her daughter; and dear Jenny was such a perfect daughter that she needed no excessive mothering. "Now with Babs Ansley I don't know that I should be so quiet," Mrs. Slade sometimes half-enviously reflected; but Jenny, who was younger than her brilliant friend, was that rare accident, an extremely pretty girl who somehow made youth and prettiness seem as safe as their absence. It was all perplexing — and to Mrs. Slade a little boring. She wished that Jenny would fall in love — with the wrong man, even; that she might have to be watched, out-manœuvred, rescued. And instead, it was Jenny who watched her mother, kept her out of draughts, made sure that she had taken her tonic. . . .

Mrs. Ansley was much less articulate than her friend, and her mental portrait of Mrs. Slade was slighter, and drawn with fainter touches. "Alida Slade's awfully brilliant; but not as brilliant as she thinks," would have summed it up; though she would have added, for the enlightenment of strangers, that Mrs. Slade had been an extremely dashing girl; much more so than her daughter, who was pretty, of course, and clever in a way, but had none of her mother's — well, "vividness," some one had once called it. Mrs. Ansley would take up current words like this, and cite them in quotation marks, as unheard-of audacities. No; Jenny was not like her mother. Sometimes Mrs. Ansley thought Alida Slade was disappointed; on the whole she had had a sad life. Full of failures and mistakes; Mrs. Ansley had always been rather sorry for her. . . .

So these two ladies visualized each other, each through the wrong end of her little telescope.

II

For a long time they continued to sit side by side without speaking. It seemed as 25 though, to both, there was a relief in laying down their somewhat futile activities in the presence of the vast Memento Mori which faced them. Mrs. Slade sat quite still, her eyes fixed on the golden slope of the Palace of the Caesars, and after a while Mrs. Ansley ceased to fidget with her bag, and she too sank into meditation. Like many intimate friends, the two ladies had never before had occasion to be silent together, and Mrs. Ansley was slightly embarrassed by what seemed, after so many years, a new stage in their intimacy, and one with which she did not yet know how to deal.

Suddenly the air was full of that deep clangor of bells which periodically covers Rome with a roof of silver. Mrs. Slade glanced at her wristwatch. "Five o'clock already," she said, as though surprised.

Mrs. Ansley suggested interrogatively: "There's bridge at the Embassy at five." For a long time Mrs. Slade did not answer. She appeared to be lost in contemplation, and Mrs. Ansley thought the remark had escaped her. But after a while she said, as if speaking out of a dream: "Bridge, did you say? Not unless you want to. . . . But I don't think I will, you know."

"Oh, no," Mrs. Ansley hastened to assure her. "I don't care to at all. It's so lovely here; and so full of old memories, as you say." She settled herself in her chair, and almost furtively drew forth her knitting. Mrs. Slade took sideway note of this activity, but her own beautifully cared-for hands remained motionless on her knee.

"I was just thinking," she said slowly, "what different things Rome stands for to each generation of travelers. To our grandmothers, Roman fever; to our mothers, sentimental danger — how we used to be guarded! — to our daughters, no more dangers than the middle of Main Street. They don't know it — but how much they're missing!"

The long golden light was beginning to pale, and Mrs. Ansley lifted her knitting 30 a little closer to her eyes. "Yes; how we were guarded!"

"I always used to think," Mrs. Slade continued, "that our mothers had a much more difficult job than our grandmothers. When Roman fever stalked the streets it must have been comparatively easy to gather in the girls at the danger hour; but when you and I were young, with such beauty calling us, and the spice of disobedience thrown in, and no worse risk than catching cold during the cool hour after sunset, the mothers used to be put to it to keep us in — didn't they?"

She turned again toward Mrs. Ansley, but the latter had reached a delicate point in her knitting. "One, two, three — slip two; yes, they must have been," she assented, without looking up.

Mrs. Slade's eyes rested on her with a deepened attention. "She can knit — in the face of this! How like her. . . ."

Mrs. Slade leaned back, brooding, her eyes ranging from the ruins which faced her to the long green hollow of the Forum, the fading glow of the church fronts beyond it, and the outlying immensity of the Colosseum. Suddenly she thought: "It's all very well to say that our girls have done away with sentiment and moonlight. But if Babs Ansley isn't out to catch that young aviator — the one who's a Marchese[1] — then I don't know anything. And Jenny has no chance beside her. I know that too. I wonder if that's why Grace Ansley likes the two girls to go everywhere together? My poor Jenny as a foil — !" Mrs. Slade gave a hardly audible laugh, and at the sound Mrs. Ansley dropped her knitting.

"Yes — ?"

"I — oh, nothing. I was only thinking how your Babs carries everything before her. That Campolieri boy is one of the best matches in Rome. Don't look so innocent, my dear — you know he is. And I was wondering, ever so respectfully, you understand . . . wondering how two such exemplary characters as you and Horace had managed to produce anything quite so dynamic." Mrs. Slade laughed again, with a touch of asperity.

Mrs. Ansley's hands lay inert across her needles. She looked straight out at the great accumulated wreckage of passion and splendor at her feet. But her small profile was almost expressionless. At length she said: "I think you overrate Babs, my dear."

Mrs. Slade's tone grew easier. "No; I don't. I appreciate her. And perhaps envy you. Oh, my girl's perfect; if I were a chronic invalid I'd — well, I think I'd rather be in Jenny's hands. There must be times . . . but there! I always wanted a brilliant daughter . . . and never quite understood why I got an angel instead."

Mrs. Ansley echoed her laugh in a faint murmur. "Babs is an angel too."

"Of course — of course! But she's got rainbow wings. Well, they're wandering by the sea with their young men; and here we sit . . . and it all brings back the past a little too acutely."

Mrs. Ansley had resumed her knitting. One might almost have imagined (if one had known her less well, Mrs. Slade reflected) that, for her also, too many memories rose from the lengthening shadows of those august ruins. But no; she was simply absorbed in her work. What was there for her to worry about? She knew that Babs would almost certainly come back engaged to the extremely eligible Campolieri. "And she'll sell the New York house, and settle down near them in Rome, and never be in their way . . . she's much too tactful. But she'll have an excellent cook, and just the right people in for bridge and cocktails . . . and a perfectly peaceful old age among her grandchildren."

---

[1]Italian nobleman. — Eds.

Mrs. Slade broke off this prophetic flight with a recoil of self-disgust. There was no one of whom she had less right to think unkindly than of Grace Ansley. Would she never cure herself of envying her? Perhaps she had begun too long ago.

She stood up and leaned against the parapet, filling her troubled eyes with the tranquilizing magic of the hour. But instead of tranquilizing her the sight seemed to increase her exasperation. Her gaze turned toward the Colosseum. Already its golden flank was drowned in purple shadow, and above it the sky curved crystal clear, without light or color. It was the moment when afternoon and evening hang balanced in mid-heaven.

Mrs. Slade turned back and laid her hand on her friend's arm. The gesture was so abrupt that Mrs. Ansley looked up, startled.

"The sun's set. You're not afraid, my dear?" 45

"Afraid — ?"

"Of Roman fever or pneumonia? I remember how ill you were that winter. As a girl you had a very delicate throat, hadn't you?"

"Oh, we're all right up here. Down below, in the Forum, it does get deathly cold, all of a sudden . . . but not here."

"Ah, of course you know because you had to be so careful." Mrs. Slade turned back to the parapet. She thought: "I must make one more effort not to hate her." Aloud she said: "Whenever I look at the Forum from up here I remember that story about a great-aunt of yours, wasn't she? A dreadfully wicked great-aunt?"

"Oh yes; Great-aunt Harriet. The one who was supposed to have sent her young 50 sister out to the Forum after sunset to gather a night-blooming flower for her album. All our great-aunts and grandmothers used to have albums of dried flowers."

Mrs. Slade nodded. "But she really sent her because they were in love with the same man — "

"Well, that was the family tradition. They said Aunt Harriet confessed it years afterward. At any rate, the poor little sister caught the fever and died. Mother used to frighten us with the story when we were children."

"And you frightened me with it, that winter when you and I were here as girls. The winter I was engaged to Delphin."

Mrs. Ansley gave a faint laugh. "Oh, did I? Really frightened you? I don't believe you're easily frightened."

"Not often; but I was then. I was easily frightened because I was too happy. I 55 wonder if you know what that means?"

"I — yes. . . ." Mrs. Ansley faltered.

"Well, I suppose that was why the story of your wicked aunt made such an impression on me. And I thought: 'There's no more Roman fever, but the Forum is deathly cold after sunset — especially after a hot day. And the Colosseum's even colder and damper.' "

"The Colosseum — ?"

"Yes. It wasn't easy to get in, after the gates were locked for the night. Far from easy. Still, in those days it could be managed; it was managed, often. Lovers met there who couldn't meet elsewhere. You knew that?"

"I — I daresay. I don't remember." 60

"You don't remember? You don't remember going to visit some ruins or other one evening, just after dark, and catching a bad chill? You were supposed to have gone to see the moon rise. People always said that expedition was what caused your illness."

There was a moment's silence; then Mrs. Ansley rejoined: "Did they? It was all so long ago."

"Yes. And you got well again — so it didn't matter. But I suppose it struck your friend — the reason given for your illness, I mean — because everybody knew you were so prudent on account of your throat, and your mother took such care of you. . . . You had been out late sight-seeing, hadn't you, that night?"

"Perhaps I had. The most prudent girls aren't always prudent. What made you think of it now?"

Mrs. Slade seemed to have no answer ready. But after a moment she broke out: 65 "Because I simply can't bear it any longer — "

Mrs. Ansley lifted her head quickly. Her eyes were wide and very pale. "Can't bear what?"

"Why — your not knowing that I've always known why you went."

"Why I went — ?"

"Yes. You think I'm bluffing, don't you? Well, you went to meet the man I was engaged to — and I can repeat every word of the letter that took you there."

While Mrs. Slade spoke Mrs. Ansley had risen unsteadily to her feet. Her bag, 70 her knitting and gloves, slid in a panic-stricken heap to the ground. She looked at Mrs. Slade as though she were looking at a ghost.

"No, no — don't," she faltered out.

"Why not? Listen, if you don't believe me. 'My one darling, things can't go on like this. I must see you alone. Come to the Colosseum immediately after dark tomorrow. There will be somebody to let you in. No one whom you need fear will suspect' — but perhaps you've forgotten what the letter said?"

Mrs. Ansley met the challenge with an unexpected composure. Steadying herself against the chair she looked at her friend, and replied: "No; I know it by heart too."

"And the signature? 'Only your D.S.' Was that it? I'm right, am I? That was the letter that took you out that evening after dark?"

Mrs. Ansley was still looking at her. It seemed to Mrs. Slade that a slow struggle 75 was going on behind the voluntarily controlled mask of her small quiet face. "I shouldn't have thought she had herself so well in hand," Mrs. Slade reflected, almost resentfully. But at this moment Mrs. Ansley spoke, "I don't know how you knew. I burnt that letter at once."

"Yes; you would, naturally — you're so prudent!" The sneer was open now. "And if you burnt the letter you're wondering how on earth I know what was in it. That's it, isn't it?"

Mrs. Slade waited, but Mrs. Ansley did not speak.

"Well, my dear, I know what was in that letter because I wrote it!"

"You wrote it?"

"Yes." 80

The two women stood for a minute staring at each other in the last golden light. Then Mrs. Ansley dropped back into her chair. "Oh," she murmured, and covered her face with her hands.

Mrs. Slade waited nervously for another word or movement. None came, and at length she broke out: "I horrify you."

Mrs. Ansley's hands dropped to her knee. The face they uncovered was streaked with tears. "I wasn't thinking of you. I was thinking — it was the only letter I ever had from him!"

"And I wrote it. Yes; I wrote it! But I was the girl he was engaged to. Did you happen to remember that?"

Mrs. Ansley's head dropped again. "I'm not trying to excuse myself. . . . I remembered. . . ." 85

"And still you went?"

"Still I went."

Mrs. Slade stood looking down on the small bowed figure at her side. The flame of her wrath had already sunk, and she wondered why she had ever thought there would be any satisfaction in inflicting so purposeless a wound on her friend. But she had to justify herself.

"You do understand? I'd found out — and I hated you, hated you. I knew you were in love with Delphin — and I was afraid; afraid of you, of your quiet ways, your sweetness . . . your . . . well, I wanted you out of the way, that's all. Just for a few weeks; just till I was sure of him. So in a blind fury I wrote that letter. . . . I don't know why I'm telling you now."

"I suppose," said Mrs. Ansley slowly, "it's because you've always gone on hating me." 90

"Perhaps. Or because I wanted to get the whole thing off my mind." She paused. "I'm glad you destroyed the letter. Of course I never thought you'd die."

Mrs. Ansley relapsed into silence, and Mrs. Slade, leaning above her, was conscious of a strange sense of isolation, of being cut off from the warm current of human communion. "You think me a monster!"

"I don't know. . . . It was the only letter I had, and you say he didn't write it?"

"Ah, how you care for him still!"

"I cared for that memory," said Mrs. Ansley. 95

Mrs. Slade continued to look down on her. She seemed physically reduced by the blow — as if, when she got up, the wind might scatter her like a puff of dust. Mrs. Slade's jealousy suddenly leapt up again at the sight. All these years the woman had been living on that letter. How she must have loved him, to treasure the mere memory of its ashes! The letter of the man her friend was engaged to. Wasn't it she who was the monster?

"You tried your best to get him away from me, didn't you? But you failed; and I kept him. That's all."

"Yes. That's all."

"I wish now I hadn't told you. I'd no idea you'd feel about it as you do; I thought you'd be amused. It all happened so long ago, as you say; and you must do me the justice to remember that I had no reason to think you'd ever taken it seriously. How could I, when you were married to Horace Ansley two months afterward? As soon as you could get out of bed your mother rushed you off to Florence and married you. People were rather surprised — they wondered at its being done so quickly; but I thought I knew. I had an idea you did it out of pique — to be able to say you'd got ahead of Delphin and me. Girls have such silly reasons for doing the most serious things. And your marrying so soon convinced me that you'd never really cared."

"Yes. I suppose it would," Mrs. Ansley assented.

The clear heaven overhead was emptied of all its gold. Dusk spread over it, abruptly darkening the Seven Hills. Here and there lights began to twinkle through the foliage at their feet. Steps were coming and going on the deserted terrace — waiters looking out of the doorway at the head of the stairs, then reappearing with trays and napkins and flasks of wine. Tables were moved, chairs straightened. A feeble string of electric lights flickered out. Some vases of faded flowers were carried away, and brought back replenished. A stout lady in a dust-coat suddenly appeared, asking in broken Italian if any one had seen the elastic band which held together her tattered Baedeker.[2] She poked with her stick under the table at which she had lunched, the waiters assisting.

The corner where Mrs. Slade and Mrs. Ansley sat was still shadowy and deserted. For a long time neither of them spoke. At length Mrs. Slade began again: "I suppose I did it as a sort of joke — "

"A joke?"

"Well, girls are ferocious sometimes, you know. Girls in love especially. And I remember laughing to myself all that evening at the idea that you were waiting around there in the dark, dodging out of sight, listening for every sound, trying to get in — Of course I was upset when I heard you were so ill afterward."

Mrs. Ansley had not moved for a long time. But now she turned slowly toward her companion. "But I didn't wait. He'd arranged everything. He was there. We were let in at once," she said.

Mrs. Slade sprang up from her leaning position. "Delphin there? They let you in? — Ah, now you're lying!" she burst out with violence.

Mrs. Ansley's voice grew clearer, and full of surprise. "But of course he was there. Naturally he came — "

"Came? How did he know he'd find you there? You must be raving!"

Mrs. Ansley hesitated, as though reflecting. "But I answered the letter. I told him I'd be there. So he came."

Mrs. Slade flung her hands up to her face. "Oh, God — you answered! I never thought of your answering. . . ."

"It's odd you never thought of it, if you wrote the letter."

---

[2]Travel guide. — Eds.

"Yes. I was blind with rage."

Mrs. Ansley rose, and drew her fur scarf about her. "It is cold here. We'd better go. . . . I'm sorry for you," she said as she clasped the fur about her throat.

The unexpected words sent a pang through Mrs. Slade. "Yes; we'd better go." She gathered up her bag and cloak. "I don't know why you should be sorry for me," she muttered.

Mrs. Ansley stood looking away from her toward the dusky secret mass of the 115
Colosseum. "Well — because I didn't have to wait that night."

Mrs. Slade gave an unquiet laugh. "Yes; I was beaten there. But I oughtn't to begrudge it to you, I suppose. At the end of all these years. After all, I had everything; I had him for twenty-five years. And you had nothing but that one letter that he didn't write."

Mrs. Ansley was again silent. At length she turned toward the door of the terrace. She took a step, and turned back, facing her companion.

"I had Barbara," she said, and began to move ahead of Mrs. Slade toward the stairway.

(1934)

Exploring the Text

1. How does the setting of "Roman Fever" provide both a literal and a figurative backdrop for the story's conflicts?
2. How does Edith Wharton develop the characters of Alida Slade and Grace Ansley? Are there hints at the beginning of the story about how things will turn out? Were you surprised by the ending? Explain your answer.
3. In what ways do each of the women visualize the other "through the wrong end of her little telescope" (par. 24)? Is either Alida or Grace correct in her view?
4. What are the differences between Alida's and Grace's daughters, Jenny and Barbara? How do we learn of their differences? Is there evidence in the story to support those observations?
5. Alida Slade remarks on the "different things Rome stands for to each generation of travelers. To our grandmothers, Roman fever; to our mothers, sentimental danger — how we used to be guarded! — to our daughters, no more dangers than the middle of Main Street. They don't know it — but how much they're missing!" (par. 29). What does she think the daughters are missing? What else might the dangers of Rome mean to women who travel there? What comment might Wharton be making about the limitations women faced in her world?
6. How can "Roman Fever" be considered social commentary? How might it move beyond social commentary into the realm of morality?
7. What do you think is the greatest irony in this story fraught with irony?
8. To your mind, which woman has the upper hand? Explain your answer.

Eleanor Roosevelt

Eleanor Roosevelt (1884–1962) was the wife of Franklin D. Roosevelt and First Lady of the United States from 1933 to 1945. She was best known for her devotion to civil rights and her advocacy for working women. After her husband died in 1945, Roosevelt served as one of the United States' first delegates to the United Nations, where, as a chairwoman, she drafted and approved the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948. In 1961, during John F. Kennedy's administration, Roosevelt chaired the Presidential Commission on the Status of Women; she went on to assist in the establishment of the state of Israel and to attempt negotiations with the Soviet Union.

What Libraries Mean to the Nation

Roosevelt delivered the following speech on April 1, 1936, at the District of Columbia Library Association dinner.

It has been a great pleasure to be here this evening and to hear all the things that have been said about libraries in the district and in general, and the librarians, without whom the libraries would be of little use, I am afraid. But as I sat here I fear that I have thought a good deal about the fact that there are so many places in the United States that have no libraries and that have no way of getting books.

What the libraries mean to the nation is fairly obvious to all of us, especially to those who are here this evening. We know that without libraries, without education, which is based largely on libraries, we cannot have an educated people who will carry on successfully our form of government, and it seems to me that what we really are interested in is how we can make this country more conscious of what it has not got, because we do pat ourselves on the back for the things that we have and that we do. I was looking over some maps which were sent to me and I longed to have these maps very much enlarged and put up in many, many places throughout this country, because I do not think that many people know how many states do not spend more than ten cents per capita for library books a year, and how many states have large areas, particularly rural areas, where one cannot get books.

One of the things that I have been particularly grateful for in the years of the depression — and, of course, I think, sad as it has been, we have some things to be grateful for — is that we have discovered so many things that we had not known before. These facts have come to the knowledge of a great many people who had simply passed them by before, because they did not happen to think about them, and one of these things, that we used to be able to hide, is the areas of the country which are not served in any way by libraries. I have seen photographs, for instance, of girls going out on horseback with libraries strapped on behind them, taking books to children and grown people in places that have been without libraries. We know a good deal about Mrs. Breckinridge's nursing service in Kentucky, but we know very little about the libraries that go out in the same way that her nurses do, on horseback.

I have lived a great deal in the country, in a state which prides itself in spending much money on education, and I am quite sure that some people think there is no lack of education and no lack of library facilities, and sometimes I long to take people and let them see some of the back country districts that I know, in New York State. I know one place in the northern part of the state where I camped for a while in the summer, and I went to the school and talked to the teachers. They are using school books which have been passed down from one child to another. They have practically no books outside of the textbooks. The children in the district are so poor and some of them so pathetic that I suppose the struggle to live has been so great you could not think much about what you fed the mind, but I came away feeling that right there, in one of the biggest and richest states in the country, we had a big area that needed books and needed libraries to help these schools in the education of the children, and, even more, to help the whole community to learn to live through their minds.

We are doing a tremendous amount through the home economics colleges to help 5 people to learn how to live in their homes, to better their standards of material living. We have got to think in exactly the same way about helping them to live mentally and to attain better standards, and we can do it only through the children. We can do ground work with the children; we must begin with them; but we have got to do a tremendous amount with the older people.

I had a letter the other day which was pathetic. It was from a man who said he was 74 years old. He wrote to ask me to see that the adult education classes in that particular community were not stopped, because it had meant so much to him to learn to read. He did not think that I could understand what it meant never to have been able to understand a word on the printed page. He said, "I am not the only one. My next door neighbor is 81 and he learned to read last winter, and it has just made life over for us." It gave you the feeling that there is a good deal of education that is not being done in this country, in spite of all that is done.

We have come a long way. We have done a great deal, but we still have a lot that can be done to improve our educational system, and we still have a tremendous amount to do with our libraries. We have got to make our libraries the center of a new life in the mind, because people are hungry to use their minds.

A New Era Ahead

We are facing a great change in civilization, and the responsibility, I think, for what we do with our leisure time is a very great responsibility for all of us who have intellectual interests. Somebody said to me, "I would not be so worried and I would not mind facing the fact that we are working fewer hours, if I only knew what people would do with their free time. I would not know what to do myself if I had only to work six hours a day."

That is a challenge. We, here in this country, ought to know what to do with our time, if we have it. I do not know whether we are going to have it, but if we are going to have more leisure time, it is the library, and people who live in the libraries and work in libraries, who are going to lead the way, who are going to give other people the curiosity and the vision of useful things, and pleasant things, and amusing things which can be done in those hours in which we may not have to work in the ways in which we have worked before. It is a very great responsibility, but it is also a very great interest.

Now, I think here in the city of Washington, and in nearly all big cities, the problem is a different one from the one I know so well in the country districts. I think that perhaps there are more facilities and, for that reason, there are more stimulating people engaged in solving the different problems that affect education in cities. But there is a great need, a very great need, in rural America. There is a great need for imagination in the ways used to stir the interest of old and young to use what library facilities they have, and to insist that they shall have more and to make them willing to pay for more, because, in the end, they will get something that they want out of it. 10

The more I have thought about the problem, the more I have felt that we do not use all our opportunities to stimulate an interest in books. Everything today in which people are interested, the radio, the movies — all of these — should, if properly used, stimulate the use of books. For instance, if there is a remarkably good movie, like The Life of Pasteur, it seems to me that it should be used by people in our rural schools and rural libraries to create an interest in the life of Pasteur, the things that Pasteur did, the people around him, and all the discoveries that have come from that time on. I am sure that if we put our minds on it, there are a great many ways in which we can use the things which are coming constantly into the lives of people throughout the country to stimulate an interest in the oldest and most interesting recreation there is.

But you do have to learn to love books, you do have to learn how to read them, you do have to learn that a book is a companion, and this is done in a great many different ways. I think we can do a great deal by having more copies of the same book, perhaps less expensive books, in the libraries so that we can have a good many people reading the same books and coming together for discussion.

I know, for instance, that even in a small group, like a family, we all want to read one book at the same time, and we all want to tear each other's hair out when we can't get a copy. It seems to me that here is something we should be thinking about, to stimulate the reading of books in families and large groups of people. I think the CCC[1] has made me realize this. One boy said to me, "Do you know about that book? I am so glad to be able to talk about it. . . . You know, it takes such a long time to get a book around." Now, if there had been a dozen or more copies of that book, the group would have talked about that book and it would have been a valuable contribution. It would have stimulated their intellectual thought.

I feel that the care of libraries and the use of books, and the knowledge of books, is a tremendously vital thing, and that we who deal with books and who love books have a great opportunity to bring about something in this country which is more vital here than anywhere else, because we have the chance to make a democracy that will be a real democracy, that will fulfill the vision that Senator King has just given us. It will take on our part imagination and patience and constant interest in awakening interest in other people. But, if we do, I think we shall find that our love of books will bring us a constantly widening audience and constantly more interesting contacts in whatever part of the country we may go.

[1]The Civilian Conservation Corps provided manual labor jobs for young men during the Great Depression. — Eds.

(1936)

Exploring the Text

1. Describe the tone of Eleanor Roosevelt's remarks. How does the tone show awareness and consideration of her audience?
2. How does Roosevelt establish credibility beyond the fact that she is First Lady of the United States?
3. What assumptions does Roosevelt make about her audience? Find sentences in the speech in which those assumptions are most obvious.
4. What kind of evidence does Roosevelt provide to support her claim that the country needs more libraries? Classify them as claims of fact, value, and policy. Does one type dominate?
5. What do you think of Roosevelt's argument that rural areas need more libraries and that libraries need to stock multiple copies of popular books? Do those arguments stand up today?
6. In this digital age, what do you think is the primary answer to the question of what libraries mean to the nation?

Works Progress Administration

Part of Roosevelt's New Deal, the Works Progress Administration (WPA) was designed to stimulate the economy through public-works projects such as building roads, bridges, buildings, and schools. At its height, the initiative employed over 3 million people. It also commissioned works from visual artists, designers, and photographers under the Federal Art Project.

Bookmobile, Louisiana

The following photo, taken circa 1938, of the bookmobile at Bayou de Large, fifteen miles south of Houma, Louisiana, is part of the Franklin Delano Roosevelt Library and comes from the WPA archives.

National Archives

Exploring the Text

1. What strikes you first in the photograph? Explain why you find it striking.
2. What emotions does the photo capture? How are those emotions expressed?
3. What is the effect of the diagonal line created by the boat moving from the bottom left toward the upper right in the photo?
4. What does this photograph remind you of? Are there literary or mythological connections to be made?
5. What do you think the bookmobile meant to the people in the photo? What can you tell from their body language and placement in the picture?

Franklin Delano Roosevelt

Franklin Delano Roosevelt (1882–1945) was the thirty-second president of the United States (1933–1945) and the only American president elected to more than two terms. Roosevelt led the nation through two of its most challenging periods, the Great Depression and World War II. Roosevelt's New Deal — a series of programs that provided government jobs for the unemployed, boosted economic growth, and regulated the financial and transportation industries — helped America begin to recover from the Great Depression. After the attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941 and throughout World War II (1939–1945), Roosevelt worked with Winston Churchill and Joseph Stalin to lead the Allies against Germany, Italy, and Japan, and he sanctioned the development of the world's first atomic bomb.

Second Inaugural Address: One-Third of a Nation

After being re-elected by a landslide, Roosevelt gave this speech on January 20, 1937, the first time the presidential inauguration was held in January rather than in March.

When four years ago we met to inaugurate a President, the Republic, single-minded in anxiety, stood in spirit here. We dedicated ourselves to the fulfillment of a vision — to speed the time when there would be for all the people that security and peace essential to the pursuit of happiness. We of the Republic pledged ourselves to drive from the temple of our ancient faith those who had profaned it; to end by action, tireless and unafraid, the stagnation and despair of that day. We did those first things first.

Our covenant with ourselves did not stop there. Instinctively we recognized a deeper need — the need to find through government the instrument of our united purpose to solve for the individual the ever-rising problems of a complex civilization. Repeated attempts at their solution without the aid of government had left us baffled and bewildered. For, without that aid, we had been unable to create those moral controls over the services of science which are necessary to make science a useful servant instead of a ruthless master of mankind. To do this we knew that we must find practical controls over blind economic forces and blindly selfish men.

We of the Republic sensed the truth that democratic government has innate capacity to protect its people against disasters once considered inevitable, to solve problems once considered unsolvable. We would not admit that we could not find a way to master economic epidemics just as, after centuries of fatalistic suffering, we had found a way to master epidemics of disease. We refused to leave the problems of our common welfare to be solved by the winds of chance and the hurricanes of disaster.

In this we Americans were discovering no wholly new truth; we were writing a new chapter in our book of self-government.

This year marks the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Constitutional Convention which made us a nation. At that Convention our forefathers found the way out of the chaos which followed the Revolutionary War; they created a strong government with powers of united action sufficient then and now to solve problems utterly beyond individual or local solution. A century and a half ago they established the federal government in order to promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to the American people.

Today we invoke those same powers of government to achieve the same objectives.

Four years of new experience have not belied our historic instinct. They hold out the clear hope that government within communities, government within the separate States, and government of the United States can do the things the times require, without yielding its democracy. Our tasks in the last four years did not force democracy to take a holiday.

Nearly all of us recognize that as intricacies of human relationships increase, so power to govern them also must increase — power to stop evil; power to do good. The essential democracy of our Nation and the safety of our people depend not upon the absence of power, but upon lodging it with those whom the people can change or continue at stated intervals through an honest and free system of elections. The Constitution of 1787 did not make our democracy impotent.

In fact, in these last four years, we have made the exercise of all power more democratic; for we have begun to bring private autocratic powers into their proper subordination to the public's government. The legend that they were invincible — above and beyond the processes of a democracy — has been shattered. They have been challenged and beaten.

Our progress out of the depression is obvious. But that is not all that you and I mean by the new order of things. Our pledge was not merely to do a patchwork job with second-hand materials. By using the new materials of social justice we have undertaken to erect on the old foundations a more enduring structure for the better use of future generations.

In that purpose we have been helped by achievements of mind and spirit. Old truths have been relearned; untruths have been unlearned. We have always known that heedless self-interest was bad morals; we know now that it is bad economics. Out of the collapse of a prosperity whose builders boasted their practicality has come the conviction that in the long run economic morality pays. We are beginning to wipe out the line that divides the practical from the ideal; and in so doing we are fashioning an instrument of unimagined power for the establishment of a morally better world.

This new understanding undermines the old admiration of worldly success as such. We are beginning to abandon our tolerance of the abuse of power by those who betray for profit the elementary decencies of life.

In this process evil things formerly accepted will not be so easily condoned. Hard-headedness will not so easily excuse hard-heartedness. We are moving toward an era of good feeling. But we realize that there can be no era of good feeling save among men of good will.

For these reasons I am justified in believing that the greatest change we have witnessed has been the change in the moral climate of America.

Among men of good will, science and democracy together offer an ever-richer life and ever-larger satisfaction to the individual. With this change in our moral climate and our rediscovered ability to improve our economic order, we have set our feet upon the road of enduring progress.

Shall we pause now and turn our back upon the road that lies ahead? Shall we call this the promised land? Or, shall we continue on our way? For "each age is a dream that is dying, or one that is coming to birth."

Many voices are heard as we face a great decision. Comfort says, "Tarry a while." Opportunism says, "This is a good spot." Timidity asks, "How difficult is the road ahead?"

True, we have come far from the days of stagnation and despair. Vitality has been preserved. Courage and confidence have been restored. Mental and moral horizons have been extended.

But our present gains were won under the pressure of more than ordinary circumstance. Advance became imperative under the goad of fear and suffering. The times were on the side of progress.

To hold to progress today, however, is more difficult. Dulled conscience, irresponsibility, and ruthless self-interest already reappear. Such symptoms of prosperity may become portents of disaster! Prosperity already tests the persistence of our progressive purpose.

Let us ask again: Have we reached the goal of our vision of that fourth day of March, 1933? Have we found our happy valley?

I see a great nation, upon a great continent, blessed with a great wealth of natural resources. Its hundred and thirty million people are at peace among themselves; they are making their country a good neighbor among the nations. I see a United States which can demonstrate that, under democratic methods of government, national wealth can be translated into a spreading volume of human comforts hitherto unknown, and the lowest standard of living can be raised far above the level of mere subsistence.

But here is the challenge to our democracy: In this nation I see tens of millions of its citizens — a substantial part of its whole population — who at this very moment are denied the greater part of what the very lowest standards of today call the necessities of life.

I see millions of families trying to live on incomes so meager that the pall of family disaster hangs over them day by day.

I see millions whose daily lives in city and on farm continue under conditions labeled indecent by a so-called polite society half a century ago.

I see millions denied education, recreation, and the opportunity to better their lot and the lot of their children.

I see millions lacking the means to buy the products of farm and factory and by their poverty denying work and productiveness to many other millions.

I see one-third of a nation ill-housed, ill-clad, ill-nourished.

It is not in despair that I paint you that picture. I paint it for you in hope — because the Nation, seeing and understanding the injustice in it, proposes to paint it out. We are determined to make every American citizen the subject of his country's interest and concern; and we will never regard any faithful, law-abiding group within our borders as superfluous. The test of our progress is not whether we add more to the abundance of those who have much; it is whether we provide enough for those who have too little.

If I know aught of the spirit and purpose of our Nation, we will not listen to Comfort, Opportunism, and Timidity. We will carry on.

Overwhelmingly, we of the Republic are men and women of good will; men and women who have more than warm hearts of dedication; men and women who have cool heads and willing hands of practical purpose as well. They will insist that every agency of popular government use effective instruments to carry out their will.

Government is competent when all who compose it work as trustees for the whole people. It can make constant progress when it keeps abreast of all the facts. It can obtain justified support and legitimate criticism when the people receive true information of all that government does.

If I know aught of the will of our people, they will demand that these conditions of effective government shall be created and maintained. They will demand a nation uncorrupted by cancers of injustice and, therefore, strong among the nations in its example of the will to peace.

Today we reconsecrate our country to long-cherished ideals in a suddenly changed civilization. In every land there are always at work forces that drive men apart and forces that draw men together. In our personal ambitions we are individualists. But in our seeking for economic and political progress as a nation, we all go up, or else we all go down, as one people.

To maintain a democracy of effort requires a vast amount of patience in dealing 35 with differing methods, a vast amount of humility. But out of the confusion of many voices rises an understanding of dominant public need. Then political leadership can voice common ideals, and aid in their realization.

In taking again the oath of office as President of the United States, I assume the solemn obligation of leading the American people forward along the road over which they have chosen to advance.

While this duty rests upon me I shall do my utmost to speak their purpose and to do their will, seeking Divine guidance to help us each and every one to give light to them that sit in darkness and to guide our feet into the way of peace.

(1937)

Exploring the Text

1. Whom do you think President Franklin Delano Roosevelt speaks for in this address?
2. Do you consider this speech optimistic or pessimistic? Using support from the selection, explain your answer.
3. Do you think Roosevelt depends most on claims of fact, of value, or of policy? Try to find examples of each, and then consider why he might have depended on one type of claim over the others.
4. What contrasts does Roosevelt set up in this speech? What do you think their purpose is?
5. How does Roosevelt answer the question he asks in paragraph 21: "Have we found our happy valley?"
6. Roosevelt uses figurative language sparingly, but effectively, in this speech. Find examples and explain why he might have chosen to speak figuratively rather than literally at those moments.

John Steinbeck

John Steinbeck (1902–1968) was a Pulitzer and Nobel Prize–winning American writer and the author of twenty-seven books. Born and raised in California, Steinbeck briefly attended Stanford University but dropped out before graduating to pursue a freelance writing career in New York in 1925. When that failed, he returned to California, where he continued to write, and he finally found fame in 1935 with the publication of Tortilla Flat, a collection of humorous stories. With his later novels — Of Mice and Men (1937), The Grapes of Wrath (1939), and East of Eden (1952) — Steinbeck established a reputation for social criticism because his writing focused on the impoverished lives of rural laborers in California during the early to mid-1900s. He won the Pulitzer Prize for Fiction in 1940 for The Grapes of Wrath, and in 1962 he received the Nobel Prize for Literature.

The Chrysanthemums

"The Chrysanthemums" was published in the October 1937 edition of Harper's magazine.

The high grey-flannel fog of winter closed off the Salinas Valley from the sky and from all the rest of the world. On every side it sat like a lid on the mountains and made of the great valley a closed pot. On the broad, level land floor the gang plows bit deep and left the black earth shining like metal where the shares had cut. On the foothill ranches across the Salinas River, the yellow stubble fields seemed to be bathed in pale cold sunshine, but there was no sunshine in the valley now in December. The thick willow scrub along the river flamed with sharp and positive yellow leaves.

It was a time of quiet and of waiting. The air was cold and tender. A light wind blew up from the southwest so that the farmers were mildly hopeful of a good rain before long; but fog and rain do not go together.

Across the river, on Henry Allen's foothill ranch there was little work to be done, for the hay was cut and stored and the orchards were plowed up to receive the rain deeply when it should come. The cattle on the higher slopes were becoming shaggy and rough-coated.

Elisa Allen, working in her flower garden, looked down across the yard and saw Henry, her husband, talking to two men in business suits. The three of them stood by the tractor shed, each man with one foot on the side of the little Fordson. They smoked cigarettes and studied the machine as they talked.

Elisa watched them for a moment and then went back to her work. She was thirty- 5 five. Her face was lean and strong and her eyes were as clear as water. Her figure looked blocked and heavy in her gardening costume, a man's black hat pulled low down over her eyes, clod-hopper shoes, a figured print dress almost completely covered by a big corduroy apron with four big pockets to hold the snips, the trowel and scratcher, the seeds, and the knife she worked with. She wore heavy leather gloves to protect her hands while she worked.

She was cutting down the old year's chrysanthemum stalks with a pair of short and powerful scissors. She looked down toward the men by the tractor shed now and then. Her face was eager and mature and handsome; even her work with the scissors was overeager, overpowerful. The chrysanthemum stems seemed too small and easy for her energy.

She brushed a cloud of hair out of her eyes with the back of her glove, and left a smudge of earth on her cheek in doing it. Behind her stood the neat white farm house with red geraniums close-banked around it as high as the windows. It was a hard-swept looking little house with hard-polished windows, and a clean mud-mat on the front steps.

Elisa cast another glance toward the tractor shed. The strangers were getting into their Ford coupe. She took off a glove and put her strong fingers down into the forest of new green chrysanthemum sprouts that were growing around the old roots. She spread the leaves and looked down among the close-growing stems. No aphids were there, no sowbugs or snails or cutworms. Her terrier fingers destroyed such pests before they could get started.

Elisa started at the sound of her husband's voice. He had come near quietly, and he leaned over the wire fence that protected her flower garden from cattle and dogs and chickens.

"At it again," he said. "You've got a strong new crop coming."

Elisa straightened her back and pulled on the gardening glove again. "Yes. They'll be strong this coming year." In her tone and on her face there was a little smugness.

"You've got a gift with things," Henry observed. "Some of those yellow chrysanthemums you had this year were ten inches across. I wish you'd work out in the orchard and raise some apples that big."

Her eyes sharpened. "Maybe I could do it, too. I've a gift with things, all right. My mother had it. She could stick anything in the ground and make it grow. She said it was having planters' hands that knew how to do it."

"Well, it sure works with flowers," he said.

"Henry, who were those men you were talking to?"

"Why, sure, that's what I came to tell you. They were from the Western Meat Company. I sold thirty head of three-year-old steers. Got nearly my own price, too."

"Good," she said. "Good for you."

"And I thought," he continued, "I thought how it's Saturday afternoon, and we might go into Salinas for dinner at a restaurant, and then to a picture show — to celebrate, you see."

"Good," she repeated. "Oh, yes. That will be good."

Henry put on his joking tone. "There's fights tonight. How'd you like to go to the fights?"

"Oh, no," she said breathlessly. "No, I wouldn't like fights."

"Just fooling, Elisa. We'll go to a movie. Let's see. It's two now. I'm going to take Scotty and bring down those steers from the hill. It'll take us maybe two hours. We'll go in town about five and have dinner at the Cominos Hotel. Like that?"

"Of course I'll like it. It's good to eat away from home."

"All right, then. I'll go get up a couple of horses."

She said, "I'll have plenty of time to transplant some of these sets, I guess." 25

She heard her husband calling Scotty down by the barn. And a little later she saw the two men ride up the pale yellow hillside in search of the steers.

There was a little square sandy bed kept for rooting the chrysanthemums. With her trowel she turned the soil over and over, and smoothed it and patted it firm. Then she dug ten parallel trenches to receive the sets. Back at the chrysanthemum bed she pulled out the little crisp shoots, trimmed off the leaves at each one with her scissors, and laid it on a small orderly pile.

A squeak of wheels and plod of hoofs came from the road. Elisa looked up. The country road ran along the dense bank of willows and cottonwoods that bordered the river, and up this road came a curious vehicle, curiously drawn. It was an old spring-wagon, with a round canvas top on it like the corner of a prairie schooner. It was drawn by an old bay horse and a little grey-and-white burro. A big stubble-bearded man sat between the cover flaps and drove the crawling team. Underneath the wagon, between the hind wheels, a lean and rangy mongrel dog walked sedately. Words were painted on the canvas, in clumsy, crooked letters. "Pots, pans, knives, sisors, lawn mores, Fixed." Two rows of articles, and the triumphantly definitive "Fixed" below. The black paint had run down in little sharp points beneath each letter.

Elisa, squatting on the ground, watched to see the crazy, loose-jointed wagon pass by. But it didn't pass. It turned into the farm road in front of her house, crooked old wheels skirling and squeaking. The rangy dog darted from between the wheels and ran ahead. Instantly the two ranch shepherds flew out at him. Then all three stopped, and with stiff and quivering tails, with taut straight legs, with ambassadorial dignity, they slowly circled, sniffing daintily. The caravan pulled up to Elisa's wire fence and stopped. Now the newcomer dog, feeling outnumbered, lowered his tail and retired under the wagon with raised hackles and bared teeth.

The man on the seat called out, "That's a bad dog in a fight when he gets started." 30

Elisa laughed. "I see he is. How soon does he generally get started?"

The man caught up her laughter and echoed it heartily. "Sometimes not for weeks and weeks," he said. He climbed stiffly down, over the wheel. The horse and the donkey drooped like unwatered flowers.

Elisa saw that he was a very big man. Although his hair and beard were greying, he did not look old. His worn black suit was wrinkled and spotted with grease. The laughter had disappeared from his face and eyes the moment his laughing voice ceased. His eyes were dark, and they were full of the brooding that gets in the eyes of teamsters and of sailors. The calloused hands he rested on the wire fence were cracked, and every crack was a black line. He took off his battered hat.

"I'm off my general road, ma'am," he said. "Does this dirt road cut over across the river to the Los Angeles highway?"

Elisa stood up and shoved the thick scissors in her apron pocket. "Well, yes, it does, but it winds around and then fords the river. I don't think your team could pull through the sand."

He replied with some asperity, "It might surprise you what them beasts can pull through."

"When they get started?" she asked.

He smiled for a second. "Yes. When they get started."

"Well," said Elisa, "I think you'll save time if you go back to the Salinas road and pick up the highway there."

He drew a big finger down the chicken wire and made it sing. "I ain't in any hurry, ma'am. I go from Seattle to San Diego and back every year. Takes all my time. About six months each way. I aim to follow nice weather."

Elisa took off her gloves and stuffed them in the apron pocket with the scissors. She touched the under edge of her man's hat, searching for fugitive hairs. "That sounds like a nice kind of a way to live," she said.

He leaned confidentially over the fence. "Maybe you noticed the writing on my wagon. I mend pots and sharpen knives and scissors. You got any of them things to do?"

"Oh, no," she said, quickly. "Nothing like that." Her eyes hardened with resistance.

"Scissors is the worst thing," he explained. "Most people just ruin scissors trying to sharpen 'em, but I know how. I got a special tool. It's a little bobbit kind of thing, and patented. But it sure does the trick."

"No. My scissors are all sharp."

"All right, then. Take a pot," he continued earnestly, "a bent pot, or a pot with a hole. I can make it like new so you don't have to buy no new ones. That's a savings for you."

"No," she said shortly. "I tell you I have nothing like that for you to do."

His face fell to an exaggerated sadness. His voice took on a whining undertone. "I ain't had a thing to do today. Maybe I won't have no supper tonight. You see I'm off my regular road. I know folks on the highway clear from Seattle to San Diego. They save their things for me to sharpen up because they know I do it so good and save them money."

"I'm sorry," Elisa said irritably. "I haven't anything for you to do."

His eyes left her face and fell to searching the ground. They roamed about until they came to the chrysanthemum bed where she had been working. "What's them plants, ma'am?"

The irritation and resistance melted from Elisa's face. "Oh, those are chrysanthemums, giant whites and yellows. I raise them every year, bigger than anybody around here."

"Kind of a long-stemmed flower? Looks like a quick puff of colored smoke?" he asked.

"That's it. What a nice way to describe them."

"They smell kind of nasty till you get used to them," he said.

"It's a good bitter smell," she retorted, "not nasty at all." 55

He changed his tone quickly, "I like the smell myself."

"I had ten-inch blooms this year," she said.

The man leaned farther over the fence. "Look. I know a lady down the road a piece, has got the nicest garden you ever seen. Got nearly every kind of flower but no chrysanthemums. Last time I was mending a copper-bottom washtub for her (that's a hard job but I do it good), she said to me, 'If you ever run acrost some nice chrysanthemums I wish you'd try to get me a few seeds.' That's what she told me."

Elisa's eyes grew alert and eager. "She couldn't have known much about chrysanthemums. You can raise them from seed, but it's much easier to root the little sprouts you see there."

"Oh," he said. "I s'pose I can't take none to her, then." 60

"Why yes you can," Elisa cried. "I can put some in damp sand, and you can carry them right along with you. They'll take root in the pot if you keep them damp. And then she can transplant them."

"She'd sure like to have some, ma'am. You say they're nice ones?"

"Beautiful," she said. "Oh, beautiful." Her eyes shone. She tore off the battered hat and shook out her dark pretty hair. "I'll put them in a flower pot, and you can take them right with you. Come into the yard."

While the man came through the picket gate Elisa ran excitedly along the geranium-bordered path to the back of the house. And she returned carrying a big red flower pot. The gloves were forgotten now. She kneeled on the ground by the starting bed and dug up the sandy soil with her fingers and scooped it into the bright new flower pot. Then she picked up the little pile of shoots she had prepared. With her strong fingers she pressed them into the sand and tamped around them with her knuckles. The man stood over her. "I'll tell you what to do," she said. "You remember so you can tell the lady."

"Yes, I'll try to remember." 65

"Well, look. These will take root in about a month. Then she must set them out, about a foot apart in good rich earth like this, see?" She lifted a handful of dark soil for him to look at. "They'll grow fast and tall. Now remember this: In July tell her to cut them down, about eight inches from the ground."

"Before they bloom?" he asked.

"Yes, before they bloom." Her face was tight with eagerness. "They'll grow right up again. About the last of September the buds will start."

She stopped and seemed perplexed. "It's the budding that takes the most care," she said hesitantly. "I don't know how to tell you." She looked deep into his eyes, searchingly. Her mouth opened a little, and she seemed to be listening. "I'll try to tell you," she said. "Did you ever hear of planting hands?"

"Can't say I have, ma'am." 70

"Well, I can only tell you what it feels like. It's when you're picking off the buds you don't want. Everything goes right down into your fingertips. You watch your fingers work. They do it themselves. You can feel how it is. They pick and pick the buds. They never make a mistake. They're with the plant. Do you see? Your fingers and the plant. You can feel that, right up your arm. They know. They never make a mistake. You can feel it. When you're like that you can't do anything wrong. Do you see that? Can you understand that?"

She was kneeling on the ground looking up at him. Her breast swelled passionately.

The man's eyes narrowed. He looked away self-consciously. "Maybe I know," he said. "Sometimes in the night in the wagon there — "

Elisa's voice grew husky. She broke in on him, "I've never lived as you do, but I know what you mean. When the night is dark — why, the stars are sharp-pointed, and there's quiet. Why, you rise up and up! Every pointed star gets driven into your body. It's like that. Hot and sharp and — lovely."

Kneeling there, her hand went out toward his legs in the greasy black trousers. Her hesitant fingers almost touched the cloth. Then her hand dropped to the ground. She crouched low like a fawning dog.

He said, "It's nice, just like you say. Only when you don't have no dinner, it ain't."

She stood up then, very straight, and her face was ashamed. She held the flower pot out to him and placed it gently in his arms. "Here. Put it in your wagon, on the seat, where you can watch it. Maybe I can find something for you to do."

At the back of the house she dug in the can pile and found two old and battered aluminum saucepans. She carried them back and gave them to him. "Here, maybe you can fix these."

His manner changed. He became professional. "Good as new I can fix them." At the back of his wagon he set a little anvil, and out of an oily tool box dug a small machine hammer. Elisa came through the gate to watch him while he pounded out the dents in the kettles. His mouth grew sure and knowing. At a difficult part of the work he sucked his underlip.

"You sleep right in the wagon?" Elisa asked.

"Right in the wagon, ma'am. Rain or shine I'm dry as a cow in there."

"It must be nice," she said. "It must be very nice. I wish women could do such things."

"It ain't the right kind of a life for a woman."

Her upper lip raised a little, showing her teeth. "How do you know? How can you tell?" she said.

"I don't know, ma'am," he protested. "Of course I don't know. Now here's your kettles, done. You don't have to buy no new ones."

"How much?"

"Oh, fifty cents'll do. I keep my prices down and my work good. That's why I have all them satisfied customers up and down the highway."

Elisa brought him a fifty-cent piece from the house and dropped it in his hand. "You might be surprised to have a rival some time. I can sharpen scissors, too. And I can beat the dents out of little pots. I could show you what a woman might do."

He put his hammer back in the oily box and shoved the little anvil out of sight. "It would be a lonely life for a woman, ma'am, and a scary life, too, with animals creeping under the wagon all night." He climbed over the singletree, steadying himself with a hand on the burro's white rump. He settled himself in the seat, picked up the lines. "Thank you kindly, ma'am," he said. "I'll do like you told me; I'll go back and catch the Salinas road."

"Mind," she called, "if you're long in getting there, keep the sand damp." 90

"Sand, ma'am? . . . Sand? Oh, sure. You mean around the chrysanthemums. Sure I will." He clucked his tongue. The beasts leaned luxuriously into their collars. The mongrel dog took his place between the back wheels. The wagon turned and crawled out the entrance road and back the way it had come, along the river.

Elisa stood in front of her wire fence watching the slow progress of the caravan. Her shoulders were straight, her head thrown back, her eyes half-closed, so that the scene came vaguely into them. Her lips moved silently, forming the words "Good-bye — good-bye." Then she whispered, "That's a bright direction. There's a glowing there." The sound of her whisper startled her. She shook herself free and looked about to see whether anyone had been listening. Only the dogs had heard. They lifted their heads toward her from their sleeping in the dust, and then stretched out their chins and settled asleep again. Elisa turned and ran hurriedly into the house.

In the kitchen she reached behind the stove and felt the water tank. It was full of hot water from the noonday cooking. In the bathroom she tore off her soiled clothes and flung them into the corner. And then she scrubbed herself with a little block of pumice, legs and thighs, loins and chest and arms, until her skin was scratched and red. When she had dried herself she stood in front of a mirror in her bedroom and looked at her body. She tightened her stomach and threw out her chest. She turned and looked over her shoulder at her back.

After a while she began to dress, slowly. She put on her newest underclothing and her nicest stockings and the dress which was the symbol of her prettiness. She worked carefully on her hair, penciled her eyebrows and rouged her lips.

Before she was finished she heard the little thunder of hoofs and the shouts of 95
Henry and his helper as they drove the red steers into the corral. She heard the gate bang shut and set herself for Henry's arrival.

His step sounded on the porch. He entered the house calling, "Elisa, where are you?"

"In my room, dressing. I'm not ready. There's hot water for your bath. Hurry up. It's getting late."

When she heard him splashing in the tub, Elisa laid his dark suit on the bed, and shirt and socks and tie beside it. She stood his polished shoes on the floor beside the bed. Then she went to the porch and sat primly and stiffly down. She looked toward the river road where the willow-line was still yellow with frosted leaves so that under the high grey fog they seemed a thin band of sunshine. This was the only color in the grey afternoon. She sat unmoving for a long time. Her eyes blinked rarely.

Henry came banging out of the door, shoving his tie inside his vest as he came. Elisa stiffened and her face grew tight. Henry stopped short and looked at her. "Why — why, Elisa. You look so nice!"

"Nice? You think I look nice? What do you mean by 'nice'?"

Henry blundered on. "I don't know. I mean you look different, strong and happy."

"I am strong? Yes, strong. What do you mean 'strong'?"

He looked bewildered. "You're playing some kind of a game," he said helplessly. "It's a kind of a play. You look strong enough to break a calf over your knee, happy enough to eat it like a watermelon."

For a second she lost her rigidity. "Henry! Don't talk like that. You didn't know what you said." She grew complete again. "I'm strong," she boasted, "I never knew before how strong."

Henry looked down toward the tractor shed, and when he brought his eyes back to her, they were his own again. "I'll get out the car. You can put on your coat while I'm starting."

Elisa went into the house. She heard him drive to the gate and idle down his motor, and then she took a long time to put on her hat. She pulled it here and pressed it there. When Henry turned the motor off she slipped into her coat and went out.

The little roadster bounced along on the dirt road by the river, raising the birds and driving the rabbits into the brush. Two cranes flapped heavily over the willow-line and dropped into the river-bed.

Far ahead on the road Elisa saw a dark speck. She knew.

She tried not to look as they passed it, but her eyes would not obey. She whispered to herself sadly, "He might have thrown them off the road. That wouldn't have been much trouble, not very much. But he kept the pot," she explained. "He had to keep the pot. That's why he couldn't get them off the road."

The roadster turned a bend and she saw the caravan ahead. She swung full around toward her husband so she could not see the little covered wagon and the mismatched team as the car passed them.

In a moment it was over. The thing was done. She did not look back.

She said loudly, to be heard above the motor. "It will be good, tonight, a good dinner."

"Now you're changed again," Henry complained. He took one hand from the wheel and patted her knee. "I ought to take you in to dinner oftener. It would be good for both of us. We get so heavy out on the ranch."

"Henry," she asked, "could we have wine at dinner?"

"Sure we could. Say! That will be fine."

She was silent for a while; then she said, "Henry, at those prize fights, do the men hurt each other very much?"

"Sometimes a little, not often. Why?"

"Well, I've read how they break noses, and blood runs down their chests. I've read how the fighting gloves get heavy and soggy with blood."

He looked around at her. "What's the matter, Elisa? I didn't know you read things like that." He brought the car to a stop, then turned to the right over the Salinas River bridge.

"Do any women ever go to the fights?" she asked.

"Oh, sure, some. What's the matter Elisa? Do you want to go? I don't think you'd like it, but I'll take you if you really want to go."

She relaxed limply in the seat. "Oh, no. No. I don't want to go. I'm sure I don't." Her face was turned away from him. "It will be enough if we can have wine. It will be plenty." She turned up her coat collar so he could not see that she was crying weakly—like an old woman.

(1937)

Exploring the Text

1. Describe the relationship Elisa has with her husband. Explain why you came to the conclusion you did.
2. What do you think the chrysanthemums Elisa grows represent in the story? How do the different characters' reactions to them help develop those characters?
3. What do you think is the main conflict in this story? How does John Steinbeck set it up?
4. How does the backdrop of the natural world help Steinbeck develop the themes in this story? Consider especially what the setting means for each character and the interactions with each other.
5. In what ways does Elisa change when she is with the tinker? What do you think those changes represent?
6. Critics have considered this story an early example of a woman trying to gain equality in a man's world. Charles A. Sweet Jr., writing in 1974 in Modern Fiction Studies, says that Elisa is "the representative of the feminine ideal of equality and its inevitable defeat." Do you consider that a viable reading of the story? How might we read it differently in the twenty-first century? Or would we?

William Faulkner

William Faulkner (1897–1962) is considered one of the finest American writers of the twentieth century. Born in New Albany, Mississippi, Faulkner grew bored with education in his early teens, joining first the Canadian and then the British Royal Air Force during the First World War. While living in New Orleans, Faulkner wrote his first novel, Soldier's Pay (1926). Over the next three years, he published Mosquitoes (1927) and The Sound and the Fury (1929), which established his reputation. The following decade saw Faulkner at his most prolific. As I Lay Dying (1930), Sanctuary (1931), and Light in August (1932), together with collections of poems and short stories, preceded publication of Absalom, Absalom! in 1936. During spells in Hollywood, he also established himself as a masterful screenwriter. In 1949, he was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

W. H. Auden

Born in northern England to a doctor and a nurse, Wystan Hugh Auden (1907–1973) earned a scholarship to Oxford to study engineering. While there, he became interested in poetry — especially the modernist poetry of T. S. Eliot — and studied English instead. He was part of a group of poets known as the Oxford Group (and later, the Auden Generation), which included Stephen Spender and Louis MacNeice. During the 1930s, Auden traveled to Spain and China; became involved in political causes; and wrote prose, poetry, and plays. In 1939, Auden left England and became a U.S. citizen. Another Time (1940), the first book he wrote in America, contains some of his most famous poems, including "Musée des Beaux Arts." He won a Pulitzer Prize for The Age of Anxiety (1947) and a National Book Award for The Shield of Achilles (1955).

The Unknown Citizen

"The Unknown Citizen" was published in the New Yorker magazine in 1939, shortly after Auden moved from England to the United States.

(To JS/07 M 378
This Marble Monument
Is Erected by the State)

He was found by the Bureau of Statistics to be
One against whom there was no official complaint,
And all the reports on his conduct agree
That, in the modern sense of an old-fashioned word, he was a saint,
For in everything he did he served the Greater Community.
Except for the War till the day he retired,
He worked in a factory and never got fired,
But satisfied his employers, Fudge Motors Inc.
Yet he wasn't a scab or odd in his views.
For his Union reports that he paid his dues,
(Our report on his Union shows it was sound)
And our Social Psychology workers found
That he was popular with his mates and liked a drink.
The Press are convinced that he bought a paper every day
And that his reactions to advertisements were normal in every way.
Policies taken out in his name prove that he was fully insured,
And his Health-card shows he was once in a hospital but left it cured.
Both Producers Research and High-Grade Living declare
He was fully sensible to the advantages of the Instalment Plan

And had everything necessary to the Modern Man,
A phonograph, a radio, a car and a frigidaire.
Our researchers into Public Opinion are content
That he held the proper opinions for the time of year;
When there was peace, he was for peace: when there was war, he went.
He was married and added five children to the population,
Which our Eugenist says was the right number for a parent of his generation.
And our teachers report that he never interfered with their education.
Was he free? Was he happy? The question is absurd:
Had anything been wrong, we should certainly have heard.

(1939)

Exploring the Text

1. What does the title remind you of? How is it allusive? How is it a play on words? Explain whether or not it has personal meaning for you. What might it have meant in W. H. Auden's time?
2. What is the effect of the rhyme in "The Unknown Citizen"?
3. Note the list of possessions in line 21: "A phonograph, a radio, a car and a frigidaire." What would that list consist of if the poem were written today?
4. What do you think Auden means in line 27: "And our teachers report that he never interfered with their education"?
5. What argument does "The Unknown Citizen" make on the subject of citizenship? How does Auden support his claim?
6. This poem is considered satirical. What are the targets of the satire?

Richard Wright

Richard Nathaniel Wright (1908–1960) was an African American writer and poet who helped redefine ideas of racial relations in the United States during the early to mid-twentieth century. Born on a plantation near Natchez, Mississippi — to an illiterate sharecropper father and an educated schoolteacher mother — Wright went to school only through the ninth grade, yet he published his first short story in a local black newspaper at the age of sixteen. He moved to Chicago in 1927, and after the Great Depression left him jobless, he joined the Communist Party in 1932. He moved to New York City in 1937 to serve as an editor of the Communist newspaper Daily Worker, and in 1940 he published the novel Native Son, which brought him instant fame. His autobiography, Black Boy, a moving account of his experiences as an impoverished African American growing up in twentieth-century America, was published in 1945 to high acclaim.

The Man Who Was Almost a Man

"The Man Who Was Almost a Man" appeared originally as "Almos' a Man" in the January 1940 edition of Harper's Bazaar, a fashion magazine known for publishing new fiction. Wright revised and retitled the story; it was included in a posthumous collection of stories entitled Eight Men, published in 1961.

Dave struck out across the fields, looking homeward through paling light. Whut's the use talkin wid em niggers in the field? Anyhow, his mother was putting supper on the table. Them niggers can't understan nothing. One of these days he was going to get a gun and practice shooting, then they couldn't talk to him as though he were a little boy. He slowed, looking at the ground. Shucks, Ah ain scareda them even ef they are biggern me! Aw, Ah know whut Ahma do. Ahm going by ol Joe's sto n git that Sears Roebuck catlog n look at them guns. Mebbe Ma will lemme buy one when she gits mah pay from ol man Hawkins. Ahma beg her t gimme some money. Ahm ol ernough to hava gun. Ahm seventeen. Almost a man. He strode, feeling his long loose-jointed limbs. Shucks, a man oughta hava little gun aftah he done worked hard all day.

He came in sight of Joe's store. A yellow lantern glowed on the front porch. He mounted steps and went through the screen door, hearing it bang behind him. There was a strong smell of coal oil and mackerel fish. He felt very confident until he saw fat Joe walk in through the rear door, then his courage began to ooze.

"Howdy, Dave! Whutcha want?"

"How yuh, Mistah Joe? Aw, Ah don wanna buy nothing. Ah jus wanted t see ef yuhd lemme look at tha catlog erwhile."

"Sure! You wanna see it here?"

"Nawsuh. Ah wants t take it home wid me. Ah'll bring it back termorrow when Ah come in from the fiels."

"You plannin on buying something?"

"Yessuh."

"Your ma lettin you have your own money now?"

"Shucks. Mistah Joe, Ahm gittin t be a man like anybody else!"

Joe laughed and wiped his greasy white face with a red bandanna.

"Whut you plannin on buyin?"

Dave looked at the floor, scratched his head, scratched his thigh, and smiled. Then he looked up shyly.

"Ah'll tell yuh, Mistah Joe, ef yuh promise yuh won't tell."

"I promise."

"Waal, Ahma buy a gun."

"A gun? What you want with a gun?"

"Ah wanna keep it."

"You ain't nothing but a boy. You don't need a gun."

"Aw, lemme have the catlog, Mistah Joe. Ah'll bring it back."

Joe walked through the rear door. Dave was elated. He looked around at barrels of sugar and flour. He heard Joe coming back. He craned his neck to see if he were bringing the book. Yeah, he's got it. Gawddog, he's got it!

"Here, but be sure you bring it back. It's the only one I got."

"Sho, Mistah Joe."

"Say, if you wanna buy a gun, why don't you buy one from me? I gotta gun to sell."

"Will it shoot?"

"Sure it'll shoot."

"Whut kind is it?"

"Oh, it's kinda old . . . a left-hand Wheeler. A pistol. A big one."

"Is it got bullets in it?"

"It's loaded."

"Kin Ah see it?"

"Where's your money?"

"What yuh wan fer it?"

"I'll let you have it for two dollars."

"Just two dollahs? Shucks, Ah could buy tha when Ah git mah pay."

"I'll have it here when you want it."

"Awright, suh. Ah be in fer it."

He went through the door, hearing it slam again behind him. Ahma git some money from Ma n buy me a gun! Only two dollahs! He tucked the thick catalogue under his arm and hurried.

"Where yuh been, boy?" His mother held a steaming dish of black-eyed peas.

"Aw, Ma, Ah jus stopped down the road t talk wid the boys."

"Yuh know bettah t keep suppah waitin."

He sat down, resting the catalogue on the edge of the table.

"Yuh git up from there and git to the well n wash yosef! Ah ain feedin no hogs in mah house!"

She grabbed his shoulder and pushed him. He stumbled out of the room, then came back to get the catalogue.

"Whut this?"

"Aw, Ma, it's jusa catlog."

"Who yuh git it from?"

"From Joe, down at the sto."

"Waal, thas good. We kin use it in the outhouse."

"Naw, Ma." He grabbed for it. "Gimme ma catlog, Ma."

She held onto it and glared at him.

"Quit hollerin at me! Whut's wrong wid yuh? Yuh crazy?"

"But Ma, please. It ain mine! It's Joe's! He tol me t bring it back t im termorrow."

She gave up the book. He stumbled down the back steps, hugging the thick book under his arm. When he had splashed water on his face and hands, he groped back to the kitchen and fumbled in a corner for the towel. He bumped into a chair; it clattered to the floor. The catalogue sprawled at his feet. When he had dried his eyes he snatched up the book and held it again under his arm. His mother stood watching him.

"Now, ef yuh gonna act a fool over that ol book, Ah'll take it n burn it up." 55

"Naw, Ma, please."

"Waal, set down n be still!"

He sat down and drew the oil lamp close. He thumbed page after page, unaware of the food his mother set on the table. His father came in. Then his small brother.

"Whutcha got there, Dave?" his father asked.

"Jusa catlog," he answered, not looking up. 60

"Yeah, here they is!" His eyes glowed at blue-and-black revolvers. He glanced up, feeling sudden guilt. His father was watching him. He eased the book under the table and rested it on his knees. After the blessing was asked, he ate. He scooped up peas and swallowed fat meat without chewing. Buttermilk helped to wash it down. He did not want to mention money before his father. He would do much better by cornering his mother when she was alone. He looked at his father uneasily out of the edge of his eye.

"Boy, how come yuh don quit foolin wid tha book n eat yo suppah?"

"Yessuh."

"How you n ol man Hawkins gitten erlong?"

"Suh?" 65

"Can't yuh hear? Why don yuh lissen? Ah ast yu how wuz yuh n ol man Hawkins gittin erlong?"

"Oh, swell, Pa. Ah plows mo lan than anybody over there."

"Waal, yuh oughta keep you mind on whut yuh doin."

"Yessuh."

He poured his plate full of molasses and sopped it up slowly with a chunk of 70 cornbread. When his father and brother had left the kitchen, he still sat and looked again at the guns in the catalogue, longing to muster courage enough to present his case to his mother. Lawd, ef Ah only had tha pretty one! He could almost feel the slickness of the weapon with his fingers. If he had a gun like that he would polish it and keep it shining so it would never rust. N Ah'd keep it loaded, by Gawd!

"Ma?" His voice was hesitant.

"Hunh?"

"Ol man Hawkins give yuh mah money yit?"

"Yeah, but ain no usa yuh thinking bout throwin nona it erway. Ahm keeping tha money sos yuh kin have cloes t go to school this winter."

He rose and went to her side with the open catalogue in his palms. She was wash- 75 ing dishes, her head bent low over a pan. Shyly he raised the book. When he spoke, his voice was husky, faint.

"Ma, Gawd knows Ah wans one of these."

"One of whut?" she asked, not raising her eyes.

"One of these," he said again, not daring even to point. She glanced up at the page, then at him with wide eyes.

"Nigger, is yuh gone plumb crazy?"

"Aw, Ma — " 80

"Git outta here! Don yuh talk t me bout no gun! Yuh a fool!"

"Ma, Ah kin buy one fer two dollahs."

"Not ef Ah knows it, yuh ain!"

"But yuh promised me one — "

"Ah don care what Ah promised! Yuh ain nothing but a boy yit!"

"Ma, ef yuh lemme buy one Ah'll never ast yuh fer nothing no mo."

"Ah tol yuh t git outta here! Yuh ain gonna toucha penny of tha money fer no gun! Thas how come Ah has Mistah Hawkins t pay yo wages t me, cause Ah knows yuh ain got no sense."

"But, Ma, we needa gun. Pa ain got no gun. We needa gun in the house. Yuh kin never tell whut might happen."

"Now don yuh try to maka fool outta me, boy! Ef we did hava gun, yuh wouldn't have it!"

He laid the catalogue down and slipped his arm around her waist.

"Aw, Ma, Ah done worked hard alla summer n ain ast yuh fer nothing, is Ah, now?"

"Thas whut yuh spose t do!"

"But Ma, Ah wans a gun. Yuh kin lemme have two dollahs outta mah money. Please, Ma. I kin give it to Pa. . . . Please, Ma! Ah loves yuh, Ma."

When she spoke her voice came soft and low.

"What yu wan wida gun, Dave? Yuh don need no gun. Yuh'll git in trouble. N ef yo pa jus thought Ah let yuh have money t buy a gun he'd hava fit."

"Ah'll hide it, Ma. It ain but two dollahs."

"Lawd, chil, whut's wrong wid yuh?"

"Ain nothin wrong, Ma. Ahm almos a man now. Ah wans a gun."

"Who gonna sell yuh a gun?"

"Ol Joe at the sto."

"N it don cos but two dollahs?"

"Thas all, Ma. Jus two dollahs. Please, Ma."

She was stacking the plates away; her hands moved slowly, reflectively. Dave kept an anxious silence. Finally, she turned to him.

"Ah'll let yuh git tha gun ef yuh promise me one thing."

"What's tha, Ma?"

"Yuh bring it straight back t me, yuh hear? It be fer Pa."

"Yessum! Lemme go now, Ma."

She stooped, turned slightly to one side, raised the hem of her dress, rolled down the top of her stocking, and came up with a slender wad of bills.

"Here," she said. "Lawd knows yuh don need no gun. But yer pa does. Yuh bring it right back t me, yuh hear? Ahma put it up. Now ef yuh don, Ahma have yuh pa lick yuh so hard yuh won fergit it."

"Yessum."

He took the money, ran down the steps, and across the yard.

"Dave! Yuuuuuh Daaaaave!"

He heard, but he was not going to stop now. "Now, Lawd!"

The first movement he made the following morning was to reach under his pillow for the gun. In the gray light of dawn he held it loosely, feeling a sense of power. Could kill a man with a gun like this. Kill anybody, black or white. And if he were holding his gun in his hand, nobody could run over him; they would have to respect him. It was a big gun, with a long barrel and a heavy handle. He raised and lowered it in his hand, marveling at its weight.

He had not come straight home with it as his mother had asked; instead he had stayed out in the fields, holding the weapon in his hand, aiming it now and then at some imaginary foe. But he had not fired it; he had been afraid that his father might hear. Also he was not sure he knew how to fire it.

To avoid surrendering the pistol he had not come into the house until he knew that they were all asleep. When his mother had tiptoed to his bedside late that night and demanded the gun, he had first played possum; then he had told her that the gun was hidden outdoors, that he would bring it to her in the morning. Now he lay turning it slowly in his hands. He broke it, took out the cartridges, felt them, and then put them back.

He slid out of bed, got a long strip of old flannel from a trunk, wrapped the gun in it, and tied it to his naked thigh while it was still loaded. He did not go in to breakfast. Even though it was not yet daylight, he started for Jim Hawkins' plantation. Just as the sun was rising he reached the barns where the mules and plows were kept.

"Hey! That you, Dave?"

He turned. Jim Hawkins stood eying him suspiciously.

"What're yuh doing here so early?"

"Ah didn't know Ah wuz gittin up so early, Mistah Hawkins. Ah was fixin t hitch up ol Jenny n take her t the fiels."

"Good. Since you're so early, how about plowing that stretch down by the woods?"

"Suits me, Mistah Hawkins."

"O.K. Go to it!"

He hitched Jenny to a plow and started across the fields. Hot dog! This was just what he wanted. If he could get down by the woods, he could shoot his gun and nobody would hear. He walked behind the plow, hearing the traces creaking, feeling the gun tied tight to his thigh.

When he reached the woods, he plowed two whole rows before he decided to take out the gun. Finally, he stopped, looked in all directions, then untied the gun and held it in his hand. He turned to the mule and smiled.

"Know whut this is, Jenny? Naw, yuh wouldn know! Yuhs jusa ol mule! Anyhow, this is a gun, n it kin shoot, by Gawd!"

He held the gun at arm's length. Whut t hell, Ahma shoot this thing! He looked at Jenny again.

"Lissen here, Jenny! When Ah pull this ol trigger, Ah don wan yuh t run n acka fool now!"

Jenny stood with head down, her short ears pricked straight. Dave walked off about twenty feet, held the gun far out from him at arm's length, and turned his head. Hell, he told himself, Ah ain afraid. The gun felt loose in his fingers; he waved it wildly for a moment. Then he shut his eyes and tightened his forefinger. Bloom! A report half deafened him and he thought his right hand was torn from his arm. He heard Jenny whinnying and galloping over the field, and he found himself on his knees, squeezing his fingers hard between his legs. His hand was numb; he jammed it into his mouth, trying to warm it, trying to stop the pain. The gun lay at his feet. He did not quite know what had happened. He stood up and stared at the gun as though it were a living thing. He gritted his teeth and kicked the gun. Yuh almos broke mah arm! He turned to look for Jenny; she was far over the fields, tossing her head and kicking wildly.

"Hol on there, ol mule!"

When he caught up with her she stood trembling, walling her big white eyes at him. The plow was far away; the traces had broken. Then Dave stopped short, looking, not believing. Jenny was bleeding. Her left side was red and wet with blood. He went closer. Lawd, have mercy! Wondah did Ah shoot this mule? He grabbed for Jenny's mane. She flinched, snorted, whirled, tossing her head.

"Hol on now! Hol on."

Then he saw the hole in Jenny's side, right between the ribs. It was round, wet, red. A crimson stream streaked down the front leg, flowing fast. Good Gawd! Ah wuzn't shootin at tha mule. He felt panic. He knew he had to stop that blood, or Jenny would bleed to death. He had never seen so much blood in all his life. He chased the mule for half a mile, trying to catch her. Finally she stopped, breathing hard, stumpy tail half arched. He caught her mane and led her back to where the plow and gun lay. Then he stopped and grabbed handfuls of damp black earth and tried to plug the bullet hole. Jenny shuddered, whinnied, and broke from him.

"Hol on! Hol on now!"

He tried to plug it again, but blood came anyhow. His fingers were hot and sticky. He rubbed dirt into his palms, trying to dry them. Then again he attempted to plug the bullet hole, but Jenny shied away, kicking her heels high. He stood helpless. He had to do something. He ran at Jenny; she dodged him. He watched a red stream of blood flow down Jenny's leg and form a bright pool at her feet.

"Jenny . . . Jenny," he called weakly.

His lips trembled. She's bleeding t death! He looked in the direction of home, wanting to go back, wanting to get help. But he saw the pistol lying in the damp black clay. He had a queer feeling that if he only did something, this would not be; Jenny would not be there bleeding to death.

When he went to her this time, she did not move. She stood with sleepy, dreamy eyes; and when he touched her she gave a low-pitched whinny and knelt to the ground, her front knees slopping in blood.

"Jenny . . . Jenny . . ." he whispered.

For a long time she held her neck erect; then her head sank, slowly. Her ribs swelled with a mighty heave and she went over.

Dave's stomach felt empty, very empty. He picked up the gun and held it gingerly between his thumb and forefinger. He buried it at the foot of a tree. He took a stick to cover the pool of blood with dirt — but what was the use? There was Jenny lying with her mouth open and her eyes walled and glassy. He could not tell Jim Hawkins he had shot his mule. But he had to tell something. Yeah, Ah'll tell em Jenny started gittin wil n fell on the joint of the plow. . . . But that would hardly happen to a mule. He walked across the field slowly, head down.

It was sunset. Two of Jim Hawkins' men were over near the edge of the woods digging a hole in which to bury Jenny. Dave was surrounded by a knot of people, all of whom were looking down at the dead mule.

"I don't see how in the world it happened," said Jim Hawkins for the tenth time.

The crowd parted and Dave's mother, father, and small brother pushed into the center.

"Where Dave?" his mother called.

"There he is," said Jim Hawkins.

His mother grabbed him.

"Whut happened, Dave? Whut yuh done?"

"Nothin."

"C mon, boy, talk," his father said.

Dave took a deep breath and told the story he knew nobody believed.

"Waal," he drawled. "Ah brung ol Jenny down here sos Ah could do mah plowin. Ah plowed bout two rows, just like yuh see." He stopped and pointed at the long rows of upturned earth. "Then somethin musta been wrong wid ol Jenny. She wouldn ack right a-tall. She started snortin n kickin her heels. Ah tried t hol her, but she pulled erway, rearin n goin in. Then when the point of the plow was stickin up in the air, she swung erroun n twisted herself back on it. . . . She stuck herself n started t bleed. N fo Ah could do anything, she wuz dead."

"Did you ever hear of anything like that in all your life?" asked Jim Hawkins.

There were white and black standing in the crowd. They murmured. Dave's mother came close to him and looked hard into his face. "Tell the truth, Dave," she said.

"Looks like a bullet hole to me," said one man.

"Dave, whut yuh do wid the gun?" his mother asked.

The crowd surged in, looking at him. He jammed his hands into his pockets, shook his head slowly from left to right, and backed away. His eyes were wide and painful.

"Did he hava gun?" asked Jim Hawkins.

"By Gawd, Ah tol yuh tha wuz a gun wound," said a man, slapping his thigh.

His father caught his shoulders and shook him till his teeth rattled.

"Tell whut happened, yuh rascal! Tell whut. . . ."

Dave looked at Jenny's stiff legs and began to cry.

"Whut yuh do wid tha gun?" his mother asked.

"What wuz he doin wida gun?" his father asked.

"Come on and tell the truth," said Hawkins. "Ain't nobody going to hurt you. . . ."

His mother crowded close to him.

"Did yuh shoot tha mule, Dave?"

Dave cried, seeing blurred white and black faces.

"Ahh ddinn gggo tt sshooot hher. . . . Ah ssswear ffo Gawd Ahh ddin. . . . Ah wuz a-tryin t sssee ef the old gggun would sshoot — "

"Where yuh git the gun from?" his father asked.

"Ah got it from Joe, at the sto."

"Where yuh git the money?"

"Ma give it t me."

"He kept worryin me, Bob. Ah had t. Ah tol im t bring the gun right back t me. . . . It was fer yuh, the gun."

"But how yuh happen to shoot that mule?" asked Jim Hawkins.

"Ah wuzn shootin at the mule, Mistah Hawkins. The gun jumped when Ah pulled the trigger. . . . N fo Ah knowed anythin Jenny was there a-bleedin."

Somebody in the crowd laughed. Jim Hawkins walked close to Dave and looked into his face.

"Well, looks like you have bought you a mule, Dave."

"Ah swear fo Gawd, Ah didn go t kill the mule, Mistah Hawkins!"

"But you killed her!"

All the crowd was laughing now. They stood on tiptoe and poked heads over one another's shoulders.

"Well, boy, looks like yuh done bought a dead mule! Hahaha!"

"Ain tha ershame."

"Hohohohoho."

Dave stood, head down, twisting his feet in the dirt.

"Well, you needn't worry about it, Bob," said Jim Hawkins to Dave's father. "Just let the boy keep on working and pay me two dollars a month."

"Whut yuh wan fer yo mule, Mistah Hawkins?"

Jim Hawkins screwed up his eyes.

"Fifty dollars."

"Whut yuh do wid tha gun?" Dave's father demanded.

Dave said nothing.

"Yuh wan me t take a tree n beat yuh till yuh talk!"

"Nawsuh!"

"Whut yuh do wid it?"

"Ah throwed it erway."

"Where?"

"Ah . . . Ah throwed it in the creek."

"Waal, c mon home. N firs thing in the mawnin git to tha creek n fin tha gun."

"Yessuh."

"Whut yuh pay fer it?"

"Two dollahs."

"Take tha gun n git yo money back n carry it to Mistah Hawkins, yuh hear? N don fergit Ahma lam you black bottom good fer this! Now march yosef on home, suh!"

Dave turned and walked slowly. He heard people laughing. Dave glared, his eyes welling with tears. Hot anger bubbled in him. Then he swallowed and stumbled on.

That night Dave did not sleep. He was glad that he had gotten out of killing the mule so easily, but he was hurt. Something hot seemed to turn over inside him each time he remembered how they had laughed. He tossed on his bed, feeling his hard pillow. N Pa says he's gonna beat me. . . . He remembered other beatings, and his back quivered. Naw, naw, Ah sho don wan im t beat me tha way no mo. Dam em all! Nobody ever gave him anything. All he did was work. They treat me like a mule, n then they beat me. He gritted his teeth. N Ma had t tell on me.

Well, if he had to, he would take old man Hawkins that two dollars. But that meant selling the gun. And he wanted to keep that gun. Fifty dollars for a dead mule.

He turned over, thinking how he had fired the gun. He had an itch to fire it again. Ef other men kin shoota gun, by Gawd, Ah kin! He was still, listening. Mebbe they all sleepin now. The house was still. He heard the soft breathing of his brother. Yes, now! He would go down and get that gun and see if he could fire it! He eased out of bed and slipped into overalls.

The moon was bright. He ran almost all the way to the edge of the woods. He stumbled over the ground, looking for the spot where he had buried the gun. Yeah, here it is. Like a hungry dog scratching for a bone, he pawed it up. He puffed his black cheeks and blew dirt from the trigger and barrel. He broke it and found four cartridges unshot. He looked around; the fields were filled with silence and moonlight. He clutched the gun stiff and hard in his fingers. But, as soon as he wanted to pull the trigger, he shut his eyes and turned his head. Naw, Ah can't shoot wid mah eyes closed n mah head turned. With effort he held his eyes open; then he squeezed. Blooooom! He was stiff, not breathing. The gun was still in his hands. Dammit, he'd done it! He fired again. Blooooom! He smiled. Bloooom! Blooooom! Click, click. There! It was empty. If anybody could shoot a gun, he could. He put the gun into his hip pocket and started across the fields.

When he reached the top of a ridge he stood straight and proud in the moonlight, looking at Jim Hawkins' big white house, feeling the gun sagging in his pocket. Lawd, ef Ah had just one mo bullet Ah'd taka shot at tha house. Ah'd like t scare ol man Hawkins jusa little. . . . Jusa enough t let im know Dave Saunders is a man.

To his left the road curved, running to the tracks of the Illinois Central. He jerked 210 his head, listening. From far off came a faint hoooof-hoooof; hoooof-hoooof. . . . He stood rigid. Two dollahs a mont. Les see now. . . . Tha means it'll take bout two years. Shucks! Ah'll be dam!

He started down the road, toward the tracks. Yeah, here she comes! He stood beside the track and held himself stiffly. Here she comes, erroun the ben. . . . C mon, yuh slow poke! C mon! He had his hand on his gun; something quivered in his stomach. Then the train thundered past, the gray and brown box cars rumbling and clinking. He gripped the gun tightly; then he jerked his hand out of his pocket. Ah betcha Bill wouldn't do it! Ah betcha. . . . The cars slid past, steel grinding upon steel. Ahm ridin yuh ternight, so hep me Gawd! He was hot all over. He hesitated just a moment; then he grabbed, pulled atop of a car, and lay flat. He felt his pocket; the gun was still there. Ahead the long rails were glinting in the moonlight, stretching away, away to somewhere, somewhere where he could be a man. . . .

(1940, 1961)

Exploring the Text

1. What do you think Richard Wright's purpose is in this story?
2. What is the point of view in "The Man Who Was Almost a Man"? How does it help Wright achieve his purpose?
3. Why do you think Wright chose to use dialect for Dave's inner monologue and for the story's dialogue? What are some of the effects of that choice?
4. The gun has, of course, a literal meaning in "The Man Who Was Almost a Man," but it also carries symbolic weight. What are some of the gun's symbolic meanings?
5. Look carefully at the paragraphs in which Dave is trying to get his mother to give him money to buy the gun (pars. 76–113). What qualities does he use to convince her? How does that scene develop or extend his characterization?
6. What is the effect on Dave when, near the end of the story, he fires the gun successfully?
7. What does it mean to Dave to be a man? What does it mean to you? Are there similarities?
8. Did you find this story funny? Explain your answer.

Randall Jarrell

Randall Jarrell (1914–1965) was born in Nashville, Tennessee. He earned his BA and MA at Vanderbilt University and taught at Kenyon College. In 1939, he went to teach at the University of Texas. He enlisted in the Army Air Corps in 1942 and served in World War II. He trained as a flying cadet but did not qualify as a pilot; instead, he worked as a celestial navigation tower operator and trainer, spending most of the war in Tucson, Arizona. After the war, he taught at Sarah Lawrence College and the University of North Carolina at Greensboro. Jarrell's fame and influence as a deft and acerbic literary critic is as great as his reputation as a poet.

The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner

"The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner" is from Jarrell's first book, Little Friend, Little Friend (1945). It was inspired by his service in the war and is perhaps his most famous poem. Jarrell provided this explanatory note:

> A ball turret was a Plexiglass sphere set into the belly of a B-17 or B-24, and inhabited by two .50 caliber machine guns and one man, a short small man. When this gunner tracked with his machine guns a fighter attacking his bomber from below, he revolved with the turret; hunched upside down in his little sphere. The fighters which attacked him were armed with cannon firing explosive shells. The hose was a steam hose.

From my mother's sleep I fell into the State
And I hunched in its belly till my wet fur froze.
Six miles from earth, loosed from its dream of life,
I woke to black flak and the nightmare fighters.
When I died they washed me out of the turret with a hose.

(1945)

Exploring the Text

1. Who is the speaker in this poem? Describe him as well as you can.
2. Trace the verbs in the "The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner." What kind of pattern do you see? Who is creating the action in each verb? How is the pattern related to the meaning of the poem?
3. What associations do you make with the word "State" (l. 1)?
4. How do the sounds of the words "black flak" (l. 4) function as onomatopoeia — the use of a word that refers to a sound and whose pronunciation mimics that sound? What is their effect?
5. What argument does Randall Jarrell make in "The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner"? How does he support his claim?

Harry S Truman

Harry S Truman (1884–1972) was the thirty-third president of the United States, serving from 1945 to 1953, a span that included the final years of World War II, the Korean War, and the beginnings of the Cold War. The last president to not hold a college degree, Truman worked as a farmer and a clerk before enlisting in the army to fight in World War I. He rose to the rank of captain, and his remarkable record and leadership skills allowed him to transition into politics upon his return home. Truman served as the U.S. senator from Missouri from 1935 to 1945 and as vice president from January 1945 to April 1945, when President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's death while in office made Truman president.

Statement by the President of the United States

While the conflict in the European theater of operations during World War II had ended with Germany's surrender on May 8, 1945, the war in the Pacific continued. Japan stood strong, ignoring Allied demands for an unconditional surrender made later that summer at the Potsdam Conference. With an invasion of mainland Japan destined to be bloody and drawn out, Truman decided on another strategy. On August 6, 1945, the American bomber Enola Gay dropped an atomic bomb, code-named "Little Boy," on the port city of Hiroshima. Nine days later, another atomic bomb would be dropped on Nagasaki. In this speech, Truman announces the bombing of Hiroshima to the nation and to the world.

THE WHITE HOUSE
Washington, D. C.

IMMEDIATE RELEASE

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Sixteen hours ago an American airplane dropped one bomb on [Hiroshima] and destroyed its usefulness to the enemy. That bomb had more power than 20,000 tons of T.N.T. It had more than two thousand times the blast power of the British "Grand Slam" which is the largest bomb ever yet used in the history of warfare.

The Japanese began the war from the air at Pearl Harbor. They have been repaid many fold. And the end is not yet. With this bomb we have now added a new and revolutionary increase in destruction to supplement the growing power of our armed forces. In their present form these bombs are now in production and even more powerful forms are in development.

It is an atomic bomb. It is a harnessing of the basic power of the universe. The force from which the sun draws its power has been loosed against those who brought war to the Far East.

Before 1939, it was the accepted belief of scientists that it was theoretically possible to release atomic energy. But no one knew any practical method of doing it. By 1942, however, we knew that the Germans were working feverishly to find a way to add atomic energy to the other engines of war with which they hoped to enslave the world. But they failed. We may be grateful to Providence that the Germans got the V-1's and V-2's late and in limited quantities and even more grateful that they did not get the atomic bomb at all.

The battle of the laboratories held fateful risks for us as well as the battles of the air, land and sea, and we have now won the battle of the laboratories as we have won the other battles.

Beginning in 1940, before Pearl Harbor, scientific knowledge useful in war was pooled between the United States and Great Britain, and many priceless helps to our victories have come from that arrangement. Under that general policy the research on the atomic bomb was begun. With American and British scientists working together we entered the race of discovery against the Germans.

The United States had available the large number of scientists of distinction in the many needed areas of knowledge. It had the tremendous industrial and financial resources necessary for the project and they could be devoted to it without undue impairment of other vital war work. In the United States the laboratory work and the production plants, on which a substantial start had already been made, would be out of reach of enemy bombing, while at that time Britain was exposed to constant air attack and was still threatened with the possibility of invasion. For these reasons Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt agreed that it was wise to carry on the project here. We now have two great plants and many lesser works devoted to the production of atomic power. Employment during peak construction numbered 125,000 and over 65,000 individuals are even now engaged in operating the plants. Many have worked there for two and a half years. Few know what they have been producing. They see great quantities of material going in and they see nothing coming out of these plants, for the physical size of the explosive charge is exceedingly small. We have spent two billion dollars on the greatest scientific gamble in history — and won.

But the greatest marvel is not the size of the enterprise, its secrecy, nor its cost, but the achievement of scientific brains in putting together infinitely complex pieces of knowledge held by many men in different fields of science into a workable plan. And hardly less marvellous has been the capacity of industry to design, and of labor to operate, the machines and methods to do things never done before so that the brainchild of many minds came forth in physical shape and performed as it was supposed to do. Both science and industry worked under the direction of the United States Army, which achieved a unique success in managing so diverse a problem in the advancement of knowledge in an amazingly short time. It is doubtful if such another combination could be got together in the world. What has been done is the greatest achievement of organized science in history. It was done under high pressure and without failure.

We are now prepared to obliterate more rapidly and completely every productive enterprise the Japanese have above ground in any city. We shall destroy their docks, their factories, and their communications. Let there be no mistake; we shall completely destroy Japan's power to make war.

It was to spare the Japanese people from utter destruction that the ultimatum of July 26 was issued at Potsdam. Their leaders promptly rejected that ultimatum. If they do not now accept our terms they may expect a rain of ruin from the air, the like of which has never been seen on this earth. Behind this air attack will follow sea and land forces in such numbers and power as they have not yet seen and with the fighting skill of which they are already well aware.

The Secretary of War, who has kept in personal touch with all phases of the project, will immediately make public a statement giving further details.

His statement will give facts concerning the sites at Oak Ridge near Knoxville, Tennessee, and at Richland near Pasco, Washington, and an installation near Santa Fe, New Mexico. Although the workers at the sites have been making materials to be used in producing the greatest destructive force in history they have not themselves been in danger beyond that of many other occupations, for the utmost care has been taken of their safety.

The fact that we can release atomic energy ushers in a new era in man's understanding of nature's forces. Atomic energy may in the future supplement the power that now comes from coal, oil, and falling water, but at present it cannot be produced on a basis to compete with them commercially. Before that comes there must be a long period of intensive research.

It has never been the habit of the scientists of this country or the policy of this Government to withhold from the world scientific knowledge. Normally, therefore, everything about the work with atomic energy would be made public.

But under present circumstances it is not intended to divulge the technical processes of production or all the military applications, pending further examination of possible methods of protecting us and the rest of the world from the danger of sudden destruction. 15

I shall recommend that the Congress of the United States consider promptly the establishment of an appropriate commission to control the production and use of atomic power within the United States. I shall give further consideration and make further recommendations to the Congress as to how atomic power can become a powerful and forceful influence towards the maintenance of world peace.

(1945)

Exploring the Text

1. There were several different audiences for this speech. Identify them and explain how Harry S Truman appeals to each of them in different sections of the speech.
2. How would you describe the style of Truman's statement?
3. Truman's speech focuses on several different subjects. Trace the path of his focus and analyze why you think he might have chosen the order he used.
4. What type of sentence dominates Truman's statement? What is its effect?
5. Look carefully at the adjectives Truman uses. What do they have in common? Why might they have been chosen?
6. Do you think the speech inspires confidence? How might a speech on a similar topic be different today? Or would it?
7. There has always been tremendous debate about the use of the atomic bomb to bring World War II to an end, but Truman defended it and claimed to have no regrets about the decision, for which he took full responsibility. What qualities in this statement show his resolve? Do you sense any second-guessing or defensiveness? Explain your answer.

TALKBACK

Jonathan Schell

Jonathan Schell (b. 1943) is an author, educator, and activist known primarily for advocating against the proliferation of nuclear weapons. He was a staff writer for the New Yorker for twenty years and has written for both Newsweek and the Nation. His most famous book is The Fate of the Earth (1982).

from The Fate of the Earth

The election of Ronald Reagan in 1980 brought with it a significant shift in foreign policy toward the Soviet Union, including an end to détente, or the thaw in Cold War tensions, which had been brokered by President Richard Nixon in 1971, and a tough new stance focused on bringing down what Reagan would later call the "Evil Empire." As a result, the threat of nuclear war in the early 1980s was as imminent as it had been at any time since the Cuban missile crisis of 1962. In 1982, Schell wrote a series of three essays for the New Yorker magazine entitled "The Fate of the Earth." These essays were later collected in a book of the same name, which was nominated for the Pulitzer Prize, the National Book Award, and the National Book Critics Circle Award. The selection that appears here is from the end of the first essay, subtitled "A Republic of Insects and Grass."

To say that human extinction is a certainty would, of course, be a misrepresentation — just as it would be a misrepresentation to say that extinction can be ruled out. To begin with, we know that a holocaust may not occur at all. If one does occur, the adversaries may not use all their weapons. If they do use all their weapons, the global effects, in the ozone and elsewhere, may be moderate. And if the effects are not moderate but extreme, the ecosphere may prove resilient enough to withstand them without breaking down catastrophically. These are all substantial reasons for supposing that mankind will not be extinguished in a nuclear holocaust, or even that extinction in a holocaust is unlikely, and they tend to calm our fear and to reduce our sense of urgency. Yet at the same time we are compelled to admit that there may be a holocaust, that the adversaries may use all their weapons, that the global effects, including effects of which we are as yet unaware, may be severe, that the ecosphere may suffer catastrophic breakdown, and that our species may be extinguished. We are left with uncertainty, and are forced to make our decisions in a state of uncertainty. If we wish to act to save our species, we have to muster our resolve in spite of our awareness that the life of the species may not now in fact be jeopardized. On the other hand, if we wish to ignore the peril, we have to admit that we do so in the knowledge that the species may be in danger of imminent self-destruction. When the existence of nuclear weapons was made known, thoughtful people everywhere in the world realized that if the great powers entered into a nuclear-arms race the human species would sooner or later face the possibility of extinction. They also realized that in the absence of international agreements preventing it an arms race would probably occur. They knew that the path of nuclear armament was a dead end for mankind. The discovery of the energy in mass — of "the basic power of the universe" — and of a means by which man could release that energy altered the relationship between man and the source of his life, the earth. In the shadow of this power, the earth became small and the life of the human species doubtful. In that sense, the question of human extinction has been on the political agenda of the world ever since the first nuclear weapon was detonated, and there was no need for the world to build up its present tremendous arsenals before starting to worry about it. At just what point the species crossed, or will have crossed, the boundary between merely having the technical knowledge to destroy itself and actually having the arsenals at hand, ready to be used at any second, is not precisely knowable. But it is clear that at present, with some twenty thousand megatons of nuclear explosive power in existence, and with more being added every day, we have entered into the zone of uncertainty, which is to say the zone of risk of extinction. But the mere risk of extinction has a significance that is categorically different from, and immeasurably greater than, that of any other risk, and as we make our decisions we have to take that significance into account. Up to now, every risk has been contained within the frame of life; extinction would shatter the frame. It represents not the defeat of some purpose but an abyss in which all human purposes would be drowned for all time. We have no right to place the possibility of this limitless, eternal defeat on the same footing as risks that we run in the ordinary conduct of our affairs in our particular transient moment of human history. To employ a mathematical analogy, we can say that although the risk of extinction may be fractional, the stake is, humanly speaking, infinite, and a fraction of infinity is still infinity. In other words, once we learn that a holocaust might lead to extinction we have no right to gamble, because if we lose, the game will be over, and neither we nor anyone else will ever get another chance. Therefore, although, scientifically speaking, there is all the difference in the world between the mere possibility that a holocaust will bring about extinction and the certainty of it, morally they are the same, and we have no choice but to address the issue of nuclear weapons as though we knew for a certainty that their use would put an end to our species. In weighing the fate of the earth and, with it, our own fate, we stand before a mystery, and in tampering with the earth we tamper with a mystery. We are in deep ignorance. Our ignorance should dispose us to wonder, our wonder should make us humble, our humility should inspire us to reverence and caution, and our reverence and caution should lead us to act without delay to withdraw the threat we now pose to the earth and to ourselves.

In trying to describe possible consequences of a nuclear holocaust, I have mentioned the limitless complexity of its effects on human society and on the ecosphere — a complexity that sometimes seems to be as great as that of life itself. But if these effects should lead to human extinction, then all the complexity will give way to the utmost simplicity — the simplicity of nothingness. We — the human race — shall cease to be.

(1982)

Exploring the Text

1. How does Jonathan Schell maintain a measured and reasonable tone when the subject is the possibility of the destruction of life on earth? Why do you think he does this?
2. How does Schell appeal to logos in this excerpt?
3. Who do you think is the audience for this piece? How can you tell?
4. Consider the way Schell uses "we" and "I." Do you see a pattern? Why might he have switched from one to the other?
5. Analyze the sentence that ends the first paragraph of this excerpt. How does it deliver its impact? Do you find it convincing? Explain your answer.

Making Connections

1. Compare and contrast the ways that Harry S Truman (p. 1181) and Jonathan Schell (p. 1184) design their arguments. Are any common to both writers? What are the differences? How do the differences serve the purpose of each document?
2. Schell continues to be an ardent campaigner against nuclear weapons. He is a columnist and teacher and mentions Truman in nearly everything he writes, both for Truman's role in the dropping of atomic bombs to end World War II and for his role in trying to ban nuclear weapons worldwide. Imagine a conversation between the two men. On what grounds might they agree? On what issues would they differ?
3. During the Korean War, a war that was, according to Schell, "long, wearying, poorly understood, and publicly disliked," Harry S Truman fired General Douglas MacArthur, who had proposed using nuclear weapons. MacArthur had announced, "There can be no substitute for victory." How does this action square with the Truman who released the statement regarding having used an atomic weapon on Japan? Do you think this theme of what Schell calls "thwarted U.S. greatness" still resonates? Explain your answer.

Conversation

The Influence of Jazz

You might associate jazz with "easy listening" or "old-timey music," or you might play in a jazz band or be an ardent collector of jazz music. Wherever you enter this Conversation, it's important to remember that jazz was one of the most important artistic movements of the twentieth century, beginning in the 1920s in New Orleans, having roots in Africa, and being inspired by tribal drumming, slavery field chants, gospel, ragtime, and the blues. The 1920s are known as the Jazz Age, a term coined by F. Scott Fitzgerald, and jazz's influence spread all over the United States and Europe. Jazz musicians work to find a distinct sound and style through improvisation; thus, every recording — even of the same song — will sound different. In fact, the interplay between the group and the individual soloist is one of the things that makes jazz unique and has led to its extensive influence on visual arts and literature. It's difficult, of course, to talk and write about music without having listened to it. The recommended listening list (p. 1188) provides you with examples of excellent jazz from several periods. Try listening before you begin work on this Conversation, in which we introduce connections among jazz, literature, and art.

Sources

Gerald Early, from Jazz and the African American Literary Tradition (2010)
Robert O'Meally, from Seeing Jazz (1997)
Langston Hughes, Jazzonia (1923)
Stuart Davis, Swing Landscape (1938)
William Henry Johnson, Jitterbugs VI (1941)
Ralph Ellison, from Invisible Man (1952)
Whitney Balliett, Daddy-O (1958)
Donald Barthelme, The King of Jazz (1958)
Jayne Cortez, Jazz Fan Looks Back (2002)
Michael Segell, from The Devil's Horn (2005)
Evelyn Toynton, from Jackson Pollock (2012)

Recommended Listening

What Is Jazz?

These pieces illustrate jazz improvisation in a range of popular songs. You'll recognize the melodies. Listen to what else is going on.

Charlie Parker (alto saxophone) and Kenny Dorham (trumpet), "White Christmas"
Lester Young (tenor saxophone), "I Got Rhythm"
Dizzy Gillespie (trumpet), "Dizzy Atmosphere"
Ethan Iverson (piano) and David King (drums), "Heart of Glass"

Origins

These are some of the examples of the music from New Orleans that came to be called jazz.

King Oliver (cornet), "Weather Bird Rag"
Louis Armstrong (trumpet), "West End Blues"

From Hot to Cool

In the early days, jazz, with its thumping rhythm, was said to be "hot." Later, jazz was played in a more relaxed way, and the musicians who played it came to be called "cool."

Count Basie (piano) with Carl Smith (trumpet) and Lester Young (tenor saxophone), "Oh Lady Be Good" Billie Holiday (vocals), "Now They Call It Swing"

Big Bands = Pure Power

Fifteen musicians, eight of them brass, big drum set. Need we say more?

Count Basie Orchestra, "Jumpin' at the Woodside" Duke Ellington Orchestra and Paul Gonsalves (tenor saxophone), "Diminuendo in Blue and Crescendo in Blue"

Modern Voices

These musicians moved away from recognizable melodies into something more abstract: original music that came to be known as bebop and hard bop.

Charlie Parker (alto saxophone) and Dizzy Gillespie (trumpet), "KoKo" Miles Davis (trumpet) and John Coltrane (tenor saxophone), "If I Were a Bell" Thelonious Monk (piano) and Charlie Rouse (tenor saxophone), "Hackensack"
Grant Green (guitar), "Oleo"
Clifford Brown (trumpet) with Richie Powell (piano) and Max Roach (drums), "Land's End" Sonny Clark (piano) and Ike Quebec (tenor saxophone), "Deep in a Dream"

Jazz Now

A sampling of today's jazz artists.

Jason Moran (piano), "You've Got to Be Modernistic"
Robert Glasper (piano), "Smells Like Teen Spirit"
Miquel Zenón (alto saxophone), "Esta Plena"
Esperanza Spalding (vocals, bass), "I Know You Know" Greg Osby (saxophone), "Mob Job" from Jazz and the African American Literary Tradition

Gerald Early

The following introduction to jazz was written by Gerald Early (b. 1952) for the Web site of the National Humanities Center. Early is a professor at Washington University in St. Louis and the author of many books of cultural criticism, including The Culture of Bruising: Essays on Prizefighting, Literature, and Modern American Culture, which won the National Book Critics Circle Award for criticism. Early won a Grammy for Best Album Notes for the collection Rhapsodies in Black: Music and Words from the Harlem Renaissance.

Both blacks and whites (as well as Latinos) in the United States performed jazz and the audience was diverse, although in large measure now, the audience for this music is mostly white. Historically, jazz was largely the creation of black Americans as they have figured disproportionately among the major innovators of this musical expression. This has created two forms of tensions within jazz: that whites have not been given sufficient credit for their contributions to this art which has had white participation since its earliest days; and, second, between black performers and the whites who mostly constituted the critics, writers, venue and record company owners who described, analyzed, promoted, publicized, recorded, and distributed this music. This latter tension was especially felt during the 1950s and 1960s, when racial discord in the United States was more pronounced because of the civil rights movement, the violence it spawned, and the intensely politicized battle over the re-definition of race and the end of white hegemony in the United States and around the colonized world at the time.

But jazz was more than just music; at the height of its influence, jazz was a cultural movement, particularly influencing the young in dress, language, and attitude. It was, in this respect, a prototype for both rock and roll and hip hop because it was so viscerally hated by the bourgeoisie and the musical establishment of the day. Jazz was associated with interracial sex (many jazz nightclubs were open to patrons of any race) and with illegal drugs, in the early days, marijuana, and during the 1950s, with heroin. Visual artists and writers were frequently inspired by jazz, many thinking its sense of spontaneity, its dissonance, its anti-bourgeois attitude embodied compelling aspects of modernism. Jazz deeply influenced artists such as Romare Bearden and Jackson Pollock. Many filmmakers, both in the United States and Europe — from the 1930s through the 1960s — used jazz in either nightclub scenes, as source music, or as part of the musical score in films and animated features. Jazz was used extensively in film noir and crime movies, and occasionally in psychological dramas.

Jazz's roots are in the city: New Orleans, Chicago, New York, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, and Detroit have at various times been major incubators for jazz. Jazz has always been an urban music, tied to urban nightlife, Prohibition, vice zones, dance halls, inner city neighborhoods, and concert stages. Its history coincides not only with the urbanization of America itself but particularly with the urbanization of African Americans, dating from their movement from the South starting around the beginning of World War I when job opportunities in industry opened up for them.

Jazz broke on the scene at the same time as the arrival of the New Negro Renaissance, also known as the Harlem Renaissance, a period covering from 1919 to 1939. This period in African American life featured a self-conscious attempt by black leaders like W. E. B. Du Bois, James Weldon Johnson, Charles S. Johnson, and Alain Locke to create a school of black literature because they firmly believed that in order for blacks to achieve greatness as a people, they had to produce great art. But it must be remembered that this period was not just about art: important black political leaders were spawned during the Renaissance including black nationalist Marcus Garvey and his Universal Negro Improvement Association, A. Philip Randolph, an agitating socialist who became the head of the Pullman Porters union, and Du Bois himself who, through his editorship of The Crisis, the magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, continued to push for civil rights and a form of Pan Africanism that was antagonistic to Garvey's.

The African American response to jazz during this era was mixed. For many middle class, educated blacks, jazz was considered low class, secular (the devil's music), played in dives and joints that morally disfigured black communities. The only black writer of the Renaissance who was truly taken with jazz was Langston Hughes (1902–1967), who, during the course of his career, not only wrote many poems about it but also on occasion read his poems against a jazz backdrop, even recording with bassist Charles Mingus, a creative partnership that Mingus found unsatisfying. Frank Marshall Davis (1905–1987), a poet and journalist from Chicago, also voiced a fondness for jazz in his writing. Jazz figured in two Claude McKay (1889–1948) novels: Home to Harlem (1928) and Banjo (1929), which is about a roving seaman who is also a musician, a banjo player, an instrument still played by African Americans at the time and frequently featured in small jazz bands. Considering the impact of jazz, it is surprising how little impact the music had on African American letters in the 1920s and 1930s. 5

Jazz became much more prominent in black letters after World War II, when the music became much more self-consciously an "art" music designed for listening rather than for dancing. Many consider Ralph Ellison's monumental novel, Invisible Man (1952), winner of the National Book Award, to be one of the most successful "jazz" novels ever written, although the book is not about a musician and music does not figure in it a great deal. Ellison himself studied both composition and trumpet as a student in his hometown of Oklahoma City and at Tuskegee Institute, where, in fact, he majored in music. So, unlike most black writers, Ellison actually knew music technically. He also felt that music was central to understanding race in America: "The music, the dances that Americans do are greatly determined by Negro American style, by a Negro American sense of elegance, by an American Negro sense of what the American experience should be, by what Negroes feel about how an American should move, should express himself." But he also understood music, black music particularly, as something equally metaphorical, historical, and cultural. This is evident in his essays on jazz such as "Living with Music," "The Charlie Christian Story," and "On Bird, Bird-Watching and Jazz" that were collected for his 1964 volume of essays, Shadow and Act.

Louis Armstrong's recording of "What Did I Do (To Be So Black and Blue)" figures significantly in the beginning of Invisible Man and is, in some ways, one of the major themes of the novel; the other being how the Negro is a central figure and actor in American cultural life, that the black American is indeed American in a vital sense. The scene where the protagonist listens to Armstrong sing this song conveys this symbolically as he eats vanilla ice cream (white) drenched in sloe gin (red) while the blues play on his phonograph. This scene also emphasizes how significant the creation of African American art is to Ellison's act of creating his novel.

But generally most critics think of the novel as jazz-like in its experimental structure, the sense of improvisation that the prose of the novel suggests, particularly the increasing improvisational nature of the Invisible Man's speeches, the slightly weird, off-kilter way that the characters relate to one another and to the narrative itself. Was the entire novel the narrator's hallucination? The novel certainly suggests that jazz is a part of a larger tapestry of black creativity, founded in black folk life, including black speech and sermonizing, black styles of dress, and black eating habits. And this thread of black creativity has had largely a liberating effect on American life even as it, ironically, represents a form of discipline on the part of its inventors.

Other novels dealing directly with the lives of jazz musicians that appeared a few years after Invisible Man were John A. Williams's Night Song (1961), based loosely on the life of saxophonist Charlie Parker (in 1967 a film version was made entitled Sweet Love, Bitter, starring Dick Gregory), and William Melvin Kelley's A Drop of Patience (1965), both novels prominently feature interracial romances between black male musicians and white women. Poet and painter Ted Joans (1928–2003) also arrived on the scene at this time, achieving notoriety as a graffiti artist spray-painting "Bird Lives" on city walls immediately after the death of Charlie Parker in 1955, he spent his entire career writing poems about jazz or that imitated jazz playing. His most famous jazz poem is "Jazz Is My Religion." In this brief excerpt, devotion to a pure, non-commercial jazz is seen as a form of piety, the purity of the commitment matching the purity of the art, a common feeling among many jazz fans and musicians of the post–World War II era:

> Jazz is my religion and it alone do I dig the jazz > Clubs are my houses of worship and sometimes the > Concert halls but some holy places are too commercial > like churches) so I don't dig the sermons there

Also emerging at the same time as Joans was Beat poet Bob Kaufman (1925–1986), whose poetry was often improvised on the spot, frequently not written down, in much the spirit of the jazz musician. This excerpt from "Crootey Songo," one of his most famous poems, shows how he fashioned the words to resemble or imitate a scat singer's or a saxophonist's improvisation and also to suggest a distinct language or linguistic system, not unlike the speech of the jazz hipster: 10

> DERRAT SLEGELATIONS FLO GOOF BABER,
> SCRASH SHO DUBIES WAGO WAILO WAILO
> GEED BOP NAVA GLIED, NAVA GLIED NAVA, > SPLEERIEDER, HUYEDIST, HEDACAZ, AX---, O, O.

The 1960s was the era of the Black Arts Movement, when younger black writers, fired by both Black Nationalism and Marxism, wrote passionately for race solidarity and denounced not only racism but virtually everything white. Many of these writers were poets and a good many jazz poems were written in homage to specific jazz artists, especially saxophonist John Coltrane, who was probably the most popular jazz musician among the black intelligentsia at this time, or in imitation of the flow and spontaneity of jazz. This was probably the last time in American society when a significant portion of young people were still taken by jazz, in part, because it was now an art music with intellectual and spiritual pretensions. Unlike rhythm and blues or 1960s soul music, jazz at this time, seemed a music that took itself seriously, and was not merely a diversion, and jazz was, in good measure, passionately anti-commercial. Poet, playwright, and essayist, former Beat Amiri Baraka (LeRoi Jones) was the leader of this school of writing, a long-time jazz aficionado, who began his jazz writing career providing notes for jazz albums. Baraka produced an important study of black music entitled Blues People (1963), which is partly about jazz. His collection of essays, Black Music (1967), is devoted almost entirely to avant-garde jazz and was instrumental in introducing a young audience to this music. Baraka produced a number of noted jazz poems including "AM/Trak," a poem for John Coltrane, and "Pres Spoke in a Language," for saxophonist Lester Young. Other noted Black Arts Movement poets who wrote jazz poetry include Etheridge Knight, Sonia Sanchez, and Haki Madhubuti (Don L. Lee). Other African American poets of the 1960s and 1970s who were known for writing jazz poetry but were not directly associated with the Black Arts Movement were Michael S. Harper, Quincy Troupe, and Al Young.

Among the black writers on the scene today, essayist and novelist Stanley Crouch, poet and fiction writer Nathaniel Mackey, and poet Yusef Komunyakaa are the most associated with jazz, a music whose presence and influence has diminished over the last 35 years, especially among young people. Crouch has written many first-rate essays about jazz and is considered to be the nation's leading jazz critic; in addition, his novel, Don't the Moon Look Lonesome (2000), about a young white jazz singer and her African American saxophonist husband, offers the reader an insider's view not only of the jazz world but of the intricacies of music-making from the point of view of a professional musician. The book, in some ways like Invisible Man, is built around several speeches or speech-acts delivered or performed by various characters, lessons in creative improvisation and creative narrative that suggest music, which intensifies the book's extraordinary jazz sensibility. Komunyakaa, a Pulitzer Prize winner, has not only written a number of jazz poems but also co-edited with Sascha Feinstein The Jazz Poetry Anthology (1991) and The Second Set: The Jazz Poetry Anthology (1996). Mackey, an avant gardist, editor of the magazine Hambone, and radio DJ, has written a number of jazz poems. Indeed, jazz particularly and music in general is the main inspiration of his writing. He has also written four novels as part of a series about a fictional Los Angeles musical collective called The Mystic Horns.

(2010)

Questions

1. How does Gerald Early describe the reaction of the African American middle class to the early days of jazz music? What was the basis of their view? Have things changed? Explain why or why not.
2. When and why does Early see a change in the relationship between jazz and literature—what he calls "black letters" (par. 6)? What changes in the music led to changes in that relationship?
3. What does Early see as some of the social effects of jazz music?

from Seeing Jazz

Robert O'Meally

In the introduction to his book Seeing Jazz (1997), a collection of works of art and literature inspired by jazz, professor of American literature and director of the Jazz Study Group at Columbia University Robert O'Meally discusses what he calls the three definitive aspects of jazz — rhythm, improvisation, and call and response — providing examples of artists and writers who have captured those elements in their work.

Rhythm

Examples of rhythm veer toward the mystical: the first thunders that drummed the world into being, the dance of the spheres and of the sea, the ebb and flow of desire and procreation, the cadence of blood through human veins. Jazz music's rhythms echo these primal sounds along with those of its origins as an American music owing debts to Europe, Asia, Native America, and Africa — especially Africa, where the music's polyrhythmic character and drum and dance-beat attitudes found their beginnings.

Jazz crystallized at the turn of the 19th to the 20th century in the black communities of the United States, and if we listen closely as Sidney Bechet advises, we hear its history deeply drumming. We hear spirituals, blues, vendor's cries, marching bands, street corner idlers telling lies. We hear the sound of trains — wheels on tracks, whistles, brakes, conductors' calls, easy (and uneasy) riders. In the music of Mary Lou Williams, for example, we hear modern city rhythms — steady and winging in one instance, barbwire jagged and discontinuous in the next.

The rhythms of jazz have also inspired poets and visual artists. Both depict the drama of jazz players in action. Both accept the harder task of capturing in line and image the feeling and the meaning of the music. Both see jazz and make their audiences see it, too.

But how does one see jazz in this sense? How does one write or draw the rhythms of this music? Writers like Toni Morrison, Ntozake Shange, Amiri Baraka, Albert Murray, Michael Harper, and Rita Dove (just to name some leaders in the literary jazz aesthetic) not only tell the stories of jazz characters but pace their lines to approximate the dance-beat cadences and other rhythmic features of jazz music. Through playfully syncopated repetitions, their words perform a jazz dance on the page. No wonder Langston Hughes specified that one of his books, Ask Your Mama, be read aloud to jazz accompaniment; the words for him were solo notes sounded and scored in a jazz-rhythm pattern.

Through much of the century, visual artists literally have drawn jazz musicians, dancers, instruments, and sheet music. Henri Matisse, Piet Mondrian, and Jean Dubuffet make jazz music sound through their paintings, make us see the music. These and many others have created visual jazz compositions through their manipulation of lines, figures, tones, structures, colors, and rhythms. Note how the language of aesthetics overlaps from art form to art form. In some sense, do not all artists — whether dancers or architects, sculptors or poets — desire that their works have rhythm?

In visual art, a jazz rhythm may be visible in repeated images or human figures (with variations from image to image). Thus do the artists follow jazz's impulse to play 4/4 along with 3⁄4 or 6/8, to mirror jazz's complexly swinging, polyrhythmic character. Like writers, some visual artists divide their work into sections that approximate the structures of jazz: the A section swinging into the B section and back to A before onto C (the vamp, chorus, riff, solo space, outchorus, etc.) with rhythm always at the base. Stuart Davis and Romare Bearden describe the effort to achieve a sense of the jazz interval in their works, the skip tones, jump spaces, and silences in anticipation of the next sound. Others achieve a percussive sense of color — jazz drum songs for the eye.

Perhaps most profoundly, writers and visual artists who project jazz rhythms into their art express a jazz timekeeper's bass-clef sense of life. The feeling, as Ralph Ellison once put it, that as blues-beset as life may be . . . the real secret is somehow to make life swing, to survive by staying in the groove.

Improvisation

The word improvisation derives from the Latin im + provisus, meaning "not provided" or "not foreseen." In some sense, all artistic creation depends on the ability to improvise, to extemporize an unscripted drama, to blow a note not heard before, to fill the blank canvas of the moment. But in the making of jazz music, improvisation is a definitive hallmark, a sine qua non: a something without which, not. Jazz is substantially a performer's art where any charts or notations are provisional guideposts, notes indicating a work's general direction but never its final lines or last word. It is a music in the oral tradition, one in which a composer/arranger's latest changes may be shouted out during on-stage performance and where the performer may introduce a shift in direction while playing, in the unforeseen moment of jazz creation.

Jazz's improvised character is balanced with the fact that it is never a free-for-all; it has both an improvised freshness as well as a composer/arranger's sense of completeness and finish. Duke Ellington told his band to plan the notes as written but also "to keep some dirt in there, somewhere." In other words, even when Ellington's band played pieces with no solo spaces indicated, he wanted his players to keep the made-up-on-the-spot dimension, something the score expected but did not ask for explicitly, something of the performers' improvised own, some "dirt."

At their best, jazz compositions sound like frozen improvisations, just as solos by 10 such jazz artists as Thelonious Monk and Miles Davis sound like liquid compositions. The jazz improvisor's solo statement not only tells the soloist's own story . . . but must complement the composer/arranger's overall conceptions. In other words, true jazz musicians are co-composers of every work they play. The audience delights just as much in a particular composition as in a particular band's or player's treatment of it on a given day.

All of which has implications and challenges for the other arts. . . . Romare Bearden insisted that, like a jazz soloist, he played with the possibilities within the framework of his conception: he soloed, he improvised. Jean-Michel Basquiat, Alexis De Boeck, and others gave their work a swingingly improvised dimension. They kept "some dirt in there, somewhere," too.

This in-the-moment quality is most obvious in the work of jazz photographers like William Claxton, Herman Leonard, and Anthem Barboza. Like jazz players, jazz photographers must be so well trained that they can see an image, have an idea, and execute instantly. As Ornette Coleman advises, they "forget about the changes in key and just play." And when it comes to jazz art (musical, literary, or visual) the ability to play is the thing. Technique, however painfully hard earned, is taken for granted and "forgotten." When the bandleader points to you, can you create a composition on the spot? With little or nothing formally provided, are you composed? Can you improvise? Can you play?

Call and Response

Call and response refers to the Sunday service: "Say 'Amen' somebody" — "AMEN!" This interaction between preachers and congregations all over black America has become an integral feature of cultural expression in the United States. Born in West and Central Africa, where one experiences it in exchanges among singers and instrumentalists (as well as dancers and sculptors), in the U.S. this pattern occurs in church songs and sermons and also in word songs, play songs (such as "Little Sally Walker"), blues, rags, and in jazz. You say something; I say something back.

Call and response in jazz may consist of a two-part song within the single self — a dialogue between the pianist's right hand and the left; an instrumentalist/singer's exchange between the voice and the accompanying box or axe.

Jazz call and response also identifies complicated exchanges between a single voice and other voices: soloist and the chorus of other players; soloist and the congregation of listeners and dancers. These conversations in the language of jazz may be friendly or exhortative in the mode of the preacher and the amening congregation. They may be mutual praise songs or friendly games of leap frog. 15

They may also involve knock-down competitions, challenges, games of innuendo, ritual insult, mockery. Sometimes signifying contests (also called "cutting contests") involve big-mouthing and virtuoso sounding off. Dizzy Gillespie and Roy Eldridge were fearsome cutting contestants because, while they loved to whisper and pray through their horns, they also knew how to lie, wrangle, cuss an opponent down and, if need be, out. Call and response could be sweet, call and response could be rough.

It is a fascinating phenomenon that the call and response circle in jazz often widens to include dancers and listeners who are not dancing, but whose rapt attention and well-timed foot tapping become part of the total performance. In our (post-) modern world, jazz listeners respond to musicians' calls sent by radio or record (and C.D.) players. The hearer's response to jazz music may be to think things over yet again; the response may be to push back the furniture and dance or to turn the lights down low and have a very private party. Like jazz improvisers who transform every composition they play, listeners add their own sweet or bitter notes to the music and make it their own.

To the jazz musician, the "call" of jazz may come from an almost indescribably subtle attitude of a dancer. It may come from the example of Louis Armstrong, sounding like a century-full of music buzz-toned through the barrel of a single magic horn.

Visual and literary artists are parties to this dynamic process of jazz calling and responding. For not only do they respond to the work of people in their own fields (novelist Ellison to novelist Dostoevski, muralist James Phillips to the muralists of Mexico), they also call and respond to jazz music and its makers. This book's sections on rhythm and improvisation tell part of the story of how this process works. A jazz rhythm by Max Roach (a call) becomes a rhythm of color in a Roland Jean collage (a response); an improvisation by Charlie Parker becomes an improvised line in a Norman Lewis sketch. Writers hear the call of the music and respond with words that swing and chapters that take a jazz shape. Call, countercall; call, recall; call, response.

Perhaps above all, these writers and visual artists respond to jazz music's beautiful call for unequivocal excellence. "If I could write a poem as perfect as Parker's solo or paint a picture as evocative as Ellington's 'Mood Indigo,'" these works seem to say, "well then maybe, wherever they are, Bird and Duke would respond to me across the distances of space and time, would give to me a full-throated, full-spirited amen."

(1997)

Questions

1. According to Robert O'Meally, how do artists and writers depict rhythm? What are the differences in the ways visual artists and writers depict it? What are the similarities?
2. Put O'Meally's definitions of improvisation in your own words. Where might you see improvisation other than in music? Do you use it in your own work — or play? Explain.
3. What are some contemporary examples of call and response?

Jazzonia

Langston Hughes

This poem was originally published in 1923 with several other of Hughes's early poems in the Crisis, the official publication of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). For more biographical information on Langston Hughes, see page 1100.

Oh, silver tree!
Oh, shining rivers of the soul!

In a Harlem cabaret
Six long-headed jazzers play.
A dancing girl whose eyes are bold
Lifts high a dress of silken gold.

Oh, singing tree!
Oh, shining rivers of the soul!

Were Eve's eyes
In the first garden
Just a bit too bold?
Was Cleopatra gorgeous
In a gown of gold?

Oh, shining tree!
Oh, silver rivers of the soul!

In a whirling cabaret
Six long-headed jazzers play.

(1923)

Questions

1. What associations does Langston Hughes make with jazz in this poem? Consider the words as well as the rhythm and syntax in the poem.
2. What do the women mentioned in the poem — the dancing girl, Eve, and Cleopatra — have in common? What does that common ground say about jazz?
3. What does it mean that Hughes moves the setting of the poem from "In a Harlem cabaret" (l. 3) to "In a whirling cabaret" (l. 16)?

Swing Landscape

Stuart Davis

Stuart Davis (1892–1964) began his career painting realistic scenes of jazz saloons, but by the 1930s, as recorded music brought jazz to the masses, Davis's work reflected not just the music but also the technological communication of jazz through movies and the radio. This painting was commissioned by the Federal Arts Project, part of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's Works Progress Administration, which provided artists, musicians, and actors with employment during the Great Depression. It depicts the seaport of Gloucester, Massachusetts, transforming it into what looks like a jazz-inspired billboard.

Questions

1. What is recognizable in this painting? What is abstract? In what ways does this painting disorient the viewer?
2. What elements of urban life does Stuart Davis depict in what is supposed to be a quaint seaport scene?

Museum purchase with funds from the Hope fund Indiana University Art Museum, 42.1. Photograph by: Michael Cavanagh and Kevin Montague.

STUART DAVIS, SWING LANDSCAPE, 1938, 86¾" × 172⅞", OIL ON CANVAS, INDIANA UNIVERSITY ART MUSEUM, BLOOMINGTON.
(See color insert, Image 38.)

3. How does Swing Landscape visually depict the rhythm and syncopation (the shifting of a musical accent by stressing a normally unstressed beat) of jazz? Look carefully at the way Davis uses repetition and the juxtaposition of geometric shapes and colors.

Jitterbugs VI

WILLIAM HENRY JOHNSON

William Henry Johnson (1901–1970) was an African American painter who was born in South Carolina and moved to New York when he was seventeen. He studied in New York and on Cape Cod before moving to France in 1926 to study art. Returning to the United States in 1946, Johnson was assigned by the Works Progress Administration to teach at the Harlem Community Art Center.

Questions

1. The jitterbug is a dance — very fast, very complex — that came out of Harlem and was part of the swing craze of the late 1930s and 1940s. How does William Henry Johnson's print re-create the speed and energy of the jitterbug?
2. What is the effect of the hard angles in the painting? What is the effect of their repetition?

Whitney Museum of American Art

WILLIAM HENRY JOHNSON, JITTERBUGS VI, C. 1941, HAND-COLORED SCREENPRINT, 17 1/16" × 11 1/4", WHITNEY MUSEUM OF AMERICAN ART, NEW YORK.
(See color insert, Image 39.)

3. What elements of graphic art, or even pop art (art that depicts scenes of everyday life using techniques of commercial art and illustration), do you see in this work?

from Invisible Man

Ralph Ellison

Ralph Waldo Ellison (1914–1994) was an African American novelist and scholar born in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. In 1933, he enrolled at the Tuskegee Institute in Alabama on a scholarship to study music, and after his third year he moved to New York City to study sculpture and photography. There he met novelist Richard Wright in 1937 and soon shifted his focus to writing, publishing short stories, book reviews, and articles in newspapers and magazines, such as New Challenge and New Masses. In 1952, Ellison published his first and most famous novel, Invisible Man, which won the National Book Award in 1953. Considered one of the great American novels, Invisible Man is about a young black man's search for self-knowledge; its central metaphor is the invisibility of African Americans in white society. The following selection is from the novel's prologue.

Now I have one radio-phonograph; I plan to have five. There is a certain acoustical deadness in my hole, and when I have music I want to feel its vibration, not only with my ear but with my whole body. I'd like to hear five recordings of Louis Armstrong playing and singing "What Did I Do to Be so Black and Blue" — all at the same time. Sometimes now I listen to Louis while I have my favorite dessert of vanilla ice cream and sloe gin. I pour the red liquid over the white mound, watching it glisten and the vapor rising as Louis bends that military instrument into a beam of lyrical sound. Perhaps I like Louis Armstrong because he's made poetry out of being invisible. I think it must be because he's unaware that he is invisible. And my own grasp of invisibility aids me to understand his music. Once when I asked for a cigarette, some jokers gave me a reefer, which I lighted when I got home and sat listening to my phonograph. It was a strange evening. Invisibility, let me explain, gives one a slightly different sense of time, you're never quite on the beat. Sometimes you're ahead and sometimes behind. Instead of the swift and imperceptible flowing of time, you are aware of its nodes, those points where time stands still or from which it leaps ahead. And you slip into the breaks and look around. That's what you hear vaguely in Louis' music.

Once I saw a prizefighter boxing a yokel. The fighter was swift and amazingly scientific. His body was one violent flow of rapid rhythmic action. He hit the yokel a hundred times while the yokel held up his arms in stunned surprise. But suddenly the yokel, rolling about in the gale of boxing gloves, struck one blow and knocked science, speed and footwork as cold as a well-digger's posterior. The smart money hit the canvas. The long shot got the nod. The yokel had simply stepped inside of his opponent's sense of time. So under the spell of the reefer I discovered a new analytical way of listening to music. The unheard sounds came through, and each melodic line existed of itself, stood out clearly from all the rest, said its piece, and waited patiently for the other voices to speak.

(1952)

Questions

1. In paragraph 7 of the excerpt from Gerald Early's Jazz and the African American Literary Tradition (p. 1189), Early mentions that the symbolic aspect of this excerpt (the black man eating white ice cream with red syrup on it) as well as the music he's listening to ("What Did I Do to Be So Black and Blue?") emphasizes the difficult process of making art, especially for a black man. How does the anecdote about the prizefighter and the yokel (par. 2) expand on that theme?
2. What aspects of the three elements of jazz — rhythm, improvisation, call and response — that Robert O'Meally (p. 1194) identifies are present in Ellison's excerpt?
3. What does the narrator of Invisible Man say about what we might call negative space? How does it connect to what jazz trumpeter Miles Davis once said, "Don't play what's there; play what's not there"?

Daddy-O

Whitney Balliett

Whitney Balliett (1926–2007) was the jazz critic of the New Yorker magazine from 1957 to 2001. This piece appeared in the New Yorker in 1958.

Kenneth Rexroth, the fifty-two-year-old poet, translator (modern Greek, ancient Greek, Latin, Spanish, Chinese, Japanese), anthologist, painter (abstract), and critic (literary, music), who has also been a hobo, range cook, horse wrangler, cab driver, and sheep-herder, was born in South Bend, Indiana, but has lived for much of the past thirty years in San Francisco, where he has become a leader of that city's ongoing poetry revival. He has also helped found a poetry-read-to-jazz movement there, and the other day he opened in New York at the Five Spot Café, a Saroyan bar-and-grill at the south end of Cooper Square, for a couple of weeks of readings with the Pepper Adams Quintet. I had lunch with him on the day of his début, and found him a nervous, medium-sized man with short gray hair, a mustache, a towering forehead, and eyes that slope like a sharply peaked roof when his face is in repose. He has a voice that is apt to move in mid-syllable from a whisper to a roar, and he often erupts into machine-gun laughter, delivered in a low monotone. He was dressed in a gray-black suit, a transparent white silk shirt, and a blue-and-white polka-dot string tie. After he had ordered oysters, shad roe, vegetables ("Waiter, I don't care which vegetables, so long as they're fresh"), salad, and dark beer, he looked down at the table and said, "I've been supporting myself since I was thirteen. I've only had five years of school. In fact, I've lived in the kind of world that Jack Kerouac imagines he has lived in." His eyes shot up, and he sprayed a dozen rounds of laughter about the room. "A good many people, including the musicians I work with, think of jazz poetry at first as something only a weedhead would do. Not long ago, I worked with a symphony bassist, and he told me afterward, 'You know, I was really scared, but it's been one of the greatest musical experiences of my life.' I didn't start this thing. Renegade monks were doing it in the Middle Ages. Charles Cros, a nineteenth-century poet, read his stuff (things like 'Le Hareng Saur': 'There was a great white wall, bare, bare, bare' — ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha) to bal-musette[1] bands. There have been countless talking-blues singers in the South. Maxwell Bodenheim did it in the twenties and Langston Hughes in the thirties, and even I did it in the twenties, at the Green Mask, in Chicago, with Frank Melrose, a K.C. pianist. I've been reading poetry to jazz for two years now, starting in The Cellar, in San Francisco, with a quintet. Since then, I've done all of the West Coast, St. Louis, Chicago, Minneapolis. The most important instrument in my accompaniment is the bass. The bass goes right up your leg and sends out the voice. Modern jazz has outgrown everything. The audience can't get into the music without verbal contact. The poetry gives you that, and the jazz gets the poetry out of those seminars taught by aging poets for budding poets in corn-belt colleges. I plan a good deal of the musical accompaniment, which isn't all jazz by any means. I use bits of Satie, Webern, Boccherini. Each musician has a copy of what I'm reciting, with cues and musical notations on it. I read Ruthven Todd, Larry Durrell, Ferlinghetti, and some of my own stuff, including a lot of translations. A friend warned me about New York. 'You've got to be careful, man,' he said. 'They've been having meetings to keep Rexroth out.' Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha!"

Rexroth asked me to stop in at the Five Spot before his first show that night, and I was met there by Ivan Black, a stocky, black-mustached representative of the Five Spot, who ushered me to a table near the bandstand, a raised platform roughly the size of a large window seat. "I've got to go and wake Rexroth up," he told us. "He's sleeping at a friend's, over on Second Avenue. I'll be right back." The Five Spot is long and narrow, with a bar, sheltered by a fringed canopy, running down most of one wall; three gold-colored macelike objects suspended from a maroon ceiling; and the rest of the wall space spattered with posters and programs of various sorts. "He wasn't asleep at all," Black's voice said after a while, in a relieved way, and Rexroth, wearing impenetrable dark glasses, sat down beside me. "These shades protect you in a club," he said. "I've decided they relax you. I read my stuff. You can't do it out of your head. You get swinging, and you don't know what you're talking about."

Rexroth then said it was time to begin. Black excused himself and, while squeezing onto the platform to introduce Rexroth, accidentally brushed a thick sheaf of manuscripts off a wobbly music stand.

"Damn it, Ivan! What are you doing?" Rexroth bellowed as Black backed and filled on the manuscripts.

The manuscripts were replaced, a drum roll crashed out, and Black introduced Rexroth as a horse wrangler and the Daddy-O of the jazz-poetry movement. 5 [1]Style of French dance music that became popular in the 1880s. Once played with a musette, an instrument similar to bagpipes, it is now generally played with an accordion. — Eds.

Rexroth got up on the platform, plunged his left hand into his left coat pocket, took as wide a stance as space permitted, stuck his stomach out, and read, in a strong singsong voice, a Ruthven Todd poem; Carl Sandburg's "Mag," accompanied by an Ellington blues; a poem by Pablo Neruda; a poem of his own; and a twelfth-century Chinese poem, accompanied only by the bass, which played long passages between such lines as "But why do the birds all hate me?," "Why do the flowers betray me?," "Why do the peach and cherry blossoms prostrate me?"

(1958)

Questions

1. How does poet Kenneth Rexroth explain the relationship between poetry and jazz?
2. In what ways does Whitney Balliett use elements of jazz in this piece?
3. Rexroth once said, "It is important to get poetry out of the hands of the professors and out of the hands of the squares. If we can get poetry out into the life of the country, it can be creative. Homer, or the guy who recited Beowulf, was show business. We simply want to make poetry part of 'show business.'" Do you think that reading poetry to jazz music is an effective way to "get poetry out into the life of the country"? Explain your answer.
4. Are rap and hip-hop the present-day equivalent to poetry read to music? Why or why not?

The King of Jazz

Donald Barthelme

Donald Barthelme (1931–1989), known especially for his short fiction, grew up in Houston, Texas, and attended college there. He never received a degree, however, and spent much of his time in Houston's jazz clubs. This story was published in the New Yorker in 1958.

Well I'm the king of jazz now, thought Hokie Mokie to himself as he oiled the slide on his trombone. Hasn't been a 'bone man been king of jazz for many years. But now that Spicy MacLammermoor, the old king, is dead, I guess I'm it. Maybe I better play a few notes out of this window here, to reassure myself.

"Wow!" said somebody standing on the sidewalk. "Did you hear that?"

"I did," said his companion.

"Can you distinguish our great homemade American jazz performers, each from the other?"

"Used to could."

"Then who was that playing?"

"Sounds like Hokie Mokie to me. Those few but perfectly selected notes have the real epiphanic glow."

"The what?"

"The real epiphanic glow, such as is obtained only by artists of the calibre of Hokie Mokie, who's from Pass Christian, Mississippi. He's the king of jazz, now that Spicy MacLammermoor is gone."

Hokie Mokie put his trombone in its trombone case and went to a gig. At the gig everyone fell back before him, bowing.

"Hi Bucky! Hi Zoot! Hi Freddie! Hi George! Hi Thad! Hi Roy! Hi Dexter! Hi Jo! Hi Willie! Hi Greens!"

"What we gonna play, Hokie? You the king of jazz now, you gotta decide."

"How 'bout 'Smoke'?"

"Wow!" everybody said. "Did you hear that? Hokie Mokie can just knock a fella out, just the way he pronounces a word. What a intonation on that boy! God Almighty!"

"I don't want to play 'Smoke,'" somebody said.

"Would you repeat that, stranger?"

"I don't want to play 'Smoke.' 'Smoke' is dull. I don't like the changes. I refuse to play 'Smoke.'"

"He refuse to play 'Smoke'! But Hokie Mokie is the king of jazz and he says 'Smoke'!"

"Man, you from outa town or something? What do you mean you refuse to play 'Smoke'? How'd you get on this gig anyhow? Who hired you?"

"I am Hideo Yamaguchi, from Tokyo, Japan."

"Oh, you're one of those Japanese cats, eh?"

"Yes I'm the top trombone man in all of Japan."

"Well you're welcome here until we hear you play. Tell me, is the Tennessee Tea Room still the top jazz place in Tokyo?"

"No, the top jazz place in Tokyo is the Square Box now."

"That's nice. O.K., now we gonna play 'Smoke' just like Hokie said. You ready, Hokie? O.K., give you four for nothin'. One! Two! Three! Four!"

The two men who had been standing under Hokie's window had followed him to the club. Now they said:

"Good God!"

"Yes, that's Hokie's famous 'English sunrise' way of playing. Playing with lots of rays coming out of it, some red rays, some blue rays, some green rays, some green stemming from a violet center, some olive stemming from a tan center — "

"That young Japanese fellow is pretty good, too."

"Yes, he is pretty good. And he holds his horn in a peculiar way. That's frequently the mark of a superior player."

"Bent over like that with his head between his knees — good God, he's sensational!"

He's sensational, Hokie thought. Maybe I ought to kill him.

But at that moment somebody came in the door pushing in front of him a four-and-one-half-octave marimba. Yes, it was Fat Man Jones, and he began to play even before he was fully in the door.

"What're we playing?"

" 'Billie's Bounce.' "

"That's what I thought it was. What're we in?"

"F."

"That's what I thought we were in. Didn't you use to play with Maynard?"

"Yeah I was on that band for a while until I was in the hospital."

"What for?"

"I was tired."

"What can we add to Hokie's fantastic playing?"

"How 'bout some rain or stars?"

"Maybe that's presumptuous?"

"Ask him if he'd mind."

"You ask him, I'm scared. You don't fool around with the king of jazz. That young Japanese guy's pretty good, too."

"He's sensational."

"You think he's playing in Japanese?"

"Well I don't think it's English."

This trombone's been makin' my neck green for thirty-five years, Hokie thought. How come I got to stand up to yet another challenge, this late in life?

"Well, Hideo — "

"Yes, Mr. Mokie?"

"You did well on both 'Smoke' and 'Billie's Bounce.' You're just about as good as me, I regret to say. In fact, I've decided you're better than me. It's a hideous thing to contemplate, but there it is. I have only been the king of jazz for twenty-four hours, but the unforgiving logic of this art demands we bow to Truth, when we hear it."

"Maybe you're mistaken?"

"No, I got ears. I'm not mistaken. Hideo Yamaguchi is the new king of jazz."

"You want to be king emeritus?"

"No, I'm just going to fold up my horn and steal away. This gig is yours, Hideo. You can pick the next tune."

"How 'bout 'Cream'?"

"O.K., you heard what Hideo said, it's 'Cream.' You ready, Hideo?"

"Hokie, you don't have to leave. You can play too. Just move a little over to the side there — "

"Thank you, Hideo, that's very gracious of you. I guess I will play a little, since I'm still here. Sotto voce, of course."

"Hideo is wonderful on 'Cream'!"

"Yes, I imagine it's his best tune."

"What's that sound coming in from the side there?"

"Which side?"

"The left."

"You mean that sound that sounds like the cutting edge of life? That sounds like polar bears crossing Arctic ice pans? That sounds like a herd of musk ox in full flight? That sounds like male walruses diving to the bottom of the sea? That sounds like fumaroles smoking on the slopes of Mt. Katmai? That sounds like the wild turkey walking through the deep, soft forest? That sounds like beavers chewing trees in an Appalachian marsh? That sounds like an oyster fungus growing on an aspen trunk? That sounds like a mule deer wandering a montane of the Sierra Nevada? That sounds like prairie dogs kissing? That sounds like witchgrass tumbling or a river meandering? That sounds like manatees munching seaweed at Cape Sable? That sounds like coatimundis moving in packs across the face of Oklahoma? That sounds like — "

"Good God, it's Hokie! Even with a cup mute on, he's blowing Hideo right off the stand!"

"Hideo's playing on his knees now! Good God, he's reaching into his belt for a large steel sword — Stop him!"

"Wow! That was the most exciting 'Cream' ever played! Is Hideo all right?" 70

"Yes, somebody is getting him a glass of water."

"You're my man, Hokie! That was the dadblangedest thing I ever saw!"

"You're the king of jazz once again!"

"Hokie Mokie is the most happening thing there is!"

"Yes, Mr. Hokie sir, I have to admit it, you blew me right off the stand. I see I have 75 many years of work and study before me still."

"That's O.K., son. Don't think a thing about it. It happens to the best of us. Or it almost happens to the best of us. Now I want everybody to have a good time because we're gonna play 'Flats.' 'Flats' is next."

"With your permission, sir, I will return to my hotel and pack. I am most grateful for everything I have learned here."

"That's O.K., Hideo. Have a nice day. He-he. Now, 'Flats.'" (1958)

Questions

1. What elements of jazz appear in this story?
2. What do you think Donald Barthelme is satirizing in this story? How does he do it?
3. Do you find the story funny? Why or why not?

Jazz Fan Looks Back

Jayne Cortez

Jayne Cortez (1934–2012) was a poet and spoken-word performance artist. She lived in Dakar, Senegal, and New York City. In her obituary in the New York Times, her work was described as "[m]eant for the ear even more than for the eye, her words combine a hurtling immediacy with an incantatory orality."

I crisscrossed with Monk
Wailed with Bud
Counted every star with Stitt
Sang "Don't Blame Me" with Sarah Wore a flower like Billie Screamed in the range of Dinah
& scatted "How High the Moon" with Ella Fitzgerald as she blew roof off the Shrine Auditorium
Jazz at the Philharmonic

I cut my hair into a permanent tam
Made my feet rebellious metronomes
Embedded record needles in paint on paper
Talked bopology talk
Laughed in high-pitched saxophone phrases Became keeper of every Bird riff every Lester lick
as Hawk melodicized my ear of infatuated tongues & Blakey drummed militant messages in soul of my applauding teeth
& Ray hit bass notes to the last love seat in my bones
I moved in triple time with Max
Grooved high with Diz
Perdidoed with Pettiford
Flew home with Hamp
Shuffled in Dexter's Deck
Squatty-rooed with Peterson
Dreamed a "52nd Street Theme" with Fats & scatted "Lady Be Good" with Ella Fitzgerald
as she blew roof off the Shrine Auditorium
Jazz at the Philharmonic

(2002)

Questions

1. In "Jazz Fan Looks Back," the speaker names famous jazz musicians: Thelonious Monk, Bud Powell, Sonny Stitt, Sarah Vaughan, Dinah Washington, Billie Holiday, Ella Fitzgerald, Charlie (Bird) Parker, Lester Young, Coleman Hawkins, Max Roach, Dizzy Gillespie, Oscar Pettiford, Lionel Hampton, Dexter Gordon, and Fats Navarro. Choose two or three of the musicians in the poem and listen to some of their work. What do they have in common? Do you know of jazz musicians whom Jayne Cortez does not mention? Why might she have left them out?
2. Try reading this poem aloud. How does the meaning change?

3. Jazz at the Philharmonic was a series of famous concerts that took place at the Philharmonic Auditorium in Los Angeles. What do you think it means that Cortez repeats "Jazz at the Philharmonic" twice? What is she saying about what a jazz fan hears when he or she looks back?
4. What elements of jazz do you find in this poem?

from The Devil's Horn

Michael Segell

This excerpt comes from Michael Segell's The Devil's Horn: The Story of the Saxophone from Noisy Novelty to King of Cool, published in 2005. Segell is an amateur musician and a professional writer and music lover.

When he released A Love Supreme, John Coltrane said that "as long as there is some feeling of communication, it isn't necessary that it be understood." But that hasn't deterred modern music psychologists from trying to tease out which performance and acoustical cues most effectively aid that communication. In the past decade, researchers have conducted more than a hundred studies that explore music's ability to evoke in the listener the five "basic" emotions — happiness, sadness, anger, fear, and love/tenderness, which appear in musical scores as, respectively, festoso, dolente, furloso, amoroso, and teneramente — or the hundreds of subsets of those emotions. Patrik N. Juslin and Petri Laukka, psychologists at Uppsala University in Sweden, have done meta-analyses of studies examining expressive musical cues, including tempo, sound level, timing, intonation, articulation, timbre, vibrato, tone attacks, tone decays, and pauses. Sadness, they have found, is associated with slow tempo, low sound level, legato articulation, small articulation variability, slow tone attacks, and dull timbre. Happiness is associated with fast tempo, high sound level, staccato articulation, large articulation variability, fast tone attacks, and bright timbre. The combination of cues that is most expressive, according to listeners — and very similar to the combination that evokes sadness and tenderness — includes legato articulation, soft spectrum, slow tempo, high sound level, and slow tone attacks. Sounds that mimicked so-called separation calls — sobs, cries, and moans — were the most poignant of all. Some instruments, obviously, are more capable than others of delivering these cues. Arguably, the saxophone, with the sounds of dozens of instruments tucked into its complex wave form, can deliver almost all of them.

For at least one saxophonist, little distinction exists between the expressive cues he issues on the instrument and the weight and meaning of his words. In fact, the poet Robert Pinsky says, when he plays the saxophone — he has played the horn, semi-professionally and recreationally, all his life — he's trying to do the same thing he does when he "fits the words together" in a poem.

"The horn is connected to what I do as a writer because it's on a completely physical scale and an infinite scale," says Pinsky, who was poet laureate of the United States between 1997 and 2000. "Theoretically, the cone of a saxophone goes on forever, giving the sounds that come from it an infinite quality. But it's given its expression by a human. I try to do something with the vowels and consonants of words that makes them musical — infinite — but the medium is my voice, or anybody's voice who is reading the poem, which means that the medium is inherently on a human scale — on a physical scale, like the saxophone.

"I would trade everything I've written if I could play the saxophone the way I want to. If I could sell my soul and just be tremendous, a monster, I'd be a tenor player. But I can't. I'm not musical enough. The closest I can come to what the saxophone can do is with words."

(2005)

Questions

1. What does Michael Segell think of the capacity for music — in particular the music created by the saxophone — to communicate emotion?
2. Why might Segell have cited John Coltrane, a saxophone player considered by many to be in the forefront of avant-garde jazz, even though he refutes what Coltrane says?
3. What is Segell's purpose in quoting Robert Pinsky, former poet laureate of the United States?

from Jackson Pollock

Evelyn Toynton

Evelyn Toynton's work has appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, the New York Times Book Review, the American Scholar, and other publications. She is the author of Modern Art, a novel based on Jackson Pollock and his wife, the painter Lee Krasner. This excerpt is from a biography of Pollock (1912–1956), who is considered one of the great American abstract expressionist painters. He is known for his large canvases, which lay on the floor as he splattered, dripped, and applied paint from above.

The nineteenth-century English aesthete Walter Pater said that "all art constantly aspires to the condition of music. . . . In its ideal, consummate moments, the end is not distinct from the means, the form from the matter, the subject from the expression." Or, as the critic George Steiner has written, "The energy that is music puts us in felt relation to the energy that is life; it puts us in a relation of experienced immediacy with the abstractly and verbally inexpressible, but wholly palpable, primary fact of being."[1] Beginning with the mural he painted for Guggenheim, Pollock's work got closer and closer to the condition of music — specifically, to jazz, the one indubitably, quintessentially American art form, which Pater might not have recognized as music at all.

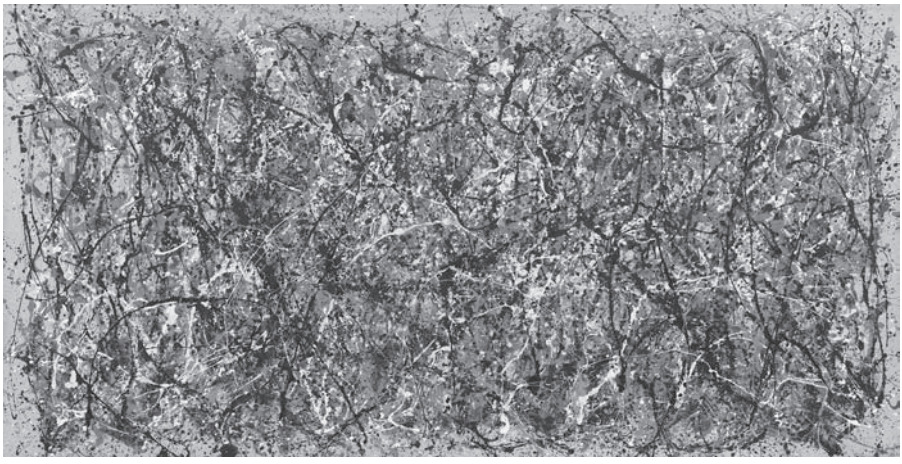

Image copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Image source: Art Resource, NY. © 2013 The Pollock-Krasner Foundation/Artists Rights Society (ARS), New York.

Jackson Pollock, One: Number 31, 1950, oil and enamel on canvas, 8' 10" × 17' 5⅝", Museum of Modern Art, New York.

The form of the drip paintings emerged as Pollock worked on them; he did not make sketches or work out in his mind beforehand what he intended the finished canvas to look like. Instead, like a jazz musician improvising on a theme, he relied on his instinctive sense of what worked, what the painting itself called for, once the process of making it was under way: "When I am in my painting, I am not aware of what I am doing . . . the painting has a life of its own. I try to let it come through."[2]

Also like a jazz musician, he made use of accident and chance, though Pollock, understandably defensive about suspicions of his artistry, was at pains to minimize the role these played in his process: "I can control the flow of paint; there is no accident," he said, and "I don't use the accident — 'cause I deny the accident."[3] Yet, as we have seen, he used whatever materials happened to fall on the canvas as he worked, incorporating cigarette ash, cigarette butts, and dead insects into the work at various junctures, as well as the broken glass and sand "and other foreign matter" that he added deliberately.

The freer his paintings became, the more they seemed to tap into some of the same "primitive," preverbal impulses as jazz — to express, like jazz, the workings of the unconscious, not through the use of symbols but directly. Like jazz, they convey a sense of exultation, of urgent, rhapsodic feeling just barely contained — the Nietzschean tension between wildness and form. (It is telling that Nietzsche identified that state of ecstasy and wildness with Dionysus, the god of wine; jazz musicians are more notorious even than Pollock for their use of consciousness-altering substances of various kinds.)

Like jazz, the drip paintings give the impression of freewheeling immediacy and spontaneity — a distinctively American quality — while exhibiting the same high-wire discipline necessary to avoid spinning out of control. Neither Pollock nor a great jazz musician improvises from scratch; there is a huge fund of skill and knowledge, of knowing the moves, that is being drawn on in the act itself. But perhaps the most striking point of resemblance is the way both are governed by rhythm.

A passionate aficionado, Pollock told Krasner that jazz was "the only other creative thing happening in the country."[4] But though it is always progressive jazz that his work is likened to — especially the edgy, radically experimental music of Charlie Parker, who like Pollock renewed the art form in which he worked through his own originality and daring — when it came to jazz, Pollock was a conservative. Rather than Parker and bebop, he listened to the more traditional musicians he had first heard when he was young, people like Louis Armstrong and Count Basie and Duke Ellington.

Notes

1. Pater, The Renaissance, pp. 95, 98; Steiner, Real Presences, p. 196.
2. O'Connor, Jackson Pollock, p. 40.
3. Quoted in Karmel, Jackson Pollock: Interviews, Articles, and Reviews, pp. 138, 22 (interview with William Wright).
4. O'Meally, Jazz Cadence of American Culture, p. 179.

(2012)

Questions

1. How does Evelyn Toynton compare the way Jackson Pollock paints to the way a jazz musician plays? How does she qualify the comparison?
2. Toynton quotes several experts in this selection. Which one do you find most convincing or interesting? Explain your answer.
3. Toynton makes the point that Pollock's work is compared to bebop, the most progressive jazz of his time period, though he liked the music of more traditional jazz artists, such as Louis Armstrong and Duke Ellington. Listen to some of the jazz that came after bebop — free jazz, for example. In what way might that genre have been influenced by Pollock's work?
4. What elements of jazz do you see in Pollock's One: Number 31, 1950?

Making Connections

1. Compare and contrast Langston Hughes's "Jazzonia" (p. 1197) and Jayne Cortez's "Jazz Fan Looks Back" (p. 1207). What do they have in common? What separates them? Both are considered jazz poems; do you agree? Explain.
2. Imagine the scene at the poetry reading set to jazz that Whitney Balliett describes in "Daddy-O" (p. 1202). How might it be similar to the scene Donald Barthelme sets in "The King of Jazz" (p. 1204)? What seems genuine in each? What might be pretentious?
3. The poet Robert Pinsky, quoted in Michael Segall's The Devil's Horn (p. 1209), said in an interview, "In jazz, as in poetry, there's always the play between what's regular and what's wild." What might Robert O'Meally (p. 1194) consider to be the "play between what's regular and what's wild" in both poetry and jazz?

4. Looking at the selection from the prologue of Invisible Man (p. 1201), try to identify some of the qualities that caused Gerald Early (p. 1189) to consider it the quintessential "'jazz' novel" (par. 6).

5. Compare and contrast William Henry Johnson's Jitterbuggers VI (p. 1200) to Stuart Davis's Swing Landscape (p. 1199). How do they reflect the changes in jazz music as it moved from the familiar tunes of the American songbook to the abstractions of bebop and hard bop?

Entering the Conversation

As you respond to each of the following prompts, support your position with appropriate evidence, including at least three sources in this Conversation on the influence of jazz, unless otherwise indicated.

1. Choose one of the poems, excerpts from fiction, or works of art in this Conversation and analyze its style using the three elements Robert O'Meally considers essential to jazz. Make an argument for or against the piece as a work of jazz.

2. Winthrop Sargeant was the New Yorker's critic for both jazz and classical music for many years. He was notoriously crotchety and very hard on jazz. In the conclusion of his 1946 book, Jazz, Hot and Hybrid, he concludes, "Meanwhile jazz, as a rip-snorting stimulant to the social life of a restless, energetic people, need offer no apologies. It is rapidly becoming the world's most universally welcomed popular art form. And there can be no doubt that the world is the richer for it." Analyze this statement, looking carefully for a subtext or second layer of meaning, and then write an essay in which you support, challenge, or qualify Sargeant's conclusion about jazz. Use the sources here, as well as your own listening experiences, as evidence.

3. The poet and essayist Kevin Young writes in The Grey Album, a collection of his essays, that modernism often > masked a form of anxiety. Rather than a comfort with progress — that American ideal — modernism itself may represent an apprehension about precisely that progress. Part of the blues' brood, jazz was and remains for many a site of this anxiety. While the music was seen as hectic, jumpy, and symptomatic, jazz is actually the diagnosis: we've all come down with a serious case of modernism. In its self-consciousness jazz mirrors modernism; in its willingness to refer to itself (especially later, in bebop), jazz foreshadows the growing self-reflexivity found in the postmodern era and art over the course of the last century.

Using the sources here, as well as your knowledge of music and art of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, write an essay about how anxiety is both depicted in art and music and, perhaps, how anxiety drives the creation of art and music.

4. In The History of Jazz, Ted Gioia notes the influence of the mythology of jazz, one that he says "romanticized the jazz life and celebrated its leading practitioners as defiant, rebellious youths determined to go their own way in music, as in other pursuits." What evidence do you see of that sense of rebellion in the works in this Conversation? Consider that several of the artists and musicians discussed here had problems with drug or alcohol abuse or lived on the margins of society, some even dying unknown and impoverished. Write an essay in which you argue for or against the idea that an artist's difficult personal life adds credence or value to his or her art.

5. Most fans of jazz agree that the most universally appealing quality of the music is its sense of swing, which is hard to define but might be that quality that makes you tap your feet or nod your head. Write an essay about how the works in this Conversation, and other jazz-inspired works you know, "swing."

Conversation

Japanese Internment and Reparations: Making It Right?

The Japanese bombing of Pearl Harbor on the morning of December 7, 1941, precipitated the entrance of the United States into World War II; it also began a series of events that resulted in 120,000 Japanese Americans being interned in camps operated by the War Relocation Authority. Soon after the bombing, more than two thousand men suspected of espionage or sabotage — "enemy aliens," as these Japanese Americans were called — were arrested by the FBI. Within a few months, fear that Japanese Americans' loyalty lay with Japan increased, stoked by comments such as that of Lieutenant General John L. DeWitt, commander of the Western Defense Command, who said, "The Japanese race is an enemy race, and racial affinities are not severed by migration." Early in 1942, President Franklin D. Roosevelt issued Executive Order 9066, authorizing the war department to designate military areas from which "any and all persons may be excluded."

After the war, most of these interned citizens returned to their homes, having suffered financial losses, disruption of education and careers, and deep psychological wounds. Court cases questioning the constitutionality of the relocation camps reached as high as the Supreme Court. In Korematsu v. United States, the Court did not rule the action unconstitutional but did issue the precedent-setting statement that "all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect. . . . Courts must subject them to the most rigid scrutiny."

Ultimately, it was in 1988, with the passage of the Civil Liberties Act, that Congress authorized a presidential apology to Japanese Americans. The act acknowledges that "a grave injustice was done to both citizens and permanent resident aliens of Japanese ancestry" and that ". . . these actions were carried out without adequate security reasons and without any acts of espionage or sabotage documented . . . and were motivated largely by racial prejudice, wartime hysteria, and a failure of political leadership." In compensation for the "enormous damages, both material and intangible," the act also provided for payment of $20,000 in reparations for each surviving internee.

Many argue that the case of Japanese Americans sets a precedent and that other groups who have suffered unjust treatment, such as African Americans, also deserve reparations. The texts in this Conversation will acquaint you with the circumstances and viewpoints surrounding the Japanese internment, will present several arguments both for and against reparations for African Americans, and will ask you to explore whether it is possible to right the wrongs of the past and whether providing financial compensation to wronged individuals or institutions is an appropriate and effective way to do so.

Sources

Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Executive Order No. 9066 (1942)
Western Defense Command, Evacuation Order (1942)
Dorothea Lange, I Am an American (1942)
Julie Otsuka, from When the Emperor Was Divine (2002)
George H. W. Bush, Letter of Apology (1991)
Eric K. Yamamoto, from Racial Reparations: Japanese American Redress and African American Claims (1998)
Brent Staples, The Slave Reparations Movement Adopts the Rhetoric of Victimhood (2001)
Charles Ogletree Jr., Litigating the Legacy of Slavery (2002)
Henry Louis Gates Jr., Ending the Slavery Blame-Game (2010)

Executive Order No. 9066

Franklin Delano Roosevelt

Franklin Delano Roosevelt (1882–1945) was the thirty-second president of the United States (1933–1945) and led the nation through World War II. Following is the legal document he signed that allowed for the internment of Japanese Americans in militarily sensitive areas, a designation that, according to General John DeWitt, encompassed the "Pacific Coast" and "the vicinity thereof."

The President has signed the following Executive Order:

AUTHORIZING THE SECRETARY OF WAR TO PRESCRIBE MILITARY AREAS
9066

WHEREAS the successful prosecution of the war requires every possible protection against espionage and against sabotage to national-defense material, national-defense premises, and national-defense utilities as defined in Section 4, Act of April 20, 1918, 40 Stat. 533, as amended by the Act of November 30, 1940, 54 Stat. 1220, and the Act of August 21, 1941, 55 Stat. 655 (U.S.C., Title 50, Sec. 104):

NOW, THEREFORE, by virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States, and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, I hereby authorize and direct the Secretary of War, and the Military Commanders whom he may from time to time designate, whenever he or any designated Commander deems such action necessary or desirable, to prescribe military areas in such places and of such extent as he or the appropriate Military Commander may determine, from which any or all persons may be excluded, and with respect to which, the right of any person to enter, remain in, or leave shall be subject to whatever restrictions the Secretary of War or the appropriate Military Commander may impose in his discretion. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to provide for residents of any such area who are excluded therefrom, such transportation, food, shelter, and other accommodations as may be necessary, in the judgment of the Secretary of War or the said Military Commander, and until other arrangements are made, to accomplish the purpose of this order. The designation of military areas in any region or locality shall supersede designations of prohibited and restricted areas by the Attorney General under the Proclamations of December 7 and 8, 1941, and shall supersede the responsibility and authority of the Attorney General under the said Proclamations in respect of such prohibited and restricted areas.

I hereby further authorize and direct the Secretary of War and the said Military Commanders to take such other steps as he or the appropriate Military Commander may deem advisable to enforce compliance with the restrictions applicable to each Military area hereinabove authorized to be designated, including the use of Federal troops and other Federal Agencies, with authority to accept assistance of state and local agencies.

I hereby further authorize and direct all Executive Departments, independent establishments and other Federal Agencies, to assist the Secretary of War or the said Military Commanders in carrying out this Executive Order, including the furnishing of medical aid, hospitalization, food, clothing, transportation, use of land, shelter, and other supplies, equipment, utilities, facilities, and services.

This order shall not be construed as modifying or limiting in any way the authority heretofore granted under Executive Order No. 8972, dated December 12, 1941, nor shall it be construed as limiting or modifying the duty and responsibility of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, with respect to the investigation of alleged acts of sabotage or the duty and responsibility of the Attorney General and the Department of Justice under the Proclamations of December 7 and 8, 1941, prescribing regulations for the conduct and control of alien enemies, except as such duty and responsibility is superseded by the designation of Military areas hereunder.

Franklin D. Roosevelt
The White House,
February 19, 1942.

Questions

1. What justification for this executive order does President Roosevelt cite?
2. This document was issued nearly two months after the United States declared war on Japan. What domestic actions does the president as commander in chief authorize in this document?
3. What responsibilities does the president designate to assure the protection and care of those affected by this order?
4. Why do you think that a particular ethnic group, such as the Japanese, is never mentioned in this order? Does that omission lessen the impact of the prejudice against them?
5. Given the official and legal language of this document, what leeway does the secretary of war have in the treatment of "alien enemies" (par. 5)?

Evacuation Order

Western Defense Command

During the spring of 1942, 108 evacuation orders directed the removal of Japanese Americans in California, Washington, Oregon, and parts of Arizona. These were issued under the name of General John L. DeWitt, head of the Western Defense Command. Some of these notices appeared in newspapers, but most were posted in high-visibility places, such as on billboards and community buildings. Families were given one week to prepare. The two-step process began with the affected Japanese being transported to one of sixteen "assembly centers" near their homes and then sent to one of ten "relocation centers." The following evacuation order was issued in San Francisco on May 7, 1942.

WESTERN DEFENSE COMMAND AND FOURTH ARMY
WARTIME CIVIL CONTROL ADMINISTRATION

Presidio of San Francisco, California
May 7, 1942

INSTRUCTIONS TO ALL PERSONS OF JAPANESE ANCESTRY

Living in the Following Area:

All of the City of Sacramento, State of California.

Pursuant to the provisions of Civilian Exclusion Order No. 52, this Headquarters, dated May 7, 1942, all persons of Japanese ancestry, both alien and non-alien, will be evacuated from the above area by 12 o'clock noon P.W.T, Saturday, May 16, 1942.

No Japanese person living in the above area will be permitted to change residence after 12 o'clock noon, P.W.T, Thursday, May 7, 1942, without obtaining special permission from the representative of the Commanding General, Northern California Sector, at the Civil Control Station located at:

Civic Memorial Auditorium,
Fifteenth and I Streets,
Sacramento, California.

Such permits will only be granted for the purpose of uniting members of a family, or in cases of grave emergency.

The Civil Control Station is equipped to assist the Japanese population affected by this evacuation in the following ways:

1. Give advice and instructions on the evacuation.
2. Provide services with respect to the management, leasing, sale, storage or other disposition of most kinds of property including real estate, business and professional equipment, household goods, boats, automobiles and livestock.
3. Provide temporary residence elsewhere for all Japanese in family groups.
4. Transport persons and a limited amount of clothing and equipment to their new residence.

The Following Instructions Must Be Observed:

1. A responsible member of each family, preferably the head of the family, or the person in whose name most of the property is held, and each individual living alone, will report to the Civil Control Station to receive further instructions. This must be done between 8:00 a.m. and 5:00 p.m. on Friday, May 8, 1942, or between 8:00 a.m. and 5 p.m. on Saturday, May 9, 1942, or between 8:00 a.m. and 5 p.m. on Sunday, May 10, 1942.
2. Evacuees must carry with them on departure for the Assembly Center, the following property:
   (a) Bedding and linens (no mattress) for each member of the family;

(b) Toilet articles for each member of the family;
(c) Extra clothing for each member of the family;
(d) Sufficient knives, forks, spoons, plates, bowls and cups for each member of the family;
(e) Essential personal effects for each member of the family.

All items carried will be securely packaged, tied and plainly marked with the name of the owner and numbered in accordance with instructions received at the Civil Control Station. The size and number of packages is limited to that which can be carried by the individual or family group.

No contraband items as described in paragraph 6, Public Proclamation No. 3, Headquarters Western Defense Command and Fourth Army, dated March 24, 1942, will be carried.

3. No pets of any kind will be permitted.
4. No personal items and no household goods will be shipped to the Assembly Center.
5. The United States Government through its agencies will provide for the storage, at the sole risk of the owner, of the more substantial household items, such as iceboxes, washing machines, pianos and other heavy furniture. Cooking utensils and other small items will be accepted if crated, packed and plainly marked with the name and address of the owner. Only one name and address will be used by a given family.
6. Each family, and individual living alone, will be furnished transportation to the Assembly Center or will be authorized to travel by private automobile in a supervised group. All instructions pertaining to the movement will be obtained at the Civil Control Station.

Go to the Civil Control Station between the hours of 8:00 a.m. and 5:00 p.m., Friday, May 8, 1942, or between the hours of 8:00 a.m. and 5 p.m., Saturday, May 9, 1942, or between the hours of 8:00 a.m. and 5 p.m., Sunday, May 10, 1942, to receive further instructions.

J. L. DeWitt
Lieutenant General, U.S. Army Commanding

Questions

1. What is the meaning of the designation "all persons of Japanese ancestry, both alien and non-alien"?
2. According to this document, in what ways is the Civil Control Station able "to assist the Japanese population"?
3. How long does each family have to "register" at the Civil Control Center?
4. What is each family permitted to take with them? What provision is made for belongings and property that cannot be taken along?
5. What recourse do Japanese individuals or families who wish to request an exception or accommodation have, according to this document?
6. What euphemisms do you note in this document?

I Am an American

Dorothea Lange

Dorothea Lange (1895–1965) was a famous documentary-style photographer, known for her work with the Farm Security Administration during the Depression era. This photograph was taken in March 1942. The owner of the store, a Japanese American and graduate of the University of California, placed the sign in his window the day after the bombing of Pearl Harbor; he was later sent to one of the relocation camps.

Prints and Photographs Division, Library of Congress

Questions

1. What do you see in this photograph? Describe it as objectively as possible without relying on any background knowledge.
2. This is a still photo, not one taken in a hurried moment to capture action in progress. What issues, ideas, or meaning do you think Dorothea Lange suggests through her composition?
3. This photo has achieved iconic status in photojournalism and in the story of the Japanese internment. Why? What makes it so memorable — and representative?

from When the Emperor Was Divine

Julie Otsuka

Julie Otsuka (b. 1962) is an award-winning Japanese American author who grew up in California and received a BA from Yale University and an MFA from Columbia University. "Evacuation Order No. 19" is the opening chapter of her first novel, When the Emperor Was Divine (2002), which is based on her family history: her grandfather was arrested by the FBI as a suspected spy for Japan the day after the bombing of Pearl Harbor, and her grandmother, mother, and uncle spent three years in an internment camp in Topaz, Utah. Otsuka's most recent novel is The Buddha in the Attic (2011).

The sign had appeared overnight. On billboards and trees and the backs of the bus-stop benches. It hung in the window of Woolworth's. It hung by the entrance to the YMCA. It was stapled to the door of the municipal court and nailed, at eye level, to every telephone pole along University Avenue. The woman was returning a book to the library when she saw the sign in a post office window. It was a sunny day in Berkeley in the spring of 1942 and she was wearing new glasses and could see everything clearly for the first time in weeks. She no longer had to squint but she squinted out of habit anyway. She read the sign from top to bottom and then, still squinting, she took out a pen and read the sign from top to bottom again. The print was small and dark. Some of it was tiny. She wrote down a few words on the back of a bank receipt, then turned around and went home and began to pack.

When the overdue notice from the library arrived in the mail nine days later she still had not finished packing. The children had just left for school and boxes and suitcases were scattered across the floor of the house. She tossed the envelope into the nearest suitcase and walked out the door.

Outside the sun was warm and the palm fronds were clacking idly against the side of the house. She pulled on her white silk gloves and began to walk east on Ashby. She crossed California Street and bought several bars of Lux soap and a large jar of face cream at the Rumford Pharmacy. She passed the thrift shop and the boarded-up grocery but saw no one she knew on the sidewalk. At the newsstand on the corner of Grove she bought a copy of the Berkeley Gazette. She scanned the headlines quickly. The Burma Road had been severed and one of the Dionne quintuplets — Yvonne — was still recovering from an ear operation. Sugar rationing would begin on Tuesday. She folded the paper in half but was careful not to let the ink darken her gloves.

At Lundy's Hardware she stopped and looked at the display of victory garden shovels in the window. They were well-made shovels with sturdy metal handles and she thought, for a moment, of buying one — the price was right and she did not like to pass up a bargain. Then she remembered that she already had a shovel at home in the shed. In fact, she had two. She did not need a third. She smoothed down her dress and went into the store.

"Nice glasses," Joe Lundy said the moment she walked through the door. 5

"You think?" she asked. "I'm not used to them yet." She picked up a hammer and gripped the handle firmly. "Do you have anything bigger?" she asked. Joe Lundy said that what she had in her hand was the biggest hammer he had. She put the hammer back on the rack.

"How's your roof holding out?" he asked her.

"I think the shingles are rotting. It just sprung another leak."

"It's been a wet year."

The woman nodded. "But we've had some nice days." She walked past the venetian blinds and the blackout shades to the back of the store. She picked out two rolls of tape and a ball of twine and brought them back to the register. "Every time it rains I have to set out the bucket," she said. She put down two quarters on the counter. 10

"Nothing wrong with a bucket," said Joe Lundy. He pushed the quarters back toward her across the counter but he did not look at her. "You can pay me later," he said. Then he began to wipe the side of the register with a rag. There was a dark stain there that would not go away.

"I can pay you now," said the woman.

"Don't worry about it," said Joe Lundy. He reached into his shirt pocket and gave her two caramel candies wrapped in gold foil. "For the children," he said. She slipped the caramels into her purse but left the money. She thanked him for the candy and walked out of the store.

"That's a nice red dress," he called out after her.

She turned around and squinted at him over the top of her glasses. "Thank you," she said. "Thank you, Joe." Then the door slammed behind her and she was alone on the sidewalk and she realized that in all the years she had been going to Joe Lundy's store she had never before called him by his name. Joe. It sounded strange to her. Wrong, almost. But she had said it. She had said it out loud. She wished she had said it earlier. 15

She wiped her forehead with her handkerchief. The sun was bright and she did not like to sweat in public. She took off her glasses and crossed to the shady side of the street. At the corner of Shattuck she took the streetcar downtown. She got off at Kittredge and went into J. F. Hink's department store and asked the salesman if they had any duffel bags but they did not, they were all sold out. He had sold the last one a half-hour ago. He suggested she try J. C. Penney's but they were sold out of duffel bags there too. They were sold out of duffel bags all over town.

When she got home the woman took off her red dress and put on her faded blue one — her housedress. She twisted her hair up into a bun and put on an old pair of comfortable shoes. She had to finish packing. She rolled up the Oriental rug in the living room. She took down the mirrors. She took down the curtains and shades. She carried the tiny bonsai tree out into the yard and set it down on the grass beneath the eaves where it would not get too much shade or too much sun but just the right amount of each. She brought the wind-up Victrola and the Westminster chime clock downstairs to the basement.

Upstairs, in the boy's room, she unpinned the One World One War map of the world from the wall and folded it neatly along the crease lines. She wrapped up his stamp collection and the painted wooden Indian with the long headdress he had won at the Sacramento State Fair. She pulled out the Joe Palooka comic books from under his bed. She emptied the drawers. Some of his clothes — the clothes he would need — she left out for him to put into his suitcase later. She placed his baseball glove on his pillow. The rest of his things she put into boxes and carried into the sunroom.

The door to the girl's room was closed. Above the doorknob was a note that had not been there the day before. It said DO NOT DISTURB. The woman did not open the door. She went down the stairs and removed the pictures from the walls. There were only three: the painting of Princess Elizabeth that hung in the dining room, the picture of Jesus in the foyer, and in the kitchen, a framed reproduction of Millet's The Gleaners. She placed Jesus and the little Princess together facedown in a box. She made sure to put Jesus on top. She took The Gleaners out of its frame and looked at the picture one last time. She wondered why she had let it hang in the kitchen for so long. It bothered her, the way those peasants were forever bent over above that endless field of wheat. "Look up" she wanted to say to them. "Look up, look up!" The Gleaners, she decided, would have to go. She set the picture outside with the garbage.

In the living room she emptied all the books from the shelves except Audubon's 20
Birds of America. In the kitchen she emptied the cupboards. She set aside a few things for later that evening. Everything else — the china, the crystal, the set of ivory chopsticks her mother had sent to her fifteen years ago from Kagoshima on her wedding day — she put into boxes. She taped the boxes shut with the tape she had bought from Lundy's Hardware and carried them one by one up the stairs to the sunroom. When she was done she locked the door with two padlocks and sat down on the landing with her dress pushed up above her knees and lit a cigarette. Tomorrow she and the children would be leaving. She did not know where they were going or how long they would be gone or who would be living in their house while they were away. She knew only that tomorrow they had to go.

There were things they could take with them: bedding and linen, forks, spoons, plates, bowls, cups, clothes. These were the words she had written down on the back of the bank receipt. Pets were not allowed. That was what the sign had said.

It was late April. It was the fourth week of the fifth month of the war and the woman, who did not always follow the rules, followed the rules. She gave the cat to the Greers next door. She caught the chicken that had been running wild in the yard since the fall and snapped its neck beneath the handle of a broomstick. She plucked out the feathers and set the carcass into a pan of cold water in the sink.

By early afternoon her handkerchief was soaked. She was breathing hard and her nose was itching from the dust. Her back ached. She slipped off her shoes and massaged the bunions on her feet, then went into the kitchen and turned on the radio. Enrico Caruso was singing "La donna è mobile" again. His voice was full and sweet. She opened the icebox and took out a plate of rice balls stuffed with pickled plums. She ate them slowly as she listened to the tenor sing. The plums were dark and sour. They were just the way she liked them.

When the aria was over she turned off the radio and put two rice balls into a blue bowl. She cracked an egg over the bowl and added some salmon she had cooked the night before. She brought the bowl outside to the back porch and set it down on the steps. Her back was throbbing but she stood up straight and clapped her hands three times.

A small white dog came limping out of the trees. 25

"Eat up, White Dog," she said. White Dog was old and ailing but he knew how to eat. His head bobbed up and down above the bowl. The woman sat down beside him and watched. When the bowl was empty he looked up at her. One of his eyes was clouded over. She rubbed his stomach and his tail thumped against the wooden steps.

"Good dog," she said.

She stood up and walked across the yard and White Dog followed her. The narcissus in the garden were white with mildew and the irises were beginning to wilt. Weeds were everywhere. The woman had not mowed the grass for months. Her husband usually did that. She had not seen her husband since his arrest last December. First he had been sent to Fort Missoula, Montana, on a train and then he had been transferred to Fort Sam Houston, Texas. Every few days he was allowed to write her a letter. Usually he told her about the weather. The weather at Fort Sam Houston was fine. On the back of every envelope was stamped "Censored, War Department," or "Detained Alien Enemy Mail."

The woman sat down on a rock beneath the persimmon tree. White Dog lay at her feet and closed his eyes. "White Dog," she said, "look at me." White Dog raised his head. The woman was his mistress and he did whatever she asked. She put on her white silk gloves and took out a roll of twine. "Now just keep looking at me," she said. She tied White Dog to the tree. "You've been a good dog," she said. "You've been a good white dog."

Somewhere in the distance a telephone rang. White Dog barked. "Hush," she said. 30 White Dog grew quiet. "Now roll over," she said. White Dog rolled over and looked up at her with his good eye. "Play dead," she said. White Dog turned his head to the side and closed his eyes. His paws went limp. The woman picked up the large shovel that was leaning against the trunk of the tree. She lifted it high in the air with both hands and brought the blade down swiftly on his head. White Dog's body shuddered twice and his hind legs kicked out into the air, as though he were trying to run. Then he grew still. A trickle of blood seeped out from the corner of his mouth. She untied him from the tree and let out a deep breath. The shovel had been the right choice. Better, she thought, than a hammer.

Beneath the tree she began to dig a hole. The soil was hard on top but soft and loamy beneath the surface. It gave way easily. She plunged the shovel into the earth again and again until the hole was deep. She picked up White Dog and dropped him into the hole. His body was not heavy. It hit the earth with a quiet thud. She pulled off her gloves and looked at them. They were no longer white. She dropped them into the hole and picked up the shovel again. She filled up the hole. The sun was hot and the only place there was any shade was beneath the trees. The woman was standing beneath the trees. She was forty-one and tired. The back of her dress was drenched with sweat.

National Archives photo

The author's family at the Tanforan Assembly Center (Dorothea Lange/National Archives)

She brushed her hair out of her eyes and leaned against the tree. Everything looked the same except the earth was a little darker where the hole had been. Darker and wetter. She plucked a leaf from a low-hanging branch and went back inside the house.

When the children came home from school she reminded them that early the next morning they would be leaving. Tomorrow they were going on a trip. They could bring with them only what they could carry.

"I already know that," said the girl. She wore a white cotton frock with tiny blue anchors and her hair was pulled back in two tight black braids. She tossed her books onto the sofa and told the woman that her teacher, Mr. Rutherford, had talked for an entire hour about prime numbers and coniferous trees.

"Do you know what a coniferous tree is?" the girl asked.

The woman had to admit that she did not. "Tell me," she said, but the girl just shook her head no.

"I'll tell you later," said the girl. She was ten years old and she knew what she liked. Boys and black licorice and Dorothy Lamour. Her favorite song on the radio was "Don't Fence Me In." She adored her pet macaw. She went to the bookshelf and took down Birds of America. She balanced the book on her head and walked slowly, her spine held erect, up the stairs to her room.

A few seconds later there was a loud thump and the book came tumbling back down the stairs. The boy looked up at his mother. He was seven and a small black fedora was tilted to one side of his head. "She has to stand up straighter," he said softly. He went to the foot of the stairs and stared at the book. It had landed face open to a picture of a small brown bird. A marsh wren. "You have to stand up straighter," he shouted.

"It's not that," came the girl's reply, "it's my head."

"What's wrong with your head?" shouted the boy.

"Too round. Too round on top."

He closed the book and turned to his mother. "Where's White Dog?" he asked.

He went out to the porch and clapped his hands three times.

"White Dog?" he yelled. He clapped his hands again. "White Dog!" He called out several more times, then went back inside and stood beside the woman in the kitchen. She was slicing apples. Her fingers were long and white and they knew how to hold a knife. "That dog just gets deafer every day," he said.

He sat down and turned the radio on and off, on and off, while she arranged the apples on a plate. The Radio City Symphony was performing the last movement of Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture. Cymbals were crashing. Cannons boomed. She set the plate down in front of the boy. "Eat," she said. He reached for a slice of apple just as the audience burst into applause. "Bravo," they shouted, "bravo, bravo!" The boy turned the dial to see if he could find Speaking of Sports but all he could find was the news and a Sammy Kaye serenade. He turned off the radio and took another slice of apple from the plate.

"It's so hot in here," he said.

"Take off your hat then," said the woman but the boy refused. The hat was a present from his father. It was big on him but the boy wore it every day. She poured him a glass of cold barley water and he drank it all in one gulp.

The girl came into the kitchen and went to the macaw's cage by the stove. She leaned over and put her face close to the bars. "Tell me something," she said.

The bird fluffed his wings and danced from side to side on his perch. "Baaaak," he said.

"That's not what I wanted to hear," said the girl.

"Take off your hat," said the bird.

The girl sat down and the woman gave her a glass of cold barley water and a long silver spoon. The girl licked the spoon and stared at her reflection. Her head was upside down. She dipped the spoon into the sugar bowl.

"Is there anything wrong with my face?" she asked.

"Why?" said the woman.

"People were staring."

"Come over here," said the woman.

The girl stood up and walked over to her mother.

"Let me look at you."

"You took down the mirrors," the girl said.

"I had to. I had to put them away."

"Tell me how I look."

The woman ran her hands across the girl's face. "You look fine," she said. "You have a fine nose."

"What else?" asked the girl.

"You have a fine set of teeth."

"Teeth don't count."

"Teeth are essential."

The woman began to rub the girl's shoulders. She told the girl to lean back and close her eyes and then she pressed her fingers deep into the girl's neck until she felt her begin to relax. "If there was something wrong with my face," the girl asked, "would you tell me?"

"Turn around," the woman said.

The girl turned around.

"Now look at me."

The girl looked at her.

"You have the most beautiful face I have ever seen."

"You're just saying that."

"No, I mean it."

The boy turned on the radio. The weatherman was giving the forecast for the next day. He was predicting rain and cooler temperatures. "Sit down and drink your water," the boy said to his sister. "Don't forget to take your umbrella tomorrow," said the weatherman.

The girl sat down. She drank her barley water and began to tell the woman all about coniferous trees. Most of them were evergreens but some were just shrubs. Not all of them had cones. Some of them, like the yew, only had seedpods.

"That's good to know," said the woman. Then she stood up and told the girl it was time to practice the piano for Thursday's lesson.

"Do I have to?"

The woman thought for a moment. "No," she said, "only if you want to."

"Tell me I have to."

"I can't."

The girl went out to the living room and sat down on the piano bench. "The metronome's gone," she called out.

"Just count to yourself then," said the woman.

". . . Three, five, seven . . ." The girl put down her knife and paused. They were eating supper at the table. Outside it was dusk. The sky was dark purple and a breeze was blowing in off the bay. Hundreds of jays were twittering madly in the Greers' magnolia tree next door. A drop of rain fell on the ledge above the kitchen sink and the woman stood up and closed the window.

"Eleven, thirteen," said the girl. She was practicing her prime numbers for Monday's test.

"Sixteen?" said the boy. 85

"No," said the girl. "Sixteen's got a square root."

"I forgot," said the boy. He picked up a drumstick and began to eat.

"You never knew," said the girl.

"Forty-one," said the boy. "Eighty-six." He wiped his mouth with a napkin. "Twelve," he added.

The girl looked at him. Then she turned to her mother. "There's something wrong 90 with this chicken," she said. "It's too tough." She put down her fork. "I can't swallow another bite."

"Don't, then," said the woman.

"I'll eat it," said the boy. He plucked a wing from his sister's plate and put it into his mouth. He ate the whole thing. Then he spit out the bones and asked his mother where they were going the next day.

"I don't know," the woman said.

The girl stood up and left the table. She sat down at the piano and began to play a piece by Debussy from memory. "Golliwogg's Cake Walk." The melody was slow and simple. She had played it at a recital the summer before. Her father had sat in the front row of the audience and when she was finished he had clapped and clapped. She played the piece all the way through without missing a note. When she began to play it a second time the boy got up and went to his room and began to pack.

The first thing he put inside of his suitcase was his baseball glove. He slipped it 95 into the large pocket with the red satin lining. The pocket bulged. He threw in his clothes and tried to close the lid but the suitcase was very full. He sat on top of it and the lid sank down slowly. Suddenly he stood up again. The lid sprang open. There was something he had forgotten. He went to the closet in the hall and brought back his polka-dotted umbrella. He held it out at arm's length and shook his head sadly. The umbrella was too long. There was no way it would fit inside the suitcase.

The woman stood alone in the kitchen, washing her hands. The children had gone to bed and the house was quiet. The pipes were still hot from the day and the water from the faucet was warm. She could hear thunder in the distance — thunder and, from somewhere far off in the night, the faint wail of a siren. She looked out the window above the sink. The sky was still clear and she could see a full moon through the branches of the maple tree. The maple was a sapling with delicate leaves that turned bright red in the fall. Her husband had planted it for her four summers ago. She turned off the tap and looked around for the dish towel but it was not there. She had already packed the towels. They were in the suitcase by the door in the hall.

She dried her hands on the front of her dress and went to the birdcage. She lifted off the green cloth and undid the wire clasp on the door. "Come on out," she said. The bird stepped cautiously onto her hand and looked at her. "It's only me," she said. The bird blinked. His eyes were black and bulbous. They had no center.

"Get over here," he said, "get over here now." He sounded just like her husband. If she closed her eyes she could easily imagine that her husband was right there in the room with her.

The woman did not close her eyes. She knew exactly where her husband was. He was sleeping on a cot — a cot or maybe a bunk bed — somewhere in a tent at Fort Sam Houston where the weather was always fine. She pictured him lying there with one arm flung across his eyes and then she kissed the top of the bird's head.

"I am right here," she said. "I am right here, right now." 100

She gave the bird a sunflower seed and he cracked the shell open in his beak. "Get over here," he said again.

She opened the window and set the bird out on the ledge.

"You're all right," the bird said.

She stroked the underside of his chin and he closed his eyes. "Silly bird," she whispered. She closed the window and locked it. Now the bird was outside on the other side of the glass. He tapped the pane three times with his claw and said something but she did not know what it was. She could not hear him anymore.

She rapped back. 105

"Go," she said. The bird flapped his wings and flew up into the maple tree. She grabbed the broom from behind the stove and went outside and shook the branches of the tree. A spray of water fell from the leaves. "Go," she shouted. "Get on out of here."

The bird spread his wings and flew off into the night.

She went back inside the kitchen and took out a bottle of plum wine from beneath the sink. Without the bird in the cage, the house felt empty. She sat down on the floor and put the bottle to her lips. She swallowed once and looked at the place on the wall where The Gleaners had hung. The white rectangle was glowing in the moonlight. She stood up and traced around its edges with her finger and began to laugh — quietly at first, but soon her shoulders were heaving and she was gasping for breath. She put down the bottle and waited for the laughter to stop but it would not, it kept on coming until finally the tears were running down her cheeks. She picked up the bottle again and drank. The wine was dark and sweet. She had made it herself last fall. She took out her handkerchief and wiped her mouth. Her lips left a dark stain on the cloth. She put the cork back into the bottle and pushed it in as far as it would go. "La donna è mobile," she sang to herself as she went down the stairs to the basement. She hid the bottle behind the old rusted furnace where no one would ever find it.

In the middle of the night the boy crawled into her bed and asked her, over and over again, "What is that funny noise? What is that funny noise?"

The woman smoothed down his black hair. "Rain," she whispered. 110

The boy understood. He fell asleep at once. The thunder had come and gone and except for the sound of the rain the house was now quiet. The woman lay awake worrying about the leaky roof. Her husband had meant to fix it but he never had. She got up and placed a tin bucket on the floor to catch the water. She felt better after she did that. She climbed back into bed beside the boy and pulled the blanket up around his shoulders. He was chewing in his sleep and she wondered if he was hungry. Then she remembered the candy in her purse. The caramels. She had forgotten about the caramels. What would Joe Lundy say? He would tell her she was wearing a nice red dress. He would tell her not to worry about it. She knew that. She closed her eyes. She would give the caramels to the children in the morning. That was what she would do. She whispered a silent prayer to herself and drifted off to sleep as the water dripped steadily into the bucket. The boy shrugged off the blanket and rolled up against the wall where it was cool. In a few hours he and the girl and their mother would wake up and go to the Civil Control Station at the First Congregational Church on Channing Way. Then they would pin their identification numbers to their collars and grab their suitcases and climb up onto the bus and go to wherever it was they had to go.

(2002)

Questions

1. This introductory chapter opens with a reference to a "sign," though Otsuka does not reveal its import. At the end of the first paragraph, do you as a reader have any idea what the sign is about or foretells? When do you begin to realize that something about this seemingly ordinary "sunny day in Berkeley in the spring of 1942" is definitely not ordinary?
2. The mother gives the family's cat away and frees their pet bird, but she kills and buries the dog. Why? Why do you think Otsuka provides such a graphic description of the act?
3. Otsuka juxtaposes everyday events, such as going to the hardware store, with strange, sometimes ominous details, such as stores "all over town" being "sold out of duffel bags" (par. 16). What other odd juxtapositions begin to alert the reader that something sinister is occurring or is about to occur?
4. After the children have gone to bed, the mother drinks plum wine and begins to laugh, "quietly at first, but soon her shoulders were heaving and she was gasping for breath" (par. 108). She laughs until she cries. What does this uncharacteristic behavior say about her state of mind at this point?
5. Instead of giving her characters specific names, Otsuka refers to them here (and throughout the novel) as "the woman," "the girl," "the boy," and "the father." How does this lack of a particular name affect your relationship to each character?
6. How does the language — word choice and syntax — in this opening chapter of the novel contribute to the impression that the woman's control over the situation at hand and her own emotions is precarious?

Letter of Apology

George H. W. Bush

In 1988, the Civil Liberties Act was passed, calling for a formal presidential apology and authorizing reparations of $20,000 for each surviving internee who was a U.S. citizen or legal resident immigrant at the time of internment. The following letter accompanied each $20,000 check.

A monetary sum and words alone cannot restore lost years or erase painful memories; neither can they fully convey our Nation's resolve to rectify injustice and to uphold the rights of individuals. We can never fully right the wrongs of the past. But we can take a clear stand for justice and recognize that serious injustices were done to Japanese Americans during World War II.

In enacting a law calling for restitution and offering a sincere apology, your fellow Americans have, in a very real sense, renewed their traditional commitment to the ideals of freedom, equality, and justice. You and your family have our best wishes for the future.

Sincerely,
George Bush
President of the United States
(1991)

Questions

1. How would you describe the tone of this letter? Cite specific words and structural elements. What is the effect of including the phrase "in a very real sense" (par. 2)?
2. What acknowledgment does the letter make? What does it not acknowledge? Is emphasis placed on the individual or the community — in terms of both responsibility and restitution?
3. President Ronald Reagan, who signed the Civil Liberties Act of 1988, made the following comment: "Yes, the nation was then at war, struggling for its survival. And it's not for us today to pass judgment upon those who may have made mistakes while engaged in that great struggle. Yet we must recognize that the internment of Japanese Americans was just that, a mistake." Do you think that this comment (or a paraphrase expressing the same point) should have been included as part of the letter? Why or why not?

from Racial Reparations
Japanese American Redress and African American Claims

Eric K. Yamamoto

Eric K. Yamamoto holds the Korematsu Professorship of Law and Social Justice at the University of Hawaii at Manoa. He was part of the legal team in the Supreme Court case Korematsu v. United States, has won numerous teaching awards, and has written books and articles on racial justice and redress. The following excerpts are taken from a special issue of the Boston College Third World Law Journal on "The Long Shadow of Korematsu."

In 1991 the United States Office of Redress Administration presented the first $20,000 reparations check to the oldest Hawai'i survivor of the Japanese American internment camps. I attended the stately ceremony. The mood, while serious, was decidedly upbeat. Tears of relief mixed with sighs of joy. Freed at last.

Amidst the celebration I reflected on the Japanese American redress process and wondered about its impacts over time. The process had been arduous, with twists and turns. Many Japanese Americans contributed,[1] and their communities overwhelmingly considered reparations a great victory, as did I.

Other racial groups lent support, often in the form of political endorsements. Support also came as ringing oratory — for instance, the moving speech on the floor of the House of Representatives by African American Congressperson Ron Dellums.[2] Yet some of the support seemed begrudging. One African American scholar observed,

> [t]he apology [to Japanese Americans] was so appropriate and the payment so justified . . . that the source of my ambivalent reaction was at first difficult to identify. After some introspection, I guiltily discovered that my sentiments were related to a very dark, brooding feeling that I had fought long and hard to conquer — inferiority. A feeling that took first root in the soil of "Why them and not me."[3]

This confession led me to ask about what political role Japanese Americans might play in future struggles for racial justice in America. That question then led to my essay in 1992 about the social meanings of Japanese American redress. The essay started with the recognition that Japanese American beneficiaries of reparations benefited personally, sometimes profoundly. The trauma of racial incarceration, without charges or trial, and the lingering self-doubt over two generations left scars on the soul. The government's apology and bestowal of symbolic reparations fostered long overdue healing for many. As I observed then, redress was:

> cathartic for internees. A measure of dignity was restored. Former internees could finally talk about the internment. Feelings long repressed, surfaced. One woman,

---

[1]See Takeshi Nakayma, Historic Chapter Closes, Rafu Shimpo, Aug. 10, 1998, 1, 3. Contributors to Japanese American redress included the Japanese American Citizens League (JACL), the National Coalition for Japanese American Redress, numerous elected officials, and grassroots organizers.

[2]See 133 Cong. Rec. H7555, H7576–77 (daily ed. Sept. 17, 1987) (statement of Rep. Dellums), 135 Cong. Rec. H7597, H7626–27 (daily ed. Aug. 4, 1988) (statement of Rep. Dellums). In support of an amendment to the Related Agencies Appropriations Act of 1990 concerning the Civil Liberties Act of 1988, Dellums recalled:

> I participated in the debate that gave rise to the authorizing legislation. For some of us in this Chamber, that was a very painful debate for me, a very emotional debate. Hopefully, for all of us it was a debate full of principle[,] integrity and compassion. . . .
>
> Mr. Speaker, I urge support of the amendment before us. This is a matter of high principle, and those of us who recall the debate on the floor remember there were tears in the House Chamber, and there was conflict, agony, and pain in this Chamber.

135 Cong. Rec. H7595–02, H7626-27 (daily ed. Oct. 26, 1989) (statement of Rep. Dellums).

[3]Vincene Verdun, If the Shoe Fits, Wear It: An Analysis of Reparations to African Americans, 67 Tul. L. Rev. 597, 647 (1993).

> now in her sixties, stated that she always felt the internment was wrong, but that, after being told by the military, the President and the Supreme Court that it was a necessity, she had come seriously to doubt herself. Redress and reparations and the recent successful court challenges, she said, had now freed her soul.

But, I wondered, what were the long-term societal effects of reparations — the social legacy of Japanese American redress beyond personal benefits? Would societal attitudes toward Asian Americans and other racial minorities change? Would institutions, especially those that curtailed civil liberties in the name of national security, be restructured? Would Japanese American reparations serve as a catalyst for redress for others?

I identified and critiqued two emerging and seemingly contradictory views of reparations for Japanese Americans and then offered a third. The first view was that redress demonstrates that America does the right thing, that the Constitution works (if belatedly) and that the United States is far along on its march to racial justice for all. I criticized that view as unrealistically bright.

> The criticism is not that reparations are insignificant for recipients; the criticism is that they can lead to an "adjustment of individual attitudes" towards the historical injustice of the internment without giving current "consideration to the fundamental realities of power." The "danger lies in the possibility of enabling people to 'feel good' about each other" for the moment, "while leaving undisturbed the attendant social realities" creating the underlying conflict.

The second view was that "reparations legislation has the potential of becoming a civil rights law that at best delivers far less than it promises and that at worst creates illusions of progress, functioning as a hegemonic device to preserve the status quo." I criticized that view as overly dark.

As part of this critique, and drawing upon critical race theory insights, I offered a third view.

> [R]eparations legislation and court rulings in cases such as [the] Korematsu [coram nobis case] do not . . . inevitably lead to a restructuring of governmental institutions, a changing of societal attitudes or a transformation of social relationships, and the dangers of illusory progress and co-optation are real. At the same time, reparations claims, and the rights discourse they engender in attempts to harness the power of the state, can and should be appreciated as intensely powerful and calculated political acts that challenge racial assumptions underlying past and present social arrangements. They bear potential for contributing to institutional and attitudinal restructuring. . . .[4]

---

[4]The Korematsu coram nobis litigation in 1983–84 reopened the United States Supreme Court's decision in the original Korematsu case in 1944 which upheld the constitutionality of the internment. Korematsu v. U.S., 584 F. Supp. 1406 (N.D.Cal. 1984). Based on recently discovered World War II documents showing the absence of military necessity for the internment and the Justice Department's wilful misrepresentations to the Court, the federal district court found a manifest injustice and set aside Fred Korematsu's conviction for refusing to abide by the military's exclusion orders. See id. at 1417.

In light of this third view, I posited that the social meaning of Japanese American redress was yet to be determined. I suggested that the key to the legacy of redress was how Japanese Americans acted when faced with continuing racial subordination of African Americans, Native Americans, Native Hawaiians, Latinas/os, and Asian Americans. Would we draw upon the lessons of the reparations movement and work to end all forms of societal oppression, or would we close up shop because we got ours?

Six years have passed. During that time, the United States, indeed the world, has gone apology crazy. Japanese American redress has stimulated a spate of race apologies. Some apologies appear to reflect heartfelt recognition of historical and current injustice and are backed by reparations. Other apologies appear empty, as strategic maneuvers to release pent-up social pressure. 10

Amidst this phenomenon African Americans have renewed their call for reparations for the legally sanctioned harms of slavery and Jim Crow oppression. These renewed claims have gained momentum, perhaps more so than at any time since Reconstruction — when Congress and the President sought to confiscate Southern land and provide freed slaves with forty acres and a mule. The Florida legislature recently approved reparations for survivors and descendants of the 1923 Rosewood massacre.[5] The African American victims of the Tuskegee syphilis experiment received reparations and a presidential apology in 1997. One reparations lawsuit was filed on the West Coast and a reparations class action is contemplated on the East Coast. Representative John Conyers' resolution calling for a Congressional Reparations Study Commission, reintroduced every year since 1989, has garnered endorsements from an impressive array of political organizations.

And in every African American reparations publication, in every legal argument, in almost every discussion, the topic of Japanese American redress surfaces. Sometimes as legal precedent. Sometimes as moral compass. Sometimes as political guide. . . .

Reparations, if thoughtfully conceived, offered and administered, can be transformative. They can help change material conditions of group life and send political messages about societal commitment to principles of equality. When reparations stimulate change, however, they also generate resistance. Proponents suffer backlash. Thus, when reparations claims are treated seriously, they tend to re-create victimhood by inflaming old wounds and triggering regressive reactions. This is the dilemma of reparations.

Seeing these dual possibilities in all redress movements, Joe Singer describes the potential for further victimization in two contemporary situations.[6] He recounts

---

[5]In 1995, each of the nine African American survivors of the mayhem as a result of a white woman's false rape charge was awarded $150,000 in reparations; the descendants of Rosewood residents received between $375 and $22,535 for loss of property. See Lori Robinson, Righting a Wrong Among Black Americans: The Debate is Escalating over Whether an Apology for Slavery Is Enough, Seattle Post-Intelligencer, June 29, 1997, available in 1997 WL 3200157.

[6]See generally Joseph William Singer, Reparation (1997) (unpublished manuscript, on file with author).

Jews' highly publicized demands in 1997 that Swiss banks account for and restore Jewish money and gold held by the banks for Nazis during World War II. Bank acknowledgment and restitution treats Jews as worthy human beings with rights, including the right to own property. Restitution counters the anti-Semitic myth of Jews misappropriating the property of others. Jewish "victimhood is acknowledged, but Jews are not treated as mere victims, but as agents calling the Swiss banks to account. . . ."

One problem, however, is that Jewish demands for monetary restitution resurrect for some the harsh historical stereotypes of Jews "as money-grubbing, as having both accumulated secret bank accounts in the past and as caring now about nothing more than money. . . ." Another, and broader, problem is that additional Jewish reparations claims may spark resentment among other groups whose reparations claims have gone unmet (such as Hungarian gypsies who were exterminated by Nazis in Auschwitz and elsewhere). 15

Singer also describes reparations demands for African Americans. Some understand those demands as a call for redress of past injustice; others understand the demands as a "refusal to grow up." The result, evident in the volatile affirmative action debates, is that "calls to repair the current effects of past injustice are met with derisory denials that continuing injustice exists and that the problems of African Americans are now purely of their own making." As Singer observes about mixed healing potential in both situations, the "very thing that restoration is intended to combat may be the result of the demand for restoration." . . .

The socio-psychological benefits of apologies and reparations are often significant for recipients.[7] As previously mentioned, one woman said the Japanese American redress process had "freed her soul." Other beneficiaries responded with a collective sigh of relief. Ben Takeshita, for instance, expressed the sentiments of many when he said that although monetary payments "could not begin to compensate . . . for his . . . lost freedom, property, livelihood, or the stigma of disloyalty," the reparations demonstrated the sincerity of the government's apology.[8]

In light of both the dangers and the transformative potential of reparations, I offer two insights into specific reparations efforts, insights drawn from Japanese American redress that bear on the shape of African American reparations claims and strategy.

---

[7]According to clinical psychologist Susan Heitler, "[a]n apology is a much more complex and powerful phenomenon than most people realize[.]" Additionally, psychologist Susan T. Fisk observes,

> An apology for slavery would say it may not have been me, but it was my people or my government that did this and we now see that it was really a crime and sin. It is potentially healing. It shares responsibility for ending racism and it acknowledges that slavery has some relevance to today.

Id. See also Sharon Cohen, Americans to be Compensated for Horrors of Holocaust: Survivors Say Reparations Won't End Nightmares, San Diego Union-Trib., Apr. 6, 1997, available in 1997 WL 3126022 (for concentration camp survivor, "[r]eceiving reparations . . . would be a psychological boost").

[8]Nicholas Tavuchis, Mea Culpa: A Sociology of Apology and Reconciliation 107 (1991).

One is normative: reparations by government or groups should be aimed at a restructuring of the institutions and relationships that gave rise to the underlying justice grievance. Otherwise, as a philosophical and practical matter, reparations cannot be effective in addressing root problems of misuse of power, particularly in the maintenance of oppressive systemic structures, or integrated symbolically into a group's (or government's) moral foundation for responding to intergroup conflicts or for urging others to restructure oppressive relationships. This means that monetary reparations are important, but not simply as individual compensation. Money is important to facilitate the process of personal and community "repair" discussed below.

A second insight is descriptive: restructuring those institutions and changing societal attitudes will not flow naturally and inevitably from reparations itself. Dominant interests, whether governmental or private, will cast reparations in ways that tend to perpetuate existing power structures and relationships. Indeed, traditionally framed, American interests in racial reparations, including international credibility and domestic peace, tend to reinforce the social status quo.

Those seeking reparations need to draw on the moral force of their claims (and not frame it legally out of existence) while simultaneously radically recasting reparations in a way that both materially benefits those harmed and generally furthers some larger interests of mainstream America. Moreover, those benefiting from reparations in the past need to draw upon the material benefits of reparations and the political insights and commitments derived from their particular reparations process and join with others to push for bureaucratic, legal and attitudinal restructuring — to push for material change. And their efforts must extend beyond their own reparations to securing reparations for others. 20

These insights point toward a reframing of the prevailing reparations paradigm — a new framing embracing the notion of reparations as "repair." Indeed, reparation, in singular, means repair. It encompasses both acts of repairing damage to the material conditions of racial group life — distributing money to those in need and transferring land ownership to those dispossessed, building schools, churches, community centers and medical clinics, creating tax incentives and loan programs for businesses owned by inner city residents — and acts of restoring injured human psyches — enabling those harmed to live with, but not in, history. Reparations, as collective actions, foster the mending of tears in the social fabric, the repairing of breaches in the polity.

For example, slavery, Jim Crow apartheid and mainstream resistance to integration inflicted horrendous harms upon African American individuals and their communities, harms now exacerbated by the increasing resegregation of America. Reparations directly improving the material conditions of life for African Americans and their communities are especially appropriate. In addition, the racial harm to African Americans also wounded the American polity. It grated on America's sense of morality (do we really believe in freedom, equality and justice?), destabilized the American psyche (are we really oppressors?), generated personal discomfort and fear in daily interactions (will there be retribution?), and continues to do so. As Harlon Dalton observes, "perpetuating racial hierarchy in a society that professes to be egalitarian is destructive of the spirit as well as of the body politic."[9] Reparations for African Americans, conceived as repair, can help mend this larger tear in the social fabric for the benefit of both blacks and mainstream America.

So viewed, reparations are potentially transformative. Reparations can avoid "the traps of individualism, neutrality and indeterminacy that plague many mainstream concepts of rights or legal principles."[10] Reparations are grounded in group, rather than individual, rights and responsibilities and provide tangible benefits to those wronged by those in power. As Mari Matsuda observes, properly cast, reparations target substantive barriers to liberty and equality. In addition, coupled with acknowledgment and apology, reparations are potentially transformative because of what they symbolize for both bestower and beneficiary: reparations "condemn exploitation and adopt a vision of a more just world."[11]

(1998)

Questions

1. What is the purpose of quoting African American congressperson Ron Dellums and scholar Vincene Verdun in the opening of this essay (par. 3)?
2. What two attitudes toward "the social meanings of Japanese American redress" (par. 4) does Eric K. Yamamoto present? What is the third — his own — viewpoint?
3. What does Yamamoto believe is "the dilemma of reparations" (par. 13)? How is it demonstrated in the example of restitution for Jews victimized by Nazi Germany?
4. Why does Yamamoto argue that "monetary reparations are important, but not simply as individual compensation" (par. 18)?
5. What does Yamamoto mean when he calls for "a reframing of the prevailing reparations paradigm" (par. 21)?
6. Under what circumstances and terms does Yamamoto believe that "reparations are potentially transformative" (par. 23)?

The Slave Reparations Movement Adopts the Rhetoric of Victimhood

Brent Staples

An editorial writer for the New York Times, Brent Staples (b. 1951) is author of the award-winning memoir Parallel Times: Growing Up in Black and White (1994). The following essay appeared as an op-ed piece in the New York Times on September 2, 2001.

---

[9]Harlon L. Dalton, Racial Healing: Confronting the Fear Between Blacks and Whites 4 (1995).
[10]Mari J. Matsuda, Looking to the Bottom: Critical Legal Studies and Reparations, 22 Harv. C.R-C.L. L. Rev. 323, 373–88 (1987).
[11]See id. at 394.

My great-grandfather John Wesley Staples was born in Bedford County, Va., on July 4, 1865. Independence Day of that year was laden with symbolism because it heralded the end of slavery through the 13th Amendment. Family legend has it that John Wesley was one of the first free Negroes born in his county. But three of his siblings were born into slavery, as was his mother, Somerville, who was known in the family as an Ethiopian.

Slavery is nearer to us in time than most Americans understand. My eldest uncle, who turns 84 this year, has often recalled meeting former slaves when he was a boy at John Wesley's farm in Troutville, Va. Had John Wesley lived to my uncle's age, he would had seen the beginning of the civil rights movement and met the great-grandson who would later become an editorial writer for The New York Times.

The post-slavery South was especially brutal for elderly black people who had given their working lives to their masters and could no longer care for themselves. Freedom, such as it was, was further circumscribed during the late 19th century, when Southern states were writing Negroes out of the state constitutions, denying them the right to vote, hold office or attend school. The trend was deepened by sharecropping and other forms of bondage.

Black Americans often suppressed slave memories out of horror and shame. But the Staples family embraced its story out of pride in how well John Wesley and his wife, Eliza, managed to fare in the aggressively racist environment of the South in the late 19th century and early 20th century. My great-grandparents had the benefit of a strong extended family, allowing them to pool resources, including manpower. The Staples family protected the farm and John Wesley's wholesaling business with shotguns and pistols that were evident even at the dinner table. With no school available for black children, John Wesley and Eliza joined with their neighbors and built one in a field at the intersection of their three properties.

The teacher is listed in my great-aunt Sophronia's grade school composition book as a "Miss Marion B. Brown." She worked at the one-room school in return for room and board from the families. When John Wesley died in 1940, he left behind a literate family, a thriving farm and $40,000 in cash — a small fortune by standards of the time. This achievement paved the way for my father's generation and mine, which included the first college-bound members of the Staples family line. 5

Black Americans made spectacular progress beginning in the decades after slavery, moving from cotton fields to the boardroom in just over a century. But the recent debate about reparations for slavery has introduced a different narrative in which black people are cast as a victim class seeking compensation for the suffering of ancestors. The most popular version of the reparations proposal is found in The Debt: What America Owes to Blacks, by the Africa analyst Randall Robinson. The book has gained surprising credibility on the political left while generating a considerable backlash among moderate and conservative black intellectuals.

Targeted compensation is legal and morally just. The state of Florida made the right gesture in 1994 when it gave college scholarships to descendants from the black community of Rosewood, which was destroyed by whites in 1923 while the state did nothing.[1] The federal government has rightly compensated modern-day Native Americans for lands taken from them in the last century. Supporters of reparations have at least a moral case when they argue that companies that enriched themselves in slavery should attempt restitution when documents are specific enough to permit it.

But the sweeping notion that individual black Americans are owed a "debt" for slavery is a bridge too far. Black families have made and lost fortunes just as white families have. There is in addition no provable connection between 19th-century bondage and specific cases of 21st-century destitution. For these reasons, a publicly financed reparations program based on ancestry is not sustainable politically.

Such a program would logically be open to millions of people who have lived as "white" for generations but are descended from enslaved black people. The program would also be available to the descendants of black slave owners, who were far more common than many people like to admit. Black masters in South Carolina, for example, were confined to the margins of society but held many of the same attitudes about race as whites. Black masters continued to hold slaves even as the Union Army prepared for its terrible march through South Carolina.

The reparations debate is part of a burgeoning discussion about the role of slavery in American history. But by blaming history alone for modern-day social ills like poverty, illiteracy and unemployment, reparations advocates are unwittingly saying that these problems are so deeply rooted as to be unsolvable. They are also subverting the true story of black people in the United States. This story is one of extraordinary achievement in the face of gargantuan obstacles. It begins in the waning hours of slavery and continues to this very day. 10

(2001)

Questions

1. What ethos does Brent Staples establish in the opening paragraphs of the essay?
2. Why do you think Staples uses the term "targeted compensation" (par. 7) instead of "reparations"? What does he mean by his claim that "reparations advocates are . . . subverting the true story of black people in the United States" (par. 10)?
3. What concessions does he make to the counterargument—that is, support for reparations?
4. Why do you agree or disagree with Staples's statement that there is "no provable connection between 19th-century bondage and specific cases of 21st-century destitution" (par. 8)?
5. Following is a response in the New York Times to Staples's column. What parts of Staples's argument does Martin Kilson question? What evidence does he provide?

---

[1]Rosewood, Florida, was the site of the Rosewood Massacre, in which a white mob from nearby Sumner tried to pursue an escaped prisoner who allegedly beat and raped a white woman. By the end of the incident, twenty blacks had been murdered and the entire town of Rosewood had been burned down. — Eds.

How effectively does he challenge Staples's position? Consider the analogy he makes in his final statement.

To the Editor:

Brent Staples's pride in the achievements of his great-grandfather and other farmland-owning post-Emancipation Negroes (Editorial Observer, Sept. 2) is refreshing. But his appraisal of black social mobility as "spectacular progress" is bizarre.

By 1940, when blacks numbered 12 million, there were 63,697 teachers, 3,524 doctors and 1,052 lawyers, according to the Census Bureau. Was this spectacular progress? A generation and a half later, in 1970, when blacks numbered 20 million, there were 235,436 teachers, 6,106 doctors and 3,728 lawyers. Spectacular progress?

For Mr. Staples, reparations activists fake a narrative of blacks "as a victim class." But historical scholarship documents the horrendous victimization of blacks — for example, unpaid labor of millions that was key to American capital accumulation.

Just as American Jews uniformly supported reparations from Germany, so do African Americans uniformly support reparations for American slavery's victimization of their ancestors.

— Martin Kilson, Dublin, N.H., Sept. 3, 2001

Litigating the Legacy of Slavery

Charles Ogletree Jr.

Charles Ogletree Jr. (b. 1952) is the Jesse Climenko Professor at Harvard Law School and founder of the school's Charles Hamilton Houston Institute for Race and Justice. He is the author of numerous books, including All Deliberate Speed: Reflections on the First Half-Century of Brown v. Board of Education (2004) and The Presumption of Guilt: The Arrest of Henry Louis Gates Jr. and Race, Class, and Crime in America (2010). The following essay was first published in the New York Times on March 21, 2002.

Last Tuesday, a group of lawyers filed a federal class-action lawsuit in New York on behalf of all African-American descendants of slaves. The lawsuit seeks compensation from a number of defendants for profits earned through slave labor and the slave trade.

This lawsuit is limited to FleetBoston, Aetna, CSX and other to-be-named companies. The broader reparations movement seeks to explore the historical role that other private institutions and government played during slavery and the era of legal racial discrimination that followed. The goal of these historical investigations is to bring American society to a new reckoning with how our past affects the current conditions of African-Americans and to make America a better place by helping the truly disadvantaged.

The Reparations Coordinating Committee, of which I am a co-chairman, will proceed with its own plans to file wide-ranging reparations lawsuits late this autumn. The committee is a group of lawyers, academics, public officials and activists that has conducted extensive research and begun to identify parties to sue and claims to be raised.

The shape of a reparations strategy can already be seen. Among private defendants, corporations will be prominent, as last week's lawsuit shows. Other private institutions — Brown University, Yale University and Harvard Law School — have made headlines recently as the beneficiaries of grants and endowments traced back to slavery and are probable targets. Naming the government as a defendant is also central to any reparations strategy; public officials guaranteed the viability of slavery and the segregation that followed it.

A number of recent examples illustrate the possibilities for making reparations claims nationally and internationally. In South Africa, reparations have been part of the work of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which seeks to compensate people with clear material needs who suffered under apartheid because of their race. It was also in South Africa that, in the final documents of a racism conference sponsored by the United Nations, slavery was defined as a "crime against humanity," a legal determination that may enable the reparations movement to extend its reach to international forums.

In the United States, just three years ago the federal government reached a consent decree with a class of over 20,000 black farmers to compensate for years of discrimination by the Department of Agriculture. The case represents the largest civil-rights settlement by the government ever, with a likely payout of about $2 billion. Previously, the government also approved significant compensation for Japanese-Americans interned during World War II and paid reparations to black survivors of the Rosewood, Fla., race riots.

Although these precedents differ from a slavery-based reparations claim in that they involved classes of individuals who were both alive and easily identified, they nonetheless indicate government willingness to acknowledge past wrongs and remedy them. It is important that in each case the government waived its immunity from suit, thereby lifting the ordinary bar that prevents lawsuits against a sovereign.

Bring[ing] the government into litigation will also generate a public debate on slavery and the role its legacy continues to play in our society. The opportunity to use expert witnesses and conduct extensive discovery, to get facts and documentation, makes the courtroom an ideal venue for this debate.

A full and deep conversation on slavery and its legacy has never taken place in America; reparations litigation will show what slavery meant, how it was profitable and how it has continued to affect the opportunities of millions of black Americans.

Litigation is required to promote this discussion because political accountability has not been forthcoming. In each Congressional session since 1989, Representative John Conyers has introduced a bill to study slavery reparations and it has quickly died each time.

Though claims for slavery reparations have moved near the front of national and international policy discussions in the past few years, the movement has deep historical roots. Those roots go back at least as far as the unkept promise in 1864 of "40 acres and a mule" to freed slaves, which acknowledged our country's debt to the newly emancipated.

Indeed, the civil rights movement has long been organized, in part, around the notion that slavery and the century of legal discrimination that followed have had enduring and detrimental effects on American minorities.

The reparations movement should not, I believe, focus on payments to individuals. The damage has been done to a group — African-American slaves and their descendants — but it has not been done equally within the group. The reparations movement must aim at undoing the damage where that damage has been most severe and where the history of race in America has left its most telling evidence. The legacy of slavery and racial discrimination in America is seen in well-documented racial disparities in access to education, health care, housing, insurance, employment and other social goods. The reparations movement must therefore focus on the poorest of the poor — it must finance social recovery for the bottom-stuck, providing an opportunity to address comprehensively the problems of those who have not substantially benefited from integration or affirmative action.

The root of "reparations" is "to repair." This litigation strategy could give us an opportunity to fully address the legacy of slavery in a spirit of repair.

(2002)

Questions

1. Charles Ogletree Jr. approaches his argument, as lawyers do, through precedent—that is, previous cases that established a principle or rule. What precedents does he cite to support his advocacy of reparations?
2. What does he mean when he states that the U.S. government "waived its immunity from suit, thereby lifting the ordinary bar that prevents lawsuits against a sovereign" (par. 7)? Why is this point significant?
3. Ogletree claims that litigation is required to promote a public discussion of slavery and its legacy. To what extent do you agree with this claim?
4. What remedy does Ogletree propose instead of direct cash payments to individuals? Why does he not favor a monetary payment?
5. To what extent do you agree that the litigation strategy Ogletree supports would "give us an opportunity to fully address the legacy of slavery in a spirit of repair" (par. 14)?

Ending the Slavery Blame-Game

Henry Louis Gates Jr.

Scholar, literary critic, and writer Henry Louis Gates Jr. (b. 1950) is the Alphonse Fletcher University Professor and director of the W. E. B. DuBois Institute for African and African American Research at Harvard University. This essay appeared in the New York Times on April 23, 2010.

Thanks to an unlikely confluence of history and genetics — the fact that he is African American and president — Barack Obama has a unique opportunity to reshape the debate over one of the most contentious issues of America's racial legacy: reparations, the idea that the descendants of American slaves should receive compensation for their ancestors' unpaid labor and bondage.

There are many thorny issues to resolve before we can arrive at a judicious (if symbolic) gesture to match such a sustained, heinous crime. Perhaps the most vexing is how to parcel out blame to those directly involved in the capture and sale of human beings for immense economic gain.

While we are all familiar with the role played by the United States and the European colonial powers like Britain, France, Holland, Portugal and Spain, there is very little discussion of the role Africans themselves played. And that role, it turns out, was a considerable one, especially for the slave-trading kingdoms of western and central Africa. These included the Akan of the kingdom of Asante in what is now Ghana, the Fon of Dahomey (now Benin), the Mbundu of Ndongo in modern Angola and the Kongo of today's Congo, among several others.

For centuries, Europeans in Africa kept close to their military and trading posts on the coast. Exploration of the interior, home to the bulk of Africans sold into bondage at the height of the slave trade, came only during the colonial conquests, which is why Henry Morton Stanley's pursuit of Dr. David Livingstone in 1871 made for such compelling press: he was going where no (white) man had gone before.

How did slaves make it to these coastal forts? The historians John Thornton and 5
Linda Heywood of Boston University estimate that 90 percent of those shipped to the New World were enslaved by Africans and then sold to European traders. The sad truth is that without complex business partnerships between African elites and European traders and commercial agents, the slave trade to the New World would have been impossible, at least on the scale it occurred.

Advocates of reparations for the descendants of those slaves generally ignore this untidy problem of the significant role that Africans played in the trade, choosing to believe the romanticized version that our ancestors were all kidnapped unawares by evil white men, like Kunta Kinte was in Roots. The truth, however, is much more complex: slavery was a business, highly organized and lucrative for European buyers and African sellers alike.

The African role in the slave trade was fully understood and openly acknowledged by many African-Americans even before the Civil War. For Frederick Douglass, it was an argument against repatriation schemes for the freed slaves. "The savage chiefs of the western coasts of Africa, who for ages have been accustomed to selling their captives into bondage and pocketing the ready cash for them, will not more readily accept our moral and economical ideas than the slave traders of Maryland and Virginia," he warned. "We are, therefore, less inclined to go to Africa to work against the slave trade than to stay here to work against it."

To be sure, the African role in the slave trade was greatly reduced after 1807, when abolitionists, first in Britain and then, a year later, in the United States, succeeded in banning the importation of slaves. Meanwhile, slaves continued to be bought and sold within the United States, and slavery as an institution would not be abolished until 1865. But the culpability of American plantation owners neither erases nor supplants that of the African slavers. In recent years, some African leaders have become more comfortable discussing this complicated past than African-Americans tend to be.

In 1999, for instance, President Mathieu Kerekou of Benin astonished an all-black congregation in Baltimore by falling to his knees and begging African-Americans' forgiveness for the "shameful" and "abominable" role Africans played in the trade. Other African leaders, including Jerry Rawlings of Ghana, followed Mr. Kerekou's bold example.

Our new understanding of the scope of African involvement in the slave trade is not historical guesswork. Thanks to the Trans-Atlantic Slave Trade Database, directed by the historian David Eltis of Emory University, we now know the ports from which more than 450,000 of our African ancestors were shipped out to what is now the United States (the database has records of 12.5 million people shipped to all parts of the New World from 1514 to 1866). About 16 percent of United States slaves came from eastern Nigeria, while 24 percent came from the Congo and Angola. 10

Through the work of Professors Thornton and Heywood, we also know that the victims of the slave trade were predominantly members of as few as 50 ethnic groups. This data, along with the tracing of blacks' ancestry through DNA tests, is giving us a fuller understanding of the identities of both the victims and the facilitators of the African slave trade.

For many African-Americans, these facts can be difficult to accept. Excuses run the gamut, from "Africans didn't know how harsh slavery in America was" and "Slavery in Africa was, by comparison, humane" or, in a bizarre version of "The devil made me do it," "Africans were driven to this only by the unprecedented profits offered by greedy European countries."

But the sad truth is that the conquest and capture of Africans and their sale to Europeans was one of the main sources of foreign exchange for several African kingdoms for a very long time. Slaves were the main export of the kingdom of Kongo; the Asante Empire in Ghana exported slaves and used the profits to import gold. Queen Njinga, the brilliant 17th-century monarch of the Mbundu, waged wars of resistance against the Portuguese but also conquered polities as far as 500 miles inland and sold her captives to the Portuguese. When Njinga converted to Christianity, she sold African traditional religious leaders into slavery, claiming they had violated her new Christian precepts.

Did these Africans know how harsh slavery was in the New World? Actually, many elite Africans visited Europe in that era, and they did so on slave ships following the prevailing winds through the New World. For example, when Antonio Manuel, Kongo's ambassador to the Vatican, went to Europe in 1604, he first stopped in Bahia, Brazil, where he arranged to free a countryman who had been wrongfully enslaved.

African monarchs also sent their children along these same slave routes to be educated in Europe. And there were thousands of former slaves who returned to settle Liberia and Sierra Leone. The Middle Passage, in other words, was sometimes a two-way street. Under these circumstances, it is difficult to claim that Africans were ignorant or innocent. 15

Given this remarkably messy history, the problem with reparations may not be so much whether they are a good idea or deciding who would get them; the larger question just might be from whom they would be extracted.

So how could President Obama untangle the knot? In David Remnick's new book The Bridge: The Life and Rise of Barack Obama, one of the president's former students at the University of Chicago comments on Mr. Obama's mixed feelings about the reparations movement: "He told us what he thought about reparations. He agreed entirely with the theory of reparations. But in practice he didn't think it was really workable."

About the practicalities, Professor Obama may have been more right than he knew. Fortunately, in President Obama, the child of an African and an American, we finally have a leader who is uniquely positioned to bridge the great reparations divide. He is uniquely placed to publicly attribute responsibility and culpability where they truly belong, to white people and black people, on both sides of the Atlantic, complicit alike in one of the greatest evils in the history of civilization. And reaching that understanding is a vital precursor to any just and lasting agreement on the divisive issue of slavery reparations.

(2010)

Questions

1. What does Henry Louis Gates Jr. believe is the "most vexing" of the "many thorny issues to resolve" (par. 2) in the reparations controversy?
2. What is his position on the issue of reparations for African Americans as stated in this essay?
3. What evidence does he cite to support his position? What is the predominant type of evidence?
4. What does he mean by "this remarkably messy history" (par. 16)?
5. Why does he believe that President Barack Obama is "a leader who is uniquely positioned to bridge the great reparations divide" (par. 18)? To what extent do you agree?

Making Connections

1. How do you think Julie Otsuka, or the woman in "Evacuation Order No. 19" (p. 1221) would respond to the photo with the sign "I Am an American" (p. 1220), by Dorothea Lange? With sympathy? Anger? Skepticism?

2. In what ways might Charles Ogletree Jr. (p. 1240) or Henry Louis Gates Jr. (p. 1242) argue that the evacuation order treats Japanese American citizens as property?
3. How might Gates, Ogletree, or Brent Staples (p. 1237) respond to an apology to African Americans similar to the one President George H. W. Bush signed for Japanese Americans (p. 1230)?
4. Where in his article does Eric K. Yamamoto (p. 1231) reflect the viewpoint of Ogletree? Where does he reflect that of Staples? With which one would he agree more fully?
5. With what part(s) of Staples's argument would Ogletree most strenuously disagree?
6. What common ground do you find between Staples and Gates?

Entering the Conversation

As you respond to each of the following prompts, support your position with appropriate evidence, including at least three sources in this Conversation on Japanese American internment and reparations, unless otherwise indicated.

1. To what extent are the arguments for African American reparations analogous to the arguments that led to monetary reparations for Japanese Americans interned during World War II? Discuss points of both comparison and contrast.
2. What does Eric K. Yamamoto mean by the "dangers and the transformative potential of reparations" (par. 18)? Taking this distinction into account, explain why you believe that African Americans should or should not receive reparations today. If not, why not? If so, what form should reparations take?
3. Explain why you agree or disagree with the following assertion of Yamamoto: "Reparations for African Americans, conceived as repair, can help mend this larger tear in the social fabric [of the United States] for the benefit of both blacks and mainstream America" (par. 22).
4. Now that the United States has elected an African American president to two terms, is the reparations debate still viable or even relevant? Why or why not?
5. Different terms for "reparations" are used in the various source documents for this Conversation. These include "targeted compensation," "compensation," "redress," "repair," and "restitution." How do different terms represent different attitudes toward "reparations" and what it means to the community at issue as well as to the larger society?

Conversation

What Is American Literature?

As early as the turn of the nineteenth century, writers and critics were asking, What is American literature? Having brought the English language to the New World, were Americans burdened with the traditions of English literature, or were they free to develop their own literary traditions? We ask you to consider what makes American literature distinctly American, how that label has changed over the years, and what, exactly, it means to call a work a piece of American literature. The following nine selections will help you give that subject some thought.

Sources

Walt Whitman, from Letter to Ralph Waldo Emerson (1856)
Emma Lazarus, American Literature (1881)
John Macy, from The Spirit of American Literature (1913)
Sherwood Anderson, from An Apology for Crudity (1917)
Amy Lowell, from On "New Poetry" (1917)
Bliss Perry, from The American Spirit in Literature (1920)
D. H. Lawrence, from The Spirit of Place (1923)
Tom Wolfe, from Why They Aren't Writing the Great American Novel Anymore (1972)
Margaret Atwood, Hello, Martians. Let Moby-Dick Explain (2012) from Letter to Ralph Waldo Emerson

WALT WHITMAN

Walt Whitman sent a first edition of Leaves of Grass to Ralph Waldo Emerson, who responded with an enthusiastic letter of admiration, calling it the "most extraordinary piece of wit and wisdom that America has yet contributed." Without asking permission, Whitman published the letter in the New York Tribune as an advertisement for his book, included it as an appendix to the second edition, and stamped its best line ("I greet you at the beginning of a great career") in gold leaf on the second edition's spine. The second edition also included an open letter to Emerson about the development of literature in America, parts of which appear here.

Swiftly, on limitless foundations, the United States too are founding a literature. It is all as well done, in my opinion, as could be practicable. Each element here is in condition. Every day I go among the people of Manhattan Island, Brooklyn, and other cities, and among the young men, to discover the spirit of them, and to refresh myself. These are to be attended to; I am myself more drawn here than to those authors, publishers, importations, reprints, and so forth. I pass coolly through those, understanding them perfectly well, and that they do the indispensable service, outside of men like me, which nothing else could do. In poems, the young men of The States shall be represented, for they out-rival the best of the rest of the earth.

The lists of ready-made literature which America inherits by the mighty inheritance of the English language — all the rich repertoire of traditions, poems, histories, metaphysics, plays, classics, translations, have made, and still continue, magnificent preparations for that other plainly signified literature, to be our own, to be electric, fresh, lusty, to express the full-sized body, male and female — to give the modern meanings of things, to grow up beautiful, lasting, commensurate with America, with all the passions of home, with the inimitable sympathies of having been boys and girls together, and of parents who were with our parents.

What else can happen The States, even in their own despite? That huge English flow, so sweet, so undeniable, has done incalculable good here, and is to be spoken of for its own sake with generous praise and with gratitude. Yet the price The States have had to lie under for the same has not been a small price. Payment prevails; a nation can never take the issues of the needs of other nations for nothing. America, grandest of lands in the theory of its politics, in popular reading, in hospitality, breadth, animal beauty, cities, ships, machines, money, credit, collapses quick as lightning at the repeated, admonishing, stern words, Where are any mental expressions from you, beyond what you have copied or stolen? Where the born throngs of poets, literats, orators, you promised? Will you but tag after other nations? They struggled long for their literature, painfully working their way, some with deficient languages, some with priest-craft, some in the endeavor just to live — yet achieved for their times, works, poems, perhaps the only solid consolation left to them through ages afterward of shame and decay. You are young, have the perfectest of dialects, a free press, a free government, the world forwarding its best to be with you. As justice has been strictly done to you, from this hour do strict justice to yourself. Strangle the singers who will not sing you loud and strong. Open the doors of The West. Call for new great masters to comprehend new arts, new perfections, new wants. Submit to the most robust bard till he remedy your barrenness. Then you will not need to adopt the heirs of others; you will have true heirs, begotten of yourself, blooded with your own blood. . . .

All current nourishments to literature serve. Of authors and editors I do not know how many there are in The States, but there are thousands, each one building his or her step to the stairs by which giants shall mount. Of the twenty-four modern mammoth two-double, three-double, and four-double cylinder presses now in the world, printing by steam, twenty-one of them are in These States. The twelve thousand large and small shops for dispensing books and newspapers — the same number of public libraries, any one of which has all the reading wanted to equip a man or woman for American reading — the three thousand different newspapers, the nutriment of the imperfect ones coming in just as usefully as any — the story papers, various, full of strong-flavored romances, widely circulated — the one-cent and two-cent journals — the political ones, no matter what side — the weeklies in the country — the sporting and pictorial papers — the monthly magazines, with plentiful imported feed — the sentimental novels, numberless copies of them — the low-priced flaring tales, adventures, biographies — all are prophetic; all waft rapidly on. I see that they swell wide, for reasons. I am not troubled at the movement of them, but greatly pleased. I see plying shuttles, the active ephemeral myriads of books also, faithfully weaving the garments of a generation of men, and a generation of women, they do not perceive or know. What a progress popular reading and writing has made in fifty years! What a progress fifty years hence! The time is at hand when inherent literature will be a main part of These States, as general and real as steam-power, iron, corn, beef, fish. First-rate American persons are to be supplied. Our perennial materials for fresh thoughts, histories, poems, music, orations, religions, recitations, amusements, will then not be disregarded, any more than our perennial fields, mines, rivers, seas. Certain things are established, and are immovable; in those things millions of years stand justified. The mothers and fathers of whom modern centuries have come, have not existed for nothing; they too had brains and hearts. Of course all literature, in all nations and years, will share marked attributes in common, as we all, of all ages, share the common human attributes. America is to be kept coarse and broad. What is to be done is to withdraw from precedents, and be directed to men and women — also to The States in their federalness; for the union of the parts of the body is not more necessary to their life than the union of These States is to their life.

A profound person can easily know more of the people than they know of themselves. Always waiting untold in the souls of the armies of common people, is stuff better than anything that can possibly appear in the leadership of the same. That gives final verdicts. In every department of These States, he who travels with a coterie, or with selected persons, or with imitators, or with infidels, or with the owners of slaves, or with that which is ashamed of the body of a man, or with that which is ashamed of the body of a woman, or with any thing less than the bravest and the openest, travels straight for the slopes of dissolution. The genius of all foreign literature is clipped and cut small, compared to our genius, and is essentially insulting to our usages, and to the organic compacts of These States. Old forms, old poems, majestic and proper in their own lands here in this land are exiles; the air here is very strong. Much that stands well and has a little enough place provided for it in the small scales of European kingdoms, empires, and the like, here stands haggard, dwarfed, ludicrous, or has no place little enough provided for it. Authorities, poems, models, laws, names, imported into America, are useful to America today to destroy them, and so more disencumbered to great works, great days.

(1856)

Questions

1. What does Walt Whitman consider to be America's inheritance? What does he consider to be its purpose?

2. What advantages does Whitman think American writers have? What exhortations does Whitman give about those advantages?
3. In what ways does paragraph 4 reflect what Whitman envisions as American literature? What does his style suggest about what he sees as our "inherent literature"?
4. Do you think American literature has, as Whitman predicts, kept "coarse and broad" (par. 4)?

American Literature

Emma Lazarus

Known best for her sonnet "The New Colossus," some lines of which are inscribed on the base of the Statue of Liberty, Emma Lazarus (1849–1887) grew up in New York City and Newport, Rhode Island. This essay was published in the Critic in 1881 in response to an article by literary critic George Woodberry.

In the May number of the Fortnightly Review Mr. George Edward Woodberry dogmatizes in a singular way concerning the "Fortunes of Literature under the American Republic." "Among us," he writes, "literature has no continuous tradition; where the torch fell, it was extinguished. Irving, it is true, had imitators who came to nothing; but our fiction does not seem to be different because Hawthorne lived; no poet has caught the music of Longfellow; no thinker carries forward the conclusions of Emerson. These men have left no lineage. . . . We have not earned the right to claim them as a national possession." The merest tyro[1] in the study of American literature can unravel this flimsy web of sophistries. In the first place we have yet to learn that in the sense of producing imitators, the influence of a man of genius is beneficial. On the contrary, we consider the shoal of imitators of the few first-class living poets of England — Tennyson, Morris, Swinburne, and Browning — one of the worst pests of contemporary literature. Who cares a fig for the imitators of Thackeray, of Dickens, of Carlyle? All these great men have marked mannerisms of style which make them the easy prey of a host of petty tricksters, who do all in their power by a cheap imitation of the outward form to disgust the world with the original, inimitable thought. The modern novel was invented, not by an Englishman, but by Balzac: Thackeray did not take up the torch extinguished in the hands of Scott, but appropriated what was his own in the immense world discovered by the Frenchman. It may be remembered, too, that contemporary English criticism declared Dickens's early work to be imitative of an American's — Irving. What would be said of an American who placed himself so conspicuously and shamelessly under the guidance of foreign leaders, as did Carlyle under the banner of Germany? The language which we share in common with England gives a false air of resemblance to productions that have infinitely less in common than have those of Carlyle with the works of Jean-Paul and the German romantic school.

[1]Novice. — Eds.

Emerson stands isolated by his superiority in the sense that all men of genius are isolated, even from their followers; but whoever fails to see in Emerson's works the flowering of a distinctively American school of thought and habit of life, fails to understand the essential spirit of his teachings. Moreover, "his conclusions" are "carried forward," and to their extreme development, by a fellow-townsman of his own, only second to him in intellectual force, and with a still stronger local flavor — the poet-naturalist, Henry Thoreau. Again, in our own generation it is difficult to conceive of, otherwise than as a successor of these two, the keen-eyed observer of Nature and charming reporter of her open secrets, John Burroughs. Individual and sincere though he be, the influence of Emerson and Thoreau is strongly felt through his writings, which could have been produced nowhere else than in America. Let Mr. Woodberry take up any number of the Atlantic Monthly, any volume of New England essays or poetry, and judge whether the influence, as subtle as it is strong, of the transcendental idealist Emerson has not penetrated through all superficial practicalities and vulgarities to the very fibre of our best intellectual life. Is Mr. Woodberry quite fair in selecting Donatello as the representative type of Hawthorne's genius, and adding, "Except for the accident of the author's birth, the character would be as welcome in England as in America"? This is as if we should choose "Romola" for our example, and say, "Except for the accident of George Eliot's birth, she would be as welcome in Italy as in England." In each case we unjustly exclude the essentially national and even more powerful works of the same author. What foreigner could have given us the inside view of New England Puritanism presented in the Scarlet Letter, or have created the character of Hester Prynne? Did not the history of Salem "contribute an important element to the growth of Hawthorne's genius," which we have "a right to claim as a national possession"? Why does Mr. Woodberry persistently put forward, as the only American poet, Longfellow, and ignore (except as a writer of sensational tales) Edgar Poe, "whose cup was small, but who drank from his own glass," as emphatically as did Alfred de Musset, or Keats, or Tennyson? Is it by accident that Walt Whitman was born in America, or Lowell, or Holmes, or Bret Harte, or the author of Uncle Tom's Cabin, or, to come down to the present moment, the men who wrote the Fool's Errand, and Creole Days? "To-day," affirms Mr. Woodberry, "American authors make their reputation by English criticism, and American magazines are rivals for English pens." It is surprising that so ridiculously obsolete a tradition as this should still endeavor to pass current. The Atlantic Monthly has never depended for its reputation upon foreign contributions, and it is notorious that the success of Scribner's Monthly and of Harper's has been based upon their national character.

For evils that do not exist, Mr. Woodberry is at no loss to discover causes equally mythical. He complains of the lack of good critics, and describes the habit of American critics as being simply to "give a synopsis of the work before them": yet, after reading French, German, Italian, and English articles, amid the flood of criticisms upon Carlyle, with which the world has been deluged since his death, we found by far the most discriminating and intelligent analysis of his genius among the essays of an American — Mr. Lowell; while one of the most just and sympathetic estimates of Carlyle's personality appeared in a Boston magazine over the signature of the elder Henry James; and Emerson's reminiscences, published in a New York monthly, painted a portrait that could have come only from the hand of a master. Mr. Stedman, in his criticisms of American and English poets, Mr. Henry James, Jr., in his volume on the French poets and novelists, and, in their more elaborate and critical articles, Mr. Stoddard and Mr. Howells, compare favorably with the leading European critics. So far from true is it that "American authors make their reputation by English criticism" that we do not hesitate to reject and ridicule the English verdict of men whom we consider ourselves better fitted to understand — as in the case of a certain poet, whom all the lion hunters of London could not foist upon America as anything higher than a second-rate singer. On the other hand, in some instances, American critics have founded the reputation of English books. Carlyle's now hackneyed sentence "I hear many echoes, but only one voice — from Concord," ascribes to the right quarter the first rumor of his fame. It is less well-known, but equally true, that the same authoritative voice was among the first to proclaim the greatness of the authors of the "Idylls of the King," and "Peg Woffington." In short, we cannot help thinking that the literary history of the past fifty years in America contrasts favorably with that of the past fifty years in England — the only period with which it can, with any show of justice, be compared.

(1881)

Questions

1. What counterargument does Emma Lazarus acknowledge and refute in this essay?
2. How does Lazarus develop and support her own argument?
3. What influences on American literature does Lazarus consider distinctly American? What is distinctly American about them?

from The Spirit of American Literature

John Macy

John Macy (1877–1932) was an author, a critic, a teacher, and a poet. Unhappily married to and mostly separated from Anne Sullivan, the famous teacher of Helen Keller, he helped Keller and Sullivan write The Story of My Life, Keller's best-selling autobiography. This excerpt is from the first chapter of his influential survey of major American writers from Washington Irving to Henry James, The Spirit of American Literature, published in 1913.

American literature is a branch of English literature, as truly as are English books written in Scotland or South Africa. Our literature lies almost entirely in the nineteenth century when the ideas and books of the western world were freely interchanged among the nations and became accessible to an increasing number of readers. In literature nationality is determined by language rather than by blood or geography. M. Maeterlinck, born a subject of King Leopold, belongs to French literature. Mr. Joseph Conrad, born in Poland, is already an English classic. Geography, much less important in the nineteenth century than before, was never, among modern European nations, so important as we sometimes are asked to believe. Of the ancestors of English literature "Beowulf" is scarcely more significant, and rather less graceful, than our tree-inhabiting forebears with prehensile toes; the true progenitors of English literature are Greek, Latin, Hebrew, Italian, and French.

American literature and English literature of the nineteenth century are parallel derivatives from preceding centuries of English literature. Literature is a succession of books from books. Artistic expression springs from life ultimately but not immediately. It may be likened to a river which is swollen throughout its course by new tributaries and by the seepages of its banks; it reflects the life through which it flows, taking colour from the shores; the shores modify it, but its power and volume descend from distant headwaters and affluents far up stream. Or it may be likened to the race-life which our food nourishes or impoverishes, which our individual circumstances foster or damage, but which flows on through us, strangely impersonal and beyond our power to kill or create.

It is well for a writer to say: "Away with books! I will draw my inspiration from life!" For we have too many books that are simply better books diluted by John Smith. At the same time, literature is not born spontaneously out of life. Every book has its literary parentage, and students find it so easy to trace genealogies that much criticism reads like an Old Testament chapter of "begats." Every novel was suckled at the breasts of older novels, and great mothers are often prolific of anæmic offspring. The stock falls off and revives, goes a-wandering, and returns like a prodigal. The family records get blurred. But of the main fact of descent there is no doubt.

American literature is English literature made in this country. Its nineteenth-century characteristics are evident and can be analyzed and discussed with some degree of certainty. Its "American" characteristics — no critic that I know has ever given a good account of them. You can define certain peculiarities of American politics, American agriculture, American public schools, even American religion. But what is uniquely American in American literature? Poe is just as American as Mark Twain; Lanier is just as American as Whittier. The American spirit in literature is a myth, like American valour in war, which is precisely like the valour of Italians and Japanese. The American, deluded by a falsely idealized image which he calls America, can say that the purity of Longfellow represents the purity of American home life. An Irish Englishman, Mr. Bernard Shaw, with another falsely idealized image of America, surprised that a fact does not fit his image, can ask: "What is Poe doing in that galley?" There is no answer. You never can tell. Poe could not help it. He was born in Boston, and lived in Richmond, New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia. Professor Van Dyke says that Poe was a maker of "decidedly un-American cameos," but I do not understand what that means. Facts are uncomfortable consorts of prejudices and emotional generalities; they spoil domestic peace, and when there is a separation they sit solid at home while the other party goes. Irving, a shy, sensitive gentleman, who wrote with fastidious care, said: "It has been a matter of marvel, to European readers, that a man from the wilds of America should express himself in tolerable English." It is a matter of marvel, just as it is a marvel that Blake and Keats flowered in the brutal city of London a hundred years ago.

The literary mind is strengthened and nurtured, is influenced and mastered, by the accumulated riches of literature. In the last century the strongest thinkers in our language were Englishmen, and not only the traditional but the contemporary influences on our thinkers and artists were British. This may account for one negative characteristic of American literature — its lack of American quality. True, our records must reflect our life. Our poets, enamoured of nightingales and Persian gardens, have not altogether forgotten the mocking-bird and the woods of Maine. Fiction, written by inhabitants of New York, Ohio, and Massachusetts, does tell us something of the ways of life in those mighty commonwealths, just as English fiction written by Lancashire men about Lancashire people is saturated with the dialect, the local habits and scenery of that county. But wherever an English-speaking man of imagination may dwell, in Dorset or Calcutta or Indianapolis, he is subject to the strong arm of the empire of English literature; he cannot escape it; it tears him out of his obscure bed and makes a happy slave of him. He is assigned to the department of the service for which his gifts qualify him, and his special education is undertaken by drill-masters and captains who hail from provinces far from his birthplace.

Dickens, who writes of London, influences Bret Harte, who writes of California, and Bret Harte influences Kipling, who writes of India. Each is intensely local in subject matter. The affinity between them is a matter of temperament, manifested, for example, in the swagger and exaggeration characteristic of all three. California did not "produce" Bret Harte; the power of Dickens was greater than that of the Sierras and the Golden Gate. Bret Harte created a California that never existed, and Indian gentlemen, Caucasian and Hindoo, tell us that Kipling invented an army and an empire unknown to geographers and war-offices.

The ideas at work among these English men of letters are world-encircling and fly between book and brain. The dominant power is on the British Islands, and the prevailing stream of influence flows west across the Atlantic. Sometimes it turns and runs the other way. Poe influenced Rossetti; Whitman influenced Henley. For a century Cooper has been in command of the British literary marine. Literature is reprehensibly unpatriotic, even though its votaries are, as individual citizens, afflicted with local prides and hostilities. It takes only a dramatic interest in the guns of Yorktown. Its philosophy was nobly uttered by Gaston Paris in the Collège de France in 1870, when the city was beleaguered by the German armies: "Common studies, pursued in the same spirit, in all civilized countries, form, beyond the restrictions of diverse and often hostile nationalities, a great country which no war profanes, no conqueror menaces, where souls find that refuge and unity which in former times was offered them by the city of God." The catholicity of English language and literature transcends the temporal boundaries of states.

(1913)

Questions

1. Why does John Macy think that American literature is a "branch of English literature" (par. 1)? Do you agree or disagree with him? Explain your answer.
2. Describe the metaphor Macy uses in paragraph 2 to explain artistic expression.
3. Why does Macy believe there is no such thing as a "uniquely American" (par. 4) quality to American literature? What evidence does he use to support his argument?

from An Apology for Crudity

Sherwood Anderson

Sherwood Anderson (1876–1941) was a novelist and short-story writer whose most important work is the short-story sequence Winesburg, Ohio. His work is said to have influenced the American writers Ernest Hemingway, William Faulkner, Norman Mailer, and Studs Turkel. This essay was published in the literary journal the Dial in 1917.

For a long time I have believed that crudity is an inevitable quality in the production of a really significant present-day American literature. How indeed is one to escape the obvious fact that there is as yet no native subtlety of thought or living among us? And if we are a crude and childlike people how can our literature hope to escape the influence of that fact? Why indeed should we want it to escape?

If you are in doubt as to the crudity of thought in America, try an experiment. Come out of your offices, where you sit writing and thinking, and try living with us. Get on a train at Pittsburg and go west to the mountains of Colorado. Stop for a time in our towns and cities. Stay for a week in some Iowa corn-shipping town and for another week in one of the Chicago clubs. As you loiter about read our newspapers and listen to our conversations, remembering, if you will, that as you see us in the towns and cities, so we are. We are not subtle enough to conceal ourselves and he who runs with open eyes through the Mississippi Valley may read the story of the Mississippi Valley.

It is a marvelous story and we have not yet begun to tell the half of it. A little, I think I know why. It is because we who write have drawn ourselves away. We have not had faith in our people and in the story of our people. If we are crude and childlike, that is our story and our writing men must learn to dare to come among us until they know the story. The telling of the story depends, I believe, upon their learning that lesson and accepting that burden.

To my room, which is on a street near the loop in the city of Chicago, come men who write. They talk and I talk. We are fools. We talk of writers of the old world and the beauty and subtlety of the work they do. Below us the roaring city lies like a great animal on the prairies, but we do not run out to the prairies. We stay in our rooms and talk.

And so, having listened to talk and having myself talked overmuch, I grow weary of talk and walk in the streets. As I walk alone, an old truth comes home to me and I know that we shall never have an American literature until we return to faith in ourselves and to the facing of our own limitations. We must, in some way, become in ourselves more like our fellows, more simple and real. 5

For surely it does not follow that because we Americans are a people without subtlety, we are a dull or uninteresting people. Our literature is dull, but we are not. One remembers how Dostoevsky had faith in the simplicity of the Russians and what he achieved. He lived and he expressed the life of his time and people. The thing that he did brings hope of achievement for our men.

But let us first of all accept certain truths. Why should we Americans aspire to a subtlety that belongs not to us but to old lands and places? Why talk of intellectuality and of intellectual life when we have not accepted the life that we have? There is death on that road and following it has brought death into much of American writing. Can you doubt what I say? Consider the smooth slickness of the average magazine story. There is often great subtlety of plot and phrase, but there is no reality. Can such work live? The answer is that the most popular magazine story or novel does not live in our minds for a month.

And what are we to do about it? To me it seems that as writers we shall have to throw ourselves with greater daring into the life here. We shall have to begin to write out of the people and not for the people. We shall have to find within ourselves a little of that courage. To continue along the road we are travelling is unthinkable. To draw ourselves apart, to live in little groups and console ourselves with the thought that we are achieving intellectuality, is to get nowhere. By such a road we can hope only to go on producing a literature that has nothing to do with life as it is lived in these United States.

To be sure, the doing of the thing I am talking about will not be easy. America is a land of objective writing and thinking. New paths will have to be made. The subjective impulse is almost unknown to us. Because it is close to life, it works out into crude and broken forms. It leads along a road that such American masters of prose as James and Howells did not want to take, but if we are to get anywhere, we shall have to travel that road.

(1917)

Questions

1. What does Sherwood Anderson mean by "crudity"? Explain how you think he feels about it.
2. Why does Anderson think American literature needs to become less "dull" (par. 6)? How does he suggest making that happen?
3. What is your view of crudity in literature? Do you think literature should reveal our worst habits and instincts or should those aspects be cleaned up? What would Anderson think of the "gross out" comedy in some of today's films? Might he think we've gone too far?

from On "New Poetry"

Amy Lowell

Amy Lowell (1874–1925) was an American poet and critic. She was awarded a posthumous Pulitzer Prize for What O'Clock (1926). This selection is from Tendencies in Modern American Poetry, Lowell's study of American poets such as Robert Frost and Carl Sandburg, which was published in 1917.

When people speak of the "New Poetry," they generally mean that poetry which is written in the newer, freer forms. But such a distinction is misleading in the extreme, for, after all, forms are merely forms, of no particular value unless they are the necessary and adequate clothing to some particular manner of thought.

There is a "New Poetry" to-day, and the new forms are a part of its attire, but the body is more important than the clothing and existed before it. All real changes are a matter of slow growth, of evolution. The beginnings of a change are almost imperceptible, the final stages, on the other hand, being so radical that everyone remarks them, and with such astonishment that the cry of "freak," "charlatan," is almost sure to be raised by ignorant readers.

A great artistic movement is as inevitable a thing as the growth of a race. But, as in races, individuals possess differing characteristics, so the various artists whose work represents a revolt may differ most widely one from another, and yet, in varying still more widely from artists of other epochs, they create what critics call a "movement." . . .

A poetic movement may be compared to a braid of woven strands. Of the six poets of whom I shall speak, each is an exemplar, and I think the most typical exemplar, of a strand. But one particular tinge is peculiar to all the strands, and that particular tinge is revolt against the immediate past.

We shall see these poets revolting against stilted phrases and sentimentality; we shall see them endeavouring to express themselves, and the new race which America is producing; we shall see them stepping boldly from realism to far flights of imagination. We shall see them ceding more and more to the influence of other, alien, peoples, and fusing exotic modes of thought with their Anglo-Saxon inheritance. This is indeed the melting pot, and its fumes affect the surrounding company as well as the ingredients in the crucible. 5

To understand the change which is going on in American poetry, it is necessary to glance back for a moment to earlier conditions.

If we examine the state of American poetry from, let us say, 1830 until the Civil War, we shall be struck with one thing. That is, with the racial homogeneity of our poets. They are all of good English stock, in their work, I mean. It is true that two great geniuses flung themselves up out of this mass of cultivated endeavour. But that is no exception to the Anglo-Saxon rule, for no literature is richer in geniuses than is the English. But these two geniuses, Edgar Allan Poe and Walt Whitman, were too far ahead of their times to have much effect upon their contemporaries. They are better understood, and have more followers, in the America of to-day. Wordsworth on the one hand, Byron on the other, were the main springs of American poetry.

Good poetry, if not strikingly great poetry, marked the epoch of Whittier, Bryant, Emerson, Lowell, Longfellow, and Holmes. They were English provincial poets, in the sense that America was still a literary province of the Mother Country.

But from the Civil War until almost the present day, the literary sponsors of American verse were much less worthy of disciples. The robustness of Byron gave place to the sugared sentimentality of Tennyson; the moral strength of Wordsworth made way for the frozen didacticism of Matthew Arnold. But worse was to follow, for technique usurped the place of emotion, and words, mere words, were exalted out of all due proportion. Swinburne and Rossetti are not good masters to follow, no matter with what skill they themselves wrought. Only those of our poets who kept solidly to the Shakespearean tradition achieved any measure of success. But Keats was the last great exponent of that tradition, and we all know how thin, how lacking in charm, the copies of Keats have become. No matter how beautiful a piece of music may be, we cannot hear it indefinitely without satiety, and the same piece rendered by a phonograph soon becomes unbearable. Our poets were largely phonographs to greater English poets dead and gone, as the pages of our magazines of twenty years ago will abundantly prove.

Art is like politics. Any theory carried too far ends in sterility, and freshness is only gained by following some other line. Faultless, flowing verses, raised about a worn-out, threadbare idea — fine moral sentiments expressed in the weak, innocuous language of the hymn-books — had no resemblance to the temper of modern American life. Publishers still printed poetry, but not with any idea of its answering a demand; editors accepted it to round out short pages, but they hardly expected to have more attention accorded it than an ornamental scroll would have received. Readers found more sustenance in Browning, and bewailed the fact that he was dead, and, alas, English! America was not a country for poets, said the wiseacres, it was given over to materialism, and materialism could never produce art. 10

This was tantamount to saying that art was an artificial thing, whereas making steel harrows was a natural thing. Of course, that is a ridiculous point of view. Art, true art, is the desire of a man to express himself, to record the reactions of his personality to the world he lives in. Great emotion always tends to become rhythmic, and out of that tendency the forms of art have been evolved. Art becomes artificial only when the forms take precedence over the emotion.

Now here was a great country practically dumb. Here was a virile race, capable of subduing a vast continent in an incredibly short time, with no tongue to vent its emotion. How should such a race express itself by the sentiments appropriate to a highly civilized country no bigger than New York State, and of that country some fifty years earlier, to boot?

I would not be construed into saying that the larger the country, the more profound the emotions. That would be absurd. I only mean that the material conditions under which Americans lived — the great unoccupied spaces, the constant warring and overcoming of nature, the fluid state of the social fabric — all made a different speech necessary, if they were really to express the thoughts that were in them.

There was one other element in the constitution of the American people, quite as important as these I have mentioned. That element was, and is, the ingrained Puritanism which time and place do so little to eradicate. Of course, the dwellers in large cities, worked upon from their earliest childhood by modern conditions, were able to modify the Puritan sentiment, to cast out what of poison remained in it. For Puritanism, at this late day, has resolved itself into a virulent poison which saps vitality and brings on the convulsions of despair.

Puritanism was always a drastic, soul-searching, joyless religion. It was itself a revolt against a licence that had become unbearable. But no student of history can fail to be struck with the vigour and healthy-mindedness of a race which can live under such an incubus and retain its sanity. There is no more horrible page to the student than that of the early times in New England, when nervous little children were tortured with exhortations to declare their faith and escape the clutches of the devil, and senile old women were hanged for witches. Moloch and his sacrifices of human victims is no more revolting. Yet, in spite of much infant mortality, and many of the weaker members of a community going insane, the people as a whole lived and throve under this threatening horror, with the vitality of a race born to endure. 15

Indeed, my simile of a drug is no idle comparison. For Puritanism undoubtedly did much to strengthen the fibre of the early settlers, but its prolonged effect has been to produce anæmia and atrophy, and where these do not follow, where the strength of the individual keeps him fighting for the cause of individuality against the composite thought of a race, the result is an innate cynicism, a dreadful despair which will not let him be.

The age of Bryant and Longfellow was singularly free from these negative, but powerful, results of the Puritanic poison. Didactic and moral these poets undoubtedly were, but with them the paternal tradition was diluted by nothing more violent than time. They were in sympathy with its main trend only; like fruits set in the sun, the substance itself had mellowed and sweetened. Living in a highly educated community, they modified with it, and only so far as it, too, modified. They were not at war with their times, their surroundings, or their fellow citizens.

In the case of smaller places, the result is very different. Here, Puritanism held sway quite out of time. It persisted long after it had become an anachronism to New England at large. An individual brought up in one of the small towns scattered over the country was therefore obliged to reproduce suddenly in himself the evolution of three hundred years. In so far as he was advanced mentally beyond his fellows, he suffered the pangs of growth and misunderstanding. And his evolution carried with it the farther torture of consciousness. Sudden change can never accomplish the result of a long, slow process. What large cities like Boston lived into, the clever youths of smaller towns were thrust violently upon.

We must never forget that all inherited prejudice and training pulls one way, in these unfortunate cases; the probing, active mind pulls another. The result is a profound melancholy, tinged with cynicism. Self-analysis has sapped joy, and the impossibility of constructing an ethical system in accordance both with desire and with tradition has twisted the mental vision out of all true proportion. It takes the lifetime of more than one individual to throw off a superstition, and the effort to do so is not made without sacrifice.

(1917)

Questions

1. What does Amy Lowell think ties the work of the writers of "New Poetry" together? What are her criticisms of earlier American poetry?
2. How does Lowell counter the critics who say that America can't produce art because the country is too materialistic?
3. How does Lowell think Puritanism affects American poetry?

from The American Spirit in Literature

Bliss Perry

Bliss Perry (1860–1954) was a literary critic, writer, and teacher who wrote extensively about American literature. He was the editor of the Atlantic Monthly and taught at Williams College, Princeton University, and Harvard University. This is an excerpt from Chapter 10 of The American Spirit in Literature, published in 1920.

Perhaps the truth is that although we are a reading people we are not yet a book-loving people. The American newspaper and magazine have been successful in making their readers fancy that newspaper and magazine are an equivalent for books. Popular orators and popular preachers confirm this impression, and colleges and universities have often emphasized a vocational choice of books — in other words, books that are not books at all, but treatises. It is not, of course, that American journalism, whether of the daily or monthly sort, has consciously set itself to supplant the habit of book-reading. A thousand social and economic factors enter into such a problem. But few observers will question the assertion that the influence of the American magazine, ever since its great period of national literary service in the eighties and nineties, has been more marked in the field of conduct and of artistic taste than in the stimulation of a critical literary judgment. An American schoolhouse of today owes its improvement in appearance over the schoolhouse of fifty years ago largely to the popular diffusion, through the illustrated magazines, of better standards of artistic taste. But whether the judgment of school-teachers and school-children upon a piece of literature is any better than it was in the red schoolhouse of fifty years ago is a disputable question.

But we must stop guessing, or we shall never have done. The fundamental problem of our literature, as this book has attempted to trace it, has been to obtain from a mixed population dwelling in sections as widely separated as the peoples of Northern and Southern Europe, an integral intellectual and spiritual activity which could express, in obedience to the laws of beauty and truth, the emotions stimulated by our national life. It has been assumed in the preceding chapters that American literature is something different from English literature written in America. Canadian and Australian literatures have indigenous qualities of their own, but typically they belong to the colonial literature of Great Britain. This can scarcely be said of the writings of Franklin and Jefferson, and it certainly cannot be said of the writings of Cooper, Hawthorne, Emerson, Thoreau, Whitman, Lowell, Lincoln, Mark Twain, and Mr. Howells. In the pages of these men and of hundreds of others less distinguished, there is a revelation of a new national type. That the full energies of this nation have been back of our books, giving them a range and vitality and unity commensurate with the national existence, no one would claim. There are other spheres of effort in which American character has been more adequately expressed than in words. Nevertheless the books are here, in spite of every defect in national discipline, every flaw in national character; and they deserve the closest attention from all those who are trying to understand the American mind.

If the effort toward an expression of a peculiarly complex national experience has been the problem of our literary past, the literary problem of the future is the expression of the adjustment of American ideals to the standards of civilization. "Patriotism," said the martyred Edith Cavell[1] just before her death, "is not enough." Nationality and the instincts of national separatism now seem essential to the preservation of the political units of the world-state, precisely as a healthy individualism must be the basis of all enduring social fellowship. Yet it is clear that civilization is a larger, more ultimate term than nationality. Chauvinism is nowhere more repellent than in the things of the mind. It is difficult for some Americans to think internationally even in political affairs — to construe our national policy and duty in terms of obligation to civilization. Nevertheless the task must be faced, and we are slowly realizing it.

In the field of literature, likewise, Americanism is not a final word either of blame or praise. It is a word of useful characterization. Only American books, and not books written in English in America, can adequately represent our national contribution to the world's thinking and feeling. So argued Emerson and Whitman, long ago. But the younger of these two poets came to realize in his old age that the New World and the Old World are fundamentally one. The literature of the New World will inevitably have an accent of its own, but it must speak the mother-language of civilization, share in its culture, accept its discipline.

It has been said disparagingly of Longfellow and his friends: "The houses of the Brahmins had only eastern windows. The souls of the whole school lived in the old lands of culture, and they visited these lands as often as they could, and, returning, brought back whole libraries of books which they eagerly translated." But even if [1]British nurse who helped smuggle Allied soldiers out of German-occupied Belgium during World War I. She was tried for treason by the Germans and executed, despite international condemnation of her sentence. — Eds.

Longfellow and his friends had been nothing more than translators and diffusers of European culture, their task would have been justified. They kept the ideals of civilization from perishing in this new soil. Through those eastern windows came in, and still comes in, the sunlight to illumine the American spirit. To decry the literatures of the Orient and of Greece and Rome as something now outgrown by America, is simply to close the eastern windows, to narrow our conception of civilization to merely national and contemporaneous terms. It is as provincial to attempt this restriction in literature as it would be in world-politics. We must have all the windows open in our American writing, free access to ideas, knowledge of universal standards, perception of universal law.

(1920)

Questions

1. What does Bliss Perry think about the effect of magazines on American reading habits?
2. Why does Perry think it is important to have "all the windows open in our American writing" (par. 5)?
3. Why does Perry think American literature deserves close attention even though the American spirit has shown itself stronger in areas other than literature?

from The Spirit of Place

D. H. Lawrence

This essay is the opening chapter of Studies in Classic American Literature (1923), by the British writer David Herbert Lawrence (1885–1930). Lawrence is the author of The Rainbow (1915), Women in Love (1920), and Lady Chatterley's Lover (1928), among other works.

We like to think of the old-fashioned American classics as children's books. Just childishness, on our part. The old American art-speech contains an alien quality, which belongs to the American continent and to nowhere else. But, of course, so long as we insist on reading the books as children's tales, we miss all that.

One wonders what the proper high-brow Romans of the third and fourth or later centuries read into the strange utterances of Lucretius or Apuleius or Tertullian, Augustine or Athanasius. The uncanny voice of Iberian Spain, the weirdness of old Carthage, the passion of Libya and North Africa; you may bet the proper old Romans never heard these at all. They read old Latin inference over the top of it, as we read old European inference over the top of Poe or Hawthorne.

It is hard to hear a new voice, as hard as it is to listen to an unknown language. We just don't listen. There is a new voice in the old American classics. The world has declined to hear it, and has babbled about children's stories.

Why? — Out of fear. The world fears a new experience more than it fears anything. Because a new experience displaces so many old experiences. And it is like trying to use muscles that have perhaps never been used, or that have been going stiff for ages. It hurts horribly.

The world doesn't fear a new idea. It can pigeon-hole any idea. But it can't pigeon-hole a real new experience. It can only dodge. The world is a great dodger, and the Americans the greatest. Because they dodge their own very selves.

There is a new feeling in the old American books, far more than there is in the modern American books, which are pretty empty of any feeling, and proud of it. There is a "different" feeling in the old American classics. It is the shifting over from the old psyche to something new, a displacement. And displacements hurt. This hurts. So we try to tie it up, like a cut finger. Put a rag round it.

It is a cut too. Cutting away the old emotions and consciousness. Don't ask what is left.

Art-speech is the only truth. An artist is usually a damned liar, but his art, if it be art, will tell you the truth of his day. And that is all that matters. Away with eternal truth. Truth lives from day to day, and the marvellous Plato of yesterday is chiefly bosh today.

The old American artists were hopeless liars. But they were artists, in spite of themselves. Which is more than you can say of most living practitioners.

And you can please yourself, when you read The Scarlet Letter, whether you accept what that sugary, blue-eyed little darling of a Hawthorne has to say for himself, false as all darlings are, or whether you read the impeccable truth of his art-speech.

The curious thing about art-speech is that it prevaricates so terribly, I mean it tells such lies. I suppose because we always all the time tell ourselves lies. And out of a pattern of lies art weaves the truth. Like Dostoevsky posing as a sort of Jesus, but most truthfully revealing himself all the while as a little horror.

Truly art is a sort of subterfuge. But thank God for it, we can see through the subterfuge if we choose. Art has two great functions. First, it provides an emotional experience. And then, if we have the courage of our own feelings, it becomes a mine of practical truth. We have had the feelings ad nauseam. But we've never dared dig the actual truth out of them, the truth that concerns us, whether it concerns our grandchildren or not.

The artist usually sets out — or used to — to point a moral and adorn a tale. The tale, however, points the other way, as a rule. Two blankly opposing morals, the artist's and the tale's. Never trust the artist. Trust the tale. The proper function of a critic is to save the tale from the artist who created it.

Now we know our business in these studies; saving the American tale from the American artist.

(1923)

Questions

1. Why does D. H. Lawrence say that the world is hesitant to accept American literature? How does he put American literature into a world context?

2. Why does Lawrence say, "Never trust the artist. Trust the tale" (par. 13).
3. Later in this essay, Lawrence says, "Every continent has its own great spirit of place. Every people is polarized in some particular locality, which is home, the homeland. Different places on the face of the earth have different vital effluence, different vibration, different chemical exhalation, different polarity with different stars: call it what you like. But the spirit of place is a great reality." Does this belief resonate today or does it seem outdated? Explain your answer.

from Why They Aren't Writing the Great American Novel Anymore

Tom Wolfe

This essay appeared in Esquire magazine in 1972. In it Tom Wolfe examines the development of New Journalism, writing in which journalists and authors use the tools of fiction in their reporting and nonfiction.

The similarity between the early days of the novel and the early days of the New Journalism is not merely coincidental. In both cases we are watching the same process. We are watching a group of writers coming along, working in a genre regarded as Lower Class (the novel before the 1850's, slick-magazine journalism before the 1960's), who discover the joys of detailed realism and its strange powers. Many of them seem to be in love with realism for its own sake; and never mind the "sacred callings" of literature. They seem to be saying: "Hey! Come here! This is the way people are living now—just the way I'm going to show you! It may astound you, disgust you, delight you or arouse your contempt or make you laugh. . . . Nevertheless, this is what it's like! It's all right here! You won't be bored! Take a look!"

As I hardly have to tell you, that is not exactly the way serious novelists regard the task of the novel today. In this decade, the Seventies, The Novel will be celebrating the one-hundredth anniversary of its canonization as the spiritual genre. Novelists today keep using words like "myth," "fable" and "magic." That state of mind known as "the sacred office of the novelist" had originated in Europe in the 1870's and didn't take hold in the American literary world until after the Second World War. But it soon made up for lost time. What kind of novel should a sacred officer write? In 1948 Lionel Trilling presented the theory that the novel of social realism (which had flourished in America throughout the 1930's) was finished because the freight train of history had passed it by. The argument was that such novels were a product of the rise of the bourgeoisie in the nineteenth century at the height of capitalism. But now bourgeois society was breaking up, fragmenting. A novelist could no longer portray a part of that society and hope to capture the Zeitgeist; all he would be left with was one of the broken pieces. The only hope was a new kind of novel (his candidate was the novel of ideas). This theory caught on among young novelists with an astonishing grip. Whole careers were altered. All those writers hanging out in the literary pubs in New York such as the White Horse Tavern rushed off to write every kind of novel you could imagine, so long as it wasn't the so-called "big novel" of manners and society. The next thing one knew, they were into novels of ideas, Freudian novels, surrealistic novels ("black comedy"), Kafkaesque novels and, more recently, the catatonic novel or novel of immobility, the sort that begins: "In order to get started, he went to live alone on an island and shot himself." (Opening line of a Robert Coover short story.)

As a result, by the Sixties, about the time I came to New York, the most serious, ambitious and, presumably, talented novelists had abandoned the richest terrain of the novel: namely, society, the social tableau, manners and morals, the whole business of "the way we live now," in Trollope's phrase. There is no novelist who will be remembered as the novelist who captured the Sixties in America, or even in New York, in the sense that Thackeray was the chronicler of London in the 1840's and Balzac was the chronicler of Paris and all of France after the fall of the Empire. Balzac prided himself on being "the secretary of French society." Most serious American novelists would rather cut their wrists than be known as "the secretary of American society," and not merely because of ideological considerations. With fable, myth and the sacred office to think about — who wants such a menial role?

That was marvelous for journalists — I can tell you that. The Sixties was one of the most extraordinary decades in American history in terms of manners and morals. Manners and morals were the History of the Sixties. A hundred years from now when historians write about the 1960's in America (always assuming, to paraphrase Céline, that the Chinese will still give a damn about American history), they won't write about it as the decade of the war in Vietnam or of space exploration or of political assassinations . . . but as the decade when manners and morals, styles of living, attitudes toward the world changed the country more crucially than any political events . . . all the changes that were labeled, however clumsily, with such tags as "the generation gap," "the counter culture," "black consciousness," "sexual permissiveness," "the death of God," . . . the abandonment of proprieties, pieties, decorums connoted by "go-go funds," "fast money," swinger groovy hippie drop-out pop Beatles Andy Baby Jane Bernie Huey Eldridge LSD marathon encounter stone underground rip-off. . . . This whole side of American life that gushed forth when postwar American affluence finally blew the lid off — all this novelists simply turned away from, gave up by default. That left a huge gap in American letters, a gap big enough to drive an ungainly Reo rig like the New Journalism through.

When I reached New York in the early Sixties, I couldn't believe the scene I saw 5 spread out before me. New York was pandemonium with a big grin on. Among people with money — and they seemed to be multiplying like shad — it was the wildest, looniest time since the 1920's . . . a universe of creamy forty-five-year-old fashionable fatties with walnut-shell eyes out on the giblet slab wearing the hip-huggers and the minis and the Little Egypt eyes and the sideburns and the boots and the bells and the love beads, doing the Watusi and the Funky Broadway and jiggling and grinning and sweating and sweating and grinning and jiggling until the onset of dawn or saline depletion, whichever came first. . . . It was a hulking carnival. But what really amazed me was that as a writer I had it practically all to myself. As fast as I could possibly do it, I was turning out articles on this amazing spectacle that I saw bubbling and screaming right there in front of my wondering eyes — New York! — and all the while I just knew that some enterprising novelist was going to come along and do this whole marvelous scene with one gigantic daring bold stroke. It was so ready, so ripe — beckoning . . . but it never happened. To my great amazement New York simply remained the journalist's bonanza. For that matter, novelists seemed to shy away from the life of the great cities altogether. The thought of tackling such a subject seemed to terrify them, confuse them, make them doubt their own powers. And besides, it would have meant tackling social realism as well.

To my even greater amazement I had the same experience when I came upon 1960's California. This was the very incubator of new styles of living, and these styles were right there for all to see, ricocheting off every eyeball — and again a few amazed journalists working in the new form had it all to themselves, even the psychedelic movement, whose waves are still felt in every part of the country, in every grammar school even, like the intergalactic pulse. I wrote The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test and then waited for the novels that I was sure would come pouring out of the psychedelic experience . . . but they never came forth, either. I learned later that publishers had been waiting, too. They had been practically crying for novels by the new writers who must be out there somewhere, the new writers who would do the big novels of the hippie life or campus life or radical movements or the war in Vietnam or dope or sex or black militancy or encounter groups or the whole whirlpool all at once. They waited, and all they got was the Prince of Alienation . . . sailing off to Lonesome Island on his Tarot boat with his back turned and his Timeless cape on, reeking of camphor balls.

Amazing, as I say. If nothing else had done it, that would have. The — New Journalists — Parajournalists — had the whole crazed obscene uproarious Mammon-faced drug-soaked mau-mau; lust oozing Sixties in America all to themselves.

(1972)

Questions

1. What does Tom Wolfe think early novelists and practitioners of New Journalism have in common?
2. In what ways does Wolfe believe the American novel has changed by the time he writes this in the 1970s? According to him, how did that change open the way for New Journalism?
3. How does this excerpt reflect some of the elements of New Journalism?
4. Do you consider examples of New Journalism, such as Truman Capote's In Cold Blood, to be literature? Explain why or why not.

Hello, Martians. Let Moby-Dick Explain

MARGARET ATWOOD

This essay by Canadian novelist, poet, and environmental activist Margaret Atwood (b. 1939) was published in the New York Times in 2012. Short-listed five times and winner once of the Man Booker Prize, Atwood is the author of The Handmaid's Tale (1985), Cat's Eye (1988), and The Blind Assassin (2000), among other books.

Last night the Martians touched down in the backyard. They were oval and bright pink, with two antlike antennae topped by eyes fringed with sea-anemone lashes. They said they'd come to study America.

"Why ask me?" I said. "America is farther south."

"You are an observer," they said. "Please tell us: Does America have a different 'flavor' from that of other countries? Is it the center of the cultural world? How does it look to outsiders?"

"America has always been different from Europe," I said, "having begun as a utopian religious community. Some have seen it as a dream world where you can be what you choose, others as a mirage that lures, exploits and disappoints. Some see it as a land of spiritual potential, others as a place of crass and vulgar materialism. Some see it as a mecca for creative entrepreneurs, others as a corporate oligarchy where the big eat the small and inventions helpful to the world are stifled. Some see it as the home of freedom of expression, others as a land of timorous conformity and mob-opinion rule."

"Thank you," said the Martians, after looking up "thank you" on translate.google .com™. "How may we best discover the essence of America?" 5

"Through its literature, would be my choice," I said, "but I'm biased."

"O.K.," said the Martians. "What should we read first? Can we have marshmallows?"

"Let's start with two stories by Nathaniel Hawthorne," I said. "'The Maypole of Merry Mount,' and 'Young Goodman Brown.' Here are your marshmallows."

Their pink antennae waved excitedly. They stored away the marshmallows as rare American artifacts. Then they read the stories, very quickly, as Martians do. "What do these mean to contemporary America?" they asked.

"In 'The Maypole of Merry Mount,'" I said, "some people having a fun party in the woods are disrupted by the Puritans, who consider them immoral. Both groups have come to America in search of 'freedom.' The Merry Mounters interpret 'freedom' as sexual and individual freedom, the Puritans as freedom to practice their own religion while outlawing the behavior of others. This fight is still going on in America: the same issues come up in every election. In my novel The Handmaid's Tale," I added modestly, "I've included them as 'freedom to' and 'freedom from.'" 10

"We took that in high school," said the Martians. "What about 'Young Goodman Brown'?"

"So, in 'Young Goodman Brown,'" I said, "this Puritan goes for a walk at night and discovers that all his neighbors and relations — including his young wife, Faith — are members of a satanic witchcraft group. He wakes up in the morning wondering if he's had a bad dream. But ever afterward he distrusts the neighbors; and so do all Americans, because how do you know whether the neighbors are who they claim to be? Every once in a while America has a Salem-style witch hunt, during which hysteria takes over and people are tagged with the satanic label of the moment. Right now it's mostly 'terrorism,' though in some quarters it's 'liberalism' or even 'evil-green-dragon environmentalism.'"

The Martians decided to eat one marshmallow each to see what it tasted like. Their mouths were underneath: they dealt with food by hopping onto it. "Can we have popcorn now? Orville Redenbacher's™?" they said. "And a Coke™?"

"How do you know about those things?" I said.

"We watch American TV and Internet," they said, "like everyone else in the universe. Though American cultural hegemony is slipping, we perceive: newly rich countries such as India and Brazil have developed their own mass media. Also, America's promise of democracy and egalitarianism — the mainstay of its cultural capital, widely understood — is being squandered. America is viewed as riddled with internal contradictions, what with vote suppression, the economic inequality protested by Occupy Wall Street, the impact of the mortgage meltdown, and the public's loss of confidence in political institutions. So, the popcorn? We can do the microwaving." They took out their ray guns. 15

"After you've read the next book," I said. "It's Melville's Moby-Dick."

The Martians riffled through Moby-Dick at top speed. Then they consulted translate.google.com™ for an expression that would best convey their reaction. "Holy crap!" they said. "Does this mean what we think it means?" they said.

"What do you think it means?" I said. "I'll do the popcorn myself: you might get the wavelength wrong."

"Moby-Dick is about the oil industry," they said. "And the Ship of American State. The owners of the Pequod are rapacious and stingy religious hypocrites. The ship's business is to butcher whales and turn them into an industrial energy product. The mates are the middle management. The harpooners, who are from races colonized by America one way or another, are supplying the expert tech labor. Elijah the prophet — from the American artist caste — foretells the Pequod's doom, which comes about because the chief executive, Ahab, is a megalomaniac who wants to annihilate nature.

"Nature is symbolized by a big white whale, which has interfered with Ahab's personal freedom by biting off his leg and refusing to be slaughtered and boiled. The narrator, Ishmael, represents journalists; his job is to warn America that it's controlled by psychotics who will destroy it, because they hate the natural world and don't grasp the fact that without it they will die. That's enough literature for now. Can we have popcorn?" 20

After inhaling the popcorn, they slurped up their Cokes™, then asked me to take an Instagram™ on their cellphones of them with the bottles.

"Now we are going to Las Vegas to do some gambling," they said, "because it's a very American thing. After that we will buzz the Grand Canyon, and then we'll go to the Boot Hill Museum in Kansas and get pictures of ourselves dressed as Wild West cowboys and honky-tonk floozies."

"I think you should be careful," I said.

"Why?" the Martians asked.

"Forgive me for pointing this out, but you look a lot like diagrams of the human female uterus," I said. "Complete with fallopian tubes and ovaries." 25

A human being might be insulted to be told this, but it didn't seem to bother the Martians. Having looked up "uterus" on translate.google.com™, they said, "Isn't the uterus a good thing? The life force and so on?"

"In some parts of America," I said, "the men are obsessed with uteri. They feel that having one is potentially demonic. It's a hangover from 'Young Goodman Brown.' If they saw you hopping around — worse still, eating popcorn — they'd go completely berserk, and pronounce you pregnant, and put you in jail."

"Maybe we will go to Radio City Music Hall instead," the Martians said.

"Good choice," I said. "You won't stand out in New York, or not much. If anyone bothers you, accuse them of being specist. Throw in that you're vegans."

"O.K.," they said. "When we get back to Mars, we will start an American book club. We wish to read David Foster Wallace, not to mention Edith Wharton and Raymond Carver and tons of others. It is the writers who convey the inner truth about a nation, despite themselves, yes? Will you join us on video?" 30

"A pleasure," I said. "Any reader is a friend of mine."

(2012)

Questions

1. Besides the fact that she's a writer, why do you think Margaret Atwood suggests literature as the way to "best discover the essence of America" (par. 5)?
2. Based on the stories Atwood suggests, what does she consider to be the most important influence in both American literature and politics?
3. Do you think Atwood believes that there is such a thing as American literature? Explain your answer.

Making Connections

1. Both Amy Lowell (p. 1257) and Margaret Atwood (p. 1267) discuss the influence of Puritanism on American literature. In what ways are their views similar? In what ways are they different?

2. Emma Lazarus (p. 1250) argues that the influence of "a man of genius" is beneficial, noting that "contemporary English criticism declared [Charles] Dickens's early work to be imitative of an American's — [Washington] Irving" (par. 1). What might she say to Walt Whitman (p. 1247) about his exhortation to "[c]all for new great masters to comprehend new arts, new perfections, new wants" (par. 3)?

3. Compare and contrast the excerpts from John Macy (p. 1252) and Bliss Perry (p. 1260), both of which address the spirit of American literature.

4. What do you think Sherwood Anderson (p. 1255) would say to Atwood's visiting Martians?

5. Tom Wolfe (p. 1264) suggests that writers in the twentieth century were interested only in novels of ideas, not in novels of manners and society. Would D. H. Lawrence (p. 1262) agree? How does he see the obligation of the American writer? What "tale" did he think writers should tell?

Entering the Conversation

As you respond to each of the following prompts, support your position with appropriate evidence, including at least three sources in this Conversation on American literature, unless otherwise indicated.

1. What makes American literature distinctly American? What aspects of our nation, our storytelling, our language, our culture, or the genres in which we work make our literature exceptionally American?

2. Coined by the French writer on America, Alexis de Tocqueville, "American exceptionalism" is a term used to describe the telling of the American story as a grand and unique narrative. Some think that American exceptionalism has contributed to a limited national identity, marginalizing those whose stories do not fit the narrative. Consider the views of the writers here, as well as your reading in American literature, and write an essay in which you support, challenge, or qualify the concept of American exceptionalism.

3. Consider one of the American novels you have read this year. Write an essay in which you analyze it as being representative of American literature. Refer to at least three of the sources here for ideas about what might or might not define American literature.

4. Rice University scholar Caroline Levander suggests we ask, Where is American literature? rather than What is American literature? She says that American literature has emerged over space as well as over time and that another way to look at American literature is as a "collaborative undertaking occurring throughout the nation's shifting geographic margins and centers." Use Levander's lens to imagine a round-table discussion in which the writers here consider the question, Where is American literature?

5. What's ahead for the great American novel? Maria Konnikova, writing in Slate, says, > Today's American soul is a far cry from that of the mid-1800s. With translations and multiculturalism, fluid borders, constant travel, and cultural intermingling, what does it even mean, American? Race, slavery, these are all indelible parts of the picture. But increasingly, racial history may be becoming one of an array of ever-mingling, ever-changing, ever-shifting possibilities. Surely, just as apt a modern-day contender for the title would be someone like Teju Cole or Junot Diaz or Jhumpa Lahiri — someone who embodies America's flow of identities, the reimagining of the American Dream. That, in a way, would be far more akin to the spirit of the GAN [Great American Novel] — the vista that tries to capture what it means to be American, in contrast to being anything else.

Write an essay in which you predict the future of American literature, focusing on, as Konnikova says, what it means to be American.

Grammar as Rhetoric and Style

Direct, Precise, and Active Verbs

Direct, precise, active verbs energize writing. Consider this description with verbs in blue from "The Chrysanthemums" by John Steinbeck (p. 1147, pars. 7–8):

> She brushed a cloud of hair out of her eyes with the back of her glove, and left a smudge of earth on her cheek in doing it. Behind her stood the neat white farm house with red geraniums close-banked around it as high as the windows. It was a hard-swept looking little house with hard-polished windows, and a clean mud-mat on the front steps.
>
> Elisa cast another glance toward the tractor shed. The strangers were getting into their Ford coupe. She took off a glove and put her strong fingers down into the forest of new green chrysanthemum sprouts that were growing around the old roots. She spread the leaves and looked down among the close-growing stems. No aphids were there, no sowbugs or snails or cutworms. Her terrier fingers destroyed such pests before they could get started.

The simple verb forms and strong active verbs in Steinbeck's description of Elisa help develop her character as confident, precise, and definitive when she works on her chrysanthemums. It is easy to visualize her and her actions as she notices, but doesn't dwell on, the men getting into the car.

Now consider another passage, from Edith Wharton's "Roman Fever" (p. 1127, par. 7). The verbs are in blue:

> The dark lady laughed again, and they both relapsed upon the view, contemplating it in silence, with a sort of diffused serenity which might have been borrowed from the spring effulgence of the Roman skies. The luncheon-hour was long past, and the two had their end of the vast terrace to themselves. At its opposite extremity a few groups, detained by a lingering look at the outspread city, were gathering up guide-books and fumbling for tips. The last of them scattered, and the two ladies were alone on the air-washed height.

Wharton uses active and passive verbs to give a sense of the transitional nature of the scene. The last two sentences have four different action verbs, but the last part — in which the two ladies are left to the view — relies solely on a passive verb form of "to be." The women are quite isolated from the hustle and bustle of the tourists, as that verb form suggests.

Direct Verbs

Use forms of to be and other linking verbs sparingly and with a specific reason. Often you can change a form of to be followed by a predicate adjective or a predicate noun (also called nominalization) into an action verb. Consider how the second sentence in the pairs below sports a stronger verb than the first:

> The high grey-flannel fog of winter was closing off the Salinas Valley from the sky and from all the rest of the world.

> The high grey-flannel fog of winter closed off the Salinas Valley from the sky and from all the rest of the world. — John Steinbeck

> It is the presentation of such a "complex" instantaneously which gives that sense of sudden liberation; that sense of freedom from time limits and space limits; that sense of sudden growth, which is the experience we have in the presence of the greatest works of art.

> It is the presentation of such a "complex" instantaneously which gives that sense of sudden liberation; that sense of freedom from time limits and space limits; that sense of sudden growth, which we experience in the presence of the greatest works of art. — Ezra Pound

> During this period, white people were different from colored to me only in that they rode through town and never lived there.

> During this period, white people differed from colored to me only in that they rode through town and never lived there. — Zora Neale Hurston

Precise Verbs

While there is nothing wrong with the verbs got and put in the first sentence below, consider the precision of the verbs in the second sentence.

> He got out of bed and put on his overalls.

> He eased out of bed and slipped into overalls. — Richard Wright

Similarly, in the first sentence that follows, keep and comes are perfectly serviceable verbs — until you compare them with the more precise verbs that the writer selects.

> To keep a democracy of effort requires a vast amount of patience in dealing with differing methods, a vast amount of humility. But out of the confusion of many voices comes an understanding of dominant public need.

> To maintain a democracy of effort requires a vast amount of patience in dealing with differing methods, a vast amount of humility. But out of the confusion of many voices rises an understanding of dominant public need.
>
> — Franklin Delano Roosevelt

Active Verbs

In addition to selecting a verb that is direct and creates a precise image, use verbs in the active voice — with an easy-to-picture subject doing something — unless you have a specific purpose for using the passive voice, where the subject is acted on. Here, for example, in a sentence from "How It Feels to Be Colored Me," Zora Neale Hurston makes good use of the passive voice (p. 1117, par. 9):

> I feel most colored when I am thrown against a sharp white background.

In this sentence, Hurston is acted on. Why? Perhaps because she wanted to create a sense of helplessness.

By and large, though, strong writers stick with the active voice, as Ernest Hemingway does when he describes what's going on outside the café in "A Clean, Well-Lighted Place" (p. 1121, par. 9):

> A girl and a soldier went by in the street. The street light shone on the brass number on his collar. The girl wore no head covering and hurried beside him.
>
> — Ernest Hemingway

Hemingway could have cast that sentence in the passive voice, as follows:

> They were passed by a girl and a soldier. The brass number on his collar was lit by the street light. The girl's head was not covered and she was hurrying beside him.

As is often the case, and as this example demonstrates, use of the passive voice muddies the picture.

• EXERCISE 1 •

Improve the following sentences by replacing one or more verbs in each with a more effective one — that is, a more vivid, precise, and active verb.

1. My first college visit will always be remembered by me.
2. There are many technological advances available to make our lives easier.
3. In the middle of the night, sirens could be heard.
4. It was not very long before she regretted buying the expensive handbag.
5. The Graham technique is little esteemed by modern dancers today.
6. The college advisor said she could not make a suggestion about which school to apply to because she didn't know his SAT scores.
7. The team captain is responsible for scheduling practices and communicating with team members.
8. A decision was reached by the arbitration panel.
9. The local sheriff gave a warning to the college students about walking around with open containers.
10. The chief of surgery took the opportunity to thank the volunteers.
11. Do your children have fears about going away to camp?
12. Antigone was very protective of Oedipus in Oedipus at Colonus.

• EXERCISE 2 •

Identify the verbs in the following passages. Discuss how these verbs affect the tone of the passages.

> To my room, which is on a street near the loop in the city of Chicago, come men who write. They talk and I talk. We are fools. We talk of writers of the Old World and the beauty and subtlety of the work they do. Below us the roaring city lies like a great animal on the prairies, but we do not run out to the prairies. We stay in our rooms and talk.

And so, having listened to talk and having myself talked overmuch, I grow weary of talk and walk in the streets. As I walk alone, an old truth comes home to me and I know that we shall never have an American literature until we return to faith in ourselves and to the facing of our own limitations. We must, in some way, become in ourselves more like our fellows, more simple and real.

— Sherwood Anderson, An Apology for Crudity

It is an atomic bomb. It is a harnessing of the basic power of the universe. The force from which the sun draws its power has been loosed against those who brought war to the Far East.

— Harry S Truman, Statement by the President of the United States

• EXERCISE 3 •

Analyze the verbs in the first two paragraphs (p. 1143) of Franklin Delano Roosevelt's second inaugural address, One-Third of a Nation. How would you describe the verbs FDR uses? How do they set the tone for the subject of his address? Do the verbs he uses provide a hint that his address has a message that goes beyond the usual inauguration speech? Cite specific examples to support your view.

When four years ago we met to inaugurate a President, the Republic, single-minded in anxiety, stood in spirit here. We dedicated ourselves to the fulfillment of a vision — to speed the time when there would be for all the people that security and peace essential to the pursuit of happiness. We of the Republic pledged ourselves to drive from the temple of our ancient faith those who had profaned it; to end by action, tireless and unafraid, the stagnation and despair of that day. We did those first things first.

Our covenant with ourselves did not stop there. Instinctively we recognized a deeper need — the need to find through government the instrument of our united purpose to solve for the individual the ever-rising problems of a complex civilization. Repeated attempts at their solution without the aid of government had left us baffled and bewildered. For, without that aid, we had been unable to create those moral controls over the services of science which are necessary to make science a useful servant instead of a ruthless master of mankind. To do this we knew that we must find practical controls over blind economic forces and blindly selfish men.

• EXERCISE 4 •

Count the verbs in one of the passages in Exercise 2 or 3. Then categorize them as linking verbs or more vivid action verbs and calculate the ratio of one to the other. Do the same for several paragraphs of your own writing. Are you relying more on linking verbs, or are most of your verbs direct and precise action verbs?

Suggestions for Writing

America in the Modern World

Now that you have examined a number of texts from the period between the two world wars, explore aspects of this era in America's history by synthesizing your own ideas and the readings. You might want to do additional research or use readings from other classes as you write.

1. Write an essay in which you discuss whether or not the poetry of American imagist William Carlos Williams (p. 1106) follows the rules set out by Ezra Pound in "A Few Don'ts by an Imagiste" (p. 1075).
2. Actor, poet, director, and activist Ossie Davis said this about Langston Hughes:

   > Langston Hughes belongs to whoever is listening. A possession in common, like the sights and sounds of a streetcorner hangout, or the barbershop debate over pretty girls' legs, and baseball players: Open your ears and your heart if you've got one; Langston will walk right in and do the rest. His thoughts come naked, conceived in the open, only at home in the public domain. Free, without charge, like water, like air — like salted peanuts at a Harlem rent party. Come in, have one on me — that's Langston's style; a great host; a perfect bartender; dishing it up, iambic pentameter, on the rocks and on the house, fresh wrote this morning. Dead now, but still alive. Ol' Langston in the corners of my mind.

   Do you agree with Davis about Hughes's accessibility or do you find him harder to understand? Explain in an essay your own experience reading the work of Langston Hughes, starting with the poems (pp. 1101, 1197) and also looking at his essay (p. 1102) in this chapter.
3. Research the group of women known as the "pack horse librarians" of Kentucky and write about how they lived the ideas and ideals of Eleanor Roosevelt's speech about what libraries mean to the nation (p. 1138). Create a pitch for a film about them: imagine whom you would cast, where you would shoot, and how you would tell their story in film.

4. This chapter includes many pieces that could be defined as representing modernism, a movement marked by abstract art, symbolic poetry, and stream-of-consciousness prose. Peter Watson, the New York correspondent for the London Times, wrote in his book A Terrible Beauty, "One of the many innovations of modernism was the new demands it placed on the audience. Music, painting, literature, even architecture, would never be quite so 'easy' as they had been." Write an essay in which you analyze one or more works in this chapter through the lens of Watson's comment.

5. The works in this chapter are bookended by two world wars. Write an essay in which you trace the influences of war on the literature of the time.

this page left intentionally blank

10

Redefining America

1945 to the Present

On August 6 and August 9, 1945, the United States dropped atomic bombs on the Japanese cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, simultaneously marking the end of World War II and the beginning of a new era in which America would become the world's foremost economic, military, and cultural power.

Reluctant allies during the war, America and the Soviet Union emerged from World War II as the sole remaining superpowers, separated by a profound ideological divide between capitalism and Communism, democracy and totalitarianism. As Europe recovered physically and politically, the two superpowers vied for influence over its fate. Western Europe was rebuilt with U.S. help via the Marshall Plan, while the Soviet Union quickly stepped in to seize control of Eastern Europe, setting up satellite states in Poland, Romania, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Albania, and Hungary. Caught between the two superpowers, Germany and its capital, Berlin, were divided into East and West, Communist and democratic. Alarmed by the Soviet Union's expansionist policies in Eastern Europe and beyond, the United States and its allies adopted a policy of containment to stop the spread of Communism. The Cold War had begun, and it would affect American life until the Soviet Union fell in 1991.

The Soviet Union raised the stakes of the Cold War in 1949, when they shocked the world by successfully testing a nuclear weapon. The Cold War became an arms race, with the threat of nuclear war hanging over American life like a dark cloud. Children learned to duck and cover under school desks in case of a nuclear attack. Families built fallout shelters in their backyards. As William Faulkner said in his Nobel Prize acceptance speech, "There are no longer problems of the spirit. There is only the question: When will I be blown up?" Adding further paranoia to this Cold War anxiety, a spy ring was uncovered within the Los Alamos nuclear facility. The ring had been relaying top-secret nuclear weapons plans to the Soviets. The threat of Communist infiltration, global Communism, and nuclear war set off a panic, often called the Red Scare, that had Congress searching for Communists within the government, in unions, in education, and in Hollywood. In this chapter, you will read a series of texts about the anxieties of the atomic age and their impact on the present day, including a piece by playwright Arthur Miller in which he explains how commonalities between the hunt for Communists and the Salem Witch Trials inspired him to write The Crucible.

Permission from Solo Syndication. Supplied by Llyfrgell Genedlaethol Cymru/National Library of Wales © Leslie Illingworth Associated Newspaper/Solo Syndication, London.

In this cartoon by British cartoonist Leslie Illingworth, Joseph Stalin spreads Communism throughout Eastern Europe.

Despite the anxiety, the United States emerged from World War II into a period of previously unimaginable prosperity. Wartime spending and production had pulled the nation out of the economic depression of the 1930s and transformed it into a manufacturing juggernaut that produced newly developed consumer goods, including plastics, passenger jets, dishwashers, refrigerators, washing machines, air conditioners, and televisions. Employment in both white- and blue-collar sectors skyrocketed, as did the American standard of living. The economy grew by a startling 37 percent during the 1950s, and the gross domestic product (GDP) rose by 250 percent between 1940 and 1960. The 1950s saw a corresponding swell in income levels across the board, but particularly in the middle class. In this chapter, you will read a Conversation on the American middle class that asks you to consider the factors that led to its rise during the postwar boom and to reflect on the impact that growing income inequality might have on its future.

Perhaps no product symbolizes the prosperity of the postwar era more than the automobile. Cars and trucks were no longer luxuries or tools but a part of the American way of life, a tangible expression of freedom. By the mid-1950s, there were more than 60 million automobiles on American roads. With the rise of the automobile came Walter Kiddie Nuclear Laboratories, Inc. Packaged Shelter, Bettmann/Corbis.

The fear of nuclear attack during the Cold War brought a rise in the purchase and installation of bomb shelters such as this one, which were stocked with enough food and water to sustain a family for three to five days.

an increase in single-family homes (as opposed to apartment buildings or homes intended for extended families), which were often grouped together on the outskirts of a city in suburbs. And as suburbs grew, urban populations declined for the first time in America's history. In this chapter, you will enter a Conversation about America's love affair with the automobile. Is it over? Has the impact of suburban sprawl begun to outweigh the call of the open road? Has the automobile's place in our hearts been replaced by other technologies, or will the open road always be a part of our national identity?

Gary Leonard/Corbis

Despite the exuberance of the postwar boom, not everyone shared in the prosperity of the 1950s and 1960s. Jim Crow laws made discrimination the law of the land throughout the American South, though de facto segregation existed all over America. In this chapter, you will read James Baldwin's "Notes of a Native Son" which gives a glimpse of the emotional toll racial discrimination takes on its victims. Things began to change in 1954, with the heroic efforts of the civil rights movement. The Selma-to-Montgomery marches, the Montgomery Bus Boycott begun by Rosa Parks, the simple ordering of a cup of coffee at a segregated Woolworth's lunch counter in Greensboro, North Carolina — these are iconic events in our nation's history. In this chapter, poet Rita Dove brings Rosa Parks's actions to life in her poem "Rosa." In the spring of 1963, during a protest to desegregate the shops in downtown Birmingham, Alabama, Martin Luther King Jr. and thousands of others were arrested. In jail, on smuggled scraps of paper, King wrote his famous "Letter from Birmingham Jail." which you will read in this chapter. It is paired with a TalkBack essay by Malcolm Gladwell, who contends that Twitter and other social networks are not capable of generating the dramatic campaigns and lasting change that the civil rights movement achieved.

Throughout the 1960s, the Cold War continued to smolder. The Cuban Missile Crisis brought the world as close as it has ever come to all-out nuclear war. And in Asia, the United States sent troops into Vietnam ostensibly to prevent a Communist takeover of South Vietnam by the Soviet-backed North Vietnamese. Despite protests at home — especially on college campuses — the United States supported its actions based on a belief in the domino theory, which held that if one country in a region fell to Communism, others would follow. The Vietnam War lasted for more than a decade and a half, ending in 1975 and costing the lives of 58,000 U.S. soldiers and as many as 2 million Vietnamese. Tim O'Brien's "On the Rainy River" tells the tale of a young man who gets drafted and has to deal with the competing ethical demands of serving his country and serving his own conscience. Veteran Yusef Komunyakaa's poem "Facing It" describes the emotional experience of a soldier viewing the Vietnam Memorial in Washington, D.C.

AP photo

In this August 28, 1963, file photo, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. (center front) marches for civil rights, arms linked with a line of men, in the March on Washington. Later that day, Dr. King would give his famous "I Have a Dream" speech.

From the 1950s to the 1970s, patterns of immigration to the United States shifted. The number of immigrants from Europe declined, while the number from Mexico, Central and South America, and South and East Asia increased. And whereas

Bettmann/Corbis

A group of women rally at the Statue of Liberty in support of the recent passage of the Equal Rights Amendment by the United States House of Representatives. The bill did not survive in the U.S. Senate.

assimilation had been the mantra for European immigrants, multiculturalism became the byword for the new immigrants, who were reluctant to give up their traditions and identities. Multiculturalism challenged and redefined what it means to be an American. In this chapter, you will read pieces by Naomi Shihab Nye, Judith Ortiz Cofer, Li-Young Lee, and others who give voice to this new, more inclusive, America.

The women's rights movement of the late 1960s changed the American workplace, economy, and family structure. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, in 1950 about 34 percent of women held jobs; by 1980, that number grew to 51 percent, and by 1990, that number grew to 60 percent. Dual-income families have largely replaced

Neville Elder/Corbis

New York City firefighters walk through the rubble at the World Trade Center, the ruins of the Twin Towers behind them.

single-income families. In this chapter, you will read pieces by Adrienne Rich and Stephen Jay Gould that explore the literary and scientific thinking that resulted in greater equality for women in American culture.

As America entered the twenty-first century, it experienced perhaps its greatest tragedy and challenge: 9/11 was the defining event of that decade. The wars it spawned and the impact it had on American culture continue to be felt more than a decade later. In this chapter, you will consider Art Spiegelman's visual homage to the tragedy and Ana Juan's response a decade later. You will also hear from soldier and poet Brian Turner, whose haunting poem describes the challenges of a soldier returning from war to face the mundane realities of everyday life.

The America you will explore in this chapter is one marked by rapid change. Every decade seems to have brought sweeping technological, demographic, and cultural changes, defining and redefining America generation after generation.

Elizabeth Bishop

Elizabeth Bishop (1911–1979) was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, spent much of her childhood in Nova Scotia, and eventually settled in Boston. She attended Vassar College, where she earned a BA and met poet Marianne Moore, who dissuaded her from attending medical school in favor of pursuing life as a poet. Bishop published her first collection of poetry, North and South (1946), after traveling in Europe and North Africa. During an extended trip to Brazil, she published her second collection, A Cold Spring (1955), with the poems from North and South, in a single volume. This won her the Pulitzer Prize in 1956. Bishop lived in Brazil for fifteen years; translated the Brazilian work Minha Vida de Menina as The Diary of Helena Morely (1957); and described her life in Brazil in her third collection of poetry, Questions of Travel (1965). Her last collection, Geography III, was published in 1976.

The Fish

Bishop lived in Key West, Florida, when she wrote "The Fish." She was an avid fisherwoman, having grown up in a fishing village in Nova Scotia. "The Fish" was first published in Partisan Review in 1938.

I caught a tremendous fish and held him beside the boat half out of water, with my hook fast in a corner of his mouth.
He didn't fight.
He hadn't fought at all.
He hung a grunting weight, battered and venerable and homely. Here and there his brown skin hung in strips like ancient wall-paper, and its pattern of darker brown was like wall-paper:
shapes like full-blown roses stained and lost through age.
He was speckled with barnacles, fine rosettes of lime, and infested with tiny white sea-lice, and underneath two or three rags of green weed hung down.
While his gills were breathing in the terrible oxygen
— the frightening gills,
fresh and crisp with blood,
that can cut so badly —
I thought of the coarse white flesh packed in like feathers,
the big bones and the little bones,

the dramatic reds and blacks of his shiny entrails, and the pink swim-bladder
like a big peony.
I looked into his eyes which were far larger than mine but shallower, and yellowed, the irises backed and packed with tarnished tinfoil seen through the lenses of old scratched isinglass.
They shifted a little, but not to return my stare.
— It was more like the tipping of an object toward the light.
I admired his sullen face,
the mechanism of his jaw, and then I saw that from his lower lip
— if you could call it a lip — grim, wet, and weapon-like, hung five old pieces of fish-line, or four and a wire leader with the swivel still attached, with all their five big hooks grown firmly in his mouth.
A green line, frayed at the end where he broke it, two heavier lines, and a fine black thread still crimped from the strain and snap when it broke and he got away.
Like medals with their ribbons frayed and wavering, a five-haired beard of wisdom trailing from his aching jaw.
I stared and stared and victory filled up the little rented boat, from the pool of bilge where oil had spread a rainbow around the rusted engine to the bailer rusted orange,
the sun-cracked thwarts,
the oarlocks on their strings,

the gunnels — until everything was rainbow, rainbow, rainbow!
And I let the fish go.

(1938)

Exploring the Text

1. How does the speaker's description of the fish change over the course of the poem?
2. Trace the verbs in "The Fish," from "I caught" in the first line to "I let" in the last. What do they have in common? What is the effect of their parallel structure?
3. You may notice that Elizabeth Bishop uses several similes (ll. 9–15, for example) and almost no metaphors. Why do you think she made that decision?
4. How does the image in line 69, "where oil had spread a rainbow," foreshadow the end of the poem? What do you think is the significance of the repeated "rainbow"?
5. How would the meaning of the poem change if Bishop's last line had been "So I let the fish go"?
6. Why do you think the speaker let the fish go? Refer to specific words, lines, and images in the poem to explain your answer.
7. In what way is "The Fish" a classic "fish tale" (a boast about the size of a catch)? In what way is it different?

William Faulkner

William Faulkner (1897–1962) grew up in Oxford, Mississippi. Except for some time spent in the Canadian and then the British Royal Air Force during World War I, at a bookstore in New York City, and at a newspaper in New Orleans, Faulkner seldom left Oxford. His fiction — including The Sound and the Fury (1929), Light in August (1932), Absalom, Absalom! (1936), and Intruder in the Dust (1962), among others — takes place in the imaginary Yoknapatawpha County and features a revolving cast of recurring characters.

Nobel Prize Banquet Speech

The Nobel Prize in Literature was awarded to William Faulkner in 1949 for "his powerful and unique contribution to the modern American novel." His speech was given at the City Hall in Stockholm, Sweden, on December 10, 1950.

Ladies and gentlemen,

I feel that this award was not made to me as a man, but to my work — a life's work in the agony and sweat of the human spirit, not for glory and least of all for profit, but to create out of the materials of the human spirit something which did not exist before.

So this award is only mine in trust. It will not be difficult to find a dedication for the money part of it commensurate with the purpose and significance of its origin. But I would like to do the same with the acclaim too, by using this moment as a pinnacle from which I might be listened to by the young men and women already dedicated to the same anguish and travail, among whom is already that one who will some day stand here where I am standing.

Our tragedy today is a general and universal physical fear so long sustained by now that we can even bear it. There are no longer problems of the spirit. There is only the question: When will I be blown up? Because of this, the young man or woman writing today has forgotten the problems of the human heart in conflict with itself which alone can make good writing because only that is worth writing about, worth the agony and the sweat.

He must learn them again. He must teach himself that the basest of all things is to be afraid; and, teaching himself that, forget it forever, leaving no room in his workshop for anything but the old verities and truths of the heart, the old universal truths lacking which any story is ephemeral and doomed — love and honor and pity and pride and compassion and sacrifice. Until he does so, he labors under a curse. He writes not of love but of lust, of defeats in which nobody loses anything of value, of victories without hope and, worst of all, without pity or compassion. His griefs grieve on no universal bones, leaving no scars. He writes not of the heart but of the glands.

Until he relearns these things, he will write as though he stood among and watched the end of man. I decline to accept the end of man. It is easy enough to say that man is immortal simply because he will endure: that when the last dingdong of doom has clanged and faded from the last worthless rock hanging tideless in the last red and dying evening, that even then there will still be one more sound: that of his puny inexhaustible voice, still talking.

I refuse to accept this. I believe that man will not merely endure: he will prevail. 5
He is immortal, not because he alone among creatures has an inexhaustible voice, but because he has a soul, a spirit capable of compassion and sacrifice and endurance. The poet's, the writer's, duty is to write about these things. It is his privilege to help man endure by lifting his heart, by reminding him of the courage and honor and hope and pride and compassion and pity and sacrifice which have been the glory of his past. The poet's voice need not merely be the record of man, it can be one of the props, the pillars to help him endure and prevail.

(1950)

Exploring the Text

1. Consider the ways William Faulkner's speech appeals to ethos, pathos, and logos. Which appeal do you think is the strongest? Explain your answer.
2. Although this is an "occasional" speech — that is, one written for a special occasion — Faulkner seems to have a wider audience than just that at the Nobel committee banquet in mind. Who do you think comprises his audience?

3. Find examples of the way Faulkner uses antithesis in the speech. What do they add to his message?
4. Explain what Faulkner means when he says, "There is only the question: When will I be blown up?" (par. 2).
5. This speech by Faulkner was not an instant hit. His Southern drawl was hard to understand and the microphone was not well placed at the banquet. Nevertheless, when it became available in print, it gained in popularity and is now considered one of the most important Nobel Prize speeches. Why do you think it has so much staying power? What aspects of the speech speak to you today?

Bernard Malamud

Bernard Malamud (1914–1986) was an American novelist and short-story writer, born in Brooklyn, New York. In 1936, he received his bachelor's degree from the City College of New York, and in 1942, he received a master's degree in literature from Columbia University. He taught composition at Oregon State University and creative writing at Bennington College, where he stayed until his retirement. He published his first novel, The Natural, in 1952, for which he became well-known, and in 1967, he won the National Book Award and the Pulitzer Prize for his novel The Fixer, which focused on anti-Semitism in czarist Russia. Malamud wrote eight novels and sixty-five short stories and is considered one of the greatest American writers of the twentieth century.

The First Seven Years

Written in 1950, "The First Seven Years" was published in Malamud's collection The Magic Barrel in 1958.

Feld, the shoemaker, was annoyed that his helper, Sobel, was so insensitive to his reverie that he wouldn't for a minute cease his fanatic pounding at the other bench. He gave him a look, but Sobel's bald head was bent over the last as he worked and he didn't notice. The shoemaker shrugged and continued to peer through the partly frosted window at the near-sighted haze of falling February snow. Neither the shifting white blur outside, nor the sudden deep remembrance of the snowy Polish village where he had wasted his youth could turn his thoughts from Max the college boy, (a constant visitor in the mind since early that morning when Feld saw him trudging through the snowdrifts on his way to school) whom he so much respected because of the sacrifices he had made throughout the years — in winter or direst heat — to further his education. An old wish returned to haunt the shoemaker: that he had had a son instead of a daughter, but this blew away in the snow for Feld, if anything, was a practical man. Yet he could not help but contrast the diligence of the boy, who was a peddler's son, with Miriam's unconcern for an education. True, she was always with a book in her hand, yet when the opportunity arose for a college education, she had said no she would rather find a job. He had begged her to go, pointing out how many fathers could not afford to send their children to college, but she said she wanted to be independent. As for education, what was it, she asked, but books, which Sobel, who diligently read the classics, would as usual advise her on. Her answer greatly grieved her father.

A figure emerged from the snow and the door opened. At the counter the man withdrew from a wet paper bag a pair of battered shoes for repair. Who he was the shoemaker for a moment had no idea, then his heart trembled as he realized, before he had thoroughly discerned the face, that Max himself was standing there, embarrassedly explaining what he wanted done to his old shoes. Though Feld listened eagerly, he couldn't hear a word, for the opportunity that had burst upon him was deafening.

He couldn't exactly recall when the thought had occurred to him, because it was clear he had more than once considered suggesting to the boy that he go out with Miriam. But he had not dared speak, for if Max said no, how would he face him again? Or suppose Miriam, who harped so often on independence, blew up in anger and shouted at him for his meddling? Still, the chance was too good to let by: All it meant was an introduction. They might long ago have become friends had they happened to meet somewhere, therefore was it not his duty — an obligation — to bring them together, nothing more, a harmless connivance to replace an accidental encounter in the subway, let's say, or a mutual friend's introduction in the street? Just let him once see and talk to her and he would for sure be interested. As for Miriam, what possible harm for a working girl in an office, who met only loud-mouthed salesmen and illiterate shipping clerks, to make the acquaintance of a fine scholarly boy? Maybe he would awaken in her a desire to go to college; if not — the shoemaker's mind at last came to grips with the truth — let her marry an educated man and live a better life.

When Max finished describing what he wanted done to his shoes, Feld marked them, both with enormous holes in the soles which he pretended not to notice, with large white-chalk x's, and the rubber heels, thinned to the nails, he marked with o's, though it troubled him he might have mixed up the letters. Max inquired the price, and the shoemaker cleared his throat and asked the boy, above Sobel's insistent hammering, would he please step through the side door there into the hall. Though surprised, Max did as the shoemaker requested, and Feld went in after him. For a minute they were both silent, because Sobel had stopped banging, and it seemed they understood neither was to say anything until the noise began again. When it did, loudly, the shoemaker quickly told Max why he had asked to talk to him.

"Ever since you went to high school," he said, in the dimly-lit hallway, "I watched you in the morning go to the subway to school, and I said always to myself, this is a fine boy that he wants so much an education." 5

"Thanks," Max said, nervously alert. He was tall and grotesquely thin, with sharply cut features, particularly a beak-like nose. He was wearing a loose, long slushy overcoat that hung down to his ankles, looking like a rug draped over his bony shoulders, and a soggy, old brown hat, as battered as the shoes he had brought in.

"I am a business man," the shoemaker abruptly said to conceal his embarrassment, "so I will explain you right away why I talk to you. I have a girl, my daughter Miriam — she is nineteen — a very nice girl and also so pretty that everybody looks on her when she passes by in the street. She is smart, always with a book, and I thought to myself that a boy like you, an educated boy — I thought maybe you will be interested sometime to meet a girl like this." He laughed a bit when he had finished and was tempted to say more but had the good sense not to.

Max stared down like a hawk. For an uncomfortable second he was silent, then he asked, "Did you say nineteen?"

"Yes."

"Would it be all right to inquire if you have a picture of her?"

"Just a minute." The shoemaker went into the store and hastily returned with a snapshot that Max held up to the light.

"She's all right," he said.

Feld waited.

"And is she sensible — not the flighty kind?"

"She is very sensible."

After another short pause, Max said it was okay with him if he met her.

"Here is my telephone," said the shoemaker, hurriedly handing him a slip of paper. "Call her up. She comes home from work six o'clock."

Max folded the paper and tucked it away into his worn leather wallet.

"About the shoes," he said. "How much did you say they will cost me?"

"Don't worry about the price."

"I just like to have an idea."

"A dollar — dollar fifty. A dollar fifty," the shoemaker said.

At once he felt bad, for he usually charged two twenty-five for this kind of job. Either he should have asked the regular price or done the work for nothing.

Later, as he entered the store, he was startled by a violent clanging and looked up to see Sobel pounding with all his might upon the naked last. It broke, the iron striking the floor and jumping with a thump against the wall, but before the enraged shoemaker could cry out, the assistant had torn his hat and coat from the hook and rushed out into the snow.

So Feld, who had looked forward to anticipating how it would go with his daughter and Max, instead had a great worry on his mind. Without his temperamental helper he was a lost man, especially since it was years now that he had carried the store alone. The shoemaker had for an age suffered from a heart condition that threatened collapse if he dared exert himself. Five years ago, after an attack, it had appeared as though he would have either to sacrifice his business upon the auction block and live on a pittance thereafter, or put himself at the mercy of some unscrupulous employee who would in the end probably ruin him. But just at the moment of his darkest despair, this Polish refugee, Sobel, appeared one night from the street and begged for work. He was a stocky man, poorly dressed, with a bald head that had once been blond, a severely plain face and soft blue eyes prone to tears over the sad books he read, a young man but old — no one would have guessed thirty. Though he confessed he knew nothing of shoemaking, he said he was apt and would work for a very little if Feld taught him the trade. Thinking that with, after all, a landsman, he would have less to fear than from a complete stranger, Feld took him on and within six weeks the refugee rebuilt as good a shoe as he, and not long thereafter expertly ran the business for the thoroughly relieved shoemaker.

Feld could trust him with anything and did, frequently going home after an hour or two at the store, leaving all the money in the till, knowing Sobel would guard every cent of it. The amazing thing was that he demanded so little. His wants were few; in money he wasn't interested — in nothing but books, it seemed — which he one by one lent to Miriam, together with his profuse, queer written comments, manufactured during his lonely rooming house evenings, thick pads of commentary which the shoemaker peered at and twitched his shoulders over as his daughter, from her fourteenth year, read page by sanctified page, as if the word of God were inscribed on them. To protect Sobel, Feld himself had to see that he received more than he asked for. Yet his conscience bothered him for not insisting that the assistant accept a better wage than he was getting, though Feld had honestly told him he could earn a handsome salary if he worked elsewhere, or maybe opened a place of his own. But the assistant answered, somewhat ungraciously, that he was not interested in going elsewhere, and though Feld frequently asked himself what keeps him here? why does he stay? he finally answered it that the man, no doubt because of his terrible experiences as a refugee, was afraid of the world.

After the incident with the broken last, angered by Sobel's behavior, the shoemaker decided to let him stew for a week in the rooming house, although his own strength was taxed dangerously and the business suffered. However, after several sharp nagging warnings from both his wife and daughter, he went finally in search of Sobel, as he had once before, quite recently, when over some fancied slight — Feld had merely asked him not to give Miriam so many books to read because her eyes were strained and red — the assistant had left the place in a huff, an incident which, as usual, came to nothing for he had returned after the shoemaker had talked to him, and taken his seat at the bench. But this time, after Feld had plodded through the snow to Sobel's house — he had thought of sending Miriam but the idea became repugnant to him — the burly landlady at the door informed him in a nasal voice that Sobel was not at home, and though Feld knew this was a nasty lie, for where had the refugee to go? still for some reason he was not completely sure of — it may have been the cold and his fatigue — he decided not to insist on seeing him. Instead he went home and hired a new helper.

Having settled the matter, though not entirely to his satisfaction, for he had much more to do than before, and so, for example, could no longer lie late in bed mornings because he had to get up to open the store for the new assistant, a speechless, dark man with an irritating rasp as he worked, whom he would not trust with the key as he had Sobel. Furthermore, this one, though able to do a fair repair job, knew nothing of grades of leather or prices, so Feld had to make his own purchases; and every night at closing time it was necessary to count the money in the till and lock up. However, he was not dissatisfied, for he lived much in his thoughts of Max and Miriam. The college boy had called her, and they had arranged a meeting for this coming Friday night.

The shoemaker would personally have preferred Saturday, which he felt would make it a date of the first magnitude, but he learned Friday was Miriam's choice, so he said nothing. The day of the week did not matter. What mattered was the aftermath. Would they like each other and want to be friends? He sighed at all the time that would have to go by before he knew for sure. Often he was tempted to talk to Miriam about the boy, to ask whether she thought she would like his type — he had told her only that he considered Max a nice boy and had suggested he call her — but the one time he tried she snapped at him — justly — how should she know?

At last Friday came. Feld was not feeling particularly well so he stayed in bed, and Mrs. Feld thought it better to remain in the bedroom with him when Max called. Miriam received the boy, and her parents could hear their voices, his throaty one, as they talked. Just before leaving, Miriam brought Max to the bedroom door and he stood there a minute, a tall, slightly hunched figure wearing a thick, droopy suit, and apparently at ease as he greeted the shoemaker and his wife, which was surely a good sign. And Miriam, although she had worked all day, looked fresh and pretty. She was a large-framed girl with a well-shaped body, and she had a fine open face and soft hair. They made, Feld thought, a first-class couple.

Miriam returned after 11:30. Her mother was already asleep, but the shoemaker got out of bed and after locating his bathrobe went into the kitchen, where Miriam, to his surprise, sat at the table, reading.

"So where did you go?" Feld asked pleasantly.

"For a walk," she said, not looking up.

"I advised him," Feld said, clearing his throat, "he shouldn't spend so much money."

"I didn't care."

The shoemaker boiled up some water for tea and sat down at the table with a cupful and a thick slice of lemon.

"So how," he sighed after a sip, "did you enjoy?"

"It was all right."

He was silent. She must have sensed his disappointment, for she added, "You can't really tell much the first time."

"You will see him again?"

Turning a page, she said that Max had asked for another date.

"For when?"

"Saturday."

"So what did you say?"

"What did I say?" she asked, delaying for a moment — "I said yes."

Afterwards she inquired about Sobel, and Feld, without exactly knowing why, said the assistant had got another job. Miriam said nothing more and began to read. The shoemaker's conscience did not trouble him; he was satisfied with the Saturday date.

During the week, by placing here and there a deft question, he managed to get from Miriam some information about Max. It surprised him to learn that the boy was not studying to be either a doctor or lawyer but was taking a business course leading to a degree in accountancy. Feld was a little disappointed because he thought of accountants as bookkeepers and would have preferred "a higher profession." However, it was not long before he had investigated the subject and discovered that Certified Public Accountants were highly respected people, so he was thoroughly content as Saturday approached. But because Saturday was a busy day, he was much in the store and therefore did not see Max when he came to call for Miriam. From his wife he learned there had been nothing especially revealing about their meeting. Max had rung the bell and Miriam had got her coat and left with him — nothing more. Feld did not probe, for his wife was not particularly observant. Instead, he waited up for Miriam with a newspaper on his lap, which he scarcely looked at so lost was he in thinking of the future. He awoke to find her in the room with him, tiredly removing her hat. Greeting her, he was suddenly inexplicably afraid to ask anything about the evening. But since she volunteered nothing he was at last forced to inquire how she had enjoyed herself. Miriam began something noncommittal but apparently changed her mind, for she said after a minute, "I was bored."

When Feld had sufficiently recovered from his anguished disappointment to ask why, she answered without hesitation, "Because he's nothing more than a materialist."

"What means this word?"

"He has no soul. He's only interested in things."

He considered her statement for a long time but then asked, "Will you see him again?" 50

"He didn't ask."

"Suppose he will ask you?"

"I won't see him."

He did not argue; however, as the days went by he hoped increasingly she would change her mind. He wished the boy would telephone, because he was sure there was more to him than Miriam, with her inexperienced eye, could discern. But Max didn't call. As a matter of fact he took a different route to school, no longer passing the shoemaker's store, and Feld was deeply hurt.

Then one afternoon Max came in and asked for his shoes. The shoemaker took them down from the shelf where he had placed them, apart from the other pairs. He had done the work himself and the soles and heels were well built and firm. The shoes had been highly polished and somehow looked better than new. Max's Adam's apple went up once when he saw them, and his eyes had little lights in them. 55

"How much?" he asked, without directly looking at the shoemaker.

"Like I told you before," Feld answered sadly. "One dollar fifty cents."

Max handed him two crumpled bills and received in return a newly-minted silver half-dollar.

He left. Miriam had not been mentioned. That night the shoemaker discovered that his new assistant had been all the while stealing from him, and he suffered a heart attack.

Though the attack was very mild, he lay in bed for three weeks. Miriam spoke of going for Sobel, but sick as he was Feld rose in wrath against the idea. Yet in his heart he knew there was no other way, and the first weary day back in the shop thoroughly convinced him, so that night after supper he dragged himself to Sobel's rooming house. 60

He toiled up the stairs, though he knew it was bad for him, and at the top knocked at the door. Sobel opened it and the shoemaker entered. The room was a small, poor one, with a single window facing the street. It contained a narrow cot, a low table and several stacks of books piled haphazardly around on the floor along the wall, which made him think how queer Sobel was, to be uneducated and read so much. He had once asked him, Sobel, why you read so much? and the assistant could not answer him. Did you ever study in a college someplace? he had asked, but Sobel shook his head. He read, he said, to know. But to know what, the shoemaker demanded, and to know, why? Sobel never explained, which proved he read much because he was queer.

Feld sat down to recover his breath. The assistant was resting on his bed with his heavy back to the wall. His shirt and trousers were clean, and his stubby fingers, away from the shoemaker's bench, were strangely pallid. His face was thin and pale, as if he had been shut in this room since the day he had bolted from the store.

"So when you will come back to work?" Feld asked him.

To his surprise, Sobel burst out, "Never."

Jumping up, he strode over to the window that looked out upon the miserable street. "Why should I come back?" he cried.

"I will raise your wages."

"Who cares for your wages!"

The shoemaker, knowing he didn't care, was at a loss what else to say.

"What do you want from me, Sobel?"

"Nothing."

"I always treated you like you was my son."

Sobel vehemently denied it. "So why you look for strange boys in the street they should go out with Miriam? Why you don't think of me?"

The shoemaker's hands and feet turned freezing cold. His voice became so hoarse he couldn't speak. At last he cleared his throat and croaked, "So what has my daughter got to do with a shoemaker thirty-five years old who works for me?"

"Why do you think I worked so long for you?" Sobel cried out. "For the stingy wages I sacrificed five years of my life so you could have to eat and drink and where to sleep?"

"Then for what?" shouted the shoemaker.

"For Miriam," he blurted — "for her."

The shoemaker, after a time, managed to say, "I pay wages in cash, Sobel," and lapsed into silence. Though he was seething with excitement, his mind was coldly clear, and he had to admit to himself he had sensed all along that Sobel felt this way. He had never so much as thought it consciously, but he had felt it and was afraid.

"Miriam knows?" he muttered hoarsely.

"She knows."

"You told her?"

"No."

"Then how does she know?"

"How does she know?" Sobel said, "Because she knows. She knows who I am and what is in my heart."

Feld had a sudden insight. In some devious way, with his books and commentary, Sobel had given Miriam to understand that he loved her. The shoemaker felt a terrible anger at him for his deceit.

"Sobel, you are crazy," he said bitterly. "She will never marry a man so old and ugly like you." 85

Sobel turned black with rage. He cursed the shoemaker, but then, though he trembled to hold it in, his eyes filled with tears and he broke into deep sobs. With his back to Feld, he stood at the window, fists clenched, and his shoulders shook with his choked sobbing.

Watching him, the shoemaker's anger diminished. His teeth were on edge with pity for the man, and his eyes grew moist. How strange and sad that a refugee, a grown man, bald and old with his miseries, who had by the skin of his teeth escaped Hitler's incinerators, should fall in love, when he had got to America, with a girl less than half his age. Day after day, for five years he had sat at his bench, cutting and hammering away, waiting for the girl to become a woman, unable to ease his heart with speech, knowing no protest but desperation.

"Ugly I didn't mean," he said half aloud.

Then he realized that what he had called ugly was not Sobel but Miriam's life if she married him. He felt for his daughter a strange and gripping sorrow, as if she were already Sobel's bride, the wife, after all, of a shoemaker, and had in her life no more than her mother had had. And all his dreams for her — why he had slaved and destroyed his heart with anxiety and labor — all these dreams of a better life were dead.

The room was quiet. Sobel was standing by the window reading, and it was curious 90 that when he read he looked young.

"She is only nineteen," Feld said brokenly. "This is too young yet to get married. Don't ask her for two years more, till she is twenty-one, then you can talk to her."

Sobel didn't answer. Feld rose and left. He went slowly down the stairs but once outside, though it was an icy night and the crisp falling snow whitened the street, he walked with a stronger stride.

But the next morning, when the shoemaker arrived, heavy-hearted, to open the store, he saw he needn't have come, for his assistant was already seated at the last, pounding leather for his love.

(1950)

Exploring the Text

1. What do you notice about how Bernard Malamud introduces the characters in "The First Seven Years"? Explain how he develops each one and the purpose he or she serves in the story.
2. The title "The First Seven Years" alludes to the biblical story of Rachel and Jacob, in which Jacob has to work seven years to be able to marry Rachel. On his wedding night, he finds that her older sister Leah has been substituted and that he has to work another seven years for Rachel. What themes does the connection to the Bible suggest?

3. Feld thinks that Miriam and Max make a "first-class couple" (par. 29). What would make Feld think that? What did you think? Did you expect Miriam and Max to hit it off? Explain your answer.
4. How is Feld's fascination with Max a reflection of his belief in the American Dream?
5. Analyze the story's last paragraph, which is one long compound sentence with several subordinate clauses. Describe the effect of the sentence's length and construction. What does it remind you of?
6. Richard Bernstein, reviewing The Complete Stories in December 1997 for the New York Times, wrote that Malamud could "take figures from the immigrant Jewish petty bourgeoisie [usually defined as the lower middle class] and place them into struggles worthy of the Greeks." Describe how the characters in "The First Seven Years" represent the Jewish petty bourgeoisie, and explain how their struggles are "worthy of the Greeks."

Langston Hughes

Langston Hughes (1902–1967) was born in the African American community of Joplin, Missouri, and raised in Lawrence, Kansas. He spent a year at Columbia University and became involved with the Harlem movement, but he was shocked by the endemic racial prejudice at the university and subsequently left. Hughes traveled for several years, spending some time in Paris before returning to the United States. He completed his BA at Pennsylvania's Lincoln University in 1929, after which he returned to Harlem for the remainder of his life. A writer of verse, prose, and drama, Hughes's first volume of poetry, The Weary Blues, was published in 1926. This collection contained "The Negro Speaks of Rivers" (p. 1101), perhaps his most famous poem. His first novel, Not Without Laughter (1930), won the Harmon Gold Medal for literature. Hughes is remembered for his celebration of the uniqueness of African American culture, which found expression in "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain" (p. 1102), published in the Nation, and in the poem "My People." He also wrote children's poetry, musicals, and opera.

Theme for English B

Hughes wrote "Theme for English B" in 1951 — more than twenty-five years after he had been a student at New York's Columbia University.

The instructor said,

Go home and write a page tonight.
And let that page come out of you —
Then, it will be true. 5

I wonder if it's that simple?
I am twenty-two, colored, born in Winston-Salem.
I went to school there, then Durham, then here to this college on the hill above Harlem.
I am the only colored student in my class.
The steps from the hill lead down into Harlem, through a park, then I cross St. Nicholas, Eighth Avenue, Seventh, and I come to the Y, the Harlem Branch Y, where I take the elevator up to my room, sit down, and write this page:

It's not easy to know what is true for you or me at twenty-two, my age. But I guess I'm what I feel and see and hear, Harlem, I hear you:
hear you, hear me — we two — you, me, talk on this page.
(I hear New York, too.) Me — who?
Well, I like to eat, sleep, drink, and be in love.
I like to work, read, learn, and understand life.
I like a pipe for a Christmas present, or records — Bessie, bop, or Bach.
I guess being colored doesn't make me not like the same things other folks like who are other races.
So will my page be colored that I write?
Being me, it will not be white.
But it will be a part of you, instructor.
You are white —
yet a part of me, as I am a part of you.
That's American.
Sometimes perhaps you don't want to be a part of me.
Nor do I often want to be a part of you.
But we are, that's true!
As I learn from you,
I guess you learn from me — although you're older — and white — and somewhat more free.

This is my page for English B.

(1951)

Exploring the Text

1. Characterize the speaker in "Theme for English B." Refer to specific words and phrases in the poem to support your description.

2. How does the poem's setting help develop its themes? Look especially at the way Langston Hughes uses the words "up," "down," and "cross" (ll. 11–15)
3. You may have noticed that there is little figurative language in "Theme for English B." In fact, in some ways it doesn't even seem like a poem. How does the rather everyday language help create some of the poem's ideas?
4. What do you think the speaker means by "That's American" (l. 33)? What do you think "That's American" means today? What are the similarities between being American then and now? What are the differences?
5. What argument do you think Hughes is making in this poem? Why do you think he used an English class assignment as a framing device for his ideas?
6. What do you think the instructor thought of the speaker's work?

Flannery O'Connor

One of the most acclaimed and widely read fiction writers of the twentieth century, Flannery O'Connor (1925–1964) was born on a farm in Milledgeville, Georgia. At the age of fifteen, she lost her father to lupus, the same disease that would take her life at thirty-nine. After graduating from the Georgia State College for Women, O'Connor attended the Iowa Writers' Workshop. At twenty-six, after being diagnosed with lupus, O'Connor returned to the Georgia farm where she grew up. Despite her illness, she published three books — the story collection A Good Man Is Hard to Find (1955) and the novels Wise Blood (1952) and The Violent Bear It Away (1960) — before her death in 1964. Her later short stories were published posthumously as Everything That Rises Must Converge (1965).

Good Country People

Most of O'Connor's stories are set in the American South, and critics often describe her writing as Southern gothic, even "grotesque." O'Connor famously questioned why those terms were used to describe Southern stereotypes, arguing instead for the term "realistic." Her short stories, such as the one here, examine the deep racial and religious divisions that exist among cultures generally lumped together as "Southern." "Good Country People" was published in 1955 in the collection A Good Man Is Hard to Find.

Besides the neutral expression that she wore when she was alone, Mrs. Freeman had two others, forward and reverse, that she used for all her human dealings. Her forward expression was steady and driving like the advance of a heavy truck. Her eyes never swerved to left or right but turned as the story turned as if they followed a yellow line down the center of it. She seldom used the other expression because it was not often necessary for her to retract a statement, but when she did, her face came to a complete stop, there was an almost imperceptible movement of her black eyes, during which they seemed to be receding, and then the observer would see that Mrs. Freeman, though she might stand there as real as several grain sacks thrown on top of each other, was no longer there in spirit. As for getting anything across to her when this was the case, Mrs. Hopewell had given it up. She might talk her head off. Mrs. Freeman could never be brought to admit herself wrong on any point. She would stand there and if she could be brought to say anything, it was something like, "Well, I wouldn't of said it was and I wouldn't of said it wasn't," or letting her gaze range over the top kitchen shelf where there was an assortment of dusty bottles, she might remark, "I see you ain't ate many of them figs you put up last summer."

They carried on their most important business in the kitchen at breakfast. Every morning Mrs. Hopewell got up at seven o'clock and lit her gas heater and Joy's. Joy was her daughter, a large blonde girl who had an artificial leg. Mrs. Hopewell thought of her as a child though she was thirty-two years old and highly educated. Joy would get up while her mother was eating and lumber into the bathroom and slam the door, and before long, Mrs. Freeman would arrive at the back door. Joy would hear her mother call, "Come on in," and then they would talk for a while in low voices that were indistinguishable in the bathroom. By the time Joy came in, they had usually finished the weather report and were on one or the other of Mrs. Freeman's daughters, Glynese or Carramae, Joy called them Glycerin and Caramel. Glynese, a redhead, was eighteen and had many admirers; Carramae, a blonde, was only fifteen but already married and pregnant. She could not keep anything in her stomach. Every morning Mrs. Freeman told Mrs. Hopewell how many times she had vomited since the last report.

Mrs. Hopewell liked to tell people that Glynese and Carramae were two of the finest girls she knew and that Mrs. Freeman was a lady and that she was never ashamed to take her anywhere or introduce her to anybody they might meet. Then she would tell how she had happened to hire the Freemans in the first place and how they were a godsend to her and how she had had them four years. The reason for her keeping them so long was that they were not trash. They were good country people. She had telephoned the man whose name they had given as a reference and he had told her that Mr. Freeman was a good farmer but that his wife was the nosiest woman ever to walk the earth. "She's got to be into everything," the man said. "If she don't get there before the dust settles, you can bet she's dead, that's all. She'll want to know all your business. I can stand him real good," he had said, "but me nor my wife neither could have stood that woman one more minute on this place." That had put Mrs. Hopewell off for a few days.

She had hired them in the end because there were no other applicants but she had made up her mind beforehand exactly how she would handle the woman. Since she was the type who had to be into everything, then, Mrs. Hopewell decided, she would not only let her be into everything, she would see to it that she was into everything — she would give her the responsibility of everything, she would put her in charge. Mrs. Hopewell had no bad qualities of her own but she was able to use other people's in such a constructive way that she never felt the lack. She had hired the Freemans and she had kept them four years.

Nothing is perfect. This was one of Mrs. Hopewell's favorite sayings. Another was: 5 that is life! And still another, the most important, was: well, other people have their opinions too. She would make these statements, usually at the table, in a tone of gentle insistence as if no one held them but her, and the large hulking Joy, whose constant outrage had obliterated every expression from her face, would stare just a little to the side of her, her eyes icy blue, with the look of someone who has achieved blindness by an act of will and means to keep it.

When Mrs. Hopewell said to Mrs. Freeman that life was like that, Mrs. Freeman would say, "I always said so myself." Nothing had been arrived at by anyone that had not first been arrived at by her. She was quicker than Mr. Freeman. When Mrs. Hopewell said to her after they had been on the place a while, "You know, you're the wheel behind the wheel," and winked, Mrs. Freeman had said, "I know it. I've always been quick. It's some that are quicker than others."

"Everybody is different," Mrs. Hopewell said.

"Yes, most people is," Mrs. Freeman said.

"It takes all kinds to make the world."

"I always said it did myself." 10

The girl was used to this kind of dialogue for breakfast and more of it for dinner; sometimes they had it for supper too. When they had no guest they ate in the kitchen because that was easier. Mrs. Freeman always managed to arrive at some point during the meal and to watch them finish it. She would stand in the doorway if it were summer but in the winter she would stand with one elbow on top of the refrigerator and look down on them, or she would stand by the gas heater, lifting the back of her skirt slightly. Occasionally she would stand against the wall and roll her head from side to side. At no time was she in any hurry to leave. All this was very trying on Mrs. Hopewell but she was a woman of great patience. She realized that nothing is perfect and that in the Freemans she had good country people and that if, in this day and age, you get good country people, you had better hang onto them.

She had had plenty of experience with trash. Before the Freemans she had averaged one tenant family a year. The wives of these farmers were not the kind you would want to be around you for very long. Mrs. Hopewell, who had divorced her husband long ago, needed someone to walk over the fields with her; and when Joy had to be impressed for these services, her remarks were usually so ugly and her face so glum that Mrs. Hopewell would say, "If you can't come pleasantly, I don't want you at all," to which the girl, standing square and rigid-shouldered with her neck thrust slightly forward, would reply, "If you want me, here I am — LIKE I AM."

Mrs. Hopewell excused this attitude because of the leg (which had been shot off in a hunting accident when Joy was ten). It was hard for Mrs. Hopewell to realize that her child was thirty-two now and that for more than twenty years she had had only one leg. She thought of her still as a child because it tore her heart to think instead of the poor stout girl in her thirties who had never danced a step or had any normal good times. Her name was really Joy but as soon as she was twenty-one and away from home, she had had it legally changed. Mrs. Hopewell was certain that she had thought and thought until she had hit upon the ugliest name in any language. Then she had gone and had the beautiful name, Joy, changed without telling her mother until after she had done it. Her legal name was Hulga.

When Mrs. Hopewell thought the name, Hulga, she thought of the broad blank hull of a battleship. She would not use it. She continued to call her Joy to which the girl responded but in a purely mechanical way.

Hulga had learned to tolerate Mrs. Freeman who saved her from taking walks with her mother. Even Glynese and Carramae were useful when they occupied attention that might otherwise have been directed at her. At first she had thought she could not stand Mrs. Freeman for she had found that it was not possible to be rude to her. Mrs. Freeman would take on strange resentments and for days together she would be sullen but the source of her displeasure was always obscure; a direct attack, a positive leer, blatant ugliness to her face — these never touched her. And without warning one day, she began calling her Hulga. 15

She did not call her that in front of Mrs. Hopewell who would have been incensed but when she and the girl happened to be out of the house together, she would say something and add the name Hulga to the end of it, and the big spectacled Joy-Hulga would scowl and redden as if her privacy had been intruded upon. She considered the name her personal affair. She had arrived at it first purely on the basis of its ugly sound and then the full genius of its fitness had struck her. She had a vision of the name working like the ugly sweating Vulcan who stayed in the furnace and to whom, presumably, the goddess had to come when called. She saw it as the name of her highest creative act. One of her major triumphs was that her mother had not been able to turn her dust into Joy, but the greater one was that she had been able to turn it herself into Hulga. However, Mrs. Freeman's relish for using the name only irritated her. It was as if Mrs. Freeman's beady steel-pointed eyes had penetrated far enough behind her face to reach some secret fact. Something about her seemed to fascinate Mrs. Freeman and then one day Hulga realized that it was the artificial leg. Mrs. Freeman had a special fondness for the details of secret infections, hidden deformities, assaults upon children. Of diseases, she preferred the lingering or incurable. Hulga had heard Mrs. Hopewell give her the details of the hunting accident, how the leg had been literally blasted off, how she had never lost consciousness. Mrs. Freeman could listen to it any time as if it had happened an hour ago.

When Hulga stumped into the kitchen in the morning (she could walk without making the awful noise but she made it — Mrs. Hopewell was certain — because it was ugly-sounding), she glanced at them and did not speak. Mrs. Hopewell would be in her red kimono with her hair tied around her head in rags. She would be sitting at the table, finishing her breakfast and Mrs. Freeman would be hanging by her elbow outward from the refrigerator, looking down at the table. Hulga always put her eggs on the stove to boil and then stood over them with her arms folded, and Mrs. Hopewell would look at her — a kind of indirect gaze divided between her and Mrs. Freeman — and would think that if she would only keep herself up a little, she wouldn't be so bad looking. There was nothing wrong with her face that a pleasant expression wouldn't help. Mrs. Hopewell said that people who looked on the bright side of things would be beautiful even if they were not.

Whenever she looked at Joy this way, she could not help but feel that it would have been better if the child had not taken the Ph.D. It had certainly not brought her out any and now that she had it, there was no more excuse for her to go to school again. Mrs. Hopewell thought it was nice for girls to go to school to have a good time but Joy had "gone through." Anyhow, she would not have been strong enough to go again. The doctors had told Mrs. Hopewell that with the best of care, Joy might see forty-five. She had a weak heart. Joy had made it plain that if it had not been for this condition, she would be far from these red hills and good country people. She would be in a university lecturing to people who knew what she was talking about. And Mrs. Hopewell could very well picture her there, looking like a scarecrow and lecturing to more of the same. Here she went about all day in a six-year-old skirt and a yellow sweat shirt with a faded cowboy on a horse embossed on it. She thought this was funny; Mrs. Hopewell thought it was idiotic and showed simply that she was still a child. She was brilliant but she didn't have a grain of sense. It seemed to Mrs. Hopewell that every year she grew less like other people and more like herself — bloated, rude, and squint-eyed. And she said such strange things! To her own mother she had said — without warning, without excuse, standing up in the middle of a meal with her face purple and her mouth half full — "Woman! do you ever look inside? Do you ever look inside and see what you are not? God!" she had cried sinking down again and staring at her plate, "Malebranche was right: we are not our own light. We are not our own light!" Mrs. Hopewell had no idea to this day what brought that on. She had only made the remark, hoping Joy would take it in, that a smile never hurt anyone.

The girl had taken the Ph.D. in philosophy and this left Mrs. Hopewell at a complete loss. You could say, "My daughter is a nurse," or "My daughter is a schoolteacher," or even, "My daughter is a chemical engineer." You could not say, "My daughter is a philosopher." That was something that had ended with the Greeks and Romans. All day Joy sat on her neck in a deep chair, reading. Sometimes she went for walks but she didn't like dogs or cats or birds or flowers or nature or nice young men. She looked at nice young men as if she could smell their stupidity.

One day Mrs. Hopewell had picked up one of the books the girl had just put down and opening it at random, she read, "Science, on the other hand, has to assert its soberness and seriousness afresh and declare that it is concerned solely with what-is. Nothing — how can it be for science anything but a horror and a phantasm? If science is right, then one thing stands firm: science wishes to know nothing of nothing. Such is after all the strictly scientific approach to Nothing. We know it by wishing to know nothing of Nothing." These words had been underlined with a blue pencil and they worked on Mrs. Hopewell like some evil incantation in gibberish. She shut the book quickly and went out of the room as if she were having a chill. 20

This morning when the girl came in, Mrs. Freeman was on Carramae. "She thrown up four times after supper," she said, "and was up twict in the night after three o'clock. Yesterday she didn't do nothing but ramble in the bureau drawer. All she did. Stand up there and see what she could run up on."

"She's got to eat," Mrs. Hopewell muttered, sipping her coffee, while she watched Joy's back at the stove. She was wondering what the child had said to the Bible salesman. She could not imagine what kind of a conversation she could possibly have had with him.

He was a tall gaunt hatless youth who had called yesterday to sell them a Bible. He had appeared at the door, carrying a large black suitcase that weighted him so heavily on one side that he had to brace himself against the door facing. He seemed on the point of collapse but he said in a cheerful voice, "Good morning, Mrs. Cedars!" and set the suitcase down on the mat. He was not a bad-looking young man though he had on a bright blue suit and yellow socks that were not pulled up far enough. He had prominent face bones and a streak of sticky-looking brown hair falling across his forehead.

"I'm Mrs. Hopewell," she said.

"Oh!" he said, pretending to look puzzled but with his eyes sparkling, "I saw it said 'The Cedars' on the mailbox so I thought you was Mrs. Cedars!" and he burst out in a pleasant laugh. He picked up the satchel and under cover of a pant, he fell forward into her hall. It was rather as if the suitcase had moved first, jerking him after it. "Mrs. Hopewell!" he said and grabbed her hand. "I hope you are well!" and he laughed again and then all at once his face sobered completely. He paused and gave her a straight earnest look and said, "Lady, I've come to speak of serious things." 25

"Well, come in," she muttered, none too pleased because her dinner was almost ready. He came into the parlor and sat down on the edge of a straight chair and put the suitcase between his feet and glanced around the room as if he were sizing her up by it. Her silver gleamed on the two sideboards; she decided he had never been in a room as elegant as this.

"Mrs. Hopewell," he began, using her name in a way that sounded almost intimate, "I know you believe in Chrustian service."

"Well yes," she murmured.

"I know," he said and paused, looking very wise with his head cocked on one side, "that you're a good woman. Friends have told me."

Mrs. Hopewell never liked to be taken for a fool. "What are you selling?" she asked. 30

"Bibles," the young man said and his eye raced around the room before he added, "I see you have no family Bible in your parlor, I see that is the one lack you got!"

Mrs. Hopewell could not say, "My daughter is an atheist and won't let me keep the Bible in the parlor." She said, stiffening slightly, "I keep my Bible by my bedside." This was not the truth. It was in the attic somewhere.

"Lady," he said, "the word of God ought to be in the parlor."

"Well, I think that's a matter of taste," she began. "I think . . ."

"Lady," he said, "for a Chrustian, the word of God ought to be in every room in the house besides in his heart. I know you're a Chrustian because I can see it in every line of your face." 35

She stood up and said, "Well, young man, I don't want to buy a Bible and I smell my dinner burning."

He didn't get up. He began to twist his hands and looking down at them, he said softly, "Well lady, I'll tell you the truth — not many people want to buy one nowadays and besides, I know I'm real simple. I don't know how to say a thing but to say it. I'm just a country boy." He glanced up into her unfriendly face. "People like you don't like to fool with country people like me!"

"Why!" she cried, "good country people are the salt of the earth! Besides, we all have different ways of doing, it takes all kinds to make the world go 'round. That's life!"

"You said a mouthful," he said.

"Why, I think there aren't enough good people in the world!" she said, stirred. "I think that's what's wrong with it!"

His face had brightened. "I didn't introduce myself," he said. "I'm Manley Pointer from out in the country around Willohobie, not even from a place, just from near a place."

"You wait a minute," she said. "I have to see about my dinner." She went out to the kitchen and found Joy standing near the door where she had been listening.

"Get rid of the salt of the earth," she said, "and let's eat."

Mrs. Hopewell gave her a pained look and turned the heat down under the vegetables. "I can't be rude to anybody," she murmured and went back into the parlor.

He had opened the suitcase and was sitting with a Bible on each knee.

"You might as well put those up," she told him. "I don't want one."

"I appreciate your honesty," he said. "You don't see any more real honest people unless you go way out in the country."

"I know," she said, "real genuine folks!" Through the crack in the door she heard a groan.

"I guess a lot of boys come telling you they're working their way through college," he said, "but I'm not going to tell you that. Somehow," he said, "I don't want to go to college. I want to devote my life to Chrustian service. See," he said, lowering his voice, "I got this heart condition. I may not live long. When you know it's something wrong with you and you may not live long, well then, lady . . ." He paused, with his mouth open, and stared at her.

He and Joy had the same condition! She knew that her eyes were filling with tears but she collected herself quickly and murmured, "Won't you stay for dinner? We'd love to have you!" and was sorry the instant she heard herself say it.

"Yes mam," he said in an abashed voice, "I would sher love to do that!"

Joy had given him one look on being introduced to him and then throughout the meal had not glanced at him again. He had addressed several remarks to her, which she had pretended not to hear. Mrs. Hopewell could not understand deliberate rudeness, although she lived with it, and she felt she had always to overflow with hospitality to make up for Joy's lack of courtesy. She urged him to talk about himself and he did. He said he was the seventh child of twelve and that his father had been crushed under a tree when he himself was eight years old. He had been crushed very badly, in fact, almost cut in two and was practically not recognizable. His mother had got along the best she could by hard working and she had always seen that her children went to Sunday School and that they read the Bible every evening. He was now nineteen years old and he had been selling Bibles for four months. In that time he had sold seventy-seven Bibles and had the promise of two more sales. He wanted to become a missionary because he thought that was the way you could do most for people. "He who losest his life shall find it," he said simply and he was so sincere, so genuine and earnest that Mrs. Hopewell would not for the world have smiled. He prevented his peas from sliding onto the table by blocking them with a piece of bread which he later cleaned his plate with. She could see Joy observing sidewise how he handled his knife and fork and she saw too that every few minutes, the boy would dart a keen appraising glance at the girl as if he were trying to attract her attention.

After dinner Joy cleared the dishes off the table and disappeared and Mrs. Hopewell was left to talk with him. He told her again about his childhood and his father's accident and about various things that had happened to him. Every five minutes or so she would stifle a yawn. He sat for two hours until finally she told him she must go because she had an appointment in town. He packed his Bibles and thanked her and prepared to leave, but in the doorway he stopped and wrung her hand and said that not on any of his trips had he met a lady as nice as her and he asked if he could come again. She had said she would always be happy to see him.

Joy had been standing in the road, apparently looking at something in the distance, when he came down the steps toward her, bent to the side with his heavy valise. He stopped where she was standing and confronted her directly. Mrs. Hopewell could not hear what he said but she trembled to think what Joy would say to him. She could see that after a minute Joy said something and that then the boy began to speak again, making an excited gesture with his free hand. After a minute Joy said something else at which the boy began to speak once more. Then to her amazement, Mrs. Hopewell saw the two of them walk off together, toward the gate. Joy had walked all the way to the gate with him and Mrs. Hopewell could not imagine what they had said to each other, and she had not yet dared to ask.

Mrs. Freeman was insisting upon her attention. She had moved from the refrig- 55 erator to the heater so that Mrs. Hopewell had to turn and face her in order to seem to be listening. "Glynese gone out with Harvey Hill again last night," she said. "She had this sty."

"Hill," Mrs. Hopewell said absently, "is the one who works in the garage?"

"Nome, he's the one that goes to chiropractor school," Mrs. Freeman said. "She had this sty. Been had it two days. So she says when he brought her in the other night he says, 'Lemme get rid of that sty for you,' and she says, 'How?' and he says, 'You just lay yourself down acrost the seat of that car and I'll show you.' So she done it and he popped her neck. Kept on a-popping it several times until she made him quit. This morning," Mrs. Freeman said, "she ain't got no sty. She ain't got no traces of a sty."

"I never heard of that before," Mrs. Hopewell said.

"He ast her to marry him before the Ordinary,"[1] Mrs. Freeman went on, "and she told him she wasn't going to be married in no office."

"Well, Glynese is a fine girl," Mrs. Hopewell said. "Glynese and Carramae are both 60 fine girls."

"Carramae said when her and Lyman was married Lyman said it sure felt sacred to him. She said he said he wouldn't take five hundred dollars for being married by a preacher."

"How much would he take?" the girl asked from the stove.

---

[1]Justice of the peace. — Eds.

"He said he wouldn't take five hundred dollars," Mrs. Freeman repeated.

"Well we all have work to do," Mrs. Hopewell said.

"Lyman said it just felt more sacred to him," Mrs. Freeman said. "The doctor wants Carramae to eat prunes. Says instead of medicine. Says them cramps is coming from pressure. You know where I think it is?" 65

"She'll be better in a few weeks," Mrs. Hopewell said.

"In the tube," Mrs. Freeman said. "Else she wouldn't be as sick as she is."

Hulga had cracked her two eggs into a saucer and was bringing them to the table along with a cup of coffee that she had filled too full. She sat down carefully and began to eat, meaning to keep Mrs. Freeman there by questions if for any reason she showed an inclination to leave. She could perceive her mother's eye on her. The first round-about question would be about the Bible salesman and she did not wish to bring it on. "How did he pop her neck?" she asked.

Mrs. Freeman went into a description of how he had popped her neck. She said he owned a '55 Mercury but that Glynese said she would rather marry a man with only a '36 Plymouth who would be married by a preacher. The girl asked what if he had a '32 Plymouth and Mrs. Freeman said what Glynese had said was a '36 Plymouth.

Mrs. Hopewell said there were not many girls with Glynese's common sense. She said what she admired in those girls was their common sense. She said that reminded her that they had had a nice visitor yesterday, a young man selling Bibles. "Lord," she said, "he bored me to death but he was so sincere and genuine I couldn't be rude to him. He was just good country people, you know," she said, "—just the salt of the earth." 70

"I seen him walk up," Mrs. Freeman said, "and then later—I seen him walk off," and Hulga could feel the slight shift in her voice, the slight insinuation, that he had not walked off alone, had he? Her face remained expressionless but the color rose into her neck and she seemed to swallow it down with the next spoonful of egg. Mrs. Freeman was looking at her as if they had a secret together.

"Well, it takes all kinds of people to make the world go 'round," Mrs. Hopewell said. "It's very good we aren't all alike."

"Some people are more alike than others," Mrs. Freeman said.

Hulga got up and stumped, with about twice the noise that was necessary, into her room and locked the door. She was to meet the Bible salesman at ten o'clock at the gate. She had thought about it half the night. She had started thinking of it as a great joke and then she had begun to see profound implications in it. She had lain in bed imagining dialogues for them that were insane on the surface but that reached below to depths that no Bible salesman would be aware of. Their conversation yesterday had been of this kind.

He had stopped in front of her and had simply stood there. His face was bony and sweaty and bright, with a little pointed nose in the center of it, and his look was different from what it had been at the dinner table. He was gazing at her with open curiosity, with fascination, like a child watching a new fantastic animal at the zoo, and he was breathing as if he had run a great distance to reach her. His gaze seemed somehow familiar but she could not think where she had been regarded with it before. For 75 almost a minute he didn't say anything. Then on what seemed an insuck of breath, he whispered, "You ever ate a chicken that was two days old?"

The girl looked at him stonily. He might have just put this question up for consideration at the meeting of a philosophical association. "Yes," she presently replied as if she had considered it from all angles.

"It must have been mighty small!" he said triumphantly and shook all over with little nervous giggles, getting very red in the face, and subsiding finally into his gaze of complete admiration, while the girl's expression remained exactly the same.

"How old are you?" he asked softly.

She waited some time before she answered. Then in a flat voice she said, "Seventeen."

His smiles came in succession like waves breaking on the surface of a little lake. 80
"I see you got a wooden leg," he said. "I think you're brave. I think you're real sweet."

The girl stood blank and solid and silent.

"Walk to the gate with me," he said. "You're a brave sweet little thing and I liked you the minute I seen you walk in the door."

Hulga began to move forward.

"What's your name?" he asked, smiling down on the top of her head.

"Hulga," she said. 85

"Hulga," he murmured, "Hulga. Hulga. I never heard of anybody name Hulga before. You're shy, aren't you, Hulga?" he asked.

She nodded, watching his large red hand on the handle of the giant valise.

"I like girls that wear glasses," he said. "I think a lot. I'm not like these people that a serious thought don't ever enter their heads. It's because I may die."

"I may die too," she said suddenly and looked up at him. His eyes were very small and brown, glittering feverishly.

"Listen," he said, "don't you think some people was meant to meet on account of 90 what all they got in common and all? Like they both think serious thoughts and all?" He shifted the valise to his other hand so that the hand nearest her was free. He caught hold of her elbow and shook it a little. "I don't work on Saturday," he said. "I like to walk in the woods and see what Mother Nature is wearing. O'er the hills and far away. Pic-nics and things. Couldn't we go on a pic-nic tomorrow? Say yes, Hulga," he said and gave her a dying look as if he felt his insides about to drop out of him. He had even seemed to sway slightly toward her.

During the night she had imagined that she seduced him. She imagined that the two of them walked on the place until they came to the storage barn beyond the two back fields and there, she imagined, that things came to such a pass that she very easily seduced him and that then, of course, she had to reckon with his remorse. True genius can get an idea across even to an inferior mind. She imagined that she took his remorse in hand and changed it into a deeper understanding of life. She took all his shame away and turned it into something useful.

She set off for the gate at exactly ten o'clock, escaping without drawing Mrs. Hopewell's attention. She didn't take anything to eat, forgetting that food is usually taken on a picnic. She wore a pair of slacks and a dirty white shirt, and as an afterthought, she had put some Vapex[2] on the collar of it since she did not own any perfume. When she reached the gate no one was there.

She looked up and down the empty highway and had the furious feeling that she had been tricked, that he had only meant to make her walk to the gate after the idea of him. Then suddenly he stood up, very tall, from behind a bush on the opposite embankment. Smiling, he lifted his hat which was new and wide-brimmed. He had not worn it yesterday and she wondered if he had bought it for the occasion. It was toast-colored with a red and white band around it and was slightly too large for him. He stepped from behind the bush still carrying the black valise. He had on the same suit and the same yellow socks sucked down in his shoes from walking. He crossed the highway and said, "I knew you'd come!"

The girl wondered acidly how he had known this. She pointed to the valise and asked, "Why did you bring your Bibles?"

He took her elbow, smiling down on her as if he could not stop. "You can never tell 95 when you'll need the word of God, Hulga," he said. She had a moment in which she doubted that this was actually happening and then they began to climb the embankment. They went down into the pasture toward the woods. The boy walked lightly by her side, bouncing on his toes. The valise did not seem to be heavy today; he even swung it. They crossed half the pasture without saying anything and then, putting his hand easily on the small of her back, he asked softly, "Where does your wooden leg join on?"

She turned an ugly red and glared at him and for an instant the boy looked abashed. "I didn't mean you no harm," he said. "I only meant you're so brave and all. I guess God takes care of you."

"No," she said, looking forward and walking fast, "I don't even believe in God."

At this he stopped and whistled. "No!" he exclaimed as if he were too astonished to say anything else.

She walked on and in a second he was bouncing at her side, fanning with his hat. "That's very unusual for a girl," he remarked, watching her out of the corner of his eye. When they reached the edge of the wood, he put his hand on her back again and drew her against him without a word and kissed her heavily.

The kiss, which had more pressure than feeling behind it, produced that extra 100 surge of adrenaline in the girl that enables one to carry a packed trunk out of a burning house, but in her, the power went at once to the brain. Even before he released her, her mind, clear and detached and ironic anyway, was regarding him from a great distance, with amusement but with pity. She had never been kissed before and she was pleased to discover that it was an unexceptional experience and all a matter of the mind's control. Some people might enjoy drain water if they were told it was vodka. When the boy, looking expectant but uncertain, pushed her gently away, she turned and walked on, saying nothing as if such business, for her, were common enough.

He came along panting at her side, trying to help her when he saw a root that she might trip over. He caught and held back the long swaying blades of thorn vine until she had passed beyond them. She led the way and he came breathing heavily behind her. Then they came out on a sunlit hillside, sloping softly into another one a little smaller. Beyond, they could see the rusted top of the old barn where the extra hay was stored.

[2]Menthol decongestant inhaler. — Eds.

The hill was sprinkled with small pink weeds. "Then you ain't saved?" he asked suddenly, stopping.

The girl smiled. It was the first time she had smiled at him at all. "In my economy," she said, "I'm saved and you are damned but I told you I didn't believe in God."

Nothing seemed to destroy the boy's look of admiration. He gazed at her now as if the fantastic animal at the zoo had put its paw through the bars and given him a loving poke. She thought he looked as if he wanted to kiss her again and she walked on before he had the chance.

"Ain't there somewheres we can sit down sometime?" he murmured, his voice softening toward the end of the sentence. 105

"In that barn," she said.

They made for it rapidly as if it might slide away like a train. It was a large two-story barn, cool and dark inside. The boy pointed up the ladder that led into the loft and said, "It's too bad we can't go up there."

"Why can't we?" she asked.

"Yer leg," he said reverently.

The girl gave him a contemptuous look and putting both hands on the ladder, she climbed it while he stood below, apparently awestruck. She pulled herself expertly through the opening and then looked down at him and said, "Well, come on if you're coming," and he began to climb the ladder, awkwardly bringing the suitcase with him. 110

"We won't need the Bible," she observed.

"You never can tell," he said, panting. After he had got into the loft, he was a few seconds catching his breath. She had sat down in a pile of straw. A wide sheath of sunlight, filled with dust particles, slanted over her. She lay back against a bale, her face turned away, looking out the front opening of the barn where hay was thrown from a wagon into the loft. The two pink-speckled hillsides lay back against a dark ridge of woods. The sky was cloudless and cold blue. The boy dropped down by her side and put one arm under her and the other over her and began methodically kissing her face, making little noises like a fish. He did not remove his hat but it was pushed far enough back not to interfere. When her glasses got in his way, he took them off of her and slipped them into his pocket.

The girl at first did not return any of the kisses but presently she began to and after she had put several on his cheek, she reached his lips and remained there, kissing him again and again as if she were trying to draw all the breath out of him. His breath was clear and sweet like a child's and the kisses were sticky like a child's. He mumbled about loving her and about knowing when he first seen her that he loved her, but the mumbling was like the sleepy fretting of a child being put to sleep by his mother. Her mind, throughout this, never stopped or lost itself for a second to her feelings. "You ain't said you loved me none," he whispered finally, pulling back from her. "You got to say that."

She looked away from him off into the hollow sky and then down at a black ridge and then down farther into what appeared to be two green swelling lakes. She didn't realize he had taken her glasses but this landscape could not seem exceptional to her for she seldom paid any close attention to her surroundings.

"You got to say it," he repeated. "You got to say you love me." 115

She was always careful how she committed herself. "In a sense," she began, "if you use the word loosely, you might say that. But it's not a word I use. I don't have illusions. I'm one of those people who see through to nothing."

The boy was frowning. "You got to say it. I said it and you got to say it," he said.

The girl looked at him almost tenderly. "You poor baby," she murmured. "It's just as well you don't understand," and she pulled him by the neck, face-down, against her. "We are all damned," she said, "but some of us have taken off our blindfolds and see that there's nothing to see. It's a kind of salvation."

The boy's astonished eyes looked blankly through the ends of her hair. "Okay," he almost whined, "but do you love me or don'tcher?"

"Yes," she said and added, "in a sense. But I must tell you something. There mustn't 120 be anything dishonest between us." She lifted his head and looked him in the eye. "I am thirty years old," she said. "I have a number of degrees."

The boy's look was irritated but dogged. "I don't care," he said. "I don't care a thing about what all you done. I just want to know if you love me or don'tcher?" and he caught her to him and wildly planted her face with kisses until she said, "Yes, yes."

"Okay then," he said, letting her go. "Prove it."

She smiled, looking dreamily out on the shifty landscape. She had seduced him without even making up her mind to try. "How?" she asked, feeling that he should be delayed a little.

He leaned over and put his lips to her ear. "Show me where your wooden leg joins on," he whispered.

The girl uttered a sharp little cry and her face instantly drained of color. The obscen- 125 ity of the suggestion was not what shocked her. As a child she had sometimes been subject to feelings of shame but education had removed the last traces of that as a good surgeon scrapes for cancer; she would no more have felt it over what he was asking than she would have believed in his Bible. But she was as sensitive about the artificial leg as a peacock about his tail. No one ever touched it but her. She took care of it as someone else would his soul, in private and almost with her own eyes turned away. "No," she said.

"I known it," he muttered, sitting up. "You're just playing me for a sucker."

"Oh no no!" she cried. "It joins on at the knee. Only at the knee. Why do you want to see it?"

The boy gave her a long penetrating look. "Because," he said, "it's what makes you different. You ain't like anybody else."

She sat staring at him. There was nothing about her face or her round freezing-blue eyes to indicate that this had moved her; but she felt as if her heart had stopped and left her mind to pump her blood. She decided that for the first time in her life she was face to face with real innocence. This boy, with an instinct that came from beyond wisdom, had touched the truth about her. When after a minute, she said in a hoarse high voice, "All right," it was like surrendering to him completely. It was like losing her own life and finding it again, miraculously, in his.

Very gently he began to roll the slack leg up. The artificial limb, in a white sock and brown flat shoe, was bound in a heavy material like canvas and ended in an ugly jointure where it was attached to the stump. The boy's face and his voice were entirely reverent as he uncovered it and said, "Now show me how to take it off and on." 130

She took it off for him and put it back on again and then he took it off himself, handling it as tenderly as if it were a real one. "See!" he said with a delighted child's face. "Now I can do it myself!"

"Put it back on," she said. She was thinking that she would run away with him and that every night he would take the leg off and every morning put it back on again. "Put it back on," she said.

"Not yet," he murmured, setting it on its foot out of her reach. "Leave it off for a while. You got me instead."

She gave a little cry of alarm but he pushed her down and began to kiss her again. Without the leg she felt entirely dependent on him. Her brain seemed to have stopped thinking altogether and to be about some other function that it was not very good at. Different expressions raced back and forth over her face. Every now and then the boy, his eyes like two steel spikes, would glance behind him where the leg stood. Finally she pushed him off and said, "Put it back on me now."

"Wait," he said. He leaned the other way and pulled the valise toward him and opened it. It had a pale blue spotted lining and there were only two Bibles in it. He took one of these out and opened the cover of it. It was hollow and contained a pocket flask of whiskey, a pack of cards, and a small blue box with printing on it. He laid these out in front of her one at a time in an evenly-spaced row, like one presenting offerings at the shrine of a goddess. He put the blue box in her hand. THIS PRODUCT TO BE USED ONLY FOR THE PREVENTION OF DISEASE, she read, and dropped it. The boy was unscrewing the top of the flask. He stopped and pointed, with a smile, to the deck of cards. It was not an ordinary deck but one with an obscene picture on the back of each card. "Take a swig," he said, offering her the bottle first. He held it in front of her, but like one mesmerized, she did not move. 135

Her voice when she spoke had an almost pleading sound. "Aren't you," she murmured, "aren't you just good country people?"

The boy cocked his head. He looked as if he were just beginning to understand that she might be trying to insult him. "Yeah," he said, curling his lip slightly, "but it ain't held me back none. I'm as good as you any day in the week."

"Give me my leg," she said.

He pushed it farther away with his foot. "Come on now, let's begin to have us a good time," he said coaxingly. "We ain't got to know one another good yet."

"Give me my leg!" she screamed and tried to lunge for it but he pushed her down easily. 140

"What's the matter with you all of a sudden?" he asked, frowning as he screwed the top on the flask and put it quickly back inside the Bible. "You just a while ago said you didn't believe in nothing. I thought you was some girl!"

Her face was almost purple. "You're a Christian!" she hissed. "You're a fine Christian! You're just like them all — say one thing and do another. You're a perfect Christian, you're . . ."

The boy's mouth was set angrily. "I hope you don't think," he said in a lofty indignant tone, "that I believe in that crap! I may sell Bibles but I know which end is up and I wasn't born yesterday and I know where I'm going!"

"Give me my leg!" she screeched. He jumped up so quickly that she barely saw him sweep the cards and the blue box into the Bible and throw the Bible into his valise. She saw him grab the leg and then she saw it for an instant slanted forlornly across the inside of the suitcase with a Bible at either side of its opposite ends. He slammed the lid shut and snatched up the valise and swung it down the hole and then stepped through himself.

When all of him had passed but his head, he turned and regarded her with a look 145 that no longer had any admiration in it. "I've gotten a lot of interesting things," he said. "One time I got a woman's glass eye this way. And you needn't to think you'll catch me because Pointer ain't really my name. I use a different name at every house I call at and don't stay nowhere long. And I'll tell you another thing, Hulga," he said, using the name as if he didn't think much of it, "you ain't so smart. I been believing in nothing ever since I was born!" and then the toast-colored hat disappeared down the hole and the girl was left, sitting on the straw in the dusty sunlight. When she turned her churning face toward the opening, she saw his blue figure struggling successfully over the green speckled lake.

Mrs. Hopewell and Mrs. Freeman, who were in the back pasture, digging up onions, saw him emerge a little later from the woods and head across the meadow toward the highway. "Why, that looks like that nice dull young man that tried to sell me a Bible yesterday," Mrs. Hopewell said, squinting. "He must have been selling them to the Negroes back in there. He was so simple," she said, "but I guess the world would be better off if we were all that simple."

Mrs. Freeman's gaze drove forward and just touched him before he disappeared under the hill. Then she returned her attention to the evil-smelling onion shoot she was lifting from the ground. "Some can't be that simple," she said. "I know I never could."

(1955)

Exploring the Text

1. The characters in "Good Country People" are defined, at least in part, by the clichés they fall back on. How do these clichés help develop the characters? What does Flannery O'Connor tell us about human nature through these clichés?
2. What do you make of the names that O'Connor gives her characters? What expectations do they create? How are your expectations fulfilled? How are they overturned?
3. What do you think Joy/Hulga's artificial leg and glasses represent? What about Manley's valise?
4. What do you think O'Connor really means by "good country people"?
5. Do you think the story is funny? Explain why or why not.

6. How does O'Connor expect us to feel about Joy/Hulga? Is she a sympathetic character or an evil one? In what ways does her disability reflect her character? What use does she make of her degrees and intelligence? What is her condition at the end of the story?
7. The critic Frederick Crews wrote about Flannery O'Connor in the New York Review of Books:

> For all her private loyalty to the church's hopeful teachings, then, the world of O'Connor's fiction remains radically askew. Readers immersed in that fiction without a lifeline to the doctrinal assurance found in her lectures and letters tend to feel an existential vertigo at the very moments where the Christian critics want them to feel most worshipful. And this response cannot be dismissed as a mere error, a product of incomplete knowledge. O'Connor's works, we must understand, are not finally about salvation but about doom — the sudden and irremediable realization that there is no exit from being, for better or worse, exactly who one is.

How does "Good Country People" illustrate Crews's observation?

TALKBACKS

Lawrence Downes

Lawrence Downes is an editor and journalist for the New York Times and writes with a focus on immigration and veterans' issues, among other topics. He received a bachelor's degree in English from Fordham University in 1986 and attended the University of Missouri School of Journalism.

In Search of Flannery O'Connor

In the following essay, which was published in the travel section of the New York Times in 2007, Downes reflects on the career and life of celebrated American novelist and short-story writer Flannery O'Connor.

The sun was white above the trees, and sinking fast. I was a few miles past Milledgeville, Ga., somewhere outside of Toomsboro, on a two-lane highway that rose and plunged and twisted through red clay hills and pine woods. I had no fixed destination, just a plan to follow a back road to some weedy field in time to watch the sun go down on Flannery O'Connor's Georgia.

Somewhere outside Toomsboro is where, in O'Connor's best-known short story, "A Good Man Is Hard to Find," a family has a car accident and a tiresome old grandmother has an epiphany. The fog of petty selfishness that has shrouded her life clears when she feels a sudden spasm of kindness for a stranger, a brooding prison escapee who calls himself the Misfit.

Of course, that's also the moment that he shoots her in the chest, but in O'Connor's world, where good and evil are as real as a spreading puddle of blood, it amounts to a happy ending. The grandmother is touched by grace at the last possible moment, and she dies smiling.

"She would of been a good woman," the Misfit said, "if it had been somebody there to shoot her every minute of her life."

O'Connor's short stories and novels are set in a rural South where people know their places, mind their manners and do horrible things to one another. It's a place that somehow hovers outside of time, where both the New Deal and the New Testament feel like recent history. It's soaked in violence and humor, in sin and in God. He may have fled the modern world, but in O'Connor's he sticks around, in the sun hanging over the tree line, in the trees and farm beasts, and in the characters who roost in the memory like gargoyles. It's a land haunted by Christ — not your friendly hug-me Jesus, but a ragged figure who moves from tree to tree in the back of the mind, pursuing the unwilling.

Many people — me for instance — are in turn haunted by O'Connor. Her doctrinally strict, mordantly funny stories and novels are as close to perfect as writing gets. Her language is so spare and efficient, her images and character's speech so vivid, they burn into the mind. Her strange Southern landscape was one I knew viscerally but, until this trip, had never set foot in. I had wondered how her fictional terrain and characters, so bizarre yet so blindingly real, might compare with the real places and people she lived among and wrote about.

Hence my pilgrimage to Milledgeville this fall, and my race against the setting sun.

O'Connor's characters shimmer between heaven and hell, acting out allegorical dramas of sin and redemption. There's Hazel Motes, the sunken-eyed Army veteran who tries to reject God by preaching "the Church of Christ Without Christ, where the blind don't see, the lame don't walk and what's dead stays that way." Hulga Hopewell, the deluded intellectual who loses her wooden leg to a thieving Bible salesman she had assumed was as dumb as a stump. The pious Mrs. Turpin, whose heart pours out thank-yous to Jesus for not having made her black or white trash or ugly. Mrs. Freeman, the universal busybody: "Besides the neutral expression that she wore when she was alone, Mrs. Freeman had two others, forward and reverse, that she used for all her human dealings."

People like these can't be real, and yet they breathe on the page. And there is nothing allegorical about the earthly stage they strut on: It's the red clay of central Georgia, in and around Milledgeville, where O'Connor spent most of her short life. She lived with her widowed mother on the family farm, called Andalusia, just outside Milledgeville, writing and raising peacocks and chickens from 1951 until her death in 1964 at age 39, of lupus.

O'Connor was a misfit herself, as a Roman Catholic in the Bible Belt, a religiously devout ironist writing for nonbelievers. She liked to gently mock the redneckedness of her surroundings. "When in Rome," she once wrote, "do as you done in Milledgeville."

But Milledgeville is not the backwoods. It's a city of 19,000, on the Oconee River in Baldwin County, 30 miles from Macon. It is the former capital of Georgia, trashed by General Sherman on his March to the Sea. It has a huge state psychiatric hospital and a prominent liberal-arts college, Georgia College and State University. The old Capitol building is now home to a military school. There is a district of big antebellum homes with columns and fussy flowerbeds. Oliver Hardy lived here when he was young and fat but not yet famous.

Milledgeville now looms huge beyond these modest attributes because of O'Connor, or Mary Flannery, as she was known in town. Her output was slender: two novels, a couple dozen short stories, a pile of letters, essays and criticism. But her reputation has grown steadily since she died. Her "Complete Stories" won the National Book Award for Fiction in 1971. Her collected letters, "The Habit of Being," banished the misperception that she was some sort of crippled hillbilly Emily Dickinson. They revealed instead a gregarious, engaged thinker who corresponded widely and eagerly, and who might have ranged far had illness not forced her to stay home and write.

O'Connor's own trail begins about 200 miles southeast of Milledgeville, in Savannah, where she was born and spent her childhood among a community of Irish Roman Catholics, of whom her parents, Edward and Regina Cline O'Connor, were prominent members. The O'Connor home, on a mossy historic square downtown, is landmarked and has been closed for renovations, but is reopening for public tours in April. The Roman Catholic Cathedral of St. John the Baptist is across the square, although nothing in it informs a visitor that one of the country's most prominent apologists for the Catholic faith worshiped and went to parochial school there.

O'Connor learned her craft at the University of Iowa and at Yaddo, the writer's colony in Saratoga Springs, N.Y. She lived for a while in Connecticut with the poet Robert Fitzgerald and his wife, Sally, and thought she was leaving the South behind.

But she got sick, and went home to Andalusia, four miles north of 15 Milledgeville.

Andalusia was a working dairy farm run by Flannery's mother, Regina, who as a prominent widow businesswoman was something of a novelty in town. No one has lived there since O'Connor died in 1964 and Regina moved back into downtown Milledgeville.

Strip malls have long since filled the gap between town and farm, and you now find Andalusia by driving past a Wal-Mart, a Chick-fil-A and a Lowe's Home Improvement Warehouse, where a man shot his wife and killed himself a few days before I arrived. You pass a billboard for Sister Nina, a fortune teller who reads palms in a home office cluttered with votive candles and pictures of Catholic saints. (To judge from one consultation, she is capable of divining that a visitor is a bearer of dark sorrows, but not exactly skilled at pinpointing what those sorrows might be.)

Across the highway from an America's Best Value Inn, a tiny sign marks the dirt road to Andalusia. I turned left, went through an open gate and there it was, a two-story white frame house with columns and brick steps leading up to a wide screened porch. Through the screens I could see a long, tidy row of white rocking chairs.

I drove around back, between the magnolia and pecan trees, parked on the grass and walked back to the house past a wooden water tower and an ancient garage, splintered and falling in on itself.

I was met at the door by Craig R. Amason, the executive director of the Flannery O'Connor-Andalusia Foundation, the nonprofit organization set up to sustain her memory and preserve her home. When the affable Mr. Amason, the foundation's sole employee, is not showing pilgrims around, he is raising money to fix up the place, a project that is a few million dollars short of its goal. The foundation urgently wants to restore the house and outbuildings to postcard-perfection, to insure its survival. Last year the Georgia Trust for Historic Preservation placed Andalusia on its list of most endangered places in the state. 20

For now, the 21-acre property is in a captivating state of decay.

There is no slow buildup on this tour; the final destination is the first doorway on your left: O'Connor's bedroom and study, converted from a sitting room because she couldn't climb the stairs. Mr. Amason stood back, politely granting me silence as I gathered my thoughts and drank in every detail.

This is where O'Connor wrote, for three hours every day. Her bed had a faded blue-and-white coverlet. The blue drapes, in a 1950's pattern, were dingy, and the paint was flaking off the walls. There was a portable typewriter, a hi-fi with classical LPs, a few bookcases. Leaning against an armoire were the aluminum crutches that O'Connor used, with her rashy swollen legs and crumbling bones, to get from bedroom to kitchen to porch.

There are few opportunities for so intimate and unguarded a glimpse into the private life of a great American writer. Mr. Amason told me that visitors sometimes wept on the bedroom threshold.

The center hall's cracked plaster walls held a few family photographs: an adorable Flannery, age 3, scowling at a picture book, and her smiling older self on an adjacent wall. There was a picture of Edward O'Connor, but none of Regina, who died in 1995 at 99. In the kitchen, an old electric range with fat heating elements sat near a chunky refrigerator, the very one Flannery bought for her mother after selling the rights to "The Life You Save May Be Your Own" for a TV movie in which Gene Kelly butchered the role of the con man Tom T. Shiftlet. In the center of the room, a small wooden table was set for two. 25

A walk around the grounds summoned all manner of O'Connor images. In a field of goldenrod, a lone hinny, a horse-donkey hybrid named Flossie, with grotesque clumps of fat on her rump, kept a reserved distance. I followed a path below the house down to a pond buzzing with dragonflies. Mr. Amason had told me to keep to the mowed areas to avoid snakes, so I wasn't too surprised to encounter a black rat snake, stretched out like a five-foot length of industrial cable, by a footbridge at the far edge of the pond. I tickled it with a turkey feather and it curled to strike faster than I could blink.

Back in Milledgeville's tidy downtown, I went to Georgia College and State University, which was Georgia State College for Women when O'Connor went there. The library displays her desk, paintings and other artifacts, and a librarian took me in the back to see her papers and books — a daunting array of fiction, classics and Catholic theology. The book of Updike's poetry looked well read, but not as much as the Kierkegaard ("Fear and Trembling" and "The Sickness Unto Death"), whose binding was falling off.

I found Sacred Heart Church, where Flannery and Regina worshiped, and was amazed when the pastor, the Rev. Michael McWhorter, suggested that I come back the next morning for the funeral service of O'Connor's first cousin Catherine Florencourt Firth, whose ashes were coming home from Arizona. I sat quietly in a back row, then shrank into my jacket when Father McWhorter announced my presence from the pulpit. But the mourners, clearly accustomed to Flannery admirers, nodded graciously at me. The pastor had a shiny round head and tidy beard, and applied incense with medieval vigor, sending curls of sweet smoke around Mrs. Firth's urn until the tiny sanctuary was entirely fogged in.

I am not accustomed to crashing funerals, so I did not linger afterward. I was grateful for the kind offers from Mrs. Firth's relations to come back and visit longer next time.

My last stop was also O'Connor's: Memory Hill Cemetery, in the middle of 30 town, where mother, father and daughter lie side by side by side under identical flat marble slabs. A state prison detail was prowling the grounds, trimming hedges. They had sloppily strewn oleander branches on Flannery's grave, which I brushed clean. I found a plastic bouquet to place at its head. I looked at the dates:

March 25, 1925
August 3, 1964

She died young, but not without saying what she wanted to say. I thought back to my journey the night before, when I captured the O'Connor sunset I had been looking for. I found a road that led down to the edge of a kaolin mine. Standing beside huge mounds of white chalky dirt, surrounded by deep treads left in the red clay by earth-moving machinery, I watched as a sentence from one of my favorite stories, "A Temple of the Holy Ghost," slowly unfolded, as if for me alone:

> "The sun was a huge red ball like an elevated Host drenched in blood and when it sank out of sight, it left a line in the sky like a red clay road hanging over the trees."

By the road's edge I spied an unusual-looking vine. It was passion flower, with purple blossoms that look like a crown of thorns, and the nails for Christ's hands and feet. I picked a bunch of strands, with their immature fruit, like little green boiled eggs, and got back onto the road to Milledgeville, under a blackening sky, to put them in some water.

(2007)

Exploring the Text

1. How does Lawrence Downes consider audience as he sets the stage for his visit to the home of Flannery O'Connor?
2. What is the effect of Downes's use of understatement in paragraph 5?

3. How does Downes characterize O'Connor? What surprises you about her?
4. How would you describe the tone of "In Search of Flannery O'Connor"? How does the essay's tone help Downes achieve his purpose?
5. Why do you think Downes ends his piece with a description of the "unusual-looking vine" he sees at the edge of the road?

Alice Walker

Alice Walker (b. 1944) is a novelist, a poet, an essayist, a civil rights activist, and a self-described eco-pacifist, best known for her depictions of the struggles and strengths of African American women. The youngest of eight children born to share-cropper parents, Walker grew up in the small town of Eatonton, Georgia. After high school, she attended Spelman College in Georgia, then transferred to Sarah Lawrence College in New York, which she graduated from in 1965. Her first novel, The Third Life of Grange Copeland, was published in 1969, followed by her poetry collection Revolutionary Petunias and Other Poems (1973). In 1982, she published The Color Purple, her most celebrated work, which won the Pulitzer Prize and was adapted into both a movie (directed by Steven Spielberg) and a Tony Award–winning Broadway musical. Walker is also known for her essays, in which she coined the term womanist. Claiming a more positive connotation than feminist, she writes that a womanist is "committed to survival and wholeness of entire people, male and female. Not a separatist." Walker has taught at Wellesley College, Yale University, the University of California–Berkeley, and many other institutions. She continues to support environmental causes and is an advocate for international women's rights.

from Beyond the Peacock
The Reconstruction of Flannery O'Connor

This essay appeared in Walker's 1975 essay collection, In Search of Our Mother's Gardens: Womanist Prose.

I discovered O'Connor when I was in college in the North and took a course in Southern writers and the South. The perfection of her writing was so dazzling I never noticed that no black Southern writers were taught. The other writers we studied — Faulkner, McCullers, Welty — seemed obsessed with a racial past that would not let them go. They seemed to beg the question of their characters' humanity on every page. O'Connor's characters — whose humanity if not their sanity is taken for granted, and who are miserable, ugly, narrow-minded, atheistic, and of intense racial smugness and arrogance, with not a graceful, pretty one anywhere who is not, at the same time, a joke — shocked and delighted me.

It was for her description of Southern white women that I appreciated her work at first, because when she set her pen to them not a whiff of magnolia hovered in the air (and the tree itself might never have been planted), and yes, I could say, yes, these white folks without the magnolia (who are indifferent to the tree's existence), and these black folks without melons and superior racial patience, these are like Southerners that I know.

She was for me the first great modern writer from the South, and was, in any case, the only one I had read who wrote such sly, demythifying sentences about white women as: "The woman would be more or less pretty — yellow hair, fat ankles, muddy-colored eyes."

Her white male characters do not fare any better — all of them misfits, thieves, deformed madmen, idiot children, illiterates, and murderers, and her black characters, male and female, appear equally shallow, demented, and absurd. That she retained a certain distance (only, however, in her later, mature work) from the inner workings of her black characters seems to me all to her credit, since, by deliberately limiting her treatment of them to cover their observable demeanor and actions, she leaves them free, in the reader's imagination, to inhabit another landscape, another life, than the one she creates for them. This is a kind of grace many writers do not have when dealing with representatives of an oppressed people within a story, and their insistence on knowing everything, on being God, in fact, has burdened us with more stereotypes than we can ever hope to shed.

In her life, O'Connor was more casual. In a letter to her friend Robert Fitzgerald in the mid-fifties she wrote, "as the niggers say, I have the misery." He found nothing offensive, apparently, in including this unflattering (to O'Connor) statement in his introduction to one of her books. O'Connor was then certain she was dying, and was in pain; one assumes she made this comment in an attempt at levity. Even so, I do not find it funny. In another letter she wrote shortly before she died she said: "Justice is justice and should not be appealed to along racial lines. The problem is not abstract for the Southerner, it's concrete: he sees it in terms of persons, not races — which way of seeing does away with easy answers." Of course this observation, though grand, does not apply to the racist treatment of blacks by whites in the South, and O'Connor should have added that she spoke only for herself. 5

But essential O'Connor is not about race at all, which is why it is so refreshing, coming, as it does, out of such a racial culture. If it can be said to be "about" anything, then it is "about" prophets and prophecy, "about" revelation, and "about" the impact of supernatural grace on human beings who don't have a chance of spiritual growth without it.

(1975)

Exploring the Text

1. Describe the way that Alice Walker characterizes the difference between Flannery O'Connor and the other Southern writers she studied in her college course.
2. How does Walker address the stereotypes of both black and white women that have been a staple of Southern literature? How does she describe O'Connor's contribution to the debunking of those stereotypes? Why does Walker feel comfortable with O'Connor's black and white women?

3. Does Walker believe there should be a line between the public (or published) self and the private one? Explain your answer. Do you agree?
4. What do you think Walker means when she says that O'Connor's work comes out of a "racial culture" (par. 6). Why does she say her work isn't about race?

Making Connections

1. Having read "Good Country People" (p. 1300) and Lawrence Downes's description of why he admires O'Connor (par. 6), can you see her influence in Downes's style? Give some examples.
2. Why do you think Downes chose to quote this description of Mrs. Freeman from "Good Country People": "Besides the neutral expression that she wore when she was alone, Mrs. Freeman had two others, forward and reverse, that she used for all her human dealings" (par. 8)? What line would you have chosen as representative of "Good Country People"? Explain your answer.
3. In paragraph 31, Downes says, "She died young, but not without saying what she wanted to say." What do you think O'Connor wanted to say in "Good Country People"?
4. Alice Walker says she is "delighted" by O'Connor's characters, who are "miserable, ugly, narrow-minded, atheistic, and of intense racial smugness and arrogance, with not a graceful, pretty one anywhere who is not, at the same time, a joke" (par. 1). Can you apply those adjectives to the characters in "Good Country People"? Do they delight you? Explain your answer.
5. What do Downes and Walker have in common in their admiration of Flannery O'Connor? In what ways do they differ?
6. Both Downes and Walker refer to peacocks — Walker in her title and Downes in paragraph 9. In "Good Country People," Hulga/Joy is said to be "as sensitive about the artificial leg as a peacock about his tail" (par. 125). Flannery O'Connor raised peacocks at her home in Milledgeville, Georgia. Why do you think peacocks are a potent symbol for some of the themes and character traits O'Connor examines in her work?

Theodore Roethke

Theodore Roethke (1908–1963) was born in Saginaw, Michigan. His early years spent in the family greenhouse business brought him close to nature and to his father, who died suddenly when Roethke was fifteen, a loss that looms large in his poem "My Papa's Waltz." After graduating from the University of Michigan, he did brief stints at law school and at Harvard University before the Great Depression compelled him to find work teaching at Lafayette College. He continued to teach throughout his life. Roethke first became popular after favorable reviews for Open House in 1941. He then won numerous prizes for his work throughout the 1950s and 1960s, including National Book Awards for both Words for the Wind (1957) and The Far Field (1964). The meeting of the mystical and the natural is at the center of his work—a meeting that fascinated such earlier poets as Blake and Wordsworth, both of whom were strong influences on Roethke's poetry.

The Waking

"The Waking" was published in Roethke's collection The Waking: Poems 1933–1953, which won the Pulitzer Prize in 1954.

I wake to sleep, and take my waking slow.
I feel my fate in what I cannot fear.
I learn by going where I have to go.

We think by feeling. What is there to know?
I hear my being dance from ear to ear.
I wake to sleep, and take my waking slow.

Of those so close beside me, which are you?
God bless the Ground! I shall walk softly there,
And learn by going where I have to go.

Light takes the Tree; but who can tell us how?
The lowly worm climbs up a winding stair;
I wake to sleep, and take my waking slow.

Great Nature has another thing to do
To you and me; so take the lively air,
And, lovely, learn by going where to go.

This shaking keeps me steady. I should know.
What falls away is always. And is near.
I wake to sleep, and take my waking slow.
I learn by going where I have to go.

(1953)

Exploring the Text

1. What are two different ways you can read the poem's first line: "I wake to sleep, and take my waking slow"?

2. What do the poem's first and third lines have in common? Do their meanings change as they are repeated as the last lines of the following tercets (three-line stanzas)? Why do you think Theodore Roethke tweaks the line about learning but leaves the line about waking intact? How do those slight changes affect the meaning of those lines?
3. "The Waking" is a villanelle, a poetic form of five tercets and a quatrain (four-line stanza). It is built on two rhymes: the two key lines of the first stanza are repeated, alternately, as the last line of each tercet and joined together in the closing quatrain. What effect does this form have on the meaning of the poem? Hint: consider its circular effect.
4. A 1992 essay by Susan Pinkus on "The Waking" begins, "When a poem takes dead aim on the eternal, we should not be surprised that it draws many interpretations." Explain what you think she means by "the eternal." What is your interpretation of the poem?
5. What argument does "The Waking" make?
6. In what ways does "The Waking" create a sort of harmony of form and content? Critics have suggested approaching it as a piece of music before trying to figure out what it means. What happens when you try that approach?

James Baldwin

James Baldwin (1924–1987) was one of the most influential figures in American literature during the latter half of the twentieth century. His novels include Go Tell It on the Mountain (1953), Giovanni's Room (1956), If Beale Street Could Talk (1974), and Just Above My Head (1979). A sharp social critic of race relations and sexual identity, Baldwin wrote numerous essays that were collected in Notes of a Native Son (1955), The Fire Next Time (1963), and The Devil Finds Work (1976). He also wrote poetry and plays. By the late 1940s, Baldwin had moved to Europe and lived in France and Turkey for most of the rest of his life, though he returned at times to the United States to lecture and participate in the civil rights movement.

Notes of a Native Son

This essay appeared in the collection Notes of a Native Son, which was published in 1955.

I

On the 29th of July, in 1943, my father died. On the same day, a few hours later, his last child was born. Over a month before this, while all our energies were concentrated in waiting for these events, there had been, in Detroit, one of the bloodiest race riots of the century. A few hours after my father's funeral, while he lay in state in the undertaker's chapel, a race riot broke out in Harlem. On the morning of the 3rd of August, we drove my father to the graveyard through a wilderness of smashed plate glass.

The day of my father's funeral had also been my nineteenth birthday. As we drove him to the graveyard, the spoils of injustice, anarchy, discontent, and hatred were all around us. It seemed to me that God himself had devised, to mark my father's end, the most sustained and brutally dissonant of codas. And it seemed to me, too, that the violence which rose all about us as my father left the world had been devised as a corrective for the pride of his eldest son. I had declined to believe in that apocalypse which had been central to my father's vision; very well, life seemed to be saying, here is something that will certainly pass for an apocalypse until the real thing comes along. I had inclined to be contemptuous of my father for the conditions of his life, for the conditions of our lives. When his life had ended I began to wonder about that life and also, in a new way, to be apprehensive about my own.

I had not known my father very well. We had got on badly, partly because we shared, in our different fashions, the vice of stubborn pride. When he was dead I realized that I had hardly ever spoken to him. When he had been dead a long time I began to wish I had. It seems to be typical of life in America, where opportunities, real and fancied, are thicker than anywhere else on the globe, that the second generation has no time to talk to the first. No one, including my father, seems to have known exactly how old he was, but his mother had been born during slavery. He was of the first generation of free men. He, along with thousands of other Negroes, came North after 1919 and I was part of that generation which had never seen the landscape of what Negroes sometimes call the Old Country.

He had been born in New Orleans and had been a quite young man there during the time that Louis Armstrong, a boy, was running errands for the dives and honky-tonks of what was always presented to me as one of the most wicked of cities — to this day, whenever I think of New Orleans, I also helplessly think of Sodom and Gomorrah. My father never mentioned Louis Armstrong, except to forbid us to play his records; but there was a picture of him on our wall for a long time. One of my father's strong-willed female relatives had placed it there and forbade my father to take it down. He never did, but he eventually maneuvered her out of the house and when, some years later, she was in trouble and near death, he refused to do anything to help her.

He was, I think, very handsome. I gather this from photographs and from my 5 own memories of him, dressed in his Sunday best and on his way to preach a sermon somewhere, when I was little. Handsome, proud, and ingrown, "like a toe-nail," somebody said. But he looked to me, as I grew older, like pictures I had seen of African tribal chieftains: he really should have been naked, with war-paint on and barbaric mementos, standing among spears. He could be chilling in the pulpit and indescribably cruel in his personal life and he was certainly the most bitter man I have ever met; yet it must be said that there was something else in him, buried in him, which lent him his tremendous power and, even, a rather crushing charm. It had something to do with his blackness, I think — he was very black — with his blackness and his beauty, and with the fact that he knew that he was black but did not know that he was beautiful. He claimed to be proud of his blackness but it had also been the cause of much humiliation and it had fixed bleak boundaries to his life. He was not a young man when we were growing up and he had already suffered many kinds of ruin; in his outrageously demanding and protective way he loved his children, who were black like him and menaced, like him; and all these things sometimes showed in his face when he tried, never to my knowledge with any success, to establish contact with any of us. When he took one of his children on his knee to play, the child always became fretful and began to cry; when he tried to help one of us with our homework the absolutely unabating tension which emanated from him caused our minds and our tongues to become paralyzed, so that he, scarcely knowing why, flew into a rage and the child, not knowing why, was punished. If it ever entered his head to bring a surprise home for his children, it was, almost unfailingly, the wrong surprise and even the big watermelons he often brought home on his back in the summertime led to the most appalling scenes. I do not remember, in all those years, that one of his children was ever glad to see him come home. From what I was able to gather of his early life, it seemed that this inability to establish contact with other people had always marked him and had been one of the things which had driven him out of New Orleans. There was something in him, therefore, groping and tentative, which was never expressed and which was buried with him. One saw it most clearly when he was facing new people and hoping to impress them. But he never did, not for long. We went from church to smaller and more improbable church, he found himself in less and less demand as a minister, and by the time he died none of his friends had come to see him for a long time. He had lived and died in an intolerable bitterness of spirit and it frightened me, as we drove him to the graveyard through those unquiet, ruined streets, to see how powerful and overflowing this bitterness could be and to realize that this bitterness now was mine.

When he died I had been away from home for a little over a year. In that year I had had time to become aware of the meaning of all my father's bitter warnings, had discovered the secret of his proudly pursed lips and rigid carriage: I had discovered the weight of white people in the world. I saw that this had been for my ancestors and now would be for me an awful thing to live with and that the bitterness which had helped to kill my father could also kill me.

He had been ill a long time — in the mind, as we now realized, reliving instances of his fantastic intransigence in the new light of his affliction and endeavoring to feel a sorrow for him which never, quite, came true. We had not known that he was being eaten up by paranoia, and the discovery that his cruelty, to our bodies and our minds, had been one of the symptoms of his illness was not, then, enough to enable us to forgive him. The younger children felt, quite simply, relief that he would not be coming home anymore. My mother's observation that it was he, after all, who had kept them alive all these years meant nothing because the problems of keeping children alive are not real for children. The older children felt, with my father gone, that they could invite their friends to the house without fear that their friends would be insulted or, as had sometimes happened with me, being told that their friends were in league with the devil and intended to rob our family of everything we owned. (I didn't fail to wonder, and it made me hate him, what on earth we owned that anybody else would want.)

His illness was beyond all hope of healing before anyone realized that he was ill. He had always been so strange and had lived, like a prophet, in such unimaginably close communion with the Lord that his long silences which were punctuated by moans and hallelujahs and snatches of old songs while he sat at the living-room window never seemed odd to us. It was not until he refused to eat because, he said, his family was trying to poison him that my mother was forced to accept as a fact what had, until then, been only an unwilling suspicion. When he was committed, it was discovered that he had tuberculosis and, as it turned out, the disease of his mind allowed the disease of his body to destroy him. For the doctors could not force him to eat, either, and, though he was fed intravenously, it was clear from the beginning that there was no hope for him.

In my mind's eye I could see him, sitting at the window, locked up in his terrors; hating and fearing every living soul including his children who had betrayed him, too, by reaching towards the world which had despised him. There were nine of us. I began to wonder what it could have felt like for such a man to have had nine children whom he could barely feed. He used to make little jokes about our poverty, which never, of course, seemed very funny to us; they could not have seemed very funny to him, either, or else our all too feeble response to them would never have caused such rages. He spent great energy and achieved, to our chagrin, no small amount of success in keeping us away from the people who surrounded us, people who had all-night rent parties to which we listened when we should have been sleeping, people who cursed and drank and flashed razor blades on Lenox Avenue. He could not understand why, if they had so much energy to spare, they could not use it to make their lives better. He treated almost everybody on our block with a most uncharitable asperity and neither they, nor, of course, their children were slow to reciprocate.

The only white people who came to our house were welfare workers and bill collectors. It was almost always my mother who dealt with them, for my father's temper, which was at the mercy of his pride, was never to be trusted. It was clear that he felt their very presence in his home to be a violation: this was conveyed by his carriage, almost ludicrously stiff, and by his voice, harsh and vindictively polite. When I was around nine or ten I wrote a play which was directed by a young, white schoolteacher, a woman, who then took an interest in me, and gave me books to read and, in order to corroborate my theatrical bent, decided to take me to see what she somewhat tactlessly referred to as "real" plays. Theatergoing was forbidden in our house, but, with the really cruel intuitiveness of a child, I suspected that the color of this woman's skin would carry the day for me. When, at school, she suggested taking me to the theater, I did not, as I might have done if she had been a Negro, find a way of discouraging her, but agreed that she should pick me up at my house one evening. I then, very cleverly, left all the rest to my mother, who suggested to my father, as I knew she would, that it would not be very nice to let such a kind woman make the trip for nothing. Also, since it was a schoolteacher, I imagine that my mother countered the idea of sin with the idea of "education," which word, even with my father, carried a kind of bitter weight. 10

Before the teacher came my father took me aside to ask why she was coming, what interest she could possibly have in our house, in a boy like me. I said I didn't know but I, too, suggested that it had something to do with education. And I understood that my father was waiting for me to say something—I didn't quite know what; perhaps that I wanted his protection against this teacher and her "education." I said none of these things and the teacher came and we went out. It was clear, during the brief interview in our living room, that my father was agreeing very much against his will and that he would have refused permission if he had dared. The fact that he did not dare caused me to despise him: I had no way of knowing that he was facing in that living room a wholly unprecedented and frightening situation.

Later, when my father had been laid off from his job, this woman became very important to us. She was really a very sweet and generous woman and went to a great deal of trouble to be of help to us, particularly during one awful winter. My mother called her by the highest name she knew. She said she was a "christian." My father could scarcely disagree but during the four or five years of our relatively close association he never trusted her and was always trying to surprise in her open, Midwestern face the genuine, cunningly hidden, and hideous motivation. In later years, particularly when it began to be clear that this "education" of mine was going to lead me to perdition, he became more explicit and warned me that my white friends in high school were not really my friends and that I would see, when I was older, how white people would do anything to keep a Negro down. Some of them could be nice, he admitted, but none of them were to be trusted and most of them were not even nice. The best thing was to have as little to do with them as possible. I did not feel this way and I was certain, in my innocence, that I never would.

But the year which preceded my father's death had made a great change in my life. I had been living in New Jersey, working in defense plants, working and living among southerners, white and black. I knew about the south, of course, and about how southerners treated Negroes and how they expected them to behave, but it had never entered my mind that anyone would look at me and expect me to behave that way. I learned in New Jersey that to be a Negro meant, precisely, that one was never looked at but was simply at the mercy of the reflexes the color of one's skin caused in other people. I acted in New Jersey as I had always acted, that is as though I thought a great deal of myself—I had to act that way—with results that were, simply, unbelievable. I had scarcely arrived before I had earned the enmity, which was extraordinarily ingenious, of all my superiors and nearly all my coworkers. In the beginning, to make matters worse, I simply did not know what was happening. I did not know what I had done, and I shortly began to wonder what anyone could possibly do, to bring about such unanimous, active, and unbearably vocal hostility. I knew about jim-crow but I had never experienced it. I went to the same self-service restaurant three times and stood with all the Princeton boys before the counter, waiting for a hamburger and coffee; it was always an extraordinarily long time before anything was set before me; but it was not until the fourth visit that I learned that, in fact, nothing had ever been set before me: I had simply picked something up. Negroes were not served there, I was told, and they had been waiting for me to realize that I was always the only Negro present. Once

I was told this, I determined to go there all the time. But now they were ready for me and, though some dreadful scenes were subsequently enacted in that restaurant, I never ate there again.

It was the same story all over New Jersey, in bars, bowling alleys, diners, places to live. I was always being forced to leave, silently, or with mutual imprecations. I very shortly became notorious and children giggled behind me when I passed and their elders whispered or shouted — they really believed that I was mad. And it did begin to work on my mind, of course; I began to be afraid to go anywhere and to compensate for this I went places to which I really should not have gone and where, God knows, I had no desire to be. My reputation in town naturally enhanced my reputation at work and my working day became one long series of acrobatics designed to keep me out of trouble. I cannot say that these acrobatics succeeded. It began to seem that the machinery of the organization I worked for was turning over, day and night, with but one aim: to eject me. I was fired once, and contrived, with the aid of a friend from New York, to get back on the payroll; was fired again, and bounced back again. It took a while to fire me for the third time, but the third time took. There were no loopholes anywhere. There was not even any way of getting back inside the gates.

That year in New Jersey lives in my mind as though it were the year during which, 15 having an unsuspected predilection for it, I first contracted some dread, chronic disease, the unfailing symptom of which is a kind of blind fever, a pounding in the skull and fire in the bowels. Once this disease is contracted, one can never be really carefree again, for the fever, without an instant's warning, can recur at any moment. It can wreck more important things than race relations. There is not a Negro alive who does not have this rage in his blood — one has the choice, merely, of living with it consciously or surrendering to it. As for me, this fever has recurred in me, and does, and will until the day I die.

My last night in New Jersey, a white friend from New York took me to the nearest big town, Trenton, to go to the movies and have a few drinks. As it turned out, he also saved me from, at the very least, a violent whipping. Almost every detail of that night stands out very clearly in my memory. I even remember the name of the movie we saw because its title impressed me as being so patly ironical. It was a movie about the German occupation of France, starring Maureen O'Hara and Charles Laughton and called This Land Is Mine. I remember the name of the diner we walked into when the movie ended: it was the "American Diner." When we walked in the counterman asked what we wanted and I remember answering with the casual sharpness which had become my habit: "We want a hamburger and a cup of coffee, what do you think we want?" I do not know why, after a year of such rebuffs, I so completely failed to anticipate his answer, which was, of course, "We don't serve Negroes here." This reply failed to discompose me, at least for the moment. I made some sardonic comment about the name of the diner and we walked out into the streets.

This was the time of what was called the "brown-out," when the lights in all American cities were very dim. When we reentered the streets something happened to me which had the force of an optical illusion, or a nightmare. The streets were very crowded and I was facing north. People were moving in every direction but it seemed to me, in that instant, that all of the people I could see, and many more than that, were moving toward me, against me, and that everyone was white. I remember how their faces gleamed. And I felt, like a physical sensation, a click at the nape of my neck as though some interior string connecting my head to my body had been cut. I began to walk. I heard my friend call after me, but I ignored him. Heaven only knows what was going on in his mind, but he had the good sense not to touch me — I don't know what would have happened if he had — and to keep me in sight. I don't know what was going on in my mind, either; I certainly had no conscious plan. I wanted to do something to crush these white faces, which were crushing me. I walked for perhaps a block or two until I came to an enormous, glittering, and fashionable restaurant in which I knew not even the intercession of the Virgin would cause me to be served. I pushed through the doors and took the first vacant seat I saw, at a table for two, and waited.

I do not know how long I waited and I rather wonder, until today, what I could possibly have looked like. Whatever I looked like, I frightened the waitress who shortly appeared, and the moment she appeared all of my fury flowed towards her. I hated her for her white face, and for her great, astounded, frightened eyes. I felt that if she found a black man so frightening I would make her fright worthwhile.

She did not ask me what I wanted, but repeated, as though she had learned it somewhere, "We don't serve Negroes here." She did not say it with the blunt, derisive hostility to which I had grown so accustomed, but, rather, with a note of apology in her voice, and fear. This made me colder and more murderous than ever. I felt I had to do something with my hands. I wanted her to come close enough for me to get her neck between my hands.

So I pretended not to have understood her, hoping to draw her closer. And she did 20 step a very short step closer, with her pencil poised incongruously over her pad, and repeated the formula: ". . . don't serve Negroes here."

Somehow, with the repetition of that phrase, which was already ringing in my head like a thousand bells of a nightmare, I realized that she would never come any closer and that I would have to strike from a distance. There was nothing on the table but an ordinary water-mug half full of water, and I picked this up and hurled it with all my strength at her. She ducked and it missed her and shattered against the mirror behind the bar. And, with that sound, my frozen blood abruptly thawed, I returned from wherever I had been, I saw, for the first time, the restaurant, the people with their mouths open, already, as it seemed to me, rising as one man, and I realized what I had done, and where I was, and I was frightened. I rose and began running for the door. A round, pot-bellied man grabbed me by the nape of the neck just as I reached the doors and began to beat me about the face. I kicked him and got loose and ran into the streets. My friend whispered, "Run!" and I ran.

My friend stayed outside the restaurant long enough to misdirect my pursuers and the police, who arrived, he told me, at once. I do not know what I said to him when he came to my room that night. I could not have said much. I felt, in the oddest, most awful way, that I had somehow betrayed him. I lived it over and over and over again, the way one relives an automobile accident after it has happened and one finds oneself alone and safe. I could not get over two facts, both equally difficult for the imagination to grasp, and one was that I could have been murdered. But the other was that I had been ready to commit murder. I saw nothing very clearly but I did see this: that my life, my real life, was in danger, and not from anything other people might do but from the hatred I carried in my own heart.

II

I had returned home around the second week in June — in great haste because it seemed that my father's death and my mother's confinement were both but a matter of hours. In the case of my mother, it soon became clear that she had simply made a miscalculation. This had always been her tendency and I don't believe that a single one of us arrived in the world, or has since arrived anywhere else, on time. But none of us dawdled so intolerably about the business of being born as did my baby sister. We sometimes amused ourselves, during those endless, stifling weeks, by picturing the baby sitting within in the safe, warm dark, bitterly regretting the necessity of becoming a part of our chaos and stubbornly putting it off as long as possible. I understood her perfectly and congratulated her on showing such good sense so soon. Death, however, sat as purposefully at my father's bedside as life stirred within my mother's womb and it was harder to understand why he so lingered in that long shadow. It seemed that he had bent, and for a long time, too, all of his energies towards dying. Now death was ready for him but my father held back.

All of Harlem, indeed, seemed to be infected by waiting. I had never before known it to be so violently still. Racial tensions throughout this country were exacerbated during the early years of the war, partly because the labor market brought together hundreds of thousands of ill-prepared people and partly because Negro soldiers, regardless of where they were born, received their military training in the south. What happened in defense plants and army camps had repercussions, naturally, in every Negro ghetto. The situation in Harlem had grown bad enough for clergymen, policemen, educators, politicians, and social workers to assert in one breath that there was no "crime wave" and to offer, in the very next breath, suggestions as to how to combat it. These suggestions always seemed to involve playgrounds, despite the fact that racial skirmishes were occurring in the playgrounds, too. Playground or not, crime wave or not, the Harlem police force had been augmented in March, and the unrest grew — perhaps, in fact, partly as a result of the ghetto's instinctive hatred of policemen. Perhaps the most revealing news item, out of the steady parade of reports of muggings, stabbings, shootings, assaults, gang wars, and accusations of police brutality is the item concerning six Negro girls who set upon a white girl in the subway because, as they all too accurately put it, she was stepping on their toes. Indeed she was, all over the nation.

I had never before been so aware of policemen, on foot, on horseback, on corners, 25 everywhere, always two by two. Nor had I ever been so aware of small knots of people. They were on stoops and on corners and in doorways, and what was striking about them, I think, was that they did not seem to be talking. Never, when I passed these groups, did the usual sound of a curse or a laugh ring out and neither did there seem to be any hum of gossip. There was certainly, on the other hand, occurring between them communication extraordinarily intense. Another thing that was striking was the unexpected diversity of the people who made up these groups. Usually, for example, one would see a group of sharpies standing on the street corner, jiving the passing chicks; or a group of older men, usually, for some reason, in the vicinity of a barber shop, discussing baseball scores, or the numbers or making rather chilling observations about women they had known. Women, in a general way, tended to be seen less often together — unless they were church women, or very young girls, or prostitutes met together for an unprofessional instant. But that summer I saw the strangest combinations: large, respectable, churchly matrons standing on the stoops or the corners with their hair tied up, together with a girl in sleazy satin whose face bore the marks of gin and the razor, or heavy-set, abrupt, no-nonsense older men, in company with the most disreputable and fanatical "race" men, or these same "race" men with the sharpies, or these sharpies with the churchly women. Seventh Day Adventists and Methodists and Spiritualists seemed to be hobnobbing with Holy-rollers and they were all, alike, entangled with the most flagrant disbelievers; something heavy in their stance seemed to indicate that they had all, incredibly, seen a common vision, and on each face there seemed to be the same strange, bitter shadow.

The churchly women and the matter-of-fact, no-nonsense men had children in the Army. The sleazy girls they talked to had lovers there, the sharpies and the "race" men had friends and brothers there. It would have demanded an unquestioning patriotism, happily as uncommon in this country as it is undesirable, for these people not to have been disturbed by the bitter letters they received, by the newspaper stories they read, not to have been enraged by the posters, then to be found all over New York, which described the Japanese as "yellow-bellied Japs." It was only the "race" men, to be sure, who spoke ceaselessly of being revenged — how this vengeance was to be exacted was not clear — for the indignities and dangers suffered by Negro boys in uniform; but everybody felt a directionless, hopeless bitterness, as well as that panic which can scarcely be suppressed when one knows that a human being one loves is beyond one's reach, and in danger. This helplessness and this gnawing uneasiness does something, at length, to even the toughest mind. Perhaps the best way to sum all this up is to say that the people I knew felt, mainly, a peculiar kind of relief when they knew that their boys were being shipped out of the south, to do battle overseas. It was, perhaps, like feeling that the most dangerous part of a dangerous journey had been passed and that now, even if death should come, it would come with honor and without the complicity of their countrymen. Such a death would be, in short, a fact with which one could hope to live.

It was on the 28th of July, which I believe was a Wednesday, that I visited my father for the first time during his illness and for the last time in his life. The moment I saw him I knew why I had put off this visit so long. I had told my mother that I did not want to see him because I hated him. But this was not true. It was only that I had hated him and I wanted to hold on to this hatred. I did not want to look on him as a ruin: it was not a ruin I had hated. I imagine that one of the reasons people cling to their hates so stubbornly is because they sense, once hate is gone, that they will be forced to deal with pain.

We traveled out to him, his older sister and myself, to what seemed to be the very end of a very Long Island. It was hot and dusty and we wrangled, my aunt and I, all the way out, over the fact that I had recently begun to smoke and, as she said, to give myself airs. But I knew that she wrangled with me because she could not bear to face the fact of her brother's dying. Neither could I endure the reality of her despair, her unstated bafflement as to what had happened to her brother's life, and her own. So we wrangled and I smoked and from time to time she fell into a heavy reverie. Covertly, I watched her face, which was the face of an old woman; it had fallen in, the eyes were sunken and lightless; soon she would be dying, too.

In my childhood — it had not been so long ago — I had thought her beautiful. She had been quick-witted and quick-moving and very generous with all the children, and each of her visits had been an event. At one time one of my brothers and myself had thought of running away to live with her. Now she could no longer produce out of her handbag some unexpected and yet familiar delight. She made me feel pity and revulsion and fear. It was awful to realize that she no longer caused me to feel affection. The closer we came to the hospital the more querulous she became and at the same time, naturally, grew more dependent on me. Between pity and guilt and fear I began to feel that there was another me trapped in my skull like a jack-in-the-box who might escape my control at any moment and fill the air with screaming.

She began to cry the moment we entered the room and she saw him lying there, 30 all shriveled and still, like a little black monkey. The great, gleaming apparatus which fed him and would have compelled him to be still even if he had been able to move brought to mind, not beneficence, but torture; the tubes entering his arm made me think of pictures I had seen when a child, of Gulliver, tied down by the pygmies on that island. My aunt wept and wept; there was a whistling sound in my father's throat; nothing was said; he could not speak. I wanted to take his hand, to say something. But I do not know what I could have said, even if he could have heard me. He was not really in that room with us, he had at last really embarked on his journey; and though my aunt told me that he said he was going to meet Jesus, I did not hear anything except that whistling in his throat. The doctor came back and we left, into that unbearable train again, and home. In the morning came the telegram saying that he was dead. Then the house was suddenly full of relatives, friends, hysteria, and confusion and I quickly left my mother and the children to the care of those impressive women, who, in Negro communities at least, automatically appear at times of bereavement armed with lotions, proverbs, and patience, and an ability to cook. I went downtown. By the time I returned, later the same day, my mother had been carried to the hospital and the baby had been born.

III

For my father's funeral I had nothing black to wear and this posed a nagging problem all day long. It was one of those problems, simple, or impossible of solution, to which the mind insanely clings in order to avoid the mind's real trouble. I spent most of that day at the downtown apartment of a girl I knew, celebrating my birthday with whiskey and wondering what to wear that night. When planning a birthday celebration one naturally does not expect that it will be up against competition from a funeral and this girl had anticipated taking me out that night, for a big dinner and a night club afterwards. Sometime during the course of that long day we decided that we would go out anyway, when my father's funeral service was over. I imagine I decided it, since, as the funeral hour approached, it became clearer and clearer to me that I would not know what to do with myself when it was over. The girl, stifling her very lively concern as to the possible effects of the whiskey on one of my father's chief mourners, concentrated on being conciliatory and practically helpful. She found a black shirt for me somewhere and ironed it and, dressed in the darkest pants and jacket I owned, and slightly drunk, I made my way to my father's funeral.

The chapel was full, but not packed, and very quiet. There were, mainly, my father's relatives, and his children, and here and there I saw faces I had not seen since childhood, the faces of my father's one-time friends. They were very dark and solemn now, seeming somehow to suggest that they had known all along that something like this would happen. Chief among the mourners was my aunt, who had quarreled with my father all his life; by which I do not mean to suggest that her mourning was insincere or that she had not loved him. I suppose that she was one of the few people in the world who had, and their incessant quarreling proved precisely the strength of the tie that bound them. The only other person in the world, as far as I knew, whose relationship to my father rivaled my aunt's in depth was my mother, who was not there.

It seemed to me, of course, that it was a very long funeral. But it was, if anything, a rather shorter funeral than most, nor, since there were no overwhelming, uncontrollable expressions of grief, could it be called — if I dare to use the word — successful. The minister who preached my father's funeral sermon was one of the few my father had still been seeing as he neared his end. He presented to us in his sermon a man whom none of us had ever seen — a man thoughtful, patient, and forbearing, a Christian inspiration to all who knew him, and a model for his children. And no doubt the children, in their disturbed and guilty state, were almost ready to believe this; he had been remote enough to be anything and, anyway, the shock of the incontrovertible, that it was really our father lying up there in that casket, prepared the mind for anything. His sister moaned and this grief-stricken moaning was taken as corroboration. The other faces held a dark, non-committal thoughtfulness. This was not the man they had known, but they had scarcely expected to be confronted with him; this was, in a sense deeper than questions of fact, the man they had not known, and the man they had not known may have been the real one. The real man, whoever he had been, had suffered and now he was dead: this was all that was sure and all that mattered now. Every man in the chapel hoped that when his hour came he, too, would be eulogized, which is to say forgiven, and that all of his lapses, greeds, errors, and strayings from the truth would be invested with coherence and looked upon with charity. This was perhaps the last thing human beings could give each other and it was what they demanded, after all, of the Lord. Only the Lord saw the midnight tears, only He was present when one of His children, moaning and wringing hands, paced up and down the room. When one slapped one's child in anger the recoil in the heart reverberated through heaven and became part of the pain of the universe. And when the children were hungry and sullen and distrustful and one watched them, daily, growing wilder, and further away, and running headlong into danger, it was the Lord who knew what the charged heart endured as the strap was laid to the backside; the Lord alone who knew what one would have said if one had had, like the Lord, the gift of the living word. It was the Lord who knew of the impossibility every parent in that room faced: how to prepare the child for the day when the child would be despised and how to create in the child — by what means? — a stronger antidote to this poison than one had found for oneself. The avenues, side streets, bars, billiard halls, hospitals, police stations, and even the playgrounds of Harlem — not to mention the houses of correction, the jails, and the morgue — testified to the potency of the poison while remaining silent as to the efficacy of whatever antidote, irresistibly raising the question of whether or not such an antidote existed; raising, which was worse, the question of whether or not an antidote was desirable; perhaps poison should be fought with poison. With these several schisms in the mind and with more terrors in the heart than could be named, it was better not to judge the man who had gone down under an impossible burden. It was better to remember. Thou knowest this man's fall; but thou knowest not his wrassling.

While the preacher talked and I watched the children — years of changing their diapers, scrubbing them, slapping them, taking them to school, and scolding them had had the perhaps inevitable result of making me love them, though I am not sure I knew this then — my mind was busily breaking out with a rash of disconnected impressions. Snatches of popular songs, indecent jokes, bits of books I had read, movie sequences, faces, voices, political issues — I thought I was going mad; all these impressions suspended, as it were, in the solution of the faint nausea produced in me by the heat and liquor. For a moment I had the impression that my alcoholic breath, inefficiently disguised with chewing gum, filled the entire chapel. Then someone began singing one of my father's favorite songs and, abruptly, I was with him, sitting on his knee, in the hot, enormous, crowded church which was the first church we attended. It was the Abyssinia Baptist Church on 138th Street. We had not gone there long. With this image, a host of others came. I had forgotten, in the rage of my growing up, how proud my father had been of me when I was little. Apparently, I had had a voice and my father had liked to show me off before the members of the church. I had forgotten what he had looked like when he was pleased but now I remembered that he had always been grinning with pleasure when my solos ended. I even remembered certain expressions on his face when he teased my mother — had he loved her? I would never know. And when had it all begun to change? For now it seemed that he had not always been cruel. I remembered being taken for a haircut and scraping my knee on the footrest of the barber's chair and I remembered my father's face as he soothed my crying and applied the stinging iodine. Then I remembered our fights, fights which had been of the worst possible kind because my technique had been silence.

I remembered the one time in all our life together when we had really spoken to each other. 35

It was on a Sunday and it must have been shortly before I left home. We were walking, just the two of us, in our usual silence, to or from church. I was in high school and had been doing a lot of writing and I was, at about this time, the editor of the high school magazine. But I had also been a Young Minister and had been preaching from the pulpit. Lately, I had been taking fewer engagements and preached as rarely as possible. It was said in the church, quite truthfully, that I was "cooling off."

My father asked me abruptly, "You'd rather write than preach, wouldn't you?"

I was astonished at his question — because it was a real question. I answered, "Yes."

That was all we said. It was awful to remember that that was all we had ever said.

The casket now was opened and mourners were being led up the aisle to look for 40 the last time on the deceased. The assumption was that the family was too overcome with grief to be allowed to make this journey alone and I watched while my aunt was led to the casket and, muffled in black, and shaking, led back to her seat. I disapproved of forcing the children to look on their dead father, considering that the shock of his death, or, more truthfully, the shock of death as a reality, was already a little more than a child could bear, but my judgment in this matter had been overruled and there they were, bewildered and frightened and very small, being led, one by one, to the casket. But there is also something very gallant about children at such moments. It has something to do with their silence and gravity and with the fact that one cannot help them. Their legs, somehow, seem exposed, so that it is at once incredible and terribly clear that their legs are all they have to hold them up.

I had not wanted to go to the casket myself and I certainly had not wished to be led there, but there was no way of avoiding either of these forms. One of the deacons led me up and I looked on my father's face. I cannot say that it looked like him at all. His blackness had been equivocated by powder and there was no suggestion in that casket of what his power had or could have been. He was simply an old man dead, and it was hard to believe that he had ever given anyone either joy or pain. Yet, his life filled that room. Further up the avenue his wife was holding his newborn child. Life and death so close together, and love and hatred, and right and wrong, said something to me which I did not want to hear concerning man, concerning the life of man.

After the funeral, while I was downtown desperately celebrating my birthday, a Negro soldier, in the lobby of the Hotel Braddock, got into a fight with a white policeman over a Negro girl. Negro girls, white policemen, in or out of uniform, and Negro males — in or out of uniform — were part of the furniture of the lobby of the Hotel Braddock and this was certainly not the first time such an incident had occurred. It was destined, however, to receive an unprecedented publicity, for the fight between the policeman and the soldier ended with the shooting of the soldier. Rumor, flowing immediately to the streets outside, stated that the soldier had been shot in the back, an instantaneous and revealing invention, and that the soldier had died protecting a Negro woman. The facts were somewhat different — for example, the soldier had not been shot in the back, and was not dead, and the girl seems to have been as dubious a symbol of womanhood as her white counterpart in Georgia usually is, but no one was interested in the facts. They preferred the invention because this invention expressed and corroborated their hates and fears so perfectly. It is just as well to remember that people are always doing this. Perhaps many of those legends, including Christianity, to which the world clings began their conquest of the world with just some such concerted surrender to distortion. The effect, in Harlem, of this particular legend was like the effect of a lit match in a tin of gasoline. The mob gathered before the doors of the Hotel Braddock simply began to swell and to spread in every direction, and Harlem exploded.

The mob did not cross the ghetto lines. It would have been easy, for example, to have gone over Morningside Park on the west side or to have crossed the Grand Central railroad tracks at 125th Street on the east side, to wreak havoc in white neighborhoods. The mob seems to have been mainly interested in something more potent and real than the white face, that is, in white power, and the principal damage done during the riot of the summer of 1943 was to white business establishments in Harlem. It might have been a far bloodier story, of course, if, at the hour the riot began, these establishments had still been open. From the Hotel Braddock the mob fanned out, east and west along 125th Street, and for the entire length of Lenox, Seventh, and Eighth avenues. Along each of these avenues, and along each major side street — 116th, 125th, 135th, and so on — bars, stores, pawnshops, restaurants, even little luncheonettes had been smashed open and entered and looted — looted, it might be added, with more haste than efficiency. The shelves really looked as though a bomb had struck them. Cans of beans and soup and dog food, along with toilet paper, corn flakes, sardines and milk tumbled every which way, and abandoned cash registers and cases of beer leaned crazily out of the splintered windows and were strewn along the avenues. Sheets, blankets, and clothing of every description formed a kind of path, as though people had dropped them while running. I truly had not realized that Harlem had so many stores until I saw them all smashed open; the first time the word wealth ever entered my mind in relation to Harlem was when I saw it scattered in the streets. But one's first, incongruous impression of plenty was countered immediately by an impression of waste. None of this was doing anybody any good. It would have been better to have left the plate glass as it had been and the goods lying in the stores.

It would have been better, but it would also have been intolerable, for Harlem had needed something to smash. To smash something is the ghetto's chronic need. Most of the time it is the members of the ghetto who smash each other, and themselves. But as long as the ghetto walls are standing there will always come a moment when these outlets do not work. That summer, for example, it was not enough to get into a fight on Lenox Avenue, or curse out one's cronies in the barber shops. If ever, indeed, the violence which fills Harlem's churches, pool halls, and bars erupts outward in a more direct fashion, Harlem and its citizens are likely to vanish in an apocalyptic flood. That this is not likely to happen is due to a great many reasons, most hidden and powerful among them the Negro's real relation to the white American. This relation prohibits, simply, anything as uncomplicated and satisfactory as pure hatred. In order really to hate white people, one has to blot so much out of the mind — and the heart — that this hatred itself becomes an exhausting and self-destructive pose. But this does not mean, on the other hand, that love comes easily: the white world is too powerful, too complacent, too ready with gratuitous humiliation, and, above all, too ignorant and too innocent for that. One is absolutely forced to make perpetual qualifications and one's own reactions are always canceling each other out. It is this, really, which has driven so many people mad, both white and black. One is always in the position of having to decide between amputation and gangrene. Amputation is swift but time may prove that the amputation was not necessary—or one may delay the amputation too long. Gangrene is slow, but it is impossible to be sure that one is reading one's symptoms right. The idea of going through life as a cripple is more than one can bear, and equally unbearable is the risk of swelling up slowly, in agony, with poison. And the trouble, finally, is that the risks are real even if the choices do not exist.

"But as for me and my house," my father had said, "we will serve the Lord." I 45 wondered, as we drove him to his resting place, what this line had meant for him. I had heard him preach it many times. I had preached it once myself, proudly giving it an interpretation different from my father's. Now the whole thing came back to me, as though my father and I were on our way to Sunday school and I were memorizing the golden text: And if it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom you will serve; whether the gods which your fathers served that were on the other side of the flood, or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell: but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord. I suspected in these familiar lines a meaning which had never been there for me before. All of my father's texts and songs, which I had decided were meaningless, were arranged before me at his death like empty bottles, waiting to hold the meaning which life would give them for me. This was his legacy: nothing is ever escaped. That bleakly memorable morning I hated the unbelievable streets and the Negroes and whites who had, equally, made them that way. But I knew that it was folly, as my father would have said, this bitterness was folly. It was necessary to hold on to the things that mattered. The dead man mattered, the new life mattered; blackness and whiteness did not matter; to believe that they did was to acquiesce in one's own destruction. Hatred, which could destroy so much, never failed to destroy the man who hated and this was an immutable law.

It began to seem that one would have to hold in the mind forever two ideas which seemed to be in opposition. The first idea was acceptance, the acceptance, totally without rancor, of life as it is, and men as they are: in the light of this idea, it goes without saying that injustice is a commonplace. But this did not mean that one could be complacent, for the second idea was of equal power: that one must never, in one's own life, accept these injustices as commonplace but must fight them with all one's strength. This fight begins, however, in the heart and it now had been laid to my charge to keep my own heart free of hatred and despair. This intimation made my heart heavy and, now that my father was irrecoverable, I wished that he had been beside me so that I could have searched his face for the answers which only the future would give me now.

(1955)

Exploring the Text

1. What is James Baldwin's primary purpose in "Notes of a Native Son"? Do you think there is a secondary purpose?
2. What is Baldwin's attitude toward his father? Does it change over the course of the essay? If so, how?

3. Identify at least three stories Baldwin tells about himself. What does each demonstrate? How do they connect?
4. Baldwin alternates among concrete descriptions of people and places, reflections, and strong argumentative assertions. How does each type of writing help him achieve his purpose in this essay?
5. Find several examples of parallel diction, parallel syntax, and parallel structure on a larger level (such as in paragraphs). What effect does Baldwin achieve by using these techniques?
6. How does Baldwin make the parallel stories about his father's life and death and about racism in the United States intersect? Find specific passages to support your answer.
7. How do you interpret the title? You might do some research into the relationship between Baldwin and Richard Wright, who wrote the novel Native Son, published in 1940. Is Baldwin suggesting a dialogue with Wright? Is he "writing back" to an established author?

Will Counts

Will Counts (1931–2001) was a photographer and journalism professor at Indiana University. He is most famous for his photographic coverage of the 1957 desegregation battle surrounding Little Rock Central High School, for which he was nominated for the Pulitzer Prize.

Little Rock's Central High School

Little Rock High School (Central High School National Historic Site) is a national symbol of the struggle over desegregation in the twentieth century. In 1957, three years after the U.S. Supreme Court decision Brown v. Board of Education, which ruled that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal," nine African American students — known as the Little Rock Nine — enrolled at Little Rock High School in Arkansas. During the first week of school, Governor Orval Faubus resisted President Dwight D. Eisenhower's order to use the National Guard to protect the African American students, dismissing the troops and exposing the students to the mobs of angry white dissenters. However, when Governor Faubus refused to restore order to the school, President Eisenhower sent paratroopers to Little Rock and took federal control of the Arkansas National Guard. Under their protection, the "Little Rock Nine" finished out the school year.

This photo, named by the Associated Press one of the top hundred photos of the twentieth century, shows Elizabeth Eckford, a fifteen-year-old black student, outside Little Rock's Central High School on the first day it was desegregated.

Will Counts Collection: Indiana University Archives

Exploring the Text

1. What can you read on the faces in the crowd that surrounds Elizabeth Eckford?
2. Pictured just to the left of Eckford is a jeering Hazel Bryan Massery, who became a symbol of racism. She later apologized to Eckford and spoke out against racism. Why do you think she became such a potent symbol?
3. What juxtapositions do you see in the photo? How do they raise the emotional temperature?
4. Consider the layout of the photo. How do the direction of the crowd and the placement of Eckford comment on the event?

Joan Didion

Joan Didion (b. 1934) is an American novelist and nonfiction writer from Sacramento, California, known for her social commentary and literary journalism. She graduated from the University of California–Berkeley in 1956, after which she moved to New York for a job at Vogue magazine. She published her first novel, Run River, in 1963, and then returned to California, where she continued to publish novels and write nonfiction essays for well-known publications such as Life, Esquire, Saturday Evening Post, the New York Times, and the New York Review of Books. Her memoir, A Year of Magical Thinking, won the National Book Award in 2005.

On Self-Respect

"On Self-Respect" was first published in Vogue in 1961. It then appeared in Didion's first collection of essays, Slouching toward Bethlehem, in 1968.

Once, in a dry season, I wrote in large letters across two pages of a notebook that innocence ends when one is stripped of the delusion that one likes oneself. Although now, some years later, I marvel that a mind on the outs with itself should have nonetheless made painstaking record of its every tremor, I recall with embarrassing clarity the flavor of those particular ashes. It was a matter of misplaced self-respect.

I had not been elected to Phi Beta Kappa. This failure could scarcely have been more predictable or less ambiguous (I simply did not have the grades), but I was unnerved by it; I had somehow thought myself a kind of academic Raskolnikov, curiously exempt from the cause-effect relationships which hampered others. Although even the humorless nineteen-year-old that I was must have recognized that the situation lacked real tragic stature, the day that I did not make Phi Beta Kappa nonetheless marked the end of something, and innocence may well be the word for it. I lost the conviction that lights would always turn green for me, the pleasant certainty that those rather passive virtues which had won me approval as a child automatically guaranteed me not only Phi Beta Kappa keys but happiness, honor, and the love of a good man; lost a certain touching faith in the totem power of good manners, clean hair, and proven competence on the Stanford-Binet scale. To such doubtful amulets had my self-respect been pinned, and I faced myself that day with the nonplused apprehension of someone who has come across a vampire and has no crucifix at hand.

Although to be driven back upon oneself is an uneasy affair at best, rather like trying to cross a border with borrowed credentials, it seems to me now the one condition necessary to the beginnings of real self-respect. Most of our platitudes notwithstanding, self-deception remains the most difficult deception. The tricks that work on others count for nothing in that very well-lit back alley where one keeps assignations with oneself: no winning smiles will do here, no prettily drawn lists of good intentions. One shuffles flashily but in vain through one's marked cards — the kindness done for the wrong reason, the apparent triumph which involved no real effort, the seemingly heroic act into which one had been shamed. The dismal fact is that self-respect has nothing to do with the approval of others — who are, after all, deceived easily enough; has nothing to do with reputation, which, as Rhett Butler told Scarlett O'Hara, is something people with courage can do without.

To do without self-respect, on the other hand, is to be an unwilling audience of one to an interminable documentary that details one's failings, both real and imagined, with fresh footage spliced in for every screening. There's the glass you broke in anger, there's the hurt on X's face; watch now, this next scene, the night Y came back from Houston, see how you muff this one. To live without self-respect is to lie awake some night, beyond the reach of warm milk, phenobarbital, and the sleeping hand on the coverlet, counting up the sins of commission and omission, the trusts betrayed, the promises subtly broken, the gifts irrevocably wasted through sloth or cowardice or carelessness. However long we postpone it, we eventually lie down alone in that notoriously uncomfortable bed, the one we make ourselves. Whether or not we sleep in it depends, of course, on whether or not we respect ourselves.

To protest that some fairly improbable people, some people who could not possibly respect themselves, seem to sleep easily enough is to miss the point entirely, as surely as those people miss it who think that self-respect has necessarily to do with not having safety pins in one's underwear. There is a common superstition that "self-respect" is a kind of charm against snakes, something that keeps those who have it locked in some unblighted Eden, out of strange beds, ambivalent conversations, and trouble in general. It does not at all. It has nothing to do with the face of things, but concerns instead a separate peace, a private reconciliation. Although the careless, suicidal Julian English in Appointment in Samarra and the careless, incurably dishonest Jordan Baker in The Great Gatsby seem equally improbable candidates for self-respect, Jordan Baker had it, Julian English did not. With that genius for accommodation more often seen in women than in men, Jordan took her own measure, made her own peace, avoided threats to that peace: "I hate careless people," she told Nick Carraway. "It takes two to make an accident."

Like Jordan Baker, people with self-respect have the courage of their mistakes. They know the price of things. If they choose to commit adultery, they do not then go running, in an access of bad conscience, to receive absolution from the wronged parties; nor do they complain unduly of the unfairness, the undeserved embarrassment, of being named co-respondent. In brief, people with self-respect exhibit a certain toughness, a kind of moral nerve; they display what was once called character, a quality which, although approved in the abstract, sometimes loses ground to other, more instantly negotiable virtues. The measure of its slipping prestige is that one tends to think of it only in connection with homely children and United States senators who have been defeated, preferably in the primary, for reelection. Nonetheless, character — the willingness to accept responsibility for one's own life — is the source from which self-respect springs.

Self-respect is something that our grandparents, whether or not they had it, knew all about. They had instilled in them, young, a certain discipline, the sense that one lives by doing things one does not particularly want to do, by putting fears and doubts to one side, by weighing immediate comforts against the possibility of larger, even intangible, comforts. It seemed to the nineteenth century admirable, but not remarkable, that Chinese Gordon[1] put on a clean white suit and held Khartoum against the Mahdi;[2] it did not seem unjust that the way to free land in California involved death and difficulty and dirt. In a diary kept during the winter of 1846, an emigrating twelve-year-old named Narcissa Cornwall noted coolly: "Father was busy reading and did not notice that the house was being filled with strange Indians until Mother spoke about it." Even lacking any clue as to what Mother said, one can scarcely fail to be impressed by the entire incident: the father reading, the Indians filing in, the mother choosing the words that would not alarm, the child duly recording the event and noting further that those particular Indians were not, "fortunately for us," hostile. Indians were simply part of the donnée.[3]

[1]British Major-General Charles George Gordon (1833–1885) is famous for quelling a revolt in China, and attempting to put down another in Sudan led by a charismatic Muslim religious leader. — Eds.

[2]Sudanese rebel Muhammad Ahmad (1845–1885) claimed to be the Mahdi, an Islamic messianic figure who would usher in a golden age of peace just before the end of the world. — Eds.

In one guise or another, Indians always are. Again, it is a question of recognizing that anything worth having has its price. People who respect themselves are willing to accept the risk that the Indians will be hostile, that the venture will go bankrupt, that the liaison may not turn out to be one in which every day is a holiday because you're married to me. They are willing to invest something of themselves; they may not play at all, but when they do play, they know the odds.

That kind of self-respect is a discipline, a habit of mind that can never be faked but can be developed, trained, coaxed forth. It was once suggested to me that, as an antidote to crying, I put my head in a paper bag. As it happens, there is a sound physiological reason, something to do with oxygen, for doing exactly that, but the psychological effect alone is incalculable: it is difficult in the extreme to continue fancying oneself Cathy in Wuthering Heights with one's head in a Food Fair bag. There is a similar case for all the small disciplines, unimportant in themselves; imagine maintaining any kind of swoon, commiserative or carnal, in a cold shower.

But those small disciplines are valuable only insofar as they represent larger ones. 10
To say that Waterloo was won on the playing fields of Eton is not to say that Napoleon might have been saved by a crash program in cricket; to give formal dinners in the rain forest would be pointless did not the candlelight flickering on the liana call forth deeper, stronger disciplines, values instilled long before. It is a kind of ritual, helping us to remember who and what we are. In order to remember it, one must have known it.

To have that sense of one's intrinsic worth which constitutes self-respect is potentially to have everything: the ability to discriminate, to love and to remain indifferent. To lack it is to be locked within oneself, paradoxically incapable of either love or indifference. If we do not respect ourselves, we are on the one hand forced to despise those who have so few resources as to consort with us, so little perception as to remain blind to our fatal weaknesses. On the other, we are peculiarly in thrall to everyone we see, curiously determined to live out — since our self-image is untenable — their false notions of us. We flatter ourselves by thinking this compulsion to please others an attractive trait: a gist for imaginative empathy, evidence of our willingness to give. Of course I will play Francesca to your Paolo,[4] Helen Keller to anyone's Annie Sullivan:

---

[3]The given. — Eds.

[4]Thirteenth-century Italian nobility, Paolo Malatesta and Francesca da Rimini are characters in Dante's Inferno, condemned to the second circle of hell for lustful behavior. Francesca was married to Giovanni Malatesta, but had a long affair with her husband's brother, Paolo. Giovanni ultimately found out about the affair and murdered them both. — Eds.

no expectation is too misplaced, no role too ludicrous. At the mercy of those we cannot but hold in contempt, we play roles doomed to failure before they are begun, each defeat generating fresh despair at the urgency of divining and meeting the next demand made upon us.

It is the phenomenon sometimes called "alienation from self." In its advanced stages, we no longer answer the telephone, because someone might want something; that we could say no without drowning in self-reproach is an idea alien to this game. Every encounter demands too much, tears the nerves, drains the will, and the specter of something as small as an unanswered letter arouses such disproportionate guilt that answering it becomes out of the question. To assign unanswered letters their proper weight, to free us from the expectations of others, to give us back to ourselves — there lies the great, the singular power of self-respect. Without it, one eventually discovers the final turn of the screw: one runs away to find oneself, and finds no one at home.

(1961)

Exploring the Text

1. How would you describe the mood and tone of "On Self-Respect"? How, for example, do phrases such as "in a dry season" or "flavor of those particular ashes" (par. 1) set the essay's mood and tone?
2. Joan Didion holds off for several paragraphs before she states her thesis. Find it and explain why you think she waited. Would you have placed it earlier? Why or why not?
3. Explain what Didion means in paragraph 3 when she says that "to be driven back upon oneself is . . . rather like trying to cross a border with borrowed credentials." How does the simile help explain what it means to be driven back upon oneself?
4. Paragraph 8 begins, "In one guise or another, Indians always are." Always are what?
5. What do the topic sentences of most of Didion's paragraphs have in common? What is the effect of that characteristic?
6. Who do you think is the audience for "On Self-Respect"? How do you know? Refer to the text to explain your answer.
7. In an Atlantic article, writer Caitlin Flanagan states, "to really love Joan Didion — to have been blown over by things like the smell of jasmine and the packing list she kept by her suitcase — you have to be female." In addition, according to blogger Michelle Dean (The Awl, May 22, 2012), Didion once told her friend journalist Sara Davidson that she had thrown together "On Self-Respect" in two days to fill the space intended for another writer on the subject. Dean continues, "And there you have it: even then Didion was a writer who could produce something in 48 hours that your sophomore-year roommate wouldn't quit quoting for years." How does "On Self-Respect" hint at qualities that would engender the fierce loyalty that many (mostly women) feel for Didion and her work?

Martin Luther King Jr.

Martin Luther King Jr. (1929–1968) was one of the most influential leaders of the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. Dr. King was born in Atlanta, Georgia, and grew up in the Ebenezer Baptist Church, where his father and grandfather were ministers. He earned a BA at Morehouse College, a divinity degree at Crozer Theological Seminary, and a PhD in theology at Boston University, all by the age of twenty-six. In 1957, he founded the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and later led numerous protests against segregation by practicing the Gandhian doctrine of nonviolent resistance.

Letter from Birmingham Jail

In 1963, while King was in Birmingham, Alabama, eight clergymen published a letter in the Post-Herald criticizing his presence in their city and his strategies. From the cell where he was jailed for demonstrating, King responded by writing what has come to be known as "Letter from Birmingham Jail."

My Dear Fellow Clergymen:

While confined here in the Birmingham city jail, I came across your recent statement calling my present activities "unwise and untimely." Seldom do I pause to answer criticism of my work and ideas. If I sought to answer all the criticisms that cross my desk, my secretaries would have little time for anything other than such correspondence in the course of the day, and I would have no time for constructive work. But since I feel that you are men of genuine good will and that your criticisms are sincerely set forth, I want to try to answer your statement in what I hope will be patient and reasonable terms.

I think I should indicate why I am here in Birmingham, since you have been influenced by the view which argues against "outsiders coming in." I have the honor of serving as president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, an organization operating in every southern state, with headquarters in Atlanta, Georgia. We have some eighty-five affiliated organizations across the South, and one of them is the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights. Frequently we share staff, educational, and financial resources with our affiliates. Several months ago the affiliate here in Birmingham asked us to be on call to engage in a nonviolent direct-action program if such were deemed necessary. We readily consented, and when the hour came we lived up to our promise. So I, along with several members of my staff, am here because I was invited here. I am here because I have organizational ties here.

But more basically, I am in Birmingham because injustice is here. Just as the prophets of the eighth century B.C. left their villages and carried their "thus saith the Lord" far beyond the boundaries of their home towns, and just as the Apostle

Paul left his village of Tarsus and carried the gospel of Jesus Christ to the far corners of the Greco-Roman world, so am I compelled to carry the gospel of freedom beyond my own home town. Like Paul, I must constantly respond to the Macedonian call for aid.

Moreover, I am cognizant of the interrelatedness of all communities and states. I cannot sit idly by in Atlanta and not be concerned about what happens in Birmingham. Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere. We are caught in an inescapable network of mutuality, tied in a single garment of destiny. Whatever affects one directly, affects all indirectly. Never again can we afford to live with the narrow, provincial "outside agitator" idea. Anyone who lives inside the United States can never be considered an outsider anywhere within its bounds.

You deplore the demonstrations taking place in Birmingham. But your statement, 5
I am sorry to say, fails to express a similar concern for the conditions that brought about the demonstrations. I am sure that none of you would want to rest content with the superficial kind of social analysis that deals merely with effects and does not grapple with underlying causes. It is unfortunate that demonstrations are taking place in Birmingham, but it is even more unfortunate that the city's white power structure left the Negro community with no alternative.

In any nonviolent campaign there are four basic steps: collection of the facts to determine whether injustices exist; negotiation; self-purification; and direct action. We have gone through all these steps in Birmingham. There can be no gainsaying the fact that racial injustice engulfs this community. Birmingham is probably the most thoroughly segregated city in the United States. Its ugly record of brutality is widely known. Negroes have experienced grossly unjust treatment in the courts. There have been more unsolved bombings of Negro homes and churches in Birmingham than in any other city in the nation. These are the hard, brutal facts of the case. On the basis of these conditions, Negro leaders sought to negotiate with the city fathers. But the latter consistently refused to engage in good-faith negotiation.

Then, last September, came the opportunity to talk with leaders of Birmingham's economic community. In the course of the negotiations, certain promises were made by the merchants — for example, to remove the stores' humiliating racial signs. On the basis of these promises, the Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth and the leaders of the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights agreed to a moratorium on all demonstrations. As the weeks and months went by, we realized that we were the victims of a broken promise. A few signs, briefly removed, returned; the others remained.

As in so many past experiences, our hopes had been blasted, and the shadow of deep disappointment settled upon us. We had no alternative except to prepare for direct action, whereby we would present our very bodies as a means of laying our case before the conscience of the local and the national community. Mindful of the difficulties involved, we decided to undertake a process of self-purification. We began a series of workshops on nonviolence, and we repeatedly asked ourselves: "Are you able to accept blows without retaliating?" "Are you able to endure the ordeal of jail?" We decided to schedule our direct-action program for the Easter season, realizing that except for Christmas, this is the main shopping period of the year. Knowing that a strong economic withdrawal program would be the by-product of direct action, we felt that this would be the best time to bring pressure to bear on the merchants for the needed change.

Then it occurred to us that Birmingham's mayoral election was coming up in March, and we speedily decided to postpone action until after election day. When we discovered that the Commissioner of Public Safety, Eugene "Bull" Connor, had piled up enough votes to be in the runoff, we decided again to postpone action until the day after the runoff so that the demonstrations could not be used to cloud the issues. Like many others, we wanted to see Mr. Connor defeated, and to this end we endured postponement after postponement. Having aided in this community need, we felt that our direct-action program could be delayed no longer.

You may well ask, "Why direct action? Why sit-ins, marches, and so forth? Isn't negotiation a better path?" You are quite right in calling for negotiation. Indeed, this is the very purpose of direct action. Nonviolent direct action seeks to create such a crisis and foster such a tension that a community which has constantly refused to negotiate is forced to confront the issue. It seeks so to dramatize the issue that it can no longer be ignored. My citing the creation of tension as part of the work of the nonviolent-resister may sound rather shocking. But I must confess that I am not afraid of the word "tension." I have earnestly opposed violent tension, but there is a type of constructive, nonviolent tension which is necessary for growth. Just as Socrates felt that it was necessary to create a tension in the mind so that individuals could rise from the bondage of myths and half-truths to the unfettered realm of creative analysis and objective appraisal, so must we see the need for nonviolent gadflies to create the kind of tension in society that will help men rise from the dark depths of prejudice and racism to the majestic heights of understanding and brotherhood. 10

The purpose of our direct-action program is to create a situation so crisis-packed that it will inevitably open the door to negotiation. I therefore concur with you in your call for negotiation. Too long has our beloved Southland been bogged down in a tragic effort to live in monologue rather than dialogue.

One of the basic points in your statement is that the action that I and my associates have taken in Birmingham is untimely. Some have asked: "Why didn't you give the new city administration time to act?" The only answer that I can give to this query is that the new Birmingham administration must be prodded about as much as the outgoing one, before it will act. We are sadly mistaken if we feel that the election of Albert Boutwell as mayor will bring the millennium to Birmingham. While Mr. Boutwell is a much more gentle person than Mr. Connor, they are both segregationists, dedicated to maintenance of the status quo. I have hoped that Mr. Boutwell will be reasonable enough to see the futility of massive resistance to desegregation. But he will not see this without pressure from devotees of civil rights. My friends, I must say to you that we have not made a single gain in civil rights without determined legal and nonviolent pressure. Lamentably, it is an historical fact that privileged groups seldom give up their privileges voluntarily. Individuals may see the moral light and voluntarily give up their unjust posture, but, as Reinhold Niebuhr[1] has reminded us, groups tend to be more immoral than individuals.

We know through painful experience that freedom is never voluntarily given by the oppressor; it must be demanded by the oppressed. Frankly, I have yet to engage in a direct-action campaign that was "well timed" in the view of those who have not suffered unduly from the disease of segregation. For years now I have heard the word "Wait!" It rings in the ear of every Negro with piercing familiarity. This "Wait" has almost always meant "Never." We must come to see, with one of our distinguished jurists, that "justice too long delayed is justice denied."

We have waited for more than 340 years for our constitutional and God-given rights. The nations of Asia and Africa are moving with jet-like speed toward gaining political independence, but we still creep at horse-and-buggy pace toward gaining a cup of coffee at a lunch counter. Perhaps it is easy for those who have never felt the stinging darts of segregation to say, "Wait." But when you have seen vicious mobs lynch your mothers and fathers at will and drown your sisters and brothers at whim; when you have seen hate-filled policemen curse, kick, and even kill your black brothers and sisters; when you see the vast majority of your twenty million Negro brothers smothering in an airtight cage of poverty in the midst of an affluent society; when you suddenly find your tongue twisted and your speech stammering as you seek to explain to your six-year-old daughter why she can't go to the public amusement park that has just been advertised on television, and see tears welling up in her eyes when she is told that Funtown is closed to colored children, and see ominous clouds of inferiority beginning to form in her little mental sky, and see her beginning to distort her personality by developing an unconscious bitterness toward white people; when you have to concoct an answer for a five-year-old son who is asking, "Daddy, why do white people treat colored people so mean?"; when you take a cross-country drive and find it necessary to sleep night after night in the uncomfortable corners of your automobile because no motel will accept you; when you are humiliated day in and day out by nagging signs reading "white" and "colored"; when your first name becomes "nigger," your middle name becomes "boy" (however old you are) and your last name becomes "John," and your wife and mother are never given the respected title "Mrs."; when you are harried by day and haunted by night by the fact that you are a Negro, living constantly at tiptoe stance, never quite knowing what to expect next, and are plagued with inner fears and outer resentments; when you are forever fighting a degenerating sense of "nobodiness"—then you will understand why we find it difficult to wait. There comes a time when the cup of endurance runs over, and men are no longer willing to be plunged into the abyss of despair. I hope, sirs, you can understand our legitimate and unavoidable impatience.

You express a great deal of anxiety over our willingness to break laws. This is 15 certainly a legitimate concern. Since we so diligently urge people to obey the Supreme Court's decision of 1954 outlawing segregation in the public schools, at first glance it may seem rather paradoxical for us consciously to break laws. One may well ask: "How can you advocate breaking some laws and obeying others?" The answer lies in the fact that there are two types of laws: just and unjust. I would be the first to advocate obeying just laws. One has not only a legal but a moral responsibility to obey just laws. Conversely, one has a moral responsibility to disobey unjust laws. I would agree with St. Augustine that "an unjust law is no law at all."

[1]Niebuhr (1892–1971) was a U.S. clergyman and a Protestant theologian. — Eds.

Now, what is the difference between the two? How does one determine whether a law is just or unjust? A just law is a man-made code that squares with the moral law or the law of God. An unjust law is a code that is out of harmony with the moral law. To put it in the terms of St. Thomas Aquinas: An unjust law is a human law that is not rooted in eternal law and natural law. Any law that uplifts human personality is just. Any law that degrades human personality is unjust. All segregation statutes are unjust because segregation distorts the soul and damages the personality. It gives the segregator a false sense of superiority and the segregated a false sense of inferiority. Segregation, to use the terminology of the Jewish philosopher Martin Buber, substitutes an "I-it" relationship for an "I-thou" relationship and ends up relegating persons to the status of things. Hence segregation is not only politically, economically, and sociologically unsound, it is morally wrong and sinful. Paul Tillich[2] has said that sin is separation. Is not segregation an existential expression of man's tragic separation, his awful estrangement, his terrible sinfulness? Thus it is that I can urge men to obey the 1954 decision of the Supreme Court, for it is morally right; and I can urge them to disobey segregation ordinances, for they are morally wrong.

Let us consider a more concrete example of just and unjust laws. An unjust law is a code that a numerical or power majority group compels a minority group to obey but does not make binding on itself. This is difference made legal. By the same token, a just law is a code that a majority compels a minority to follow and that it is willing to follow itself. This is sameness made legal.

Let me give another explanation. A law is unjust if it is inflicted on a minority that, as a result of being denied the right to vote, had no part in enacting or devising the law. Who can say that the legislature of Alabama which set up that state's segregation laws was democratically elected? Throughout Alabama all sorts of devious methods are used to prevent Negroes from becoming registered voters, and there are some counties in which, even though Negroes constitute a majority of the population, not a single Negro is registered. Can any law enacted under such circumstances be considered democratically structured?

Sometimes a law is just on its face and unjust in its application. For instance, I have been arrested on a charge of parading without a permit. Now, there is nothing wrong in having an ordinance which requires a permit for a parade. But such an ordinance becomes unjust when it is used to maintain segregation and to deny citizens the First-Amendment privilege of peaceful assembly and protest.

I hope you are able to see the distinction I am trying to point out. In no sense do I advocate evading or defying the law, as would the rabid segregationist. That would 20 lead to anarchy. One who breaks an unjust law must do so openly, lovingly, and with a willingness to accept the penalty. I submit that an individual who breaks a law that conscience tells him is unjust, and who willingly accepts the penalty of imprisonment in order to arouse the conscience of the community over its injustice, is in reality expressing the highest respect for law.

[2]Tillich (1886–1965), a German American philosopher and a Christian theologian. — Eds.

Of course, there is nothing new about this kind of civil disobedience. It was evidenced sublimely in the refusal of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego to obey the laws of Nebuchadnezzar, on the ground that a higher moral law was at stake. It was practiced superbly by the early Christians, who were willing to face hungry lions and the excruciating pain of chopping blocks rather than submit to certain unjust laws of the Roman Empire. To a degree, academic freedom is a reality today because Socrates practiced civil disobedience. In our own nation, the Boston Tea Party represented a massive act of civil disobedience.

We should never forget that everything Adolf Hitler did in Germany was "legal" and everything the Hungarian freedom fighters did in Hungary was "illegal." It was "illegal" to aid and comfort a Jew in Hitler's Germany. Even so, I am sure that, had I lived in Germany at the time, I would have aided and comforted my Jewish brothers. If today I lived in a Communist country where certain principles dear to the Christian faith are suppressed, I would openly advocate disobeying that country's antireligious laws.

I must make two honest confessions to you, my Christian and Jewish brothers. First, I must confess that over the past few years I have been gravely disappointed with the white moderate. I have almost reached the regrettable conclusion that the Negro's great stumbling block in his stride toward freedom is not the White Citizen's Counciler or the Ku Klux Klanner, but the white moderate, who is more devoted to "order" than to justice; who prefers a negative peace which is the absence of tension to a positive peace which is the presence of justice; who constantly says, "I agree with you in the goal you seek, but I cannot agree with your methods of direct action"; who paternalistically believes he can set the timetable for another man's freedom; who lives by a mythical concept of time and who constantly advises the Negro to wait for a "more convenient season." Shallow understanding from people of good will is more frustrating than absolute misunderstanding from people of ill will. Lukewarm acceptance is much more bewildering than outright rejection.

I had hoped that the white moderate would understand that law and order exist for the purpose of establishing justice and that when they fail in this purpose they become the dangerously structured dams that block the flow of social progress. I had hoped that the white moderate would understand that the present tension in the South is a necessary phase of the transition from an obnoxious negative peace, in which the Negro passively accepted his unjust plight, to a substantive and positive peace, in which all men will respect the dignity and worth of human personality. Actually, we who engage in nonviolent direct action are not the creators of tension. We merely bring to the surface the hidden tension that is already alive. We bring it out in the open, where it can be seen and dealt with. Like a boil that can never be cured so long as it is covered up but must be opened with all its ugliness to the natural medicines of air and light, injustice must be exposed, with all the tension its exposure creates, to the light of human conscience and the air of national opinion, before it can be cured.

In your statement you assert that our actions, even though peaceful, must be 25 condemned because they precipitate violence. But is this a logical assertion? Isn't this like condemning a robbed man because his possession of money precipitated the evil act of robbery? Isn't this like condemning Socrates because his unswerving commitment to truth and his philosophical inquiries precipitated the act by the misguided populace in which they made him drink hemlock? Isn't this like condemning Jesus because his unique God-consciousness and never-ceasing devotion to God's will precipitated the evil act of crucifixion? We must come to see that, as the federal courts have consistently affirmed, it is wrong to urge an individual to cease his efforts to gain his basic constitutional rights because the quest may precipitate violence. Society must protect the robbed and punish the robber.

I had also hoped that the white moderate would reject the myth concerning time in relation to the struggle for freedom. I have just received a letter from a white brother in Texas. He writes: "All Christians know that the colored people will receive equal rights eventually, but it is possible that you are in too great a religious hurry. It has taken Christianity almost two thousand years to accomplish what it has. The teachings of Christ take time to come to earth." Such an attitude stems from a tragic misconception of time, from the strangely irrational notion that there is something in the very flow of time that will inevitably cure all ills. Actually, time itself is neutral; it can be used either destructively or constructively. More and more I feel that the people of ill will have used time much more effectively than have the people of good will. We will have to repent in this generation not merely for the hateful words and actions of the bad people, but for the appalling silence of the good people. Human progress never rolls in on wheels of inevitability; it comes through the tireless efforts of men willing to be co-workers with God, and without this hard work, time itself becomes an ally of the forces of social stagnation. We must use time creatively, in the knowledge that the time is always ripe to do right. Now is the time to make real the promise of democracy and transform our pending national elegy into a creative psalm of brotherhood. Now is the time to lift our national policy from the quicksand of racial injustice to the solid rock of human dignity.

You speak of our activity in Birmingham as extreme. At first I was rather disappointed that fellow clergymen would see my nonviolent efforts as those of an extremist. I began thinking about the fact that I stand in the middle of two opposing forces in the Negro community. One is a force of complacency, made up in part of Negroes who, as a result of long years of oppression, are so drained of self-respect and a sense of "somebodiness" that they have adjusted to segregation; and in part of a few middle-class Negroes who, because of a degree of academic and economic security and because in some ways they profit by segregation, have become insensitive to the problems of the masses. The other force is one of bitterness and hatred, and it comes perilously close to advocating violence. It is expressed in the various black nationalist groups that are springing up across the nation, the largest and best-known being Elijah Muhammad's Muslim movement. Nourished by the Negro's frustration over the continued existence of racial discrimination, this movement is made up of people who have lost faith in America, who have absolutely repudiated Christianity, and who have concluded that the white man is an incorrigible "devil."

I have tried to stand between these two forces, saying that we need emulate neither the "do-nothingism" of the complacent nor the hatred and despair of the black nationalist. For there is the more excellent way of love and nonviolent protest. I am grateful to God that, through the influence of the Negro church, the way of nonviolence became an integral part of our struggle.

If this philosophy had not emerged, by now many streets of the South would, I am convinced, be flowing with blood. And I am further convinced that if our white brothers dismiss as "rabble-rousers" and "outside agitators" those of us who employ nonviolent direct action, and if they refuse to support our nonviolent efforts, millions of Negroes will, out of frustration and despair, seek solace and security in black-nationalist ideologies — a development that would inevitably lead to a frightening racial nightmare.

Oppressed people cannot remain oppressed forever. The yearning for freedom 30 eventually manifests itself, and that is what has happened to the American Negro. Something within has reminded him of his birthright of freedom, and something without has reminded him that it can be gained. Consciously or unconsciously, he has been caught up by the Zeitgeist,[3] and with his black brothers of Africa and his brown and yellow brothers of Asia, South America, and the Caribbean, the United States Negro is moving with a sense of great urgency toward the promised land of racial justice. If one recognizes this vital urge that has engulfed the Negro community, one should readily understand why public demonstrations are taking place. The Negro has many pent-up resentments and latent frustrations, and he must release them. So let him march; let him make prayer pilgrimages to the city hall; let him go on freedom rides — and try to understand why he must do so. If his repressed emotions are not released in nonviolent ways, they will seek expression through violence; this is not a threat but a fact of history. So I have not said to my people, "Get rid of your discontent." Rather, I have tried to say that this normal and healthy discontent can be channeled into the creative outlet of nonviolent direct action. And now this approach is being termed extremist.

But though I was initially disappointed at being categorized as an extremist, as I continued to think about the matter I gradually gained a measure of satisfaction from the label. Was not Jesus an extremist for love: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you." Was not Amos an extremist for justice: "Let justice roll down like waters and righteousness like an ever-flowing stream." Was not Paul an extremist for the Christian gospel: "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." Was not Martin Luther an extremist: "Here I stand; I cannot do otherwise, so help me God." And John Bunyan: "I will stay in jail to the end of my days before I make a butchery of my conscience." And Abraham Lincoln: "This nation cannot survive half slave and half free." And Thomas Jefferson: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal. . . ." So the question is not whether we will be extremists, but what kind of extremists we will be. Will we be extremists for hate or for love? Will we be extremists for the preservation of injustice or for the extension of justice? In that dramatic scene on Calvary's hill three men were crucified. We must never forget that all three were crucified for the same crime — the crime of extremism. Two were extremists for immorality, and thus fell below their environment. The other, Jesus Christ, was an extremist for love, truth, and goodness, and thereby rose above his environment. Perhaps the South, the nation, and the world are in dire need of creative extremists.

[3]German. "Spirit of the time." — Eds.

I had hoped that the white moderate would see this need. Perhaps I was too optimistic; perhaps I expected too much. I suppose I should have realized that few members of the oppressor race can understand the deep groans and passionate yearnings of the oppressed race, and still fewer have the vision to see that injustice must be rooted out by strong, persistent, and determined action. I am thankful, however, that some of our white brothers in the South have grasped the meaning of this social revolution and committed themselves to it. They are still all too few in quantity, but they are big in quality. Some — such as Ralph McGill, Lillian Smith, Harry Golden, James McBridge Dabbs, Ann Braden, and Sarah Patton Boyle — have written about our struggle in eloquent and prophetic terms. Others have marched with us down nameless streets of the South. They have languished in filthy, roach-infested jails, suffering the abuse and brutality of policemen who view them as "dirty nigger-lovers." Unlike so many of their moderate brothers and sisters, they have recognized the urgency of the moment and sensed the need for powerful "action" antidotes to combat the disease of segregation.

Let me take note of my other major disappointment. I have been so greatly disappointed with the white church and its leadership. Of course, there are some notable exceptions. I am not unmindful of the fact that each of you has taken some significant stands on this issue. I commend you, Reverend [Earl] Stallings, for your Christian stand on this past Sunday, in welcoming Negroes to your worship service on a nonsegregated basis. I commend the Catholic leaders of this state for integrating Spring Hill College several years ago.

But despite these notable exceptions, I must honestly reiterate that I have been disappointed with the church. I do not say this as one of those negative critics who can always find something wrong with the church. I say this as a minister of the gospel, who loves the church; who was nurtured in its bosom; who has been sustained by its spiritual blessings and who will remain true to it as long as the cord of life shall lengthen.

When I was suddenly catapulted into the leadership of the bus protest in 35
Montgomery, Alabama, a few years ago, I felt we would be supported by the white church. I felt that the white ministers, priests, and rabbis of the South would be among our strongest allies. Instead, some have been outright opponents, refusing to understand the freedom movement and misrepresenting its leaders; all too many others have been more cautious than courageous and have remained silent behind the anesthetizing security of stained-glass windows.

In spite of my shattered dreams, I came to Birmingham with the hope that the white religious leadership of this community would see the justice of our cause and, with deep moral concern, would serve as the channel through which our just grievances could reach the power structure. I had hoped that each of you would understand. But again I have been disappointed.

I have heard numerous southern religious leaders admonish their worshipers to comply with a desegregation decision because it is the law, but I have longed to hear white ministers declare: "Follow this decree because integration is morally right and because the Negro is your brother." In the midst of blatant injustices inflicted upon the Negro, I have watched white church men stand on the sideline and mouth pious irrelevancies and sanctimonious trivialities. In the midst of a mighty struggle to rid our nation of racial and economic injustice, I have heard many ministers say: "Those are social issues, with which the gospel has no real concern." And I have watched many churches commit themselves to a completely otherworldly religion which makes a strange, un-Biblical distinction between body and soul, between the sacred and the secular.

I have traveled the length and breadth of Alabama, Mississippi, and all the other southern states. On sweltering summer days and crisp autumn mornings I have looked at the South's beautiful churches with their lofty spires pointing heavenward. I have beheld the impressive outlines of her massive religious-education buildings. Over and over I have found myself asking: "What kind of people worship here? Who is their God? Where were their voices when the lips of Governor [Ross] Barnett dripped with words of interposition and nullification? Where were they when Governor [George] Wallace gave a clarion call for defiance and hatred? Where were their voices of support when bruised and weary Negro men and women decided to rise from the dark dungeons of complacency to the bright hills of creative protest?"

Yes, these questions are still in my mind. In deep disappointment I have wept over the laxity of the church. But be assured that my tears have been tears of love. There can be no deep disappointment where there is not deep love. Yes, I love the church. How could I do otherwise? I am in the rather unique position of being the son, the grandson, and the great-grandson of preachers. Yes, I see the church as the body of Christ. But, oh! How we have blemished and scarred that body through social neglect and through fear of being nonconformists.

There was a time when the church was very powerful — in the time when the early Christians rejoiced at being deemed worthy to suffer for what they believed. In those days the church was not merely a thermometer that recorded the ideas and principles of popular opinion; it was a thermostat that transformed the mores of society. Whenever the early Christians entered a town, the people in power became disturbed and immediately sought to convict the Christians for being "disturbers of the peace" and "outside agitators." But the Christians pressed on, in the conviction that they were "a colony of heaven," called to obey God rather than man. Small in number, they were big in commitment. They were too God-intoxicated to be "astronomically intimidated." By their effort and example they brought an end to such ancient evils as infanticide and gladiatorial contests. 40

Things are different now. So often the contemporary church is a weak, ineffectual voice with an uncertain sound. So often it is an archdefender of the status quo. Far from being disturbed by the presence of the church, the power structure of the average community is consoled by the church's silent — and often even vocal — sanction of things as they are.

But the judgment of God is upon the church as never before. If today's church does not recapture the sacrificial spirit of the early church, it will lose its authenticity, forfeit the loyalty of millions, and be dismissed as an irrelevant social club with no meaning for the twentieth century. Every day I meet young people whose disappointment with the church has turned into outright disgust.

Perhaps I have once again been too optimistic. Is organized religion too inextricably bound to the status quo to save our nation and the world? Perhaps I must turn my faith to the inner spiritual church, the church within the church, as the true ekklesia and the hope of the world. But again I am thankful to God that some noble souls from the ranks of organized religion have broken loose from the paralyzing chains of conformity and joined us as active partners in the struggle for freedom. They have left their secure congregations and walked the streets of Albany, Georgia, with us. They have gone down the highways of the South on tortuous rides for freedom. Yes, they have gone to jail with us. Some have been dismissed from their churches, have lost the support of their bishops and fellow ministers. But they have acted in the faith that right defeated is stronger than evil triumphant. Their witness has been the spiritual salt that has preserved the true meaning of the gospel in these troubled times. They have carved a tunnel of hope through the dark mountain of disappointment.

I hope the church as a whole will meet the challenge of this decisive hour. But even if the church does not come to the aid of justice, I have no despair about the future. I have no fear about the outcome of our struggle in Birmingham, even if our motives are at present misunderstood. We will reach the goal of freedom in Birmingham and all over the nation, because the goal of America is freedom. Abused and scorned though we may be, our destiny is tied up with America's destiny. Before the pilgrims landed at Plymouth, we were here. Before the pen of Jefferson etched the majestic words of the Declaration of Independence across the pages of history, we were here. For more than two centuries our forebears labored in this country without wages: they made cotton king; they built the homes of their masters while suffering gross injustice and shameful humiliation — and yet out of a bottomless vitality they continued to thrive and develop. If the inexpressible cruelties of slavery could not stop us, the opposition we now face will surely fail. We will win our freedom because the sacred heritage of our nation and the eternal will of God are embodied in our echoing demands.

Before closing I feel impelled to mention one other point in your statement that 45 has troubled me profoundly. You warmly commended the Birmingham police force for keeping "order" and "preventing violence." I doubt that you would have so warmly commended the police force if you had seen its dogs sinking their teeth into unarmed, nonviolent Negroes. I doubt that you would so quickly commend the policemen if you were to observe their ugly and inhumane treatment of Negroes here in the city jail; if you were to watch them push and curse old Negro women and young Negro girls; if you were to see them slap and kick old Negro men and young boys; if you were to observe them, as they did on two occasions, refuse to give us food because we wanted to sing our grace together. I cannot join you in your praise of the Birmingham police department.

It is true that the police have exercised a degree of discipline in handling the demonstrators. In this sense they have conducted themselves rather "nonviolently" in public. But for what purpose? To preserve the evil system of segregation. Over the past few years I have consistently preached that nonviolence demands that the means we use must be as pure as the ends we seek. I have tried to make clear that it is wrong to use immoral means to attain moral ends. But now I must affirm that it is just as wrong, or perhaps even more so, to use moral means to preserve immoral ends. Perhaps Mr. Connor and his policemen have been rather nonviolent in public, as was Chief Pritchett in Albany, Georgia, but they have used the moral means of nonviolence to maintain the immoral end of racial injustice. As T. S. Eliot has said, "The last temptation is the greatest treason: To do the right deed for the wrong reason."

I wish you had commended the Negro sit-inners and demonstrators of Birmingham for their sublime courage, their willingness to suffer, and their amazing discipline in the midst of great provocation. One day the South will recognize its real heroes. They will be the James Merediths, with the noble sense of purpose that enables them to face jeering and hostile mobs, and with the agonizing loneliness that characterizes the life of the pioneer. They will be old, oppressed, battered Negro women, symbolized in a seventy-two-year-old woman in Montgomery, Alabama, who rose up with a sense of dignity and with her people decided not to ride segregated buses, and who responded with ungrammatical profundity to one who inquired about her weariness: "My feets is tired, but my soul is at rest." They will be the young high school and college students, the young ministers of the gospel and a host of their elders, courageously and nonviolently sitting in at lunch counters and willingly going to jail for conscience' sake. One day the South will know that when these disinherited children of God sat down at lunch counters, they were in reality standing up for what is best in the American dream and for the most sacred values in our Judaeo-Christian heritage, thereby bringing our nation back to those great wells of democracy which were dug deep by the founding fathers in their formulation of the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence.

Never before have I written so long a letter. I'm afraid it is much too long to take your precious time. I can assure you that it would have been much shorter if I had been writing from a comfortable desk, but what else can one do when he is alone in a narrow jail cell, other than write long letters, think long thoughts, and pray long prayers?

If I have said anything in this letter that overstates the truth and indicates an unreasonable impatience, I beg you to forgive me. If I have said anything that understates the truth and indicates my having a patience that allows me to settle for anything less than brotherhood, I beg God to forgive me.

I hope this letter finds you strong in the faith. I also hope that circumstances will 50 soon make it possible for me to meet each of you, not as an integrationist or a civil-rights leader but as a fellow clergyman and a Christian brother. Let us all hope that the dark clouds of racial prejudice will soon pass away and the deep fog of misunderstanding will be lifted from our fear-drenched communities, and in some not too distant tomorrow the radiant stars of love and brotherhood will shine over our great nation with all their scintillating beauty.

Yours for the cause of Peace and Brotherhood,
Martin Luther King Jr.
(1963)

Exploring the Text

1. What is Martin Luther King Jr.'s tone in the opening paragraph? How might you make an argument for its being ironic?
2. How do King's allusions to biblical figures and events appeal to both ethos and pathos? What about his references to theologians and other religious scholars? Do you see a pattern in their use?
3. What are some of the different ways that King establishes his credibility? Whom does he address in addition to the Birmingham clergymen? How does he establish ethos for the different audiences for this letter?
4. Studying the long sentence in paragraph 14 (beginning with "But when you have seen"), consider why King arranges the "when" clauses in the order that he does. How would the meaning of the paragraph change if the order were different?
5. Trace one of the following patterns of figurative language throughout King's letter: darkness and light, high and low, sickness and death. Look also at the imagery surrounding the terms garment and fabric.
6. How does King balance the twin appeals to religion and patriotism throughout "Letter from Birmingham Jail"? Do you think he puts more emphasis on religion or on patriotism? Why do you think he makes that choice?
7. King writes as a member of several communities, some overlapping, some in conflict. What are they? Focusing on two or three, explain how he defines himself within each.
8. King spends nearly half the letter addressing counterarguments before he launches into his own argument. Analyze that argument, including his claims, assumptions, and evidence.

TALKBACK

Malcolm Gladwell

Author of four best-selling books, Malcolm Gladwell (b. 1963) grew up in Ontario, Canada, the son of an English university professor father and a Jamaican therapist mother. He has been a staff writer with the New Yorker magazine since 1996, and in 2005 he was named one of Time magazine's 100 Most Influential People. His books include The Tipping Point: How Little Things Make a Big Difference (2000), Blink: The Power of Thinking without Thinking (2005), and Outliers: The Story of Success (2008). Gladwell's What the Dog Saw (2009) is a compilation of articles published in the New Yorker. His writing often explores the implications of research in the social sciences and psychology.

Small Change
Why the Revolution Will Not Be Tweeted

The following article, which appeared in the New Yorker in 2010, compares the intricate network of activists who brought about the civil rights movement with the social media networks that have sprung up on the Internet.

At four-thirty in the afternoon on Monday, February 1, 1960, four college students sat down at the lunch counter at the Woolworth's in downtown Greensboro, North Carolina. They were freshmen at North Carolina A. & T., a black college a mile or so away.

"I'd like a cup of coffee, please," one of the four, Ezell Blair, said to the waitress.

"We don't serve Negroes here," she replied.

The Woolworth's lunch counter was a long L-shaped bar that could seat sixty-six people, with a standup snack bar at one end. The seats were for whites. The snack bar was for blacks. Another employee, a black woman who worked at the steam table, approached the students and tried to warn them away. "You're acting stupid, ignorant!" she said. They didn't move. Around five-thirty, the front doors to the store were locked. The four still didn't move. Finally, they left by a side door. Outside, a small crowd had gathered, including a photographer from the Greensboro Record. "I'll be back tomorrow with A. & T. College," one of the students said.

By next morning, the protest had grown to twenty-seven men and four women, most from the same dormitory as the original four. The men were dressed in suits and ties. The students had brought their schoolwork, and studied as they sat at the counter. On Wednesday, students from Greensboro's "Negro" secondary school, Dudley High, joined in, and the number of protesters swelled to eighty. By Thursday, the protesters numbered three hundred, including three white women, from the Greensboro campus of the University of North Carolina. By Saturday, the sit-in had reached six hundred. People spilled out onto the street. White teenagers waved Confederate flags. Someone threw a firecracker. At noon, the A. & T. football team arrived. "Here comes the wrecking crew," one of the white students shouted. 5

By the following Monday, sit-ins had spread to Winston-Salem, twenty-five miles away, and Durham, fifty miles away. The day after that, students at Fayetteville State Teachers College and at Johnson C. Smith College, in Charlotte, joined in, followed on Wednesday by students at St. Augustine's College and Shaw University, in Raleigh. On Thursday and Friday, the protest crossed state lines, surfacing in Hampton and Portsmouth, Virginia, in Rock Hill, South Carolina, and in Chattanooga, Tennessee. By the end of the month, there were sit-ins throughout the South, as far west as Texas. "I asked every student I met what the first day of the sitdowns had been like on his campus," the political theorist Michael Walzer wrote in Dissent. "The answer was always the same: 'It was like a fever. Everyone wanted to go.'" Some seventy thousand students eventually took part. Thousands were arrested and untold thousands more radicalized. These events in the early sixties became a civil-rights war that engulfed the South for the rest of the decade — and it happened without e-mail, texting, Facebook, or Twitter.

The world, we are told, is in the midst of a revolution. The new tools of social media have reinvented social activism. With Facebook and Twitter and the like, the traditional relationship between political authority and popular will has been upended, making it easier for the powerless to collaborate, coördinate, and give voice to their concerns. When ten thousand protesters took to the streets in Moldova in the spring of 2009 to protest against their country's Communist government, the action was dubbed the Twitter Revolution, because of the means by which the demonstrators had been brought together. A few months after that, when student protests rocked Tehran, the State Department took the unusual step of asking Twitter to suspend scheduled maintenance of its Web site, because the Administration didn't want such a critical organizing tool out of service at the height of the demonstrations. "Without Twitter the people of Iran would not have felt empowered and confident to stand up for freedom and democracy," Mark Pfeifle, a former national-security adviser, later wrote, calling for Twitter to be nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize. Where activists were once defined by their causes, they are now defined by their tools. Facebook warriors go online to push for change. "You are the best hope for us all," James K. Glassman, a former senior State Department official, told a crowd of cyber activists at a recent conference sponsored by Facebook, A. T. & T., Howcast, MTV, and Google. Sites like Facebook, Glassman said, "give the U.S. a significant competitive advantage over terrorists. Some time ago, I said that Al Qaeda was 'eating our lunch on the Internet.' That is no longer the case. Al Qaeda is stuck in Web 1.0. The Internet is now about interactivity and conversation."

These are strong, and puzzling, claims. Why does it matter who is eating whose lunch on the Internet? Are people who log on to their Facebook page really the best hope for us all? As for Moldova's so-called Twitter Revolution, Evgeny Morozov, a scholar at Stanford who has been the most persistent of digital evangelism's critics, points out that Twitter has scant internal significance in Moldova, a country where very few Twitter accounts exist. Nor does it seem to have been a revolution, not least because the protests — as Anne Applebaum suggested in the Washington Post — may well have been a bit of stagecraft cooked up by the government. (In a country paranoid about Romanian revanchism, the protesters flew a Romanian flag over the Parliament building.) In the Iranian case, meanwhile, the people tweeting about the demonstrations were almost all in the West. "It is time to get Twitter's role in the events in Iran right," Golnaz Esfandiari wrote, this past summer, in Foreign Policy. "Simply put: There was no Twitter Revolution inside Iran." The cadre of prominent bloggers, like Andrew Sullivan, who championed the role of social media in Iran, Esfandiari continued, misunderstood the situation. "Western journalists who couldn't reach — or didn't bother reaching? — people on the ground in Iran simply scrolled through the English-language tweets post with tag #iranelection," she wrote. "Through it all, no one seemed to wonder why people trying to coordinate protests in Iran would be writing in any language other than Farsi."

Some of this grandiosity is to be expected. Innovators tend to be solipsists. They often want to cram every stray fact and experience into their new model. As the historian Robert Darnton has written, "The marvels of communication technology in the present have produced a false consciousness about the past — even a sense that communication has no history, or had nothing of importance to consider before the days of television and the Internet." But there is something else at work here, in the outsized enthusiasm for social media. Fifty years after one of the most extraordinary episodes of social upheaval in American history, we seem to have forgotten what activism is.

Greensboro in the early nineteen-sixties was the kind of place where racial insubordination was routinely met with violence. The four students who first sat down at the lunch counter were terrified. "I suppose if anyone had come up behind me and yelled 'Boo,' I think I would have fallen off my seat," one of them said later. On the first day, the store manager notified the police chief, who immediately sent two officers to the store. On the third day, a gang of white toughs showed up at the lunch counter and stood ostentatiously behind the protesters, ominously muttering epithets such as "burr-head nigger." A local Ku Klux Klan leader made an appearance. On Saturday, as tensions grew, someone called in a bomb threat, and the entire store had to be evacuated. 10

The dangers were even clearer in the Mississippi Freedom Summer Project of 1964, another of the sentinel campaigns of the civil-rights movement. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee recruited hundreds of Northern, largely white unpaid volunteers to run Freedom Schools, register black voters, and raise civil-rights awareness in the Deep South. "No one should go anywhere alone, but certainly not in an automobile and certainly not at night," they were instructed. Within days of arriving in Mississippi, three volunteers — Michael Schwerner, James Chaney, and Andrew Goodman — were kidnapped and killed, and, during the rest of the summer, thirty-seven black churches were set on fire and dozens of safe houses were bombed; volunteers were beaten, shot at, arrested, and trailed by pickup trucks full of armed men. A quarter of those in the program dropped out. Activism that challenges the status quo — that attacks deeply rooted problems — is not for the faint of heart.

What makes people capable of this kind of activism? The Stanford sociologist Doug McAdam compared the Freedom Summer dropouts with the participants who stayed, and discovered that the key difference wasn't, as might be expected, ideological fervor. "All of the applicants — participants and withdrawals alike — emerge as highly committed, articulate supporters of the goals and values of the summer program," he concluded. What mattered more was an applicant's degree of personal connection to the civil-rights movement. All the volunteers were required to provide a list of personal contacts — the people they wanted kept apprised of their activities — and participants were far more likely than dropouts to have close friends who were also going to Mississippi. High-risk activism, McAdam concluded, is a "strong-tie" phenomenon.

This pattern shows up again and again. One study of the Red Brigades, the Italian terrorist group of the nineteen-seventies, found that seventy per cent of recruits had at least one good friend already in the organization. The same is true of the men who joined the mujahideen in Afghanistan. Even revolutionary actions that look spontaneous, like the demonstrations in East Germany that led to the fall of the Berlin Wall, are, at core, strong-tie phenomena. The opposition movement in East Germany consisted of several hundred groups, each with roughly a dozen members. Each group was in limited contact with the others: at the time, only thirteen per cent of East Germans even had a phone. All they knew was that on Monday nights, outside St. Nicholas Church in downtown Leipzig, people gathered to voice their anger at the state. And the primary determinant of who showed up was "critical friends" — the more friends you had who were critical of the regime, the more likely you were to join the protest.

So one crucial fact about the four freshmen at the Greensboro lunch counter — David Richmond, Franklin McCain, Ezell Blair, and Joseph McNeil — was their relationship with one another. McNeil was a roommate of Blair's in A. & T.'s Scott Hall dormitory. Richmond roomed with McCain one floor up, and Blair, Richmond, and McCain had all gone to Dudley High School. The four would smuggle beer into the dorm and talk late into the night in Blair and McNeil's room. They would all have remembered the murder of Emmett Till in 1955, the Montgomery bus boycott that same year, and the showdown in Little Rock in 1957. It was McNeil who brought up the idea of a sit-in at Woolworth's. They'd discussed it for nearly a month. Then McNeil came into the dorm room and asked the others if they were ready. There was a pause, and McCain said, in a way that works only with people who talk late into the night with one another, "Are you guys chicken or not?" Ezell Blair worked up the courage the next day to ask for a cup of coffee because he was flanked by his roommate and two good friends from high school.

The kind of activism associated with social media isn't like this at all. The platforms of social media are built around weak ties. Twitter is a way of following (or being followed by) people you may never have met. Facebook is a tool for efficiently managing your acquaintances, for keeping up with the people you would not otherwise be able to stay in touch with. That's why you can have a thousand "friends" on Facebook, as you never could in real life. 15

This is in many ways a wonderful thing. There is strength in weak ties, as the sociologist Mark Granovetter has observed. Our acquaintances — not our friends — are our greatest source of new ideas and information. The Internet lets us exploit the power of these kinds of distant connections with marvelous efficiency. It's terrific at the diffusion of innovation, interdisciplinary collaboration, seamlessly matching up buyers and sellers, and the logistical functions of the dating world. But weak ties seldom lead to high-risk activism.

In a new book called The Dragonfly Effect: Quick, Effective, and Powerful Ways to Use Social Media to Drive Social Change, the business consultant Andy Smith and the Stanford Business School professor Jennifer Aaker tell the story of Sameer Bhatia, a young Silicon Valley entrepreneur who came down with acute myelogenous leukemia. It's a perfect illustration of social media's strengths. Bhatia needed a bone-marrow transplant, but he could not find a match among his relatives and friends. The odds were best with a donor of his ethnicity, and there were few South Asians in the national bone-marrow database. So Bhatia's business partner sent out an e-mail explaining Bhatia's plight to more than four hundred of their acquaintances, who forwarded the e-mail to their personal contacts; Facebook pages and YouTube videos were devoted to the Help Sameer campaign. Eventually, nearly twenty-five thousand new people were registered in the bone-marrow database, and Bhatia found a match.

But how did the campaign get so many people to sign up? By not asking too much of them. That's the only way you can get someone you don't really know to do something on your behalf. You can get thousands of people to sign up for a donor registry, because doing so is pretty easy. You have to send in a cheek swab and — in the highly unlikely event that your bone marrow is a good match for someone in need — spend a few hours at the hospital. Donating bone marrow isn't a trivial matter. But it doesn't involve financial or personal risk; it doesn't mean spending a summer being chased by armed men in pickup trucks. It doesn't require that you confront socially entrenched norms and practices. In fact, it's the kind of commitment that will bring only social acknowledgment and praise.

The evangelists of social media don't understand this distinction; they seem to believe that a Facebook friend is the same as a real friend and that signing up for a donor registry in Silicon Valley today is activism in the same sense as sitting at a segregated lunch counter in Greensboro in 1960. "Social networks are particularly effective at increasing motivation," Aaker and Smith write. But that's not true. Social networks are effective at increasing participation — by lessening the level of motivation that participation requires. The Facebook page of the Save Darfur Coalition has 1,282,339 members, who have donated an average of nine cents apiece. The next biggest Darfur charity on Facebook has 22,073 members, who have donated an average of thirty-five cents. Help Save Darfur has 2,797 members, who have given, on average, fifteen cents. A spokesperson for the Save Darfur Coalition told Newsweek, "We wouldn't necessarily gauge someone's value to the advocacy movement based on what they've given. This is a powerful mechanism to engage this critical population. They inform their community, attend events, volunteer. It's not something you can measure by looking at a ledger." In other words, Facebook activism succeeds not by motivating people to make a real sacrifice but by motivating them to do the things that people do when they are not motivated enough to make a real sacrifice. We are a long way from the lunch counters of Greensboro.

20 The students who joined the sit-ins across the South during the winter of 1960 described the movement as a "fever." But the civil-rights movement was more like a military campaign than like a contagion. In the late nineteen-fifties, there had been sixteen sit-ins in various cities throughout the South, fifteen of which were formally organized by civil-rights organizations like the N.A.A.C.P. and CORE. Possible locations for activism were scouted. Plans were drawn up. Movement activists held training sessions and retreats for would-be protesters. The Greensboro Four were a product of this groundwork: all were members of the N.A.A.C.P. Youth Council. They had close ties with the head of the local N.A.A.C.P. chapter. They had been briefed on the earlier wave of sit-ins in Durham, and had been part of a series of movement meetings in activist churches. When the sit-in movement spread from Greensboro throughout the South, it did not spread indiscriminately. It spread to those cities which had preexisting "movement centers"—a core of dedicated and trained activists ready to turn the "fever" into action.

The civil-rights movement was high-risk activism. It was also, crucially, strategic activism: a challenge to the establishment mounted with precision and discipline. The N.A.A.C.P. was a centralized organization, run from New York according to highly formalized operating procedures. At the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, Martin Luther King, Jr., was the unquestioned authority. At the center of the movement was the black church, which had, as Aldon D. Morris points out in his superb 1984 study, The Origins of the Civil Rights Movement, a carefully demarcated division of labor, with various standing committees and disciplined groups. "Each group was task-oriented and coordinated its activities through authority structures," Morris writes. "Individuals were held accountable for their assigned duties, and important conflicts were resolved by the minister, who usually exercised ultimate authority over the congregation."

This is the second crucial distinction between traditional activism and its online variant: social media are not about this kind of hierarchical organization. Facebook and the like are tools for building networks, which are the opposite, in structure and character, of hierarchies. Unlike hierarchies, with their rules and procedures, networks aren't controlled by a single central authority. Decisions are made through consensus, and the ties that bind people to the group are loose.

This structure makes networks enormously resilient and adaptable in low-risk situations. Wikipedia is a perfect example. It doesn't have an editor, sitting in New York, who directs and corrects each entry. The effort of putting together each entry is self-organized. If every entry in Wikipedia were to be erased tomorrow, the content would swiftly be restored, because that's what happens when a network of thousands spontaneously devote their time to a task.

There are many things, though, that networks don't do well. Car companies sensibly use a network to organize their hundreds of suppliers, but not to design their cars. No one believes that the articulation of a coherent design philosophy is best handled by a sprawling, leaderless organizational system. Because networks don't have a centralized leadership structure and clear lines of authority, they have real difficulty reaching consensus and setting goals. They can't think strategically; they are chronically prone to conflict and error. How do you make difficult choices about tactics or strategy or philosophical direction when everyone has an equal say?

The Palestine Liberation Organization originated as a network, and the international-relations scholars Mette Eilstrup-Sangiovanni and Calvert Jones argue in a recent essay in International Security that this is why it ran into such trouble as it grew: "Structural features typical of networks — the absence of central authority, the unchecked autonomy of rival groups, and the inability to arbitrate quarrels through formal mechanisms — made the P.L.O. excessively vulnerable to outside manipulation and internal strife." 25

In Germany in the nineteen-seventies, they go on, "the far more unified and successful left-wing terrorists tended to organize hierarchically, with professional management and clear divisions of labor. They were concentrated geographically in universities, where they could establish central leadership, trust, and camaraderie through regular, face-to-face meetings." They seldom betrayed their comrades in arms during police interrogations. Their counterparts on the right were organized as decentralized networks, and had no such discipline. These groups were regularly infiltrated, and members, once arrested, easily gave up their comrades. Similarly, Al Qaeda was most dangerous when it was a unified hierarchy. Now that it has dissipated into a network, it has proved far less effective.

The drawbacks of networks scarcely matter if the network isn't interested in systemic change — if it just wants to frighten or humiliate or make a splash — or if it doesn't need to think strategically. But if you're taking on a powerful and organized establishment you have to be a hierarchy. The Montgomery bus boycott required the participation of tens of thousands of people who depended on public transit to get to and from work each day. It lasted a year. In order to persuade those people to stay true to the cause, the boycott's organizers tasked each local black church with maintaining morale, and put together a free alternative private carpool service, with forty-eight dispatchers and forty-two pickup stations. Even the White Citizens Council, King later said, conceded that the carpool system moved with "military precision." By the time King came to Birmingham, for the climactic showdown with Police Commissioner Eugene (Bull) Connor, he had a budget of a million dollars, and a hundred full-time staff members on the ground, divided into operational units. The operation itself was divided into steadily escalating phases, mapped out in advance. Support was maintained through consecutive mass meetings rotating from church to church around the city.

Boycotts and sit-ins and nonviolent confrontations — which were the weapons of choice for the civil-rights movement — are high-risk strategies. They leave little room for conflict and error. The moment even one protester deviates from the script and responds to provocation, the moral legitimacy of the entire protest is compromised. Enthusiasts for social media would no doubt have us believe that King's task in Birmingham would have been made infinitely easier had he been able to communicate with his followers through Facebook, and contented himself with tweets from a Birmingham jail. But networks are messy: think of the ceaseless pattern of correction and revision, amendment and debate, that characterizes Wikipedia. If Martin Luther King, Jr., had tried to do a wiki-boycott in Montgomery, he would have been steamrollered by the white power structure. And of what use would a digital communication tool be in a town where ninety-eight per cent of the black community could be reached every Sunday morning at church? The things that King needed in Birmingham — discipline and strategy — were things that online social media cannot provide.

The bible of the social-media movement is Clay Shirky's Here Comes Everybody. Shirky, who teaches at New York University, sets out to demonstrate the organizing power of the Internet, and he begins with the story of Evan, who worked on Wall Street, and his friend Ivanna, after she left her smart phone, an expensive Sidekick, on the back seat of a New York City taxicab. The telephone company transferred the data on Ivanna's lost phone to a new phone, whereupon she and Evan discovered that the Sidekick was now in the hands of a teen-ager from Queens, who was using it to take photographs of herself and her friends.

When Evan e-mailed the teen-ager, Sasha, asking for the phone back, she 30 replied that his "white ass" didn't deserve to have it back. Miffed, he set up a Web page with her picture and a description of what had happened. He forwarded the link to his friends, and they forwarded it to their friends. Someone found the MySpace page of Sasha's boyfriend, and a link to it found its way onto the site. Someone found her address online and took a video of her home while driving by; Evan posted the video on the site. The story was picked up by the news filter Digg. Evan was now up to ten e-mails a minute. He created a bulletin board for his readers to share their stories, but it crashed under the weight of responses. Evan and Ivanna went to the police, but the police filed the report under "lost," rather than "stolen," which essentially closed the case. "By this point millions of readers were watching," Shirky writes, "and dozens of mainstream news outlets had covered the story." Bowing to the pressure, the N.Y.P.D. reclassified the item as "stolen." Sasha was arrested, and Evan got his friend's Sidekick back.

Shirky's argument is that this is the kind of thing that could never have happened in the pre-Internet age — and he's right. Evan could never have tracked down Sasha. The story of the Sidekick would never have been publicized. An army of people could never have been assembled to wage this fight. The police wouldn't have bowed to the pressure of a lone person who had misplaced something as trivial as a cell phone. The story, to Shirky, illustrates "the ease and speed with which a group can be mobilized for the right kind of cause" in the Internet age.

Shirky considers this model of activism an upgrade. But it is simply a form of organizing which favors the weak-tie connections that give us access to information over the strong-tie connections that help us persevere in the face of danger. It shifts our energies from organizations that promote strategic and disciplined activity and toward those which promote resilience and adaptability. It makes it easier for activists to express themselves, and harder for that expression to have any impact. The instruments of social media are well suited to making the existing social order more efficient. They are not a natural enemy of the status quo. If you are of the opinion that all the world needs is a little buffing around the edges, this should not trouble you. But if you think that there are still lunch counters out there that need integrating, it ought to give you pause.

Shirky ends his story of the Sidekick by asking, portentously, "What happens next?" — no doubt imagining future waves of digital protesters. But he has already answered the question. What happens next is more of the same. A networked, weak-tie world is good at things like helping Wall Streeters get phones back from teen-age girls. Viva la revolución.

(2010)

Exploring the Text

1. Why do you think Malcolm Gladwell begins his piece by retelling the story of the lunch counter sit-in at the Woolworth's in Greensboro, North Carolina? How does it serve as the foundation for his argument?
2. What does Gladwell mean when he writes, "Where activists were once defined by their causes, they are now defined by their tools" (par. 7)? Do you agree or disagree with this idea? Explain your answer.
3. How does Gladwell define "high-risk activism" (pars. 11–12)? Why does he believe that activism based on social media cannot qualify as "high-risk"? Consider the contrast between "weak ties" and "strong ties" as part of your response.
4. What is the difference between increasing motivation and increasing participation, according to Gladwell? Why is the distinction between the two important to his argument?
5. Gladwell does not entirely discount the power of social media. What benefits or positive effects does he grant to social media?
6. Throughout this essay, Gladwell relies heavily on expert testimony, citing scholars, researchers, business analysts, state department officials, and security advisors. Choose two examples, and discuss how Gladwell uses one to support his argument and the other to examine a counterargument.
7. At key junctures in the essay, Gladwell makes sharp personal comments. In fact, his ending, "Viva la revolución," could be read as downright sarcastic. What others do you notice? Do these editorial comments undercut his argument or do they add to it? Explain your answer.

Making Connections

1. What are the differences in the ways Martin Luther King Jr. (p. 1345) and Gladwell (p. 1357) use expert testimony? What are the similarities?

2. Compare the tone of "Letter from Birmingham Jail" to the tone of "Small Change." How are the voices of the speakers different? Are they similar in any way? Which do you find easier to engage with? Explain your answer.
3. Gladwell describes the civil rights movement of the early 1960s as a "military campaign" (par. 20), arguing that all of the sit-ins were "formally organized by civil-rights organizations like the N.A.A.C.P. and CORE." He says that Martin Luther King Jr. was the "unquestioned authority" (par. 21). How does that square with the description King gives in his letter about the structure of the civil rights movement and the boycotts and other actions in Birmingham?
4. Imagine a conversation between King and Gladwell. Do you think they would find much common ground? On what subjects do you think they would disagree? On which would they agree? Try to imagine King's opinion of social media as a protest tool had he lived long enough to see it. Use evidence from the text to help form your answer.

Robert Hayden

Born Asa Bundy Sheffey in Detroit, Michigan, Robert Hayden (1913–1980) attended Detroit City College (now Wayne State University) before studying under W. H. Auden (p. 1169) in the graduate English program at the University of Michigan. In 1976, Hayden was appointed consultant in poetry to the Library of Congress, a post that was the forerunner of poet laureate. His first volume, Heart-Shape in the Dust (1940), took its voice from the Harlem Renaissance.

Those Winter Sundays

Hayden's 1962 collection, A Ballad of Remembrance, includes his most famous poem, "Those Winter Sundays."

Sundays too my father got up early and put his clothes on in the blueblack cold, then with cracked hands that ached from labor in the weekday weather made banked fires blaze. No one ever thanked him.

I'd wake and hear the cold splintering, breaking.
When the rooms were warm, he'd call,
and slowly I would rise and dress, fearing the chronic angers of that house,

Speaking indifferently to him, who had driven out the cold and polished my good shoes as well.
What did I know, what did I know of love's austere and lonely offices?

(1962)

Exploring the Text

1. When does the poem shift from flashback — or memory — to the present moment? How does Robert Hayden keep this shift from being too abrupt?
2. Citing specific lines from the poem, characterize the speaker's relationship with his father and the home in which the speaker grew up.
3. What is the meaning of "love's austere and lonely offices" (l. 14)? What effect does Hayden achieve by choosing such an uncommon, somewhat archaic word as offices?
4. What is the effect of the repetition in the second-to-last line of the poem?
5. What is the grown speaker's feeling about his father? How does it differ from the feeling the speaker had as a child? What does the adult speaker understand about the father that he did not understand as a child?
6. What do you think is this poem's purpose? What strategies does Hayden use to achieve it?

Joyce Carol Oates

Joyce Carol Oates was born in Lockport, New York, in 1938. With a typewriter she received at age fourteen, Oates wrote "novel after novel" in high school and college in order to train herself to be a writer. Oates is the youngest author ever to receive the National Book Award — for her novel Them (1969). Currently the Roger S. Berlind Professor of the Humanities at Princeton University, Oates has published more than thirty novels, including Black Water (1992), We Were the Mulvaneys (1996), and The Falls (2004). Her work often addresses the violence and suspense lurking beneath ordinary life.

Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been?

This story is based on the factual case of a psychopath known as the Pied Piper of Tucson. In an interview with the New York Times, Oates described him:

> The Pied Piper mimicked teenagers in their talk, dress, and behavior, but he was not a teenager — he was a man in his early thirties. Rather short, he stuffed rags in his leather boots to give himself height. (And sometimes walked unsteadily as a consequence: did not among his admiring constituency notice?) He charmed his victims as charismatic psychopaths have always charmed their victims, to the bewilderment of others who fancy themselves free of lunatic attraction. The Pied Piper of Tucson: a trashy dream, a tabloid archetype, sheer artifice, comedy, cartoon — surrounded, improbably, and finally tragically, by real people. You think that, if you look twice, he won't be there. But there he is.

This story first appeared in the fall 1966 edition of Epoch magazine.

For Bob Dylan

Her name was Connie. She was fifteen and she had a quick nervous giggling habit of craning her neck to glance into mirrors, or checking other people's faces to make sure her own was all right. Her mother, who noticed everything and knew everything and who hadn't much reason any longer to look at her own face, always scolded Connie about it. "Stop gawking at yourself, who are you? You think you're so pretty?" she would say. Connie would raise her eyebrows at these familiar complaints and look right through her mother, into a shadowy vision of herself as she was right at that moment: she knew she was pretty and that was everything. Her mother had been pretty once too, if you could believe those old snapshots in the album, but now her looks were gone and that was why she was always after Connie.

"Why don't you keep your room clean like your sister? How've you got your hair fixed — what the hell stinks? Hair spray? You don't see your sister using that junk."

Her sister June was twenty-four and still lived at home. She was a secretary in the high school Connie attended, and if that wasn't bad enough — with her in the same building — she was so plain and chunky and steady that Connie had to hear her praised all the time by her mother and her mother's sisters. June did this, June did that, she saved money and helped clean the house and cooked and Connie couldn't do a thing, her mind was all filled with trashy daydreams. Their father was away at work most of the time and when he came home he wanted supper and he read the newspaper at supper and after supper he went to bed. He didn't bother talking much to them, but around his bent head Connie's mother kept picking at her until Connie wished her mother was dead and she herself was dead and it was all over. "She makes me want to throw up sometimes," she complained to her friends. She had a high, breathless, amused voice which made everything she said a little forced, whether it was sincere or not.

There was one good thing: June went places with girl friends of hers, girls who were just as plain and steady as she, and so when Connie wanted to do that her mother had no objections. The father of Connie's best girl friend drove the girls the three miles to town and left them off at a shopping plaza, so that they could walk through the stores or go to a movie, and when he came to pick them up again at eleven he never bothered to ask what they had done.

They must have been familiar sights, walking around that shopping plaza in their 5 shorts and flat ballerina slippers that always scuffed the sidewalk, with charm bracelets jingling on their thin wrists; they would lean together to whisper and laugh secretly if someone passed by who amused or interested them. Connie had long dark blond hair that drew anyone's eye to it, and she wore part of it pulled up on her head and puffed out and the rest of it she let fall down her back. She wore a pullover jersey blouse that looked one way when she was at home and another way when she was away from home. Everything about her had two sides to it, one for home and one for anywhere that was not home: her walk that could be childlike and bobbing, or languid enough to make anyone think she was hearing music in her head, her mouth which was pale and smirking most of the time, but bright and pink on these evenings out, her laugh which was cynical and drawling at home — "Ha, ha, very funny" — but high-pitched and nervous anywhere else, like the jingling of the charms on her bracelet.

Sometimes they did go shopping or to a movie, but sometimes they went across the highway, ducking fast across the busy road, to a drive-in restaurant where older kids hung out. The restaurant was shaped like a big bottle, though squatter than a real bottle, and on its cap was a revolving figure of a grinning boy who held a hamburger aloft. One night in midsummer they ran across, breathless with daring, and right away someone leaned out a car window and invited them over, but it was just a boy from high school they didn't like. It made them feel good to be able to ignore him. They went up through the maze of parked and cruising cars to the bright-lit, fly-infested restaurant, their faces pleased and expectant as if they were entering a sacred building that loomed out of the night to give them what haven and what blessing they yearned for. They sat at the counter and crossed their legs at the ankles, their thin shoulders rigid with excitement, and listened to the music that made everything so good: the music was always in the background like music at a church service, it was something to depend upon.

A boy named Eddie came in to talk with them. He sat backwards on his stool, turning himself jerkily around in semi-circles and then stopping and turning again, and after a while he asked Connie if she would like something to eat. She said she did and so she tapped her friend's arm on her way out — her friend pulled her face up into a brave droll look — and Connie said she would meet her at eleven, across the way. "I just hate to leave her like that," Connie said earnestly, but the boy said that she wouldn't be alone for long. So they went out to his car and on the way Connie couldn't help but let her eyes wander over the windshields and faces all around her, her face gleaming with the joy that had nothing to do with Eddie or even this place; it might have been the music. She drew her shoulders up and sucked in her breath with the pure pleasure of being alive, and just at that moment she happened to glance at a face just a few feet from hers. It was a boy with shaggy black hair, in a convertible jalopy painted gold. He stared at her and then his lips widened into a grin. Connie slit her eyes at him and turned away, but she couldn't help glancing back and there he was still watching her. He wagged a finger and laughed and said, "Gonna get you, baby," and Connie turned away again without Eddie noticing anything.

She spent three hours with him, at the restaurant where they ate hamburgers and drank Cokes in wax cups that were always sweating, and then down an alley a mile or so away, and when he left her off at five to eleven only the movie house was still open at the plaza. Her girl friend was there, talking with a boy. When Connie came up the two girls smiled at each other and Connie said, "How was the movie?" and the girl said, "You should know." They rode off with the girl's father, sleepy and pleased, and Connie couldn't help but look at the darkened shopping plaza with its big empty parking lot and its signs that were faded and ghostly now, and over at the drive-in restaurant where cars were still circling tirelessly. She couldn't hear the music at this distance.

Next morning June asked her how the movie was and Connie said, "So-so."

She and that girl and occasionally another girl went out several times a week 10 that way, and the rest of the time Connie spent around the house — it was summer vacation — getting in her mother's way and thinking, dreaming, about the boys she met. But all the boys fell back and dissolved into a single face that was not even a face, but an idea, a feeling, mixed up with the urgent insistent pounding of the music and the humid night air of July. Connie's mother kept dragging her back to the daylight by finding things for her to do or saying suddenly, "What's this about the Pettinger girl?"

And Connie would say nervously, "Oh, her. That dope." She always drew thick clear lines between herself and such girls, and her mother was simple and kindly enough to believe her. Her mother was so simple, Connie thought, that it was maybe cruel to fool her so much. Her mother went scuffling around the house in old bedroom slippers and complained over the telephone to one sister about the other, then the other called up and the two of them complained about the third one. If June's name was mentioned her mother's tone was approving, and if Connie's name was mentioned it was disapproving. This did not really mean she disliked Connie and actually Connie thought that her mother preferred her to June because she was prettier, but the two of them kept up a pretense of exasperation, a sense that they were tugging and struggling over something of little value to either of them. Sometimes, over coffee, they were almost friends, but something would come up — some vexation that was like a fly buzzing suddenly around their heads — and their faces went hard with contempt.

One Sunday Connie got up at eleven — none of them bothered with church — and washed her hair so that it could dry all day long, in the sun. Her parents and sister were going to a barbecue at an aunt's house and Connie said no, she wasn't interested, rolling her eyes, to let mother know just what she thought of it. "Stay home alone then," her mother said sharply. Connie sat out back in a lawn chair and watched them drive away, her father quiet and bald, hunched around so that he could back the car out, her mother with a look that was still angry and not at all softened through the windshield, and in the back seat poor old June all dressed up as if she didn't know what a barbecue was, with all the running yelling kids and the flies. Connie sat with her eyes closed in the sun, dreaming and dazed with the warmth about her as if this were a kind of love, the caresses of love, and her mind slipped over onto thoughts of the boy she had been with the night before and how nice he had been, how sweet it always was, not the way someone like June would suppose but sweet, gentle, the way it was in movies and promised in songs; and when she opened her eyes she hardly knew where she was, the back yard ran off into weeds and a fenceline of trees and behind it the sky was perfectly blue and still. The asbestos "ranch house" that was now three years old startled her — it looked small. She shook her head as if to get awake.

It was too hot. She went inside the house and turned on the radio to drown out the quiet. She sat on the edge of her bed, barefoot, and listened for an hour and a half to a program called XYZ Sunday Jamboree, record after record of hard, fast, shrieking songs she sang along with, interspersed by exclamations from "Bobby King": "An' look here you girls at Napoleon's — Son and Charley want you to pay real close attention to this song coming up!"

And Connie paid close attention herself, bathed in a glow of slow-pulsed joy that seemed to rise mysteriously out of the music itself and lay languidly about the airless little room, breathed in and breathed out with each gentle rise and fall of her chest.

After a while she heard a car coming up the drive. She sat up at once, startled, because it couldn't be her father so soon. The gravel kept crunching all the way in from the road — the driveway was long — and Connie ran to the window. It was a car she didn't know. It was an open jalopy, painted a bright gold that caught the sun opaquely. Her heart began to pound and her fingers snatched at her hair, checking it, and she whispered "Christ. Christ," wondering how bad she looked. The car came to a stop at the side door and the horn sounded four short taps as if this were a signal Connie knew.

She went into the kitchen and approached the door slowly, then hung out the screen door, her bare toes curling down off the step. There were two boys in the car and now she recognized the driver: he had shaggy, shabby black hair that looked crazy as a wig and he was grinning at her.

"I ain't late, am I?" he said.

"Who the hell do you think you are?" Connie said.

"Toldja I'd be out, didn't I?"

"I don't even know who you are."

She spoke sullenly, careful to show no interest or pleasure, and he spoke in a fast bright monotone. Connie looked past him to the other boy, taking her time. He had fair brown hair, with a lock that fell onto his forehead. His sideburns gave him a fierce, embarrassed look, but so far he hadn't even bothered to glance at her. Both boys wore sunglasses. The driver's glasses were metallic and mirrored everything in miniature.

"You wanta come for a ride?" he said.

Connie smirked and let her hair fall loose over one shoulder.

"Don'tcha like my car? New paint job," he said. "Hey."

"What?"

"You're cute."

She pretended to fidget, chasing flies away from the door.

"Don'tcha believe me, or what?" he said.

"Look, I don't even know who you are," Connie said in disgust.

"Hey, Ellie's got a radio, see. Mine's broke down." He lifted his friend's arm and showed her the little transistor the boy was holding, and now Connie began to hear the music. It was the same program that was playing inside the house.

"Bobby King?" she said.

"I listen to him all the time. I think he's great."

"He's kind of great," Connie said reluctantly.

"Listen, that guy's great. He knows where the action is."

Connie blushed a little, because the glasses made it impossible for her to see just what this boy was looking at. She couldn't decide if she liked him or if he was just a jerk, and so she dawdled in the doorway and wouldn't come down or go back inside. She said, "What's all that stuff painted on your car?" 35

"Can'tcha read it?" He opened the door very carefully, as if he was afraid it might fall off. He slid out just as carefully, planting his feet firmly on the ground, the tiny metallic world in his glasses slowing down like gelatine hardening and in the midst of it Connie's bright green blouse. "This here is my name, to begin with," he said. ARNOLD FRIEND was written in tar-like black letters on the side, with a drawing of a round grinning face that reminded Connie of a pumpkin, except it wore sunglasses. "I wanta introduce myself, I'm Arnold Friend and that's my real name and I'm gonna be your friend, honey, and inside the car's Ellie Oscar, he's kinda shy." Ellie brought his transistor up to his shoulder and balanced it there. "Now these numbers are a secret code, honey," Arnold Friend explained. He read off the numbers 33, 19, 17 and raised his eyebrows at her to see what she thought of that, but she didn't think much of it. The left rear fender had been smashed and around it was written, on the gleaming gold background: DONE BY CRAZY WOMAN DRIVER. Connie had to laugh at that. Arnold Friend was pleased at her laughter and looked up at her. "Around the other side's a lot more — you wanta come and see them?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Why should I?"

"Don'tcha wanta see what's on the car? Don'tcha wanta go for a ride?" 40

"I don't know."

"Why not?"

"I got things to do."

"Like what?"

"Things." 45

He laughed as if she had said something funny. He slapped his thighs. He was standing in a strange way, leaning back against the car as if he were balancing himself. He wasn't tall, only an inch or so taller than she would be if she came down to him. Connie liked the way he was dressed, which was the way all of them dressed: tight faded jeans stuffed into black, scuffed boots, a belt that pulled his waist in and showed how lean he was, and a white pull-over shirt that was a little soiled and showed the hard small muscles of his arms and shoulders. He looked as if he probably did hard work, lifting and carrying things. Even his neck looked muscular. And his face was a familiar face, somehow: the jaw and chin and cheeks slightly darkened, because he hadn't shaved for a day or two, and the nose long and hawk-like, sniffing as if she were a treat he was going to gobble up and it was all a joke.

"Connie, you ain't telling the truth. This is your day set aside for a ride with me and you know it," he said, still laughing. The way he straightened and recovered from his fit of laughing showed that it had been all fake.

"How do you know what my name is?" she said suspiciously.

"It's Connie."

"Maybe and maybe not." 50

"I know my Connie," he said, wagging his finger. Now she remembered him even better, back at the restaurant, and her cheeks warmed at the thought of how she sucked in her breath just at the moment she passed him — how she must have looked to him. And he had remembered her. "Ellie and I come out here especially for you," he said. "Ellie can sit in back. How about it?"

"Where?"

"Where what?"

"Where're we going?"

He looked at her. He took off the sunglasses and she saw how pale the skin around 55 his eyes was, like holes that were not in shadow but instead in light. His eyes were like chips of broken glass that catch the light in an amiable way. He smiled. It was as if the idea of going for a ride somewhere, to some place, was a new idea to him.

"Just for a ride, Connie sweetheart."

"I never said my name was Connie," she said.

"But I know what it is. I know your name and all about you, lots of things," Arnold Friend said. He had not moved yet but stood still leaning back against the side of his jalopy. "I took a special interest in you, such a pretty girl, and found out all about you like I know your parents and sister are gone somewheres and I know where and how long they're going to be gone, and I know who you were with last night, and your best friend's name is Betty. Right?"

He spoke in a simple lilting voice, exactly as if he were reciting the words to a song. His smile assured her that everything was fine. In the car Ellie turned up the volume on his radio and did not bother to look around at them.

"Ellie can sit in the back seat," Arnold Friend said. He indicated his friend with 60 a casual jerk of his chin, as if Ellie did not count and she could not bother with him.

"How'd you find out all that stuff?" Connie said.

"Listen: Betty Schultz and Tony Fitch and Jimmy Pettinger and Nancy Pettinger," he said, in a chant. "Raymond Stanley and Bob Hutter —"

"Do you know all those kids?"

"I know everybody."

"Look, you're kidding. You're not from around here." 65

"Sure."

"But — how come we never saw you before?"

"Sure you saw me before," he said. He looked down at his boots, as if he were a little offended. "You just don't remember."

"I guess I'd remember you," Connie said.

"Yeah?" He looked up at this, beaming. He was pleased. He began to mark time 70 with the music from Ellie's radio, tapping his fists lightly together. Connie looked away from his smile to the car, which was painted so bright it almost hurt her eyes to look at it. She looked at that name, ARNOLD FRIEND. And up at the front fender was an expression that was familiar — MAN THE FLYING SAUCERS. It was an expression kids had used the year before, but didn't use this year. She looked at it for a while as if the words meant something to her that she did not yet know.

"What're you thinking about? Huh?" Arnold Friend demanded. "Not worried about your hair blowing around in the car, are you?"

"No."

"Think I maybe can't drive good?"

"How do I know?"

"You're a hard girl to handle. How come?" he said. "Don't you know I'm your friend? Didn't you see me put my sign in the air when you walked by?" 75

"What sign?"

"My sign." And he drew an X in the air, leaning out toward her. They were maybe ten feet apart. After his hand fell back to his side the X was still in the air, almost visible. Connie let the screen door close and stood perfectly still inside it, listening to the music from her radio and the boy's blend together. She stared at Arnold Friend. He stood there so stiffly relaxed, pretending to be relaxed, with one hand idly on the door handle as if he were keeping himself up that way and had no intention of ever moving again. She recognized most things about him, the tight jeans that showed his thighs and buttocks and the greasy leather boots and the tight shirt, and even that slippery friendly smile of his, that sleepy dreamy smile that all the boys used to get across ideas they didn't want to put into words. She recognized all this and also the singsong way he talked, slightly mocking, kidding, but serious and a little melancholy, and she recognized the way he tapped one fist against the other in homage to the perpetual music behind him. But all these things did not come together.

She said suddenly, "Hey, how old are you?"

His smile faded. She could see then that he wasn't a kid, he was much older — thirty, maybe more. At this knowledge her heart began to pound faster.

"That's a crazy thing to ask. Can'tcha see I'm your own age?" 80

"Like hell you are."

"Or maybe a coupla years older, I'm eighteen."

"Eighteen?" she said doubtfully.

He grinned to reassure her and lines appeared at the corners of his mouth. His teeth were big and white. He grinned so broadly his eyes became slits and she saw how thick the lashes were, thick and black as if painted with a black tar-like material. Then he seemed to become embarrassed, abruptly, and looked over his shoulder at Ellie. "Him, he's crazy," he said. "Ain't he a riot, he's a nut, a real character." Ellie was still listening to the music. His sunglasses told nothing about what he was thinking. He wore a bright orange shirt unbuttoned halfway to show his chest, which was a pale, bluish chest and not muscular like Arnold Friend's. His shirt collar was turned up all around and the very tips of the collar pointed out past his chin as if they were protecting him. He was pressing the transistor radio up against his ear and sat there in a kind of daze, right in the sun.

"He's kinda strange," Connie said. 85

"Hey, she says you're kinda strange! Kinda strange!" Arnold Friend cried. He pounded on the car to get Ellie's attention. Ellie turned for the first time and Connie saw with shock that he wasn't a kid either — he had a fair, hairless face, cheeks reddened slightly as if the veins grew too close to the surface of his skin, the face of a forty-year-old baby. Connie felt a wave of dizziness rise in her at this sight and she stared at him as if waiting for something to change the shock of the moment, make it all right again. Ellie's lips kept shaping words, mumbling along with the words blasting his ear.

"Maybe you two better go away," Connie said faintly.

"What? How come?" Arnold Friend cried. "We come out here to take you for a ride. It's Sunday." He had the voice of the man on the radio now. It was the same voice, Connie thought. "Don'tcha know it's Sunday all day and honey, no matter who you were with last night today you're with Arnold Friend and don't you forget it! — Maybe you better step out here," he said, and this last was in a different voice. It was a little flatter, as if the heat was finally getting to him.

"No. I got things to do."

"Hey." 90

"You two better leave."

"We ain't leaving until you come with us."

"Like hell I am —"

"Connie, don't fool around with me. I mean — I mean, don't fool around," he said, shaking his head. He laughed incredulously. He placed his sunglasses on top of his head, carefully, as if he were indeed wearing a wig, and brought the stems down behind his ears. Connie stared at him, another wave of dizziness and fear rising in her so that for a moment he wasn't even in focus but was just a blur, standing there against his gold car, and she had the idea that he had driven up the driveway all right but had come from nowhere before that and belonged nowhere and that everything about him and even the music that was so familiar to her was only half real.

"If my father comes and sees you —" 95

"He ain't coming. He's at a barbecue."

"How do you know that?"

"Aunt Tillie's. Right now they're — uh — they're drinking. Sitting around," he said vaguely, squinting as if he were staring all the way to town and over to Aunt Tillie's back yard. Then the vision seemed to clear and he nodded energetically. "Yeah. Sitting around. There's your sister in a blue dress, huh? And high heels, the poor sad bitch — nothing like you, sweetheart! And your mother's helping some fat woman with the corn, they're cleaning the corn — husking the corn —"

"What fat woman?" Connie cried.

"How do I know what fat woman. I don't know every goddamn fat woman in the 100 world!" Arnold Friend laughed.

"Oh, that's Mrs. Hornby. . . . Who invited her?" Connie said. She felt a little lightheaded. Her breath was coming quickly.

"She's too fat. I don't like them fat. I like them the way you are, honey," he said, smiling sleepily at her. They stared at each other for a while, through the screen door. He said softly, "Now what you're going to do is this: you're going to come out that door. You're going to sit up front with me and Ellie's going to sit in the back, the hell with Ellie, right? This isn't Ellie's date. You're my date. I'm your lover, honey."

"What? You're crazy —"

"Yes, I'm your lover. You don't know what that is but you will," he said. "I know that too. I know all about you. But look: it's real nice and you couldn't ask for nobody better than me, or more polite. I always keep my word. I'll tell you how it is, I'm always nice at first, the first time. I'll hold you so tight you won't think you have to try to get away or pretend anything because you'll know you can't. And I'll come inside you where it's all secret and you'll give in to me and you'll love me—"

"Shut up! You're crazy!" Connie said. She backed away from the door. She put her hands against her ears as if she'd heard something terrible, something not meant for her. "People don't talk like that, you're crazy," she muttered. Her heart was almost too big now for her chest and its pumping made sweat break out all over her. She looked out to see Arnold Friend pause and then take a step toward the porch lurching. He almost fell. But, like a clever drunken man, he managed to catch his balance. He wobbled in his high boots and grabbed hold of one of the porch posts. 105

"Honey?" he said. "You still listening?"

"Get the hell out of here!"

"Be nice, honey. Listen."

"I'm going to call the police—"

He wobbled again and out of the side of his mouth came a fast spat curse, an aside not meant for her to hear. But even this "Christ!" sounded forced. Then he began to smile again. She watched this smile come, awkward as if he were smiling from inside a mask. His whole face was a mask, she thought wildly, tanned down onto his throat but then running out as if he had plastered make-up on his face but had forgotten about his throat. 110

"Honey—? Listen, here's how it is. I always tell the truth and I promise you this: I ain't coming in that house after you."

"You better not! I'm going to call the police if you—if you don't—"

"Honey," he said, talking right through her voice, "honey, I'm not coming in there but you are coming out here. You know why?"

She was panting. The kitchen looked like a place she had never seen before, some room she had run inside but which wasn't good enough, wasn't going to help her. The kitchen window had never had a curtain, after three years, and there were dishes in the sink for her to do—probably—and if you ran your hand across the table you'd probably feel something sticky there.

"You listening, honey? Hey?" 115

"—going to call the police—"

"Soon as you touch the phone I don't need to keep my promise and can come inside. You won't want that."

She rushed forward and tried to lock the door. Her fingers were shaking. "But why lock it," Arnold Friend said gently, talking right into her face. "It's just a screen door. It's just nothing." One of his boots was at a strange angle, as if his foot wasn't in it. It pointed out to the left, bent at the ankle. "I mean, anybody can break through a screen door and glass and wood and iron or anything else if he needs to, anybody at all and specially Arnold Friend. If the place got lit up with a fire, honey, you'd come runnin' out into my arms, right into my arms an' safe at home—like you knew I was your lover and'd stopped fooling around, I don't mind a nice shy girl but I don't like no fooling around." Part of those words were spoken with a slight rhythmic lilt, and Connie somehow recognized them — the echo of a song from last year, about a girl rushing into her boy friend's arms and coming home again —

Connie stood barefoot on the linoleum floor, staring at him. "What do you want?" she whispered.

"I want you," he said.

"What?"

"Seen you that night and thought, that's the one, yes sir. I never needed to look any more."

"But my father's coming back. He's coming to get me. I had to wash my hair first —" She spoke in a dry, rapid voice, hardly raising it for him to hear.

"No, your daddy is not coming and yes, you had to wash your hair and you washed it for me. It's nice and shining and all for me. I thank you, sweetheart," he said, with a mock bow, but again he almost lost his balance. He had to bend and adjust his boots. Evidently his feet did not go all the way down; the boots must have been stuffed with something so that he would seem taller. Connie stared out at him and behind him at Ellie in the car, who seemed to be looking off toward Connie's right, into nothing. Then Ellie said, pulling the words out of the air one after another as if he were just discovering them, "You want me to pull out the phone?"

"Shut your mouth and keep it shut," Arnold Friend said, his face red from bending over or maybe from embarrassment because Connie had seen his boots. "This ain't none of your business."

"What — what are you doing? What do you want?" Connie said. "If I call the police they'll get you, they'll arrest you —"

"Promise was not to come in unless you touch that phone, and I'll keep that promise," he said. He resumed his erect position and tried to force his shoulders back. He sounded like a hero in a movie, declaring something important. He spoke too loudly and it was as if he were speaking to someone behind Connie. "I ain't made plans for coming in that house where I don't belong but just for you to come out to me, the way you should. Don't you know who I am?"

"You're crazy," she whispered. She backed away from the door but did not want to go into another part of the house, as if this would give him permission to come through the door. "What do you . . . You're crazy, you . . ."

"Huh? What're you saying, honey?"

Her eyes darted everywhere in the kitchen. She could not remember what it was, this room.

"This is how it is, honey: you come out and we'll drive away, have a nice ride. But if you don't come out we're gonna wait till your people come home and then they're all going to get it."

"You want that telephone pulled out?" Ellie said. He held the radio away from his ear and grimaced, as if without the radio the air was too much for him.

"I toldja shut up, Ellie," Arnold Friend said, "you're deaf, get a hearing aid, right? Fix yourself up. This little girl's no trouble and's gonna be nice to me, so Ellie keep to yourself, this ain't your date — right? Don't hem in on me, don't hog, don't crush, don't bird dog, don't trail me," he said in a rapid, meaningless voice, as if he were running through all the expressions he'd learned but was no longer sure which one of them was in style, then rushing on to new ones, making them up with his eyes closed. "Don't crawl under my fence, don't squeeze in my chipmunk hole, don't sniff my glue, suck my popsicle, keep your own greasy fingers on yourself!" He shaded his eyes and peered in at Connie, who was backed against the kitchen table. "Don't mind him, honey, he's just a creep. He's a dope. Right? I'm the boy for you and like I said, you come out here nice like a lady and give me your hand, and nobody else gets hurt, I mean, your nice old bald-headed daddy and your mummy and your sister in her high heels. Because listen: why bring them in this?"

"Leave me alone," Connie whispered.

"Hey, you know that old woman down the road, the one with the chickens and stuff — you know her?" 135

"She's dead!"

"Dead? What? You know her?" Arnold Friend said.

"She's dead —"

"Don't you like her?"

"She's dead — she's — she isn't here any more —" 140

"But don't you like her, I mean, you got something against her? Some grudge or something?" Then his voice dipped as if he were conscious of rudeness. He touched the sunglasses on top of his head as if to make sure they were still there. "Now you be a good girl."

"What are you going to do?"

"Just two things, or maybe three," Arnold Friend said. "But I promise it won't last long and you'll like me that way you get to like people you're close to. You will. It's all over for you here, so come on out. You don't want your people in any trouble, do you?"

She turned and bumped against a chair or something, hurting her leg, but she ran into the back room and picked up the telephone. Something roared in her ear, a tiny roaring, and she was so sick with fear that she could do nothing but listen to it — the telephone was clammy and very heavy and her fingers groped down to the dial but were too weak to touch it. She began to scream into the phone, into the roaring. She cried out, she cried for her mother, she felt her breath start jerking back and forth in her lungs as if it were something Arnold Friend was stabbing her with again and again with no tenderness. A noisy sorrowful wailing rose all about her and she was locked inside it the way she was locked inside this house.

After a while she could hear again. She was sitting on the floor, with her wet back against the wall. 145

Arnold Friend was saying from the door, "That's a good girl. Put the phone back."

She kicked the phone away from her.

"No, honey. Pick it up. Put it back right."

She picked it up and put it back. The dial tone stopped.

"That's a good girl. Now you come outside." 150

She was hollow with what had been fear but what was now just an emptiness. All that screaming had blasted it out of her. She sat, one leg cramped under her, and deep inside her brain was something like a pinpoint of light that kept going and would not let her relax. She thought, I'm not going to see my mother again. She thought, I'm not going to sleep in my bed again. Her bright green blouse was all wet.

Arnold Friend said, in a gentle-loud voice that was like a stage voice, "The place where you came from ain't there any more, and where you had in mind to go is cancelled out. This place you are now — inside your daddy's house — is nothing but a cardboard box I can knock down any time. You know that and always did know it. You hear me?"

She thought, I have got to think. I have got to know what to do.

"We'll go out to a nice field, out in the country here where it smells so nice and it's sunny," Arnold Friend said. "I'll have my arms tight around you so you won't need to try to get away and I'll show you what love is like, what it does. The hell with this house! It looks solid all right," he said. He ran a fingernail down the screen and the noise did not make Connie shiver, as it would have the day before. "Now put your hand on your heart, honey. Feel that? That feels solid too but we know better. Be nice to me, be sweet like you can because what else is there for a girl like you but to be sweet and pretty and give in? — and get away before her people get back?"

She felt her pounding heart. Her hand seemed to enclose it. She thought for the 155 first time in her life that it was nothing that was hers, that belonged to her, but just a pounding, living thing inside this body that wasn't really hers either.

"You don't want them to get hurt," Arnold Friend went on. "Now get up, honey. Get up all by yourself."

She stood.

"Now turn this way. That's right. Come over to me — Ellie, put that away, didn't I tell you? You dope. You miserable creepy dope," Arnold Friend said. His words were not angry but only part of an incantation. The incantation was kindly. "Now come out through the kitchen to me honey and let's see a smile, try it, you're a brave sweet little girl and now they're eating corn and hotdogs cooked to bursting over an outdoor fire, and they don't know one thing about you and never did and honey you're better than them because not a one of them would have done this for you."

Connie felt the linoleum under her feet; it was cool. She brushed her hair back out of her eyes. Arnold Friend let go of the post tentatively and opened his arms for her, his elbows pointing in toward each other and his wrists limp, to show that this was an embarrassed embrace and a little mocking, he didn't want to make her self-conscious.

She put out her hand against the screen. She watched herself push the door slowly 160 open as if she were back safe somewhere in the other doorway, watching this body and this head of long hair moving out into the sunlight where Arnold Friend waited.

"My sweet little blue-eyed girl," he said in a half-sung sigh that had nothing to do with her brown eyes but was taken up just the same by the vast sunlit reaches of the land behind him and on all sides of him — so much land that Connie had never seen before and did not recognize except to know that she was going to it.

(1966)

Exploring the Text

1. How does Joyce Carol Oates characterize Connie? What part does June play in her characterization?
2. Do you think Connie is a typical American teenager? Are her qualities characteristic of teenagers in general or do they seem specific to an earlier time period? Explain your answer.
3. How does Oates develop the character of Arnold Friend? Look especially at her descriptions of his physical features and clothes.
4. What part does music play in this story? Why is it important to Connie?
5. How does Oates generate and control the story's suspense? At which points does the suspense increase with particular intensity? How does she convey Connie's mounting fear? What or who controls her actions?
6. Oates does not provide closure in this story. Why? Does the indeterminate ending add to or diminish the story's power. Explain your answer.
7. Oates says she based her story on three Tucson, Arizona, murders committed by Charles Schmid, the "Pied Piper of Tucson," in the 1960s. How does this link to an actual incident influence your reading of the story?
8. Oates dedicates the story to Bob Dylan and says she was inspired by his song "It's All Over Now, Baby Blue." Listen to the song, paying special attention to the lyrics. Why do you think Oates found the song compelling? What do you think inspired the dedication?

Adrienne Rich

Adrienne Rich (1929–2012) was an American poet, essayist, and scholar and considered one of the most influential poets of the late twentieth century. Born in Baltimore, Maryland, Rich graduated from Radcliffe College in 1951 and published her first collection of poems, A Change of World, the same year. In 1974, she won the National Book Award for her poetry collection Diving into the Wreck, and in 1976, she published Of Woman Born: Motherhood as Experience and Institution, an essay collection that established Rich as a women's rights advocate. She won many awards during her writing career, including a fellowship from the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation (1994) and the National Book Critics Circle Award (2005).

Diving into the Wreck

"Diving into the Wreck" is the title piece of Rich's 1973 collection, which won the National Book Award in 1974. Rich read a statement that she had prepared with Alice Walker and Audre Lord, two other poets whose work had been nominated, in which she said, "We appreciate the good faith of the judges for this award, but none of us could accept this money for herself, nor could she let go unquestioned

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

Stephen Jay Gould

Paleontologist and evolutionary biologist Stephen Jay Gould (1941–2002) was a professor of geology and zoology at Harvard University from 1967 until his death. His major scientific work was the theory of punctuated equilibrium, a biological theory that builds on the work of Charles Darwin by suggesting that evolution occurs sporadically, rather than gradually over a long period of time. Gould authored numerous books, including The Mismeasure of Man (1981); Wonderful Life: The Burgess Shale and the Nature of History (1989); his magnum opus, The Structure of Evolutionary Theory (2002); and The Hedgehog, the Fox, and the Magister's Pox: Mending the Gap between Science and the Humanities (2003).

Women's Brains

Gould wrote for a general audience in his column for Natural History, where the following essay originally appeared in 1980.

In the Prelude to Middlemarch, George Eliot lamented the unfulfilled lives of talented women:

> Some have felt that these blundering lives are due to the inconvenient indefiniteness with which the Supreme Power has fashioned the natures of women: if there were one level of feminine incompetence as strict as the ability to count three and no more, the social lot of women might be treated with scientific certitude.

Eliot goes on to discount the idea of innate limitation, but while she wrote in 1872, the leaders of European anthropometry were trying to measure "with scientific certitude" the inferiority of women. Anthropometry, or measurement of the human body, is not so fashionable a field these days, but it dominated the human sciences for much of the nineteenth century and remained popular until intelligence testing replaced skull measurement as a favored device for making invidious comparisons among races, classes, and sexes. Craniometry, or measurement of the skull, commanded the most attention and respect. Its unquestioned leader, Paul Broca (1824–80), professor of clinical surgery at the Faculty of Medicine in Paris, gathered a school of disciples and imitators around himself. Their work, so meticulous and apparently irrefutable, exerted great influence and won high esteem as a jewel of nineteenth-century science.

Broca's work seemed particularly invulnerable to refutation. Had he not measured with the most scrupulous care and accuracy? (Indeed, he had. I have the greatest respect for Broca's meticulous procedure. His numbers are sound. But science is an inferential exercise, not a catalog of facts. Numbers, by themselves, specify nothing. All depends upon what you do with them.) Broca depicted himself as an apostle of objectivity, a man who bowed before facts and cast aside superstition and sentimentality. He declared that "there is no faith, however respectable, no interest, however legitimate, which must not accommodate itself to the progress of human knowledge and bend before truth." Women, like it or not, had smaller brains than men and, therefore, could not equal them in intelligence. This fact, Broca argued, may reinforce a common prejudice in male society, but it is also a scientific truth. L. Manouvrier, a black sheep in Broca's fold, rejected the inferiority of women and wrote with feeling about the burden imposed upon them by Broca's numbers:

> Women displayed their talents and their diplomas. They also invoked philosophical authorities. But they were opposed by numbers unknown to Condorcet or to John Stuart Mill. These numbers fell upon poor women like a sledge hammer, and they were accompanied by commentaries and sarcasms more ferocious than the most misogynist imprecations of certain church fathers. The theologians had asked if women had a soul. Several centuries later, some scientists were ready to refuse them a human intelligence.

Broca's argument rested upon two sets of data: the larger brains of men in modern societies, and a supposed increase in male superiority through time. His most extensive data came from autopsies performed personally in four Parisian hospitals. For 292 male brains, he calculated an average weight of 1,325 grams; 140 female brains averaged 1,144 grams for a difference of 181 grams, or 14 percent of the male weight. Broca understood, of course, that part of this difference could be attributed to the greater height of males. Yet he made no attempt to measure the effect of size alone and actually stated that it cannot account for the entire difference because we know, a priori, that women are not as intelligent as men (a premise that the data were supposed to test, not rest upon):

> We might ask if the small size of the female brain depends exclusively upon the small size of her body. Tiedemann has proposed this explanation. But we must not forget that women are, on the average, a little less intelligent than men, a difference which we should not exaggerate but which is, nonetheless, real. We are therefore permitted to suppose that the relatively small size of the female brain depends in part upon her physical inferiority and in part upon her intellectual inferiority.

In 1873, the year after Eliot published Middlemarch, Broca measured the cranial capacities of prehistoric skulls from L'Homme Mort cave. Here he found a difference of only 99.5 cubic centimeters between males and females, while modern populations range from 129.5 to 220.7. Topinard, Broca's chief disciple, explained the increasing discrepancy through time as a result of differing evolutionary pressures upon dominant men and passive women: 5

> The man who fights for two or more in the struggle for existence, who has all the responsibility and the cares of tomorrow, who is constantly active in combating the environment and human rivals, needs more brain than the woman whom he must protect and nourish, the sedentary woman, lacking any interior occupations, whose role is to raise children, love, and be passive.

In 1879, Gustave Le Bon, chief misogynist of Broca's school, used these data to publish what must be the most vicious attack upon women in modern scientific literature (no one can top Aristotle). I do not claim his views were representative of Broca's school, but they were published in France's most respected anthropological journal. Le Bon concluded:

> In the most intelligent races, as among the Parisians, there are a large number of women whose brains are closer in size to those of gorillas than to the most developed male brains. This inferiority is so obvious that no one can contest it for a moment; only its degree is worth discussion. All psychologists who have studied the intelligence of women, as well as poets and novelists, recognize today that they represent the most inferior forms of human evolution and that they are closer to children and savages than to an adult, civilized man. They excel in fickleness, inconstancy, absence of thought and logic, and incapacity to reason. Without doubt there exist some distinguished women, very superior to the average man, but they are as exceptional as the birth of any monstrosity, as, for example, of a gorilla with two heads; consequently, we may neglect them entirely.

Nor did Le Bon shrink from the social implications of his views. He was horrified by the proposal of some American reformers to grant women higher education on the same basis as men:

> A desire to give them the same education, and, as a consequence, to propose the same goals for them, is a dangerous chimera. . . . The day when, misunderstanding the inferior occupations which nature has given her, women leave the home and take part in our battles; on this day a social revolution will begin, and everything that maintains the sacred ties of the family will disappear.

Sound familiar?[1]

I have reexamined Broca's data, the basis for all this derivative pronouncement, and I find his numbers sound but his interpretation ill-founded, to say the least. The data supporting his claim for increased difference through time can be easily dismissed. Broca based his contention on the samples from L'Homme Mort alone — only seven male and six female skulls in all. Never have so little data yielded such far-ranging conclusions.

In 1888, Topinard published Broca's more extensive data on the Parisian hospitals. Since Broca recorded height and age as well as brain size, we may use modern statistics to remove their effect. Brain weight decreases with age, and Broca's women were, on average, considerably older than his men. Brain weight increases with height, and his average man was almost half a foot taller than his average woman. I used multiple regression, a technique that allowed me to assess simultaneously the influence of height and age upon brain size. In an analysis of the data for women, I found that, at average male height and age, a woman's brain would weigh 1,212 grams.

---

[1]When I wrote this essay, I assumed that Le Bon was a marginal, if colorful, figure. I have since learned that he was a leading scientist, one of the founders of social psychology, and best known for a seminal study on crowd behavior, still cited today (La psychologie des foules, 1895), and for his work on unconscious motivation.

Correction for height and age reduces Broca's measured difference of 181 grams by more than a third, to 113 grams.

I don't know what to make of this remaining difference because I cannot assess other factors known to influence brain size in a major way. Cause of death has an important effect: degenerative disease often entails a substantial diminution of brain size. (This effect is separate from the decrease attributed to age alone.) Eugene Schreider, also working with Broca's data, found that men killed in accidents had brains weighing, on average, 60 grams more than men dying of infectious diseases. The best modern data I can find (from American hospitals) records a full 100-gram difference between death by degenerative arteriosclerosis and by violence or accident. Since so many of Broca's subjects were very elderly women, we may assume that lengthy degenerative disease was more common among them than among the men. 10

More importantly, modern students of brain size still have not agreed on a proper measure for eliminating the powerful effect of body size. Height is partly adequate, but men and women of the same height do not share the same body build. Weight is even worse than height, because most of its variation reflects nutrition rather than intrinsic size — fat versus skinny exerts little influence upon the brain. Manouvrier took up this subject in the 1880s and argued that muscular mass and force should be used. He tried to measure this elusive property in various ways and found a marked difference in favor of men, even in men and women of the same height. When he corrected for what he called "sexual mass," women actually came out slightly ahead in brain size.

Thus, the corrected 113-gram difference is surely too large; the true figure is probably close to zero and may as well favor women as men. And 113 grams, by the way, is exactly the average difference between a 5 foot 4 inch and a 6 foot 4 inch male in Broca's data. We would not (especially us short folks) want to ascribe greater intelligence to tall men. In short, who knows what to do with Broca's data? They certainly don't permit any confident claim that men have bigger brains than women.

To appreciate the social role of Broca and his school, we must recognize that his statements about the brains of women do not reflect an isolated prejudice toward a single disadvantaged group. They must be weighed in the context of a general theory that supported contemporary social distinctions as biologically ordained. Women, blacks, and poor people suffered the same disparagement, but women bore the brunt of Broca's argument because he had easier access to data on women's brains. Women were singularly denigrated but they also stood as surrogates for other disenfranchised groups. As one of Broca's disciples wrote in 1881: "Men of the black races have a brain scarcely heavier than that of white women." This juxtaposition extended into many other realms of anthropological argument, particularly to claims that, anatomically and emotionally, both women and blacks were like white children — and that white children, by the theory of recapitulation, represented an ancestral (primitive) adult stage of human evolution. I do not regard as empty rhetoric the claim that women's battles are for all of us.

Maria Montessori did not confine her activities to educational reform for young children. She lectured on anthropology for several years at the University of Rome, and wrote an influential book entitled Pedagogical Anthropology (English edition, 1913). Montessori was no egalitarian. She supported most of Broca's work and the theory of innate criminality proposed by her compatriot Cesare Lombroso. She measured the circumference of children's heads in her schools and inferred that the best prospects had bigger brains. But she had no use for Broca's conclusions about women. She discussed Manouvrier's work at length and made much of his tentative claim that women, after proper correction of the data, had slightly larger brains than men. Women, she concluded, were intellectually superior, but men had prevailed heretofore by dint of physical force. Since technology has abolished force as an instrument of power, the era of women may soon be upon us: "In such an epoch there will really be superior human beings, there will really be men strong in morality and in sentiment. Perhaps in this way the reign of women is approaching, when the enigma of her anthropological superiority will be deciphered. Woman was always the custodian of human sentiment, morality and honor."

This represents one possible antidote to "scientific" claims for the constitutional 15 inferiority of certain groups. One may affirm the validity of biological distinctions but argue that the data have been misinterpreted by prejudiced men with a stake in the outcome, and that disadvantaged groups are truly superior. In recent years, Elaine Morgan has followed this strategy in her Descent of Woman, a speculative reconstruction of human prehistory from the woman's point of view — and as farcical as more famous tall tales by and for men.

I prefer another strategy. Montessori and Morgan followed Broca's philosophy to reach a more congenial conclusion. I would rather label the whole enterprise of setting a biological value upon groups for what it is: irrelevant and highly injurious. George Eliot well appreciated the special tragedy that biological labeling imposed upon members of disadvantaged groups. She expressed it for people like herself — women of extraordinary talent. I would apply it more widely — not only to those whose dreams are flouted but also to those who never realize that they may dream — but I cannot match her prose. In conclusion, then, the rest of Eliot's prelude to Middlemarch:

> The limits of variation are really much wider than anyone would imagine from the sameness of women's coiffure and the favorite love stories in prose and verse. Here and there a cygnet is reared uneasily among the ducklings in the brown pond, and never finds the living stream in fellowship with its own oary-footed kind. Here and there is born a Saint Theresa, foundress of nothing, whose loving heartbeats and sobs after an unattained goodness tremble off and are dispersed among hindrances instead of centering in some long-recognizable deed.
>
> (1980)

Exploring the Text

1. What purposes do the quotations from George Eliot's novel Middlemarch serve in this essay? Why does Stephen Jay Gould refer to Eliot when he introduces the quotation from Broca in paragraph 5? Why are quotations from Eliot, whose real name was Mary Anne Evans, especially appropriate for Gould's essay?

2. Gould builds two parallel arguments: one on scientific method, another on speculative conclusions. In which paragraphs does he question the scientific methods rather than the findings themselves? How does he weave the two arguments together to make his point?
3. How does each of the individuals Gould cites — Paul Broca, L. Manouvrier, Gustave Le Bon, and Maria Montessori — contribute to the development of his argument?
4. At the end of paragraph 7, Gould adds a footnote reassessing an earlier point. Does this admission add to or detract from his credibility? Explain your answer.
5. In paragraph 13, Gould shows how Broca and his colleagues extended their conclusions to other groups. What is Gould's purpose in developing this point as elaborately as he does?
6. In paragraph 4, why is questioning Maria Montessori's research and conclusions an effective strategy? What criticism might Gould be guarding against in doing so?
7. This essay has a strong appeal to logos, as would be expected of a scientific argument. How does Gould also appeal to pathos? How does that appeal add to the persuasiveness of his argument?
8. How do Gould's occasional shifts from the third person to the first person strengthen or weaken his essay?
9. How would you characterize the audience for whom Gould is writing? Do you think fellow scientists are part of that audience? Explain why or why not.
10. What does Gould mean when he says, "Women were singularly denigrated but they also stood as surrogates for other disenfranchised groups" (par. 13)?
11. Why does Gould say, "I do not regard as empty rhetoric the claim that women's battles are for all of us" (par. 13)? Does such a personal comment undermine his scientific credibility? Explain.

Sharon Olds

Sharon Olds was born in San Francisco in 1942 and was raised, as she describes it, "as a hellfire Calvinist." She received a BA from Stanford University and a PhD from Columbia University and has taught at New York University since 1987. Olds has published several collections of poems to considerable acclaim. Her first collection, Satan Says (1980), won the San Francisco Poetry Center Award, and The Dead and the Living (1983) won the 1983 Lamont Poetry Prize and the National Book Critics Circle Award. Nine additional collections of her work have been published in English, and her poems have been widely translated. Her most recent volume, One Secret Thing, was published in 2008.

Rite of Passage

"Rite of Passage" was published in The Dead and the Living. In it, Olds examines a critical rite of passage for a young man: the birthday party.

As the guests arrive at my son's party they gather in the living room — short men, men in first grade with smooth jaws and chins.
Hands in pockets, they stand around jostling, jockeying for place, small fights breaking out and calming. One says to another
How old are you? Six. I'm seven. So?
They eye each other, seeing themselves tiny in the other's pupils. They clear their throats a lot, a room of small bankers, they fold their arms and frown. I could beat you up, a seven says to a six,
the dark cake, round and heavy as a turret, behind them on the table. My son, freckles like specks of nutmeg on his cheeks, chest narrow as the balsa keel of a model boat, long hands cool and thin as the day they guided him out of me, speaks up as a host for the sake of the group.
We could easily kill a two-year-old, he says in his clear voice. The other men agree, they clear their throats like Generals, they relax and get down to playing war, celebrating my son's life.

(1983)

Exploring the Text

1. What argument does Sharon Olds make about the development of gender roles in "Rite of Passage"?
2. How would you describe the tone of this poem? How does the tone reflect the attitude of the speaker?
3. Are the images in the poem mainly literal or figurative? What do the images in this poem evoke?

4. Explain the title of the poem. Why do you think Olds used it? What other rites of passage do you know about? Are they anything like what Olds describes here? How are they the same? How are they different?
5. Olds avoids calling these first graders boys and does not use their names. At one point she even refers to them as "a six" and "a seven." Why do you think she made that decision?
6. Imagine this poem beginning

> As the guests arrive at my daughter's party > they gather in the living room — > short women, women in first grade

Where would you take it from there?

Naomi Shihab Nye

Poet, novelist, editor, and political activist Naomi Shihab Nye (b. 1952) is the daughter of a Palestinian father and an American mother. Nye grew up in St. Louis, Missouri, and currently lives in San Antonio, Texas. Her works for children include the picture book Sitti's Secret (1994) and the novel Habibi (1996). Her poetry collections include Different Ways to Pray (1980), 19 Varieties of Gazelle: Poems of the Middle East (2002), and Transfer (2011). She has won many awards and fellowships, including four Pushcart Prizes (for best work from small presses), the Jane Addams Children's Book Award, and the Isabella Gardner Poetry Award. Nye, who has been a visiting writer all over the world, describes herself as "a wandering poet."

Arabic Coffee

"Arabic Coffee" was first published in 1986 as an illustrated pamphlet-style broadside.

It was never too strong for us:
make it blacker, Papa,
thick in the bottom,
tell again how years will gather in small white cups,
how luck lives in a spot of grounds.

Leaning over the stove, he let it boil to the top, and down again.
Two times. No sugar in his pot.

And the place where men and women break off from one another was not present in that room.
The hundred disappointments, fire swallowing olive-wood beads at the warehouse, and the dreams tucked like pocket handkerchiefs into each day, took their places on the table, near the half-empty dish of corn. And none was more important than the others, and all were guests. When he carried the tray into the room, high and balanced in his hands,
it was an offering to all of them, stay, be seated, follow the talk wherever it goes. The coffee was the center of the flower.
Like clothes on a line saying
You will live long enough to wear me, a motion of faith. There is this,
and there is more.

(1986)

Exploring the Text

1. What do you think the coffee represents in "Arabic Coffee"? Consider both its literal and symbolic meanings.
2. What is the purpose of "Arabic Coffee"? How do the contrasts within the poem help Naomi Shihab Nye achieve her purpose?
3. How do you think the speaker feels about her father? Use words or phrases from the poem to explain your answer.
4. Look carefully at lines 10–12, "And the place where men and women / break off from one another / was not present in that room." Why does Nye consider the separation of men and women a "place"? What do you think it means when she says it's not present in the room where the coffee is being served? How does it connect to the seven lines that follow?
5. How does "Arabic Coffee" comment on both traditional values and the values of modern culture?

Brent Staples

An author and editorial writer for the New York Times, Brent Staples (b. 1951) grew up in Pennsylvania in a family of nine children. He received his BA from Widener University and his PhD in psychology from the University of Chicago. His memoir, Parallel Time: Growing Up in Black and White (1994), won the Anisfield-Wolf Book Award, which recognizes books that contribute to a deeper appreciation of cultural diversity.

Just Walk On By A Black Man Ponders His Power to Alter Public Space

The following essay originally appeared in Ms. magazine in 1986.

My first victim was a woman — white, well dressed, probably in her early twenties. I came upon her late one evening on a deserted street in Hyde Park, a relatively affluent neighborhood in an otherwise mean, impoverished section of Chicago. As I swung onto the avenue behind her, there seemed to be a discreet, uninflammatory distance between us. Not so. She cast back a worried glance. To her, the youngish black man — a broad six feet two inches with a beard and billowing hair, both hands shoved into the pockets of a bulky military jacket — seemed menacingly close. After a few more quick glimpses, she picked up her pace and was soon running in earnest. Within seconds she disappeared into a cross street.

That was more than a decade ago. I was twenty-two years old, a graduate student newly arrived at the University of Chicago. It was in the echo of that terrified woman's footfalls that I first began to know the unwieldy inheritance I'd come into — the ability to alter public space in ugly ways. It was clear that she thought herself the quarry of a mugger, a rapist, or worse. Suffering a bout of insomnia, however, I was stalking sleep, not defenseless wayfarers. As a softy who is scarcely able to take a knife to a raw chicken — let alone hold it to a person's throat — I was surprised, embarrassed, and dismayed all at once. Her flight made me feel like an accomplice in tyranny. It also made it clear that I was indistinguishable from the muggers who occasionally seeped into the area from the surrounding ghetto. That first encounter, and those that followed, signified that a vast, unnerving gulf lay between nighttime pedestrians — particularly women — and me. And I soon gathered that being perceived as dangerous is a hazard in itself. I only needed to turn a corner into a dicey situation, or crowd some frightened, armed person in a foyer somewhere, or make an errant move after being pulled over by a policeman. Where fear and weapons meet — and they often do in urban America — there is always the possibility of death.

In that first year, my first away from my hometown, I was to become thoroughly familiar with the language of fear. At dark, shadowy intersections in Chicago, I could cross in front of a car stopped at a traffic light and elicit the thunk, thunk, thunk, thunk of the driver — black, white, male, or female — hammering down the door locks. On less traveled streets after dark, I grew accustomed to but never comfortable with people who crossed to the other side of the street rather than pass me. Then there were the standard unpleasantries with police, doormen, bouncers, cabdrivers, and others whose business is to screen out troublesome individuals before there is any nastiness.

I moved to New York nearly two years ago and I have remained an avid night walker. In central Manhattan, the near-constant crowd cover minimizes tense one-on-one street encounters. Elsewhere — visiting friends in Soho, where sidewalks are narrow and tightly spaced buildings shut out the sky — things can get very taut indeed.

Black men have a firm place in New York mugging literature. Norman Podhoretz 5 in his famed (or infamous) 1963 essay, "My Negro Problem — And Ours," recalls growing up in terror of black males; they "were tougher than we were, more ruthless," he writes — and as an adult on the Upper West Side of Manhattan, he continues, he cannot constrain his nervousness when he meets black men on certain streets. Similarly, a decade later, the essayist and novelist Edward Hoagland extols a New York where once "Negro bitterness bore down mainly on other Negroes." Where some see mere panhandlers, Hoagland sees "a mugger who is clearly screwing up his nerve to do more than just ask for money." But Hoagland has "the New Yorker's quick-hunch posture for broken-field maneuvering," and the bad guy swerves away.

I often witness that "hunch posture," from women after dark on the warren-like streets of Brooklyn where I live. They seem to set their faces on neutral and, with their purse straps strung across their chests bandolier style, they forge ahead as though bracing themselves against being tackled. I understand, of course, that the danger they perceive is not a hallucination. Women are particularly vulnerable to street violence, and young black males are drastically overrepresented among the perpetrators of that violence. Yet these truths are no solace against the kind of alienation that comes of being ever the suspect, against being set apart, a fearsome entity with whom pedestrians avoid making eye contact.

It is not altogether clear to me how I reached the ripe old age of twenty-two without being conscious of the lethality nighttime pedestrians attributed to me. Perhaps it was because in Chester, Pennsylvania, the small, angry industrial town where I came of age in the 1960s, I was scarcely noticeable against a backdrop of gang warfare, street knifings, and murders. I grew up one of the good boys, had perhaps a half-dozen fistfights. In retrospect, my shyness of combat has clear sources.

Many things go into the making of a young thug. One of those things is the consummation of the male romance with the power to intimidate. An infant discovers that random flailings send the baby bottle flying out of the crib and crashing to the floor. Delighted, the joyful babe repeats those motions again and again, seeking to duplicate the feat. Just so, I recall the points at which some of my boyhood friends were finally seduced by the perception of themselves as tough guys. When a mark cowered and surrendered his money without resistance, myth and reality merged — and paid off. It is, after all, only manly to embrace the power to frighten and intimidate. We, as men, are not supposed to give an inch of our lane on the highway; we are to seize the fighter's edge in work and in play and even in love; we are to be valiant in the face of hostile forces.

Unfortunately, poor and powerless young men seem to take all this nonsense literally. As a boy, I saw countless tough guys locked away; I have since buried several, too. They were babies, really — a teenage cousin, a brother of twenty-two, a childhood friend in his midtwenties — all gone down in episodes of bravado played out in the streets. I came to doubt the virtues of intimidation early on. I chose, perhaps even unconsciously, to remain a shadow — timid, but a survivor.

The fearsomeness mistakenly attributed to me in public places often has a perilous flavor. The most frightening of these confusions occurred in the late 1970s and early 1980s when I worked as a journalist in Chicago. One day, rushing into the office of a magazine I was writing for with a deadline story in hand, I was mistaken for a burglar. The office manager called security and, with an ad hoc posse, pursued me through the labyrinthine halls, nearly to my editor's door. I had no way of proving who I was. I could only move briskly toward the company of someone who knew me. 10

Another time I was on assignment for a local paper and killing time before an interview. I entered a jewelry store on the city's affluent Near North Side. The proprietor excused herself and returned with an enormous red Doberman pinscher straining at the end of a leash. She stood, the dog extended toward me, silent to my questions, her eyes bulging nearly out of her head. I took a cursory look around, nodded, and bade her good night. Relatively speaking, however, I never fared as badly as another black male journalist. He went to nearby Waukegan, Illinois, a couple of summers ago to work on a story about a murderer who was born there. Mistaking the reporter for the killer, police hauled him from his car at gunpoint and but for his press credentials would probably have tried to book him. Such episodes are not uncommon. Black men trade tales like this all the time.

In "My Negro Problem — And Ours," Podhoretz writes that the hatred he feels for blacks makes itself known to him through a variety of avenues — one being his discomfort with that "special brand of paranoid touchiness" to which he says blacks are prone. No doubt he is speaking here of black men. In time, I learned to smother the rage I felt at so often being taken for a criminal. Not to do so would surely have led to madness — via that special "paranoid touchiness" that so annoyed Podhoretz at the time he wrote the essay.

I began to take precautions to make myself less threatening. I move about with care, particularly late in the evening. I give a wide berth to nervous people on subway platforms during the wee hours, particularly when I have exchanged business clothes for jeans. If I happen to be entering a building behind some people who appear skittish, I may walk by, letting them clear the lobby before I return, so as not to seem to be following them. I have been calm and extremely congenial on those rare occasions when I've been pulled over by the police.

And on late-evening constitutionals along streets less traveled by, I employ what has proved to be an excellent tension-reducing measure: I whistle melodies from Beethoven and Vivaldi and the more popular classical composers. Even steely New Yorkers hunching toward nighttime destinations seem to relax, and occasionally they even join in the tune. Virtually everybody seems to sense that a mugger wouldn't be warbling bright, sunny selections from Vivaldi's Four Seasons. It is my equivalent of the cowbell that hikers wear when they know they are in bear country.

(1986)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the impact of the opening sentence, "My first victim was a woman . . ."? How is Brent Staples using the term victim? How does the meaning of the sentence and the term change as you read and reread the essay?
2. How does the description at the beginning resemble a scene from a novel? What mood does Staples set with the details and specific words he chooses? Pay close attention to modifiers and verbs.
3. What examples does Staples provide to illustrate "the language of fear" (par. 3)?
4. In what ways does Staples acknowledge that the "victim's" response is not unwarranted? What explanations does he provide for her behavior? To what extent does he blame her? Does he want us as readers to blame or be more sympathetic toward her?
5. What is Staples's purpose in quoting Norman Podhoretz and Edward Hoagland? Are they providing support for his viewpoint, a contrasting viewpoint, expert testimony, or something else?
6. Is Staples being ironic when he writes, "I began to take precautions to make myself less threatening" (par. 13)? Cite specific parts of the text to support your viewpoint.
7. Is the final paragraph intended to be flippant? Humorous? Explain whether you find it an effective conclusion to the essay.
8. How would you describe the overall tone of this essay? You might consider a phrase rather than a single word to capture the complexity of this piece. Support your reading with specific references to Staples's language.
9. Staples first wrote this essay in 1986. Do you think the essay is dated? Explain why you do or do not feel that many people in today's society continue to perceive young African American males as threatening.

Yusef Komunyakaa

Yusef Komunyakaa was born James Willie Brown Jr. in 1947 and raised in Bogalusa, Louisiana. He has taught in New Orleans public schools, at Indiana University, and at Princeton University, and he is currently teaching at New York University. Fresh out of high school, Komunyakaa enlisted in the army and served in Vietnam, an experience that permeates his poetry. It was many years before he felt he could write about his time spent there.

Speaking of his war experience to the New York Times, Komunyakaa said, "I never used the word 'gook' or 'dink' in Vietnam. There is a certain kind of dehumanization that takes place to create an enemy, to call up the passion to kill this person. I knew something about that growing up in Louisiana." He was awarded the 1994 Pulitzer Prize for Neon Vernacular: New and Selected Poems.

Facing It

"Facing It" — about an encounter with the Vietnam Veterans Memorial — is from Komunyakaa's collection Dien Cai Dau (1988).

My black face fades, hiding inside the black granite.
I said I wouldn't,
dammit: No tears.
I'm stone. I'm flesh.
My clouded reflection eyes me like a bird of prey, the profile of night slanted against morning. I turn this way — the stone lets me go.
I turn that way — I'm inside the Vietnam Veterans Memorial again, depending on the light to make a difference.
I go down the 58,022 names, half-expecting to find my own in letters like smoke.
I touch the name Andrew Johnson;
I see the booby trap's white flash.
Names shimmer on a woman's blouse but when she walks away
the names stay on the wall.
Brushstrokes flash, a red bird's wings cutting across my stare.
The sky. A plane in the sky.
A white vet's image floats closer to me, then his pale eyes look through mine. I'm a window.
He's lost his right arm inside the stone. In the black mirror a woman's trying to erase names:
No, she's brushing a boy's hair.

(1988)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the effect of the mirror imagery in the poem?
2. How does the juxtaposition of stone and flesh in line 5 contribute to the meaning of the poem?
3. How would you describe the tone created by the imagery of lines 6–8?
4. Why is the poem titled "Facing It"? Has the speaker found peace? Explain.
5. Does this poem make an argument or is it solely a personal reflection? Explain your answer.
6. In an interview with the New York Times, Komunyakaa said that his life was a "healing process from the two places: Bogalusa and Vietnam." How does this poem read as a statement of the healing process?

Tim O'Brien

Tim O'Brien (b. 1946) grew up in a small town in Minnesota. In 1968, he received a BA from Macalester College and, soon thereafter, a draft notice. He served as a soldier in the Vietnam War and wrote about his experiences in his memoir, If I Die in a Combat Zone (1973). O'Brien won the National Book Award in 1979 for a novel about the war, Going after Cacciato.

On the Rainy River

"On the Rainy River" is from The Things They Carried (1990), a work of fiction that O'Brien based on his war experiences and in which he placed himself as the protagonist.

This is one story I've never told before. Not to anyone. Not to my parents, not to my brother or sister, not even to my wife. To go into it, I've always thought, would only cause embarrassment for all of us, a sudden need to be elsewhere, which is the natural response to a confession. Even now, I'll admit, the story makes me squirm. For more than twenty years I've had to live with it, feeling the shame, trying to push it away, and so by this act of remembrance, by putting the facts down on paper, I'm hoping to relieve at least some of the pressure on my dreams. Still, it's a hard story to tell. All of us, I suppose, like to believe that in a moral emergency we will behave like the heroes of our youth, bravely and forthrightly, without thought of personal loss or discredit. Certainly that was my conviction back in the summer of 1968. Tim O'Brien: a secret hero. The Lone Ranger. If the stakes ever became high enough — if the evil were evil enough, if the good were good enough — I would simply tap a secret reservoir of courage that had been accumulating inside me over the years. Courage, I seemed to think, comes to us in finite quantities, like an inheritance, and by being frugal and stashing it away and letting it earn interest, we steadily increase our moral capital in preparation for that day when the account must be drawn down. It was a comforting theory. It dispensed with all those bothersome little acts of daily courage; it offered hope and grace to the repetitive coward; it justified the past while amortizing the future.

In June of 1968, a month after graduating from Macalester College, I was drafted to fight a war I hated. I was twenty-one years old. Young, yes, and politically naive, but even so the American war in Vietnam seemed to me wrong. Certain blood was being shed for uncertain reasons. I saw no unity of purpose, no consensus on matters of philosophy or history or law. The very facts were shrouded in uncertainty: Was it a civil war? A war of national liberation or simple aggression? Who started it, and when, and why? What really happened to the USS Maddox on that dark night in the Gulf of Tonkin? Was Ho Chi Minh a Communist stooge, or a nationalist savior, or both, or neither? What about the Geneva Accords? What about SEATO and the Cold War? What about dominoes? America was divided on these and a thousand other issues, and the debate had spilled out across the floor of the United States Senate and into the streets, and smart men in pinstripes could not agree on even the most fundamental matters of public policy. The only certainty that summer was moral confusion. It was my view then, and still is, that you don't make war without knowing why. Knowledge, of course, is always imperfect, but it seemed to me that when a nation goes to war it must have reasonable confidence in the justice and imperative of its cause. You can't fix your mistakes. Once people are dead, you can't make them undead.

In any case those were my convictions, and back in college I had taken a modest stand against the war. Nothing radical, no hothead stuff, just ringing a few doorbells for Gene McCarthy, composing a few tedious, uninspired editorials for the campus newspaper. Oddly, though, it was almost entirely an intellectual activity. I brought some energy to it, of course, but it was the energy that accompanies almost any abstract endeavor; I felt no personal danger; I felt no sense of an impending crisis in my life. Stupidly, with a kind of smug removal that I can't begin to fathom, I assumed that the problems of killing and dying did not fall within my special province.

The draft notice arrived on June 17, 1968. It was a humid afternoon, I remember, cloudy and very quiet, and I'd just come in from a round of golf. My mother and father were having lunch out in the kitchen. I remember opening up the letter, scanning the first few lines, feeling the blood go thick behind my eyes. I remember a sound in my head. It wasn't thinking, just a silent howl. A million things all at once — I was too good for this war. Too smart, too compassionate, too everything. It couldn't happen. I was above it. I had the world . . . [licked] — Phi Beta Kappa and summa cum laude and president of the student body and a full-ride scholarship for grad studies at Harvard. A mistake maybe — a foul-up in the paperwork. I was no soldier. I hated Boy Scouts. I hated camping out. I hated dirt and tents and mosquitoes. The sight of blood made me queasy, and I couldn't tolerate authority, and I didn't know a rifle from a slingshot. I was a liberal, for Christ sake: If they needed fresh bodies, why not draft some back-to-the-stone-age hawk? Or some dumb jingo in his hard hat and Bomb Hanoi button, or one of LBJ's pretty daughters, or [General William] Westmoreland's whole handsome family — nephews and nieces and baby grandson. There should be a law, I thought. If you support a war, if you think it's worth the price, that's fine, but you have to put your own precious fluids on the line. You have to head for the front and hook up with an infantry unit and help spill the blood. And you have to bring along your wife, or your kids, or your lover. A law, I thought.

I remember the rage in my stomach. Later it burned down to a smoldering self- 5 pity, then to numbness. At dinner that night my father asked what my plans were. "Nothing," I said. "Wait."

I spent the summer of 1968 working in an Armour meatpacking plant in my hometown of Worthington, Minnesota. The plant specialized in pork products, and for eight hours a day I stood on a quarter-mile assembly line — more properly, a disassembly line — removing blood clots from the necks of dead pigs. My job title, I believe, was Declotter. After slaughter, the hogs were decapitated, split down the length of the belly, pried open, eviscerated, and strung up by the hind hocks on a high conveyer belt. Then gravity took over. By the time a carcass reached my spot on the line, the fluids had mostly drained out, everything except for thick clots of blood in the neck and upper chest cavity. To remove the stuff, I used a kind of water gun. The machine was heavy, maybe eighty pounds, and was suspended from the ceiling by a heavy rubber cord. There was some bounce to it, an elastic up-and-down give, and the trick was to maneuver the gun with your whole body, not lifting with the arms, just letting the rubber cord do the work for you. At one end was a trigger; at the muzzle end was a small nozzle and a steel roller brush. As a carcass passed by, you'd lean forward and swing the gun up against the clots and squeeze the trigger, all in one motion, and the brush would whirl and water would come shooting out and you'd hear a quick splattering sound as the clots dissolved into a fine red mist. It was not pleasant work. Goggles were a necessity, and a rubber apron, but even so it was like standing for eight hours a day under a lukewarm blood-shower. At night I'd go home smelling of pig. It wouldn't go away. Even after a hot bath, scrubbing hard, the stink was always there — like old bacon, or sausage, a dense greasy pig-stink that soaked deep into my skin and hair. Among other things, I remember, it was tough getting dates that summer. I felt isolated; I spent a lot of time alone. And there was also that draft notice tucked away in my wallet.

In the evenings I'd sometimes borrow my father's car and drive aimlessly around town, feeling sorry for myself, thinking about the war and the pig factory and how my life seemed to be collapsing toward slaughter. I felt paralyzed. All around me the options seemed to be narrowing, as if I were hurtling down a huge black funnel, the whole world squeezing in tight. There was no happy way out. The government had ended most graduate school deferments; the waiting lists for the National Guard and Reserves were impossibly long; my health was solid; I didn't qualify for CO [conscientious objector] status — no religious grounds, no history as a pacifist. Moreover, I could not claim to be opposed to war as a matter of general principle. There were occasions, I believed, when a nation was justified in using military force to achieve its ends, to stop a Hitler or some comparable evil, and I told myself that in such circumstances

I would've willingly marched off to the battle. The problem, though, was that a draft board did not let you choose your war.

Beyond all this, or at the very center, was the raw fact of terror. I did not want to die. Not ever. But certainly not then, not there, not in a wrong war. Driving up Main Street, past the courthouse and the Ben Franklin store, I sometimes felt the fear spreading inside me like weeds. I imagined myself dead. I imagined myself doing things I could not do — charging an enemy position, taking aim at another human being.

At some point in mid-July I began thinking seriously about Canada. The border lay a few hundred miles north, an eight-hour drive. Both my conscience and my instincts were telling me to make a break for it, just take off and run like hell and never stop. In the beginning the idea seemed purely abstract, the word Canada printing itself out in my head; but after a time I could see particular shapes and images, the sorry details of my own future — a hotel room in Winnipeg, a battered old suitcase, my father's eyes as I tried to explain myself over the telephone. I could almost hear his voice, and my mother's. Run, I'd think. Then I'd think, Impossible. Then a second later I'd think, Run.

It was a kind of schizophrenia. A moral split. I couldn't make up my mind. I feared the war, yes, but I also feared exile. I was afraid of walking away from my own life, my friends and my family, my whole history, everything that mattered to me. I feared losing the respect of my parents. I feared the law. I feared ridicule and censure. My hometown was a conservative little spot on the prairie, a place where tradition counted, and it was easy to imagine people sitting around a table down at the old Gobbler Café on Main Street, coffee cups poised, the conversation slowly zeroing in on the young O'Brien kid, how the damned sissy had taken off for Canada. At night, when I couldn't sleep, I'd sometimes carry on fierce arguments with those people. I'd be screaming at them, telling them how much I detested their blind, thoughtless, automatic acquiescence to it all, their simple-minded patriotism, their prideful ignorance, their love-it-or-leave-it platitudes, how they were sending me off to fight a war they didn't understand and didn't want to understand. I held them responsible. By God, yes, I did. All of them — I held them personally and individually responsible — the polyestered Kiwanis boys, the merchants and farmers, the pious churchgoers, the chatty housewives, the PTA and the Lions club and the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the fine upstanding gentry out at the country club. They didn't know Bao Dai from the man in the moon. They didn't know history. They didn't know the first thing about Diem's tyranny, or the nature of Vietnamese nationalism, or the long colonialism of the French — this was all too damned complicated, it required some reading — but no matter, it was a war to stop the Communists, plain and simple, which was how they liked things, and you were a . . . [traitor] if you had second thoughts about killing or dying for plain and simple reasons. 10

I was bitter, sure. But it was so much more than that. The emotions went from outrage to terror to bewilderment to guilt to sorrow and then back again to outrage. I felt a sickness inside me. Real disease.

Most of this I've told before, or at least hinted at, but what I have never told is the full truth. How I cracked. How at work one morning, standing on the pig line,

I felt something break open in my chest. I don't know what it was. I'll never know. But it was real, I know that much, it was a physical rupture — a cracking-leaking-popping feeling. I remember dropping my water gun. Quickly, almost without thought, I took off my apron and walked out of the plant and drove home. It was midmorning, I remember, and the house was empty. Down in my chest there was still that leaking sensation, something very warm and precious spilling out, and I was covered with blood and hog-stink, and for a long while I just concentrated on holding myself together. I remember taking a hot shower. I remember packing a suitcase and carrying it out to the kitchen, standing very still for a few minutes, looking carefully at the familiar objects all around me. The old chrome toaster, the telephone, the pink and white Formica on the kitchen counters. The room was full of bright sunshine. Everything sparkled. My house, I thought. My life. I'm not sure how long I stood there, but later I scribbled out a short note to my parents.

What it said, exactly, I don't recall now. Something vague. Taking off, will call, love Tim.

I drove north.

It's a blur now, as it was then, and all I remember is a sense of high velocity and the 15 feel of the steering wheel in my hands. I was riding on adrenaline. A giddy feeling, in a way, except there was the dreamy edge of impossibility to it — like running a dead-end maze — no way out — it couldn't come to a happy conclusion and yet I was doing it anyway because it was all I could think of to do. It was pure light, fast and mindless. I had no plan. Just hit the border at high speed and crash through and keep on running. Near dusk I passed through Bemidji, then turned northeast toward International Falls. I spent the night in the car behind a closed-down gas station a half mile from the border. In the morning, after gassing up, I headed straight west along the Rainy River, which separates Minnesota from Canada, and which for me separated one life from another. The land was mostly wilderness. Here and there I passed a motel or bait shop, but otherwise the country unfolded in great sweeps of pine and birch and sumac. Though it was still August, the air already had the smell of October, football season, piles of yellow-red leaves, everything crisp and clean. I remember a huge blue sky. Off to my right was the Rainy River, wide as a lake in places, and beyond the Rainy River was Canada.

For a while I just drove, not aiming at anything, then in the late morning I began looking for a place to lie low for a day or two. I was exhausted, and scared sick, and around noon I pulled into an old fishing resort called the Tip Top Lodge. Actually it was not a lodge at all, just eight or nine tiny yellow cabins clustered on a peninsula that jutted northward into the Rainy River. The place was in sorry shape. There was a dangerous wooden dock, an old minnow tank, a flimsy tar paper boathouse along the shore. The main building, which stood in a cluster of pines on high ground, seemed to lean heavily to one side, like a cripple, the roof sagging toward Canada. Briefly, I thought about turning around, just giving up, but then I got out of the car and walked up to the front porch.

The man who opened the door that day is the hero of my life. How do I say this without sounding sappy? Blurt it out — the man saved me. He offered exactly what I needed, without questions, without any words at all. He took me in. He was there at the critical time — a silent, watchful presence. Six days later, when it ended, I was unable to find a proper way to thank him, and I never have, and so, if nothing else, this story represents a small gesture of gratitude twenty years overdue.

Even after two decades I can close my eyes and return to that porch at the Tip Top Lodge. I can see the old guy staring at me. Elroy Berdahl: eighty-one years old, skinny and shrunken and mostly bald. He wore a flannel shirt and brown work pants. In one hand, I remember, he carried a green apple, a small paring knife in the other. His eyes had the bluish gray color of a razor blade, the same polished shine, and as he peered up at me I felt a strange sharpness, almost painful, a cutting sensation, as if his gaze were somehow slicing me open. In part, no doubt, it was my own sense of guilt, but even so I'm absolutely certain that the old man took one look and went right to the heart of things — a kid in trouble. When I asked for a room, Elroy made a little clicking sound with his tongue. He nodded, led me out to one of the cabins, and dropped a key in my hand. I remember smiling at him. I also remember wishing I hadn't. The old man shook his head as if to tell me it wasn't worth the bother.

"Dinner at five-thirty," he said. "You eat fish?"

"Anything," I said. 20

Elroy grunted and said, "I'll bet."

We spent six days together at the Tip Top Lodge. Just the two of us. Tourist season was over, and there were no boats on the river, and the wilderness seemed to withdraw into a great permanent stillness. Over those six days Elroy Berdahl and I took most of our meals together. In the mornings we sometimes went out on long hikes into the woods, and at night we played Scrabble or listened to records or sat reading in front of his big stone fireplace. At times I felt the awkwardness of an intruder, but Elroy accepted me into his quiet routine without fuss or ceremony. He took my presence for granted, the same way he might've sheltered a stray cat — no wasted sighs or pity — and there was never any talk about it. Just the opposite. What I remember more than anything is the man's willful, almost ferocious silence. In all that time together, all those hours, he never asked the obvious questions: Why was I there? Why alone? Why so preoccupied? If Elroy was curious about any of this, he was careful never to put it into words.

My hunch, though, is that he already knew. At least the basics. After all, it was 1968, and guys were burning draft cards, and Canada was just a boat ride away. Elroy Berdahl was no hick. His bedroom, I remember, was cluttered with books and newspapers. He killed me at the Scrabble board, barely concentrating, and on those occasions when speech was necessary he had a way of compressing large thoughts into small, cryptic packets of language. One evening, just at sunset, he pointed up at an owl circling over the violet-lighted forest to the west.

"Hey, O'Brien," he said. "There's Jesus."

The man was sharp — he didn't miss much. Those razor eyes. Now and then he'd 25 catch me staring out at the river, at the far shore, and I could almost hear the tumblers clicking in his head. Maybe I'm wrong, but I doubt it.

One thing for certain, he knew I was in desperate trouble. And he knew I couldn't talk about it. The wrong word — or even the right word — and I would've disappeared. I was wired and jittery. My skin felt too tight. After supper one evening I vomited and went back to my cabin and lay down for a few moments and then vomited again; another time, in the middle of the afternoon, I began sweating and couldn't shut it off. I went through whole days feeling dizzy with sorrow. I couldn't sleep; I couldn't lie still. At night I'd toss around in bed, half awake, half dreaming, imagining how I'd sneak down to the beach and quietly push one of the old man's boats out into the river and start paddling my way toward Canada. There were times when I thought I'd gone off the psychic edge. I couldn't tell up from down, I was just falling, and late in the night I'd lie there watching weird pictures spin through my head. Getting chased by the Border Patrol — helicopters and searchlights and barking dogs — I'd be crashing through the woods, I'd be down on my hands and knees — people shouting out my name — the law closing in on all sides — my hometown draft board and the FBI and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It all seemed crazy and impossible. Twenty-one years old, an ordinary kid with all the ordinary dreams and ambitions, and all I wanted was to live the life I was born to — a mainstream life — I loved baseball and hamburgers and cherry Cokes — and now I was off on the margins of exile, leaving my country forever, and it seemed so impossible and terrible and sad.

I'm not sure how I made it through those six days. Most of it I can't remember. On two or three afternoons, to pass some time, I helped Elroy get the place ready for winter, sweeping down the cabins and hauling in the boats, little chores that kept my body moving. The days were cool and bright. The nights were very dark. One morning the old man showed me how to split and stack firewood, and for several hours we just worked in silence out behind his house. At one point, I remember, Elroy put down his maul and looked at me for a long time, his lips drawn as if framing a difficult question, but then he shook his head and went back to work. The man's self-control was amazing. He never pried. He never put me in a position that required lies or denials. To an extent, I suppose, his reticence was typical of that part of Minnesota, where privacy still held value, and even if I'd been walking around with some horrible deformity — four arms and three heads — I'm sure the old man would've talked about everything except those extra arms and heads. Simple politeness was part of it. But even more than that, I think, the man understood that words were insufficient. The problem had gone beyond discussion. During that long summer I'd been over and over the various arguments, all the pros and cons, and it was no longer a question that could be decided by an act of pure reason. Intellect had come up against emotion. My conscience told me to run, but some irrational and powerful force was resisting, like a weight pushing me toward the war. What it came down to, stupidly, was a sense of shame. Hot, stupid shame. I did not want people to think badly of me. Not my parents, not my brother and sister, not even the folks down at the Gobbler Café. I was ashamed to be there at the Tip Top Lodge. I was ashamed of my conscience, ashamed to be doing the right thing.

Some of this Elroy must've understood. Not the details, of course, but the plain fact of crisis.

Although the old man never confronted me about it, there was one occasion when he came close to forcing the whole thing out into the open. It was early evening, and we'd just finished supper, and over coffee and dessert I asked him about my bill, how much I owed so far. For a long while the old man squinted down at the tablecloth.

"Well, the basic rate," he said, "is fifty bucks a night. Not counting meals. This makes four nights, right?"

I nodded. I had three hundred and twelve dollars in my wallet.

Elroy kept his eyes on the tablecloth. "Now that's an on-season price. To be fair, I suppose we should knock it down a peg or two." He leaned back in his chair. "What's a reasonable number, you figure?"

"I don't know," I said. "Forty?"

"Forty's good. Forty a night. Then we tack on food — say another hundred? Two hundred sixty total?"

"I guess."

He raised his eyebrows. "Too much?"

"No, that's fair. It's fine. Tomorrow, though . . . I think I'd better take off tomorrow."

Elroy shrugged and began clearing the table. For a time he fussed with the dishes, whistling to himself as if the subject had been settled. After a second he slapped his hands together.

"You know what we forgot?" he said. "We forgot wages. Those odd jobs you done. What we have to do, we have to figure out what your time's worth. Your last job — how much did you pull in an hour?"

"Not enough," I said.

"A bad one?"

"Yes. Pretty bad."

Slowly then, without intending any long sermon, I told him about my days at the pig plant. It began as a straight recitation of the facts, but before I could stop myself I was talking about the blood clots and the water gun and how the smell had soaked into my skin and how I couldn't wash it away. I went on for a long time. I told him about wild hogs squealing in my dreams, the sounds of butchery, slaughterhouse sounds, and how I'd sometimes wake up with that greasy pig-stink in my throat.

When I was finished, Elroy nodded at me.

"Well, to be honest," he said, "when you first showed up here, I wondered about all that. The aroma, I mean. Smelled like you was awful damned fond of pork chops." The old man almost smiled. He made a snuffling sound, then sat down with a pencil and a piece of paper. "So what'd this crud job pay? Ten bucks an hour? Fifteen?"

"Less."

Elroy shook his head. "Let's make it fifteen. You put in twenty-five hours here, easy. That's three hundred seventy-five bucks total wages. We subtract the two hundred sixty for food and lodging, I still owe you a hundred and fifteen."

He took four fifties out of his shirt pocket and laid them on the table.

"Call it even," he said.

"No."

"Pick it up. Get yourself a haircut."

The money lay on the table for the rest of the evening. It was still there when I went back to my cabin. In the morning, though, I found an envelope tacked to my door. Inside were the four fifties and a two-word note that said EMERGENCY FUND.

The man knew.

Looking back after twenty years, I sometimes wonder if the events of that summer didn't happen in some other dimension, a place where your life exists before you've lived it, and where it goes afterward. None of it ever seemed real. During my time at the Tip Top Lodge I had the feeling that I'd slipped out of my own skin, hovering a few feet away while some poor yo-yo with my name and face tried to make his way toward a future he didn't understand and didn't want. Even now I can see myself as I was then. It's like watching an old home movie: I'm young and tan and fit. I've got hair — lots of it. I don't smoke or drink. I'm wearing faded blue jeans and a white polo shirt. I can see myself sitting on Elroy Berdahl's dock near dusk one evening, the sky a bright shimmering pink, and I'm finishing up a letter to my parents that tells what I'm about to do and why I'm doing it and how sorry I am that I'd never found the courage to talk to them about it. I ask them not to be angry. I try to explain some of my feelings, but there aren't enough words, and so I just say that it's a thing that has to be done. At the end of the letter I talk about the vacations we used to take up in this north country, at a place called Whitefish Lake, and how the scenery here reminds me of those good times. I tell them I'm fine. I tell them I'll write again from Winnipeg or Montreal or wherever I end up.

On my last full day, the sixth day, the old man took me out fishing on the Rainy River. 55
The afternoon was sunny and cold. A stiff breeze came in from the north, and I remember how the little fourteen-foot boat made sharp rocking motions as we pushed off from the dock. The current was fast. All around us, I remember, there was a vastness to the world, an unpeopled rawness, just the trees and the sky and the water reaching out toward nowhere. The air had the brittle scent of October.

For ten or fifteen minutes Elroy held a course upstream, the river choppy and silver-gray, then he turned straight north and put the engine on full throttle. I felt the bow lift beneath me. I remember the wind in my ears, the sound of the old outboard Evinrude. For a time I didn't pay attention to anything, just feeling the cold spray against my face, but then it occurred to me that at some point we must've passed into Canadian waters, across that dotted line between two different worlds, and I remember a sudden tightness in my chest as I looked up and watched the far shore come at me. This wasn't a daydream. It was tangible and real. As we came in toward land, Elroy cut the engine, letting the boat fishtail lightly about twenty yards off shore. The old man didn't look at me or speak. Bending down, he opened up his tackle box and busied himself with a bobber and a piece of wire leader, humming to himself, his eyes down.

It struck me then that he must've planned it. I'll never be certain, of course, but I think he meant to bring me up against the realities, to guide me across the river and to take me to the edge and to stand a kind of vigil as I chose a life for myself.

I remember staring at the old man, then at my hands, then at Canada. The shoreline was dense with brush and timber. I could see tiny red berries on the bushes. I could see a squirrel up in one of the birch trees, a big crow looking at me from a boulder along the river. That close — twenty yards — and I could see the delicate latticework of the leaves, the texture of the soil, the browned needles beneath the pines, the configurations of geology and human history. Twenty yards. I could've done it. I could've jumped and started swimming for my life. Inside me, in my chest, I felt a terrible squeezing pressure. Even now, as I write this, I can still feel that tightness. And I want you to feel it — the wind coming off the river, the waves, the silence, the wooded frontier. You're at the bow of a boat on the Rainy River. You're twenty-one years old, you're scared, and there's a hard squeezing pressure in your chest.

What would you do?

Would you jump? Would you feel pity for yourself? Would you think about your family and your childhood and your dreams and all you're leaving behind? Would it hurt? Would it feel like dying? Would you cry, as I did? 60

I tried to swallow it back. I tried to smile, except I was crying.

Now, perhaps, you can understand why I've never told this story before. It's not just the embarrassment of tears. That's part of it, no doubt, but what embarrasses me much more, and always will, is the paralysis that took my heart. A moral freeze: I couldn't decide, I couldn't act, I couldn't comport myself with even a pretense of modest human dignity.

All I could do was cry. Quietly, not bawling, just the chest-chokes.

At the rear of the boat Elroy Berdahl pretended not to notice. He held a fishing rod in his hands, his head bowed to hide his eyes. He kept humming a soft, monotonous little tune. Everywhere, it seemed, in the trees and water and sky, a great worldwide sadness came pressing down on me, a crushing sorrow, sorrow like I had never known it before. And what was so sad, I realized, was that Canada had become a pitiful fantasy. Silly and hopeless. It was no longer a possibility. Right then, with the shore so close, I understood that I would not do what I should do. I would not swim away from my hometown and my country and my life. I would not be brave. That old image of myself as a hero, as a man of conscience and courage, all that was just a threadbare pipe dream. Bobbing there on the Rainy River, looking back at the Minnesota shore, I felt a sudden swell of helplessness come over me, a drowning sensation, as if I had toppled overboard and was being swept away by the silver waves. Chunks of my own history flashed by. I saw a seven-year-old boy in a white cowboy hat and a Lone Ranger mask and a pair of holstered six-shooters; I saw a twelve-year-old Little League shortstop pivoting to turn a double play; I saw a sixteen-year-old kid decked out for his first prom, looking spiffy in a white tux and a black bow tie, his hair cut short and flat, his shoes freshly polished. My whole life seemed to spill out into the river, swirling away from me, everything I had ever been or ever wanted to be. I couldn't get my breath; I couldn't stay afloat; I couldn't tell which way to swim. A hallucination, I suppose, but it was as real as anything I would ever feel. I saw my parents calling to me from the far shoreline. I saw my brother and sister, all the townsfolk, the mayor and the entire Chamber of Commerce and all my old teachers and girlfriends and high school buddies. Like some weird sporting event: everybody screaming from the sidelines, rooting me on — a loud stadium roar. Hotdogs and popcorn — stadium smells, stadium heat. A squad of cheerleaders did cartwheels along the banks of the Rainy River; they had megaphones and pompoms and smooth brown thighs. The crowd swayed left and right. A marching band played fight songs. All my aunts and uncles were there, and Abraham Lincoln, and Saint George, and a nine-year-old girl named Linda who had died of a brain tumor back in fifth grade, and several members of the United States Senate, and a blind poet scribbling notes, and LBJ, and Huck Finn, and Abbie Hoffman, and all the dead soldiers back from the grave, and the many thousands who were later to die — villagers with terrible burns, little kids without arms or legs — yes, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff were there, and a couple of popes, and a first lieutenant named Jimmy Cross, and the last surviving veteran of the American Civil War, and Jane Fonda dressed up as Barbarella, and an old man sprawled beside a pigpen, and my grandfather, and Gary Cooper, and a kind-faced woman carrying an umbrella and a copy of Plato's Republic, and a million ferocious citizens waving flags of all shapes and colors — people in hard hats, people in headbands — they were all whooping and chanting and urging me toward one shore or the other. I saw faces from my distant past and distant future. My wife was there. My unborn daughter waved at me, and my two sons hopped up and down, and a drill sergeant named Blyton sneered and shot up a finger and shook his head. There was a choir in bright purple robes. There was a cabbie from the Bronx. There was a slim young man I would one day kill with a hand grenade along a red clay trail outside the village of My Khe.

The little aluminum boat rocked softly beneath me. There was the wind and the sky. 65

I tried to will myself overboard.

I gripped the edge of the boat and leaned forward and thought, Now.

I did try. It just wasn't possible.

All those eyes on me — the town, the whole universe — and I couldn't risk the embarrassment. It was as if there were an audience to my life, that swirl of faces along the river, and in my head I could hear people screaming at me. Traitor! they yelled. Turncoat! . . . I felt myself blush. I couldn't tolerate it. I couldn't endure the mockery, or the disgrace, or the patriotic ridicule. Even in my imagination, the shore just twenty yards away, I couldn't make myself be brave. It had nothing to do with morality. Embarrassment, that's all it was.

And right then I submitted. 70

I would go to the war — I would kill and maybe die — because I was embarrassed not to.

That was the sad thing. And so I sat in the bow of the boat and cried.

It was loud now. Loud, hard crying.

Elroy Berdahl remained quiet. He kept fishing. He worked his line with the tips of his fingers, patiently, squinting out at his red and white bobber on the Rainy River. His eyes were flat and impassive. He didn't speak. He was simply there, like the river and the late-summer sun. And yet by his presence, his mute watchfulness, he made it real. He was the true audience. He was a witness, like God, or like the gods, who look on in absolute silence as we live our lives, as we make our choices or fail to make them.

"Ain't biting," he said. 75

Then after a time the old man pulled in his line and turned the boat back toward Minnesota.

I don't remember saying goodbye. That last night we had dinner together, and I went to bed early, and in the morning Elroy fixed breakfast for me. When I told him I'd be leaving, the old man nodded as if he already knew. He looked down at the table and smiled.

At some point later in the morning it's possible that we shook hands — I just don't remember — but I do know that by the time I'd finished packing the old man had disappeared. Around noon, when I took my suitcase out to the car, I noticed that his old black pickup truck was no longer parked in front of the house. I went inside and waited for a while, but I felt a bone certainty that he wouldn't be back. In a way, I thought, it was appropriate. I washed up the breakfast dishes, left his two hundred dollars on the kitchen counter, got into the car, and drove south toward home.

The day was cloudy. I passed through towns with familiar names, through the pine forests and down to the prairie, and then to Vietnam, where I was a soldier, and then home again. I survived, but it's not a happy ending. I was a coward. I went to the war.

(1990)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the rhetorical effect of the first seven sentences? Based on the opening, what were your expectations of the story to follow?
2. This is a fictional story in which Tim O'Brien uses himself — or a character by the same name — as the protagonist. Describe how you determine which details are factual and which are imaginative. What is the effect of mixing fact and fiction?
3. Reread the questions in paragraph 2. Are they rhetorical? What purpose do they serve? Could we ask similar questions about events today? Explain your response.
4. What is the narrator's conflict (par. 9)?
5. What purpose does Elroy Berdahl serve in this story? Does he seem realistic to you? Explain your answer.
6. Why does O'Brien address the reader directly in paragraphs 58–60? How would you answer his questions?
7. Identify the rhetorical strategies O'Brien uses in paragraph 64. What are the effects of these strategies in this long paragraph?
8. If you have read The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn by Mark Twain, compare Huck's conflict about doing what he has been taught is "the right thing" — turning Jim in — with O'Brien's statement at the end of paragraph 27. How are the situations of the two protagonists similar?

Judith Ortiz Cofer

Poet, novelist, and essayist Judith Ortiz Cofer was born in Puerto Rico in 1952 and grew up in New Jersey. She is currently the Regents' and Franklin Professor of English and Creative Writing at the University of Georgia. Among her many publications are the young adult novel If I Could Fly (2011), the novel The Meaning of Consuelo (2004), her memoirs Silent Dancing: A Partial Remembrance of a Puerto Rican Childhood (1990) and Woman in Front of the Sun: Becoming a Writer (2000), and her collection of prose and poetry, The Latin Deli (1993). She has won many awards, including the Anisfield-Wolf Book Award in Race Relations and the Americas Award for Children's and Young Adult Literature; she was nominated for the Pulitzer Prize in 1989.

The Myth of the Latin Woman
I Just Met a Girl Named María

In the following selection, originally published in Glamour in 1992, Cofer examines the impact of stereotyping.

On a bus trip to London from Oxford University where I was earning some graduate credits one summer, a young man, obviously fresh from a pub, spotted me and as if struck by inspiration went down on his knees in the aisle. With both hands over his heart he broke into an Irish tenor's rendition of "María" from West Side Story.[1] My politely amused fellow passengers gave his lovely voice the round of gentle applause it deserved. Though I was not quite as amused, I managed my version of an English smile: no show of teeth, no extreme contortions of the facial muscles — I was at this time of my life practicing reserve and cool. Oh, that British control, how I coveted it. But María had followed me to London, reminding me of a prime fact of my life; you can leave the Island, master the English language, and travel as far as you can, but if you are a Latina, especially one like me who so obviously belongs to Rita Moreno's gene pool, the Island travels with you.

This is sometimes a very good thing — it may win you that extra minute of someone's attention. But with some people, the same things can make you an island — not so much a tropical paradise as an Alcatraz, a place nobody wants to visit. As a Puerto Rican girl growing up in the United States and wanting like most children to "belong," I resented the stereotype that my Hispanic appearance called forth from many people I met.

---

[1] West Side Story was a Broadway musical (1957) and then a feature film (1961). Based on Romeo and Juliet, the story deals with the conflicts between two New York City gangs — a Puerto Rican gang and a white ethnic gang. The Puerto Rican actress Rita Moreno, mentioned later in this paragraph, had a major role in the movie. — Eds.

Our family lived in a large urban center in New Jersey during the sixties, where life was designed as a microcosm of my parents' casas on the island. We spoke in Spanish, we ate Puerto Rican food bought at the bodega, and we practiced strict Catholicism complete with Saturday confession and Sunday mass at a church where our parents were accommodated into a one-hour Spanish mass slot, performed by a Chinese priest trained as a missionary for Latin America.

As a girl I was kept under strict surveillance, since virtue and modesty were, by cultural equation, the same as family honor. As a teenager I was instructed on how to behave as a proper señorita. But it was a conflicting message girls got, since the Puerto Rican mothers also encouraged their daughters to look and act like women and to dress in clothes our Anglo friends and their mothers found too "mature" for our age. It was, and is, cultural, yet I often felt humiliated when I appeared at an American friend's party wearing a dress more suitable to a semiformal than to a playroom birthday celebration. At Puerto Rican festivities, neither the music nor the colors we wore could be too loud. I still experience a vague sense of letdown when I'm invited to a "party" and it turns out to be a marathon conversation in hushed tones rather than a fiesta with salsa, laughter, and dancing — the kind of celebration I remember from my childhood.

I remember Career Day in our high school, when teachers told us to come 5 dressed as if for a job interview. It quickly became obvious that to the barrio girls, "dressing up" sometimes meant wearing ornate jewelry and clothing that would be more appropriate (by mainstream standards) for the company Christmas party than as daily office attire. That morning I had agonized in front of my closet, trying to figure out what a "career girl" would wear because, essentially, except for Marlo Thomas on TV, I had no models on which to base my decision. I knew how to dress for school: at the Catholic school I attended we all wore uniforms; I knew how to dress for Sunday mass, and I knew what dresses to wear for parties at my relatives' homes. Though I do not recall the precise details of my Career Day outfit, it must have been a composite of the above choices. But I remember a comment my friend (an Italian-American) made in later years that coalesced my impressions of that day. She said that at the business school she was attending the Puerto Rican girls always stood out for wearing "everything at once." She meant, of course, too much jewelry, too many accessories. On that day at school, we were simply made the negative models by the nuns who were themselves not credible fashion experts to any of us. But it was painfully obvious to me that to the others, in their tailored skirts and silk blouses, we must have seemed "hopeless" and "vulgar." Though I now know that most adolescents feel out of step much of the time, I also know that for the Puerto Rican girls of my generation that sense was intensified. The way our teachers and classmates looked at us that day in school was just a taste of the culture clash that awaited us in the real world, where prospective employers and men on the street would often misinterpret our tight skirts and jingling bracelets as a come-on.

Mixed cultural signals have perpetuated certain stereotypes — for example, that of the Hispanic woman as the "Hot Tamale" or sexual firebrand. It is a one-dimensional view that the media have found easy to promote. In their special vocabulary, advertisers have designated "sizzling" and "smoldering" as the adjectives of choice for describing not only the foods but also the women of Latin America. From conversations in my house I recall hearing about the harassment that Puerto Rican women endured in factories where the "boss men" talked to them as if sexual innuendo was all they understood and, worse, often gave them the choice of submitting to advances or being fired.

It is custom, however, not chromosomes, that leads us to choose scarlet over pale pink. As young girls, we were influenced in our decisions about clothes and colors by the women — older sisters and mothers who had grown up on a tropical island where the natural environment was a riot of primary colors, where showing your skin was one way to keep cool as well as to look sexy. Most important of all, on the island, women perhaps felt freer to dress and move more provocatively, since, in most cases, they were protected by the traditions, mores, and laws of a Spanish/Catholic system of morality and machismo whose main rule was: You may look at my sister, but if you touch her I will kill you. The extended family and church structure could provide a young woman with a circle of safety in her small pueblo on the island; if a man "wronged" a girl, everyone would close in to save her family honor.

This is what I have gleaned from my discussions as an adult with older Puerto Rican women. They have told me about dressing in their best party clothes on Saturday nights and going to the town's plaza to promenade with their girlfriends in front of the boys they liked. The males were thus given an opportunity to admire the women and to express their admiration in the form of piropos: erotically charged street poems they composed on the spot. I have been subjected to a few piropos while visiting the Island, and they can be outrageous, although custom dictates that they must never cross into obscenity. This ritual, as I understand it, also entails a show of studied indifference on the woman's part; if she is "decent," she must not acknowledge the man's impassioned words. So I do understand how things can be lost in translation. When a Puerto Rican girl dressed in her idea of what is attractive meets a man from the mainstream culture who has been trained to react to certain types of clothing as a sexual signal, a clash is likely to take place. The line I first heard based on this aspect of the myth happened when the boy who took me to my first formal dance leaned over to plant a sloppy overeager kiss painfully on my mouth, and when I didn't respond with sufficient passion said in a resentful tone: "I thought you Latin girls were supposed to mature early" — my first instance of being thought of as a fruit or vegetable — I was supposed to ripen, not just grow into womanhood like other girls.

It is surprising to some of my professional friends that some people, including those who should know better, still put others "in their place." Though rarer, these incidents are still commonplace in my life. It happened to me most recently during a stay at a very classy metropolitan hotel favored by young professional couples for their weddings. Late one evening after the theater, as I walked toward my room with my new colleague (a woman with whom I was coordinating an arts program), a middle-aged man in a tuxedo, a young girl in satin and lace on his arm, stepped directly into our path. With his champagne glass extended toward me, he exclaimed, "Evita!"

Our way blocked, my companion and I listened as the man half-recited, half-bellowed "Don't Cry for Me, Argentina." When he finished, the young girl said: "How about a round of applause for my daddy?" We complied, hoping this would bring the silly spectacle to a close. I was becoming aware that our little group was attracting the attention of the other guests. "Daddy" must have perceived this too, and he once more barred the way as we tried to walk past him. He began to shout-sing a ditty to the tune of "La Bamba" — except the lyrics were about a girl named María whose exploits all rhymed with her name and gonorrhea. The girl kept saying "Oh, Daddy" and looking at me with pleading eyes. She wanted me to laugh along with the others. My companion and I stood silently waiting for the man to end his offensive song. When he finished, I looked not at him but at his daughter. I advised her calmly never to ask her father what he had done in the army. Then I walked between them and to my room. My friend complimented me on my cool handling of the situation. I confessed to her that I really had wanted to push the jerk into the swimming pool. I knew that this same man — probably a corporate executive, well educated, even worldly by most standards — would not have been likely to regale a white woman with a dirty song in public. He would perhaps have checked his impulse by assuming that she could be somebody's wife or mother, or at least somebody who might take offense. But to him, I was just an Evita or a María: merely a character in his cartoon-populated universe.

Because of my education and my proficiency with the English language, I have acquired many mechanisms for dealing with the anger I experience. This was not true for my parents, nor is it true for the many Latin women working at menial jobs who must put up with stereotypes about our ethnic group such as: "They make good domestics." This is another facet of the myth of the Latin woman in the United States. Its origin is simple to deduce. Work as domestics, waitressing, and factory jobs are all that's available to women with little English and few skills. The myth of the Hispanic menial has been sustained by the same media phenomenon that made "Mammy" from Gone with the Wind America's idea of the black woman for generations: María, the housemaid or counter girl, is now indelibly etched into the national psyche. The big and the little screens have presented us with the picture of the funny Hispanic maid, mispronouncing words and cooking up a spicy storm in a shiny California kitchen.

This media-engendered image of the Latina in the United States has been documented by feminist Hispanic scholars, who claim that such portrayals are partially responsible for the denial of opportunities for upward mobility among Latinas in the professions. I have a Chicana friend working on a Ph.D. in philosophy at a major university. She says her doctor still shakes his head in puzzled amazement at all the "big words" she uses. Since I do not wear my diplomas around my neck for all to see, I too have on occasion been sent to that "kitchen," where some think I obviously belong.

One such incident that has stayed with me, though I recognize it as a minor offense, happened on the day of my first public poetry reading. It took place in Miami in a boat-restaurant where we were having lunch before the event. I was nervous and excited as I walked in with my notebook in my hand. An older woman motioned me to her table. Thinking (foolish me) that she wanted me to autograph a copy of my brand-new slender volume of verse, I went over. She ordered a cup of coffee from me, assuming that I was the waitress. Easy enough to mistake my poems for menus, I suppose. I know that it wasn't an intentional act of cruelty, yet of all the good things that happened that day, I remember that scene most clearly, because it reminded me of what I had to overcome before anyone would take me seriously. In retrospect I understand that my anger gave my reading fire, that I have almost always taken doubts in my abilities as a challenge—and that the result is, most times, a feeling of satisfaction at having won a convert when I see the cold, appraising eyes warm to my words, the body language change, the smile that indicates that I have opened some avenue for communication. That day I read to that woman and her lowered eyes told me that she was embarrassed at her little faux pas, and when I willed her to look up at me, it was my victory, and she graciously allowed me to punish her with my full attention. We shook hands at the end of the reading, and I never saw her again. She has probably forgotten the whole thing but maybe not.

Yet I am one of the lucky ones. My parents made it possible for me to acquire a stronger footing in the mainstream culture by giving me the chance at an education. And books and art have saved me from the harsher forms of ethnic and racial prejudice that many of my Hispanic compañeras have had to endure. I travel a lot around the United States, reading from my books of poetry and my novel, and the reception I most often receive is one of positive interest by people who want to know more about my culture. There are, however, thousands of Latinas without the privilege of an education or the entrée into society that I have. For them life is a struggle against the misconceptions perpetuated by the myth of the Latina as whore, domestic, or criminal. We cannot change this by legislating the way people look at us. The transformation, as I see it, has to occur at a much more individual level. My personal goal in my public life is to try to replace the old pervasive stereotypes and myths about Latinas with a much more interesting set of realities. Every time I give a reading, I hope the stories I tell, the dreams and fears I examine in my work, can achieve some universal truth which will get my audience past the particulars of my skin color, my accent, or my clothes.

I once wrote a poem in which I called us Latinas "God's brown daughters." This 15 poem is really a prayer of sorts, offered upward, but also, through the human-to-human channel of art, outward. It is a prayer for communication, and for respect. In it, Latin women pray "in Spanish to an Anglo God / With a Jewish heritage," and they are "fervently hoping / that if not omnipotent / at least He be bilingual."

(1992)

Exploring the Text

1. What is the effect of Judith Ortiz Cofer's opening paragraph? Does her anger draw you in or distance you?
2. Note the times when Cofer explains rather than denies the basis for stereotyping. For instance, rather than deny that Latinas prefer vivid colors, she explains that this preference reflects the bright landscape of their homelands. Does this strategy work, or do you think Cofer is playing to the stereotype?
3. Find the sections of the essay that refer to personal experience. Does Cofer's use of personal experience weaken her argument or make it more effective? Explain. Would the essay be more effective with less—or more—personal experience? Explain your view.

4. How does Cofer broaden the argument from her personal experience to larger concerns, including other stereotypes (or stereotypes of other communities)?
5. Cofer ends by quoting one of her own poems. Is this effective? Why or why not?
6. Who do you think is Cofer's audience for this essay? Does it include the woman at the poetry reading who asks Cofer for a cup of coffee?
7. According to Cofer, "Mixed cultural signals have perpetuated certain stereotypes — for example, that of the Hispanic woman as the 'Hot Tamale' or sexual firebrand. It is a one-dimensional view that the media have found easy to promote. In their special vocabulary, advertisers have designated 'sizzling' and 'smoldering' as the adjectives of choice for describing not only the foods but also the women of Latin America" (par. 6). Does this assertion — that the media promotes stereotypes — apply today? In answering, consider Cofer's example of Latin American women, or choose another group, such as African Americans, older people, or people from the Middle East.

Edwidge Danticat

Born in Haiti in 1969, Edwidge Danticat immigrated to the United States when she was twelve. She received her BA from Barnard College and her MFA from Brown University, where her thesis project became her first novel, Breath, Eyes, Memory (1994); it was an Oprah Winfrey Book Club selection in 1998. Her other fiction includes Krik? Krak! (1995), The Farming of Bones (1998), and The Dew Breaker (2004). In her work, Danticat often explores themes of cultural dislocation from the perspective of immigrants of different generations.

New York Day Women

"New York Day Women" was part of the 1995 collection Krik? Krak!

Today, walking down the street, I see my mother. She is strolling with a happy gait, her body thrust toward the DON'T WALK sign and the yellow taxicabs that make forty-five-degree turns on the corner of Madison and Fifty-seventh Street.

I have never seen her in this kind of neighborhood, peering into Chanel and Tiffany's and gawking at the jewels glowing in the Bulgari windows. My mother never shops outside of Brooklyn. She has never seen the advertising office where I work. She is afraid to take the subway, where you may meet those young black militant street preachers who curse black women for straightening their hair.

Yet, here she is, my mother, who I left at home that morning in her bathrobe, with pieces of newspapers twisted like rollers in her hair. My mother, who accuses me of random offenses as I dash out of the house.

Would you get up and give an old lady like me your subway seat? In this state of mind, I bet you don't even give up your seat to a pregnant lady.

My mother, who is often right about that. Sometimes I get up and give my seat. Other times, I don't. It all depends on how pregnant the woman is and whether or not she is with her boyfriend or husband and whether or not he is sitting down.

As my mother stands in front of Carnegie Hall, one taxi driver yells to another, "What do you think this is, a dance floor?"

My mother waits patiently for this dispute to be settled before crossing the street.

In Haiti when you get hit by a car, the owner of the car gets out and kicks you for getting blood on his bumper.

My mother, who laughs when she says this and shows a large gap in her mouth where she lost three more molars to the dentist last week. My mother, who at fifty-nine, says dentures are okay.

You can take them out when they bother you. I'll like them. I'll like them fine.

Will it feel empty when Papa kisses you?

Oh no, he doesn't kiss me that way anymore.

My mother, who watches the lottery drawing every night on channel 11 without ever having played the numbers.

A third of that money is all I would need. We would pay the mortgage, and your father could stop driving that taxicab all over Brooklyn.

I follow my mother, mesmerized by the many possibilities of her journey. Even in a flowered dress, she is lost in a sea of pinstripes and gray suits, high heels and elegant short skirts, Reebok sneakers, dashing from building to building.

My mother, who won't go out to dinner with anyone.

If they want to eat with me, let them come to my house, even if I boil water and give it to them.

My mother, who talks to herself when she peels the skin off poultry.

Fat, you know, and cholesterol. Fat and cholesterol killed your aunt Hermine.

My mother, who makes jam with dried grapefruit peel and then puts in cinnamon bark that I always think is cockroaches in the jam. My mother, whom I have always bought household appliances for, on her birthday. A nice rice cooker, a blender.

I trail the red orchids in her dress and the heavy faux leather bag on her shoulders. Realizing the ferocious pace of my pursuit, I stop against a wall to rest. My mother keeps on walking as though she owns the sidewalk under her feet.

As she heads toward the Plaza Hotel, a bicycle messenger swings so close to her that I want to dash forward and rescue her, but she stands dead in her tracks and lets him ride around her and then goes on.

My mother stops at a corner hot-dog stand and asks for something. The vendor hands her a can of soda that she slips into her bag. She stops by another vendor selling sundresses for seven dollars each. I can tell that she is looking at an African print dress, contemplating my size. I think to myself, Please Ma, don't buy it. It would be just another thing that I would bury in the garage or give to Goodwill.

Why should we give to Goodwill when there are so many people back home who need clothes? We save our clothes for the relatives in Haiti.

Twenty years we have been saving all kinds of things for the relatives in Haiti. I need the place in the garage for an exercise bike. 25

You are pretty enough to be a stewardess. Only dogs like bones.

This mother of mine, she stops at another hot-dog vendor's and buys a frankfurter that she eats on the street. I never knew that she ate frankfurters. With her blood pressure, she shouldn't eat anything with sodium. She has to be careful with her heart, this day woman.

I cannot just swallow salt. Salt is heavier than a hundred bags of shame.

She is slowing her pace, and now I am too close. If she turns around, she might see me. I let her walk into the park before I start to follow again.

My mother walks toward the sandbox in the middle of the park. There a woman is waiting with a child. The woman is wearing a leotard with biker's shorts and has small weights in her hands. The woman kisses the child good-bye and surrenders him to my mother; then she bolts off, running on the cemented stretches in the park. 30

The child given to my mother has frizzy blond hair. His hand slips into hers easily, like he's known her for a long time. When he raises his face to look at my mother, it is as though he is looking at the sky.

My mother gives this child the soda that she bought from the vendor on the street corner. The child's face lights up as she puts in a straw in the can for him. This seems to be a conspiracy just between the two of them.

My mother and the child sit and watch the other children play in the sandbox. The child pulls out a comic book from a knapsack with Big Bird on the back. My mother peers into his comic book. My mother, who taught herself to read as a little girl in Haiti from the books that her brothers brought home from school.

My mother, who has now lost six of her seven sisters in Ville Rose and has never had the strength to return for their funerals.

Many graves to kiss when I go back. Many graves to kiss. 35

She throws away the empty soda can when the child is done with it. I wait and watch from a corner until the woman in the leotard and biker's shorts returns, sweaty and breathless, an hour later. My mother gives the woman back her child and strolls farther into the park.

I turn around and start to walk out of the park before my mother can see me. My lunch hour is long since gone. I have to hurry back to work. I walk through a cluster of joggers, then race to a Sweden Tours bus. I stand behind the bus and take a peek at my mother in the park. She is standing in a circle, chatting with a group of women who are taking other people's children on an afternoon outing. They look like a Third World Parent-Teacher Association meeting.

I quickly jump into a cab heading back to the office. Would Ma have said hello had she been the one to see me first?

As the cab races away from the park, it occurs to me that perhaps one day I would chase an old woman down a street by mistake and that old woman would be somebody else's mother, who I would have mistaken for mine.

Day women come out when nobody expects them.

Tonight on the subway, I will get up and give my seat to a pregnant woman or a lady about Ma's age.

My mother, who stuffs thimbles in her mouth and then blows up her cheeks like Dizzy Gillespie while sewing yet another Raggedy Ann doll that she names Suzette after me.

I will have all these little Suzettes in case you never have any babies, which looks more and more like it is going to happen.

My mother who had me when she was thirty-three — l'âge du Christ — at the age that Christ died on the cross.

That's a blessing, believe you me, even if American doctors say by that time you can make retarded babies.

My mother, who sews lace collars on my company softball T-shirts when she does my laundry.

Why, you can't you look like a lady playing softball?

My mother, who never went to any of my Parent-Teacher Association meetings when I was in school.

You're so good anyway. What are they going to tell me? I don't want to make you ashamed of this day woman. Shame is heavier than a hundred bags of salt.

(1995)

Exploring the Text

1. What are the differences between the narrator and her mother? Be sure to look at the explicit and implicit differences.
2. How does Edwidge Danticat maneuver between two, if not three, geographical settings? Who seems to have more flexibility, the narrator or her mother? Explain your answer.
3. How do the changes in type style, between bold and regular font, and the white space create structure for the story?
4. Who are "New York day women"?
5. How would you describe the narrator's attitude toward her mother?
6. How does Danticat develop the tension between the life that the narrator's opportunities have given her and the life of her mother?
7. Why do you think the author gave the narrator the following words: "perhaps one day I would chase an old woman down a street by mistake and that old woman would be somebody else's mother, who I would have mistaken for mine" (par. 39)?

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

2. In what ways does the description of Sherman Alexie's father play against stereotypes of Native Americans?
3. What does Alexie mean when he describes "an Indian boy" who "grows into a man who often speaks of his childhood in the third-person" (par. 5)?
4. In paragraph 7, Alexie deliberately uses a number of short, simple sentences. What effect do you think he is trying to achieve?
5. This eight-paragraph essay is divided into two distinct sections. Why? How would you describe its arrangement? How does it suit Alexie's overall purpose?
6. Discuss Alexie's use of parallel structure and repetition in the last two paragraphs. Pay particular attention to the final sentence in each.
7. Alexie writes that he read to save his life, and many other people have written that books opened up worlds and possibilities that gave them a new life. Do you believe that reading and books can still have that power? Explain.

Rita Dove

Rita Dove was born in Akron, Ohio, in 1952, at a time when racial barriers were being torn down. Her father was the first African American chemist to be hired by the Goodyear Tire Corporation. She graduated summa cum laude from Miami (Ohio) University and won a Fulbright Scholarship.

In addition to her many collections of poems, Dove's published work also includes a verse drama, The Darker Face of the Earth (1994); a collection of short stories, Fifth Sunday (1985); and a novel, Through the Ivory Gate (1992). Thomas and Beulah (1986) won the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry; On the Bus with Rosa Parks (1999) was a finalist for the National Book Critics Circle Award. Dove is the only African American to be named poet laureate of the United States, a title she held from 1993 to 1995.

Rosa

"Rosa" was first published in Georgia Review in 1998 and then in Dove's collection On the Bus with Rosa Parks in 1999. The Rosa of the title refers to Rosa Parks, an icon of the civil rights movement. In December 1955, Parks refused to give up her seat on the bus to a white man. Her arrest sparked the bus boycott in Montgomery, Alabama, considered one of the turning points of the fight for civil rights.

How she sat there,
the time right inside a place
so wrong it was ready.

That trim name with its dream of a bench to rest on. Her sensible coat.

Doing nothing was the doing:
the clean flame of her gaze carved by a camera flash.

How she stood up when they bent down to retrieve her purse. That courtesy.

(1998)

Exploring the Text

1. What does Rita Dove mean when she says, "the time right inside a place / so wrong it was ready" (ll. 2–3)? What time and place is she referring to? Why do you think she isn't more specific?
2. How does Dove characterize Rosa Parks? What does she expect the reader to bring to the poem?
3. What is the speaker's attitude toward Rosa Parks?
4. In the last stanza, "they" refers to the two policemen who came on the bus to arrest Rosa Parks. They picked up her purse and bag and handed them to her when they put her in the backseat of the police car to drive her to jail. How do you think Dove meant the last two words, "That courtesy," to be understood?
5. Dove said about "Rosa" that the poem speculates "not only on Rosa Parks's historic non-doing . . . but also on any moment in history when one is suddenly confronted with a choice — what would one do." What other moments does this poem bring to mind? Have you had an experience making this kind of choice? Explain.

Li-Young Lee

Li-Young Lee (b. 1957) was born to an elite Chinese family. His great-grandfather had been China's first republican president (1912–1916), and his father had been a personal physician to Mao Zedong. Despite the latter association, his family fled from China when the People's Republic was established in 1948, settling in Jakarta, where Lee was born. An increasing anti-Chinese movement in Indonesia drove the family from the country, and after a futile search for a permanent home in turbulent Asia, they settled in the United States in 1964. Lee was educated at the University of Pittsburgh, where he began to write. He later attended the University of Arizona and the State University of New York at Brockport. Lee's first collection of poetry was Rose (1986), which won the Delmore Schwartz Memorial Poetry Award from New York University. This was followed by The City in Which I Love You (1990), which won the Lamont Poetry Prize; Book of My Nights (2001); and his most recent publication, Behind My Eyes (2008). He has also published a personal memoir, The Wingéd Seed: A Remembrance (1995).

The Hammock

"The Hammock" was first published in the Kenyon Review.

When I lay my head in my mother's lap
I think how day hides the stars, the way I lay hidden once, waiting inside my mother's singing to herself. And I remember how she carried me on her back between home and the kindergarten, once each morning and once each afternoon.

I don't know what my mother's thinking.

When my son lays his head in my lap, I wonder:
Do his father's kisses keep his father's worries from becoming his? I think, Dear God, and remember there are stars we haven't heard from yet:
They have so far to arrive. Amen,
I think, and I feel almost comforted.

I've no idea what my child is thinking.

Between two unknowns, I live my life.
Between my mother's hopes, older than I am by coming before me, and my child's wishes, older than I am by outliving me. And what's it like?
Is it a door, and good-bye on either side?
A window, and eternity on either side?
Yes, and a little singing between two great rests.

(2000)

Exploring the Text

1. What are the connotations of the word hammock? How do these connotations contribute to your understanding of the poem?
2. Why do you think the poet chose to italicize the words "Dear God" (l. 11) and "Amen" (l. 13)? What does this tell you about the speaker's attitude toward his subject? How is this choice connected to the poem's tone?
3. Trace the oppositions Li-Young Lee sets up in "The Hammock." How do they help develop the extended metaphor of a hammock?
4. What do you think Lee means by "two unknowns" (l. 16) and "two great rests" (l. 22)?
5. Examine the structure of this poem by comparing stanzas one and three to stanzas two and four. How does the shape of the poem reflect its title and theme?

Art Spiegelman

Art Spiegelman (b. 1948) is an American cartoonist and editor, best known for his graphic novel Maus (1991), which won a Pulitzer Prize in 1992. Born in Stockholm, Sweden, Spiegelman immigrated to America with his family as a small child and spent most of his life in New York. He attended Harpur College from 1965 to 1968 but left before graduation to pursue a career in cartoon illustration. In 1977, he published a collection of comic strips entitled Breakdowns, and in 1980, with the help of his wife, artist and designer Françoise Mouly, Spiegelman launched Raw, a magazine that focused on publishing avant-garde cartoonists. From 1977 to 1990, he created his most famous work, Maus, a graphic novel that chronicled the rise of Nazism during World War II, and in 1992, he became a contributing artist for the New Yorker, where he remained until 2001, when he left to work on In the Shadow of No Towers, a collection of illustrations documenting his reaction to 9/11.

9/11/2001

The following illustration was the cover for the September 24th issue of the New Yorker magazine, the first issue to appear after September 11, 2001. It was voted one of the top ten magazine covers of the past forty years by the American Society of Magazine Editors.

Exploring the Text

1. What is your first reaction to the picture? What about your subsequent reactions? Make sure that you turn the image to the light to catch its subtleties.
2. How does Art Spiegelman use color — or the lack of color — to comment on the events of September 11, 2001?
3. Spiegelman has said that his first draft was of the shrouded towers in orange against a blue sky. He has said he was channeling surrealist artist René Magritte. Why might he have been thinking about a surrealist? Why do you think that version was not the final one?
4. Art editor Françoise Mouly, who chooses the covers for the New Yorker, commented on this cover: "Ten years ago, my husband, the cartoonist Art Speigelman, our daughter, and I stood four blocks away from the second tower as we watched it collapse in excruciatingly slow motion. Later, back at my office, I felt that images were suddenly powerless to help us understand what had happened. The only appropriate solution seemed to be to publish no cover image at all — an all-black cover. Then Art suggested adding the outlines of the two towers, black on black. So from no cover came a perfect image, which conveyed something about the unbearable loss of life, the sudden absence in our skyline, the abrupt tear in the fabric of our reality." Do you think it's the perfect cover? Explain why or why not.

Copyright © Condé Nast. From The New Yorker Magazine. All rights reserved. Cover by Art Spiegelman. Reprinted by Permission.

TALKBACK

Ana Juan

Ana Juan (b. 1961) is an illustrator from Valencia, Spain, who began contributing cover art to the New Yorker in 1995. Juan was awarded the Ezra Jack Keats New Illustrator Award in 2004 for her children's book The Night Eater and has exhibited her work in Geneva, New York, and Spain.

Reflections

This New Yorker cover marked the tenth anniversary of the terrorist attacks on New York City.

Copyright © Condé Nast. From The New Yorker Magazine. All rights reserved. Cover by Ana Juan. Reprinted by Permission.

Exploring the Text

1. How does Ana Juan portray the Twin Towers on this cover? What does her portrayal evoke?
2. What are the different meanings of the title of the drawing? How does each one apply to the work's purpose and occasion?
3. How does Juan appeal to pathos and even logos in this cover art? How does she establish ethos?
4. Do you think this is the right cover for the tenth anniversary of the terrorist attacks? Explain your answer.

Making Connections

1. How does Juan's cover (p. 1428) respond to Art Spiegelman's (p. 1427)? In what ways does she acknowledge his work? In what ways does she update it?
2. Everyone in New York City — and the country — who experienced 9/11 has his or her own story. Why does the work of these two artists deserve an audience? Or do they?
3. These covers raise the question of whether art can offer solace. What do you think? Explain your answer.

Tracy K. Smith

Tracy K. Smith (b. 1972) is an African American poet and professor of creative writing at Princeton University. Born in Massachusetts, she received a BA from Harvard University and an MFA in creative writing from Columbia University. She is the author of three award-winning books of poetry — The Body's Question (2003), Duende (2007), and Life on Mars (2011), which won the 2012 Pulitzer Prize for Poetry.

Letter to a Photojournalist Going-In "Letter to a Photojournalist Going-In" appeared in Smith's second collection, Duende, published in 2007.

You go to the pain. City after city. Borders
Where they peer into your eyes as if to erase you.

You go by bus or truck, days at a time, just taking it
When they throw you in a room or kick at your gut,

Taking it when a strong fist hammers person after person
A little deeper into the ground. Your camera blinks:

Soldiers smoking between rounds. Bodies
Blown open like curtains. In the neighborhoods,

Boys brandish plastic guns with TV bravado. Men
Ask you to look them in the face and say who's right.

At night you sleep, playing it all back in reverse:

The dance of wind in a valley of dirt. Rugs and tools,
All the junk that rises up, resurrected, then disappears

Into newly formed windows and walls. People
Close their mouths and run backwards out of frame.

Up late, your voice fits my ear like a secret.
But who can hear two things at once?

Errant stars flare, shatter. A whistle, then the indescribable thud
Of an era spilling its matter into the night. Who can say the word love

When everything — everything — pushes back with the promise
To grind itself to dust?

And what if there's no dignity to what we do,
None at all? If our work — what you see, what I say — is nothing

But a way to kid ourselves into thinking we might last? If trust is just Another human trick that'll lick its lips and laugh as it backs away?

Sometimes I think you're right, wanting to lose everything and wander
Like a blind king. Wanting to squeeze a lifetime between your hands

And press it into a single flimsy frame. Will you take it to your lips
Like the body of a woman, something to love in passing,

Or set it down, free finally, empty as the camera,
Which we all know is just a hollow box, mechanized to obey?

Sometimes I want my heart to beat like yours: from the outside in,
A locket stuffed with faces that refuse to be named. For time

To land at my feet like a grenade.

(2007)

Exploring the Text

1. In a review of Duende, the collection in which this poem appeared, critic Cindra Halm notes that one of "Smith's strengths is the quiet slide into surprising metaphor." Find the "surprising metaphor[s]" here, and explain why you agree or disagree with the reviewer that they are a strong part of Smith's writing.
2. Tracy K. Smith plays with the interaction between speaker and audience. How do you read it? Who is the photojournalist — the speaker or "you"? Explain your answer.
3. Why do you think Smith wrote this poem largely in couplets (two-line rhyming stanzas)? What is the effect of that choice? What function do the two single-line stanzas (ll. 11 and 34) have?
4. Look carefully at lines 22–24, in which the speaker asks if the work of the photojournalist is important and whether, like art, it will last. What do you think? Do you think photojournalism is a form of art? Explain why or why not.
5. Who do you think is the blind king the poem alludes to in line 27? Explain what the allusion adds to the poem.

Jonathan Franzen

Jonathan Franzen (b. 1959) is an American novelist and essayist from Webster Grove, Missouri. He graduated from Swarthmore College in 1981 with a degree in German, and from 1981 to 1982 he studied on a Fulbright Scholarship at Freie Universitat in Berlin, Germany. In 1987, he moved to New York City to pursue a writing career, and in 1988 he published his first novel, The Twenty-Seventh City. Since then, he has published essays and fiction in magazines such as the New Yorker and Harper's, and his novels The Corrections (2001) and Freedom (2010) have won him critical acclaim. He has also published two essay collections — How to Be Along (2002) and Farther Away (2012) — and a memoir, The Discomfort Zone (2006).

Agreeable

"Agreeable" was published in the New Yorker magazine in 2010. It became an episode in Franzen's 2010 novel, Freedom.

If Patty hadn't been an atheist, she might have thanked the good Lord for school athletic programs, because they basically saved her life and gave her a chance to realize herself as a person. She was especially grateful to Sandra Mosher at North Chappaqua Middle School, Elaine Carver and Jane Nagel at Horace Greeley High School, and Ernie and Rose Salvatore at the Gettysburg Girls Basketball Camp. It was from these wonderful coaches that Patty learned discipline, patience, focus, teamwork, and the ideals of good sportsmanship that helped make up for her morbid competitiveness and low self-esteem.

Patty grew up in Westchester County, New York. She was the oldest of four children, the other three of whom were more like what her parents had been hoping for. She was notably Larger than everybody else in the family, also Less Unusual, also measurably Dumber. Not actually dumb but relatively dumber. She grew up to be five feet nine and a half, which was almost the same height as her brother and numerous inches taller than her sisters, and sometimes she wished she could have gone ahead and been six feet, since she was never going to fit into the family anyway. Being able to see the basket better and to post up in traffic and to rotate more freely on defense might have given her a somewhat less vicious competitive streak, leading to a happier life post-college; probably not, but it was interesting to think about. By the time she got to the collegiate level, she was usually one of the shorter players on the floor, which in a funny way reminded her of her position in her family and helped keep her adrenaline at peak levels.

Patty's first memory of doing a team sport with her mother watching was also one of her last. She was attending ordinary-person Sports daycamp at the same complex where her sisters were doing extraordinary-person Arts daycamp, and one day her mother and sisters showed up for the late innings of a softball game. Patty was frustrated to be standing in left field waiting around for somebody to hit a ball deep while less skilled girls made errors in the infield. She started creeping in shallower and shallower, which was how the game ended. Runners on first and second. The batter hit a bouncing ball to the grossly uncoördinated shortstop, whom Patty ran in front of so that she could field the ball herself and run and tag out the lead runner and then start chasing the other runner, some sweet girl who'd probably reached first on a fielding error. Patty bore down straight at her, and the girl ran squealing into the outfield, leaving the base path for an automatic out, but Patty kept chasing her and applied the tag while the girl crumpled up and screamed at the apparently horrible pain of being lightly touched by a glove.

Patty was aware that this was not her finest hour of sportsmanship. Something had come over her because her family was watching. In the family station wagon on the way home, her mother asked her, in an even more quavering voice than usual, if she had to be quite so . . . aggressive. If it was necessary to be, well, to be so aggressive. Would it have hurt Patty to share the ball a little with her teammates? Patty replied that she hadn't been getting any balls in left field. And her mother said, "I don't mind if you play sports, but only if it's going to teach you coöperation and community-mindedness." And Patty said, "So send me to a real camp where I won't be the only good player! I can't coöperate with people who can't catch the ball!" And her mother said, "I'm not sure it's a good idea to be encouraging so much aggression and competition. I guess I'm not a sports fan, but I don't see the fun in defeating people just for the sake of defeating them. Wouldn't it be much more fun to all work together?"

Patty's mother was a professional Democrat. She later became a state assembly- 5 woman, the Honorable Joyce Emerson, known for her advocacy of open space, poor children, and the Arts. Paradise for Joyce was an open space where poor children could go and do Arts at state expense. She was born Joyce Markowitz in Brooklyn in 1934 but apparently disliked being Jewish from the earliest dawn of consciousness. (Patty sometimes wondered if one reason that Joyce's voice always trembled was from struggling so hard all her life to not sound like Brooklyn.) Joyce got a scholarship to study liberal Arts in the woods of Maine, where she met Patty's exceedingly Gentile dad, whom she married at All Souls Unitarian Church on the Upper East Side of Manhattan. When young Jack Kennedy got the Democratic nomination, in 1960, it gave Joyce a noble and stirring excuse to get out of a house that she couldn't seem to help filling up with babies. Then came civil rights, and Vietnam, and Bobby Kennedy — more good reasons to be out of a house that wasn't nearly big enough for four little kids plus a Barbadian nanny in the basement. Joyce went to her first national convention in 1968 as a delegate committed to dead Bobby. She served as county Party treasurer and later chairwoman and organized for Teddy in 1972 and 1980. Every summer, all day long, herds of volunteers tramped in and out of the house's open doors carrying boxes of campaign gear. Patty could practice dribbling and layups for six hours straight without anybody noticing or caring.

Patty's father, Ray, was a lawyer and amateur humorist whose repertory included fart jokes and mean parodies of his children's teachers, neighbors, and friends. A torment he particularly enjoyed inflicting on Patty was mimicking the Barbadian, Eulalie, when she was just out of earshot, saying, "Stop de game now, stop de playin'," in a louder and louder voice, until Patty ran from the dinner table in mortification and her siblings shrieked with excitement. Endless fun could also be had ridiculing Patty's coach and mentor Sandy Mosher, whom Ray liked to call Saaaandra. He was constantly asking Patty whether Saaaandra had had any gentlemen callers lately or maybe, tee hee, tee hee, some gentlelady callers? Her siblings chorused, "Saaaandra, Saaaandra!" Other amusing methods of tormenting Patty were to hide the family dog, Elmo, and pretend that Elmo had been euthanized while Patty was at late basketball practice. Or tease Patty about certain factual errors she'd made many years earlier — ask her how the kangaroos in Austria were doing, or whether she'd seen the latest novel by the famous contemporary writer Louisa May Alcott, or whether she still thought funguses were part of the animal kingdom. "I saw one of Patty's funguses chasing a truck the other day," her father would say. "Look, look at me, this is how Patty's fungus chases a truck."

Most nights her dad went back to work after dinner to meet with the poor people he was defending in court for little or no money. He had an office across the street from the courthouse in White Plains. His pro-bono clients included Puerto Ricans, Haitians, transvestites, and the mentally or physically disabled. Some of them were in such bad trouble that he didn't even make fun of them behind their backs. As much as possible, though, he found their problems amusing. In tenth grade, for a school project, Patty sat in on two trials that her dad was part of. One was a case against an unemployed Yonkers man who had drunk too much on Puerto Rican Day and gone looking for his wife's brother, intending to cut him with a knife, but hadn't found him and had instead cut up a stranger in a bar. Not only Ray but the judge and even the prosecutor seemed amused by the defendant's haplessness and stupidity. They kept exchanging little not-quite winks. As if misery and disfigurement and jail time were all just a lower-class sideshow designed to perk up their otherwise boring day.

On the train ride home, Patty asked her dad whose side he was on.

"Ha, good question," he answered. "You have to understand, my client is a liar. The victim is a liar. And the bar owner is a liar. They're all liars. Of course, my client is entitled to a vigorous defense. But you have to try to serve justice, too. Sometimes the P.A. and the judge and I are working together as much as the P.A. is working with the victim or I'm working with the defendant. You've heard of our adversarial system of justice?"

"Yes."

"Well. Sometimes the P.A. and the judge and I all have the same adversary. We try to sort out the facts and avoid a miscarriage. Although don't, uh. Don't put that in your paper."

"I thought sorting out facts was what the grand jury and the jury are for."

"That's right. Put that in your paper. Trial by a jury of your peers. That's important."

"But most of your clients are innocent, right?"

"Not many of them deserve as bad a punishment as somebody's trying to give them."

"But a lot of them are completely innocent, right? Mommy says they have trouble with the language, or the police aren't careful about who they arrest, and there's prejudice against them, and lack of opportunity."

"All of that is entirely true, Pattycakes. Nevertheless, uh. Your mother can be somewhat dewy-eyed."

Patty minded his ridiculing less when her mother was the butt of it.

"I mean, you saw those people," he said to her. "Jesus Christ. El ron me puso loco."

An important fact about Ray was that his family had a lot of money. His parents lived on a big ancestral estate out in the hills of northwest New Jersey, in a pretty stone modernist house that was supposedly designed by Frank Lloyd Wright and was hung with minor works by famous French Impressionists. Every summer, the entire Emerson clan gathered by the lake at the estate for holiday picnics that Patty mostly failed to enjoy. Her granddad, August, liked to grab his oldest granddaughter around the belly and sit her down on his bouncing thigh and get God only knows what kind of little thrill from this; he was certainly not very respectful of Patty's physical boundaries. Starting in seventh grade, she also had to play doubles with Ray and his junior partner and the partner's wife, on the grandparental clay tennis court, and be stared at by the junior partner, in her exposing tennis clothes, and feel self-conscious and confused by his ocular pawing.

Like Ray, August had bought the right to be privately eccentric by doing good public legal works; he'd made a name for himself defending high-profile conscientious objectors and draft evaders in three wars. In his spare time, which he had much of, he grew grapes on his property and fermented them in one of the outbuildings. His "winery" was called Doe Haunch and was a major family joke. At the holiday picnics, August tottered around in flip-flops and saggy swim trunks, clutching one of his crudely labelled bottles, refilling the glasses that his guests had discreetly emptied into grass or bushes. "What do you think?" he asked. "Is it good wine? Do you like it?" He was sort of like an eager boy hobbyist and sort of like a torturer intent on punishing every victim equally. Citing European custom, August believed in giving children wine, and when the young mothers were distracted with corn to shuck or competitive salads to adorn he watered his Doe Haunch Reserve and pressed it on kids as young as three, gently holding their chins, if necessary, and pouring the mixture into their mouths, making sure it went down. "You know what that is?" he said. "That's wine." If a child then began to act strangely, he said, "What you're feeling is called being drunk. You drank too much. You're drunk." This with a disgust no less sincere for being friendly. Patty, always the oldest of the kids, observed these scenes with silent horror, leaving it to a younger sibling or cousin to sound the alarm: "Granddaddy's getting the little kids drunk!" While the mothers came running to scold August and snatch their kids away, and the fathers tittered dirtily about August's obsession with female deer hindquarters, Patty slipped into the lake and floated in its warmest shallows, letting the water stop her ears against her family.

Her granddad had once been a true athlete, a college track star and football tight end, which was probably where her height and reflexes came from. Ray also had played football but in Maine for a school that could barely field a team. His real game was tennis, which was the one sport Patty hated, although she was good at it. She believed that Björn Borg was secretly weak. With very few exceptions (e.g., Joe Namath), she wasn't impressed with male athletes in general. Her specialty was crushes on popular boys who were enough older or better-looking to be totally unrealistic choices. Being a very agreeable person, however, she went on dates with practically anybody who asked. She thought shy or unpopular boys had a hard life, and she took pity on them insofar as was humanly possible. For some reason, many of these boys were wrestlers. In her experience, wrestlers were brave, taciturn, geeky, beetle-browed, polite, and not afraid of female jocks. One of them confided to her that in middle school she'd been known to him and his friends as the She-Monkey.

As far as actual sex goes, Patty's first experience of it was being raped at a party when she was seventeen by a boarding-school senior named Ethan Post. Ethan didn't do any sports except golf, but he had six inches of height and fifty pounds on Patty and provided discouraging perspectives on female muscle strength as compared with men's. What he did to Patty didn't strike her as a gray-area sort of rape. When she started fighting, she fought hard, if not well, and only for so long, because she was drunk for one of the first times ever. She'd been feeling so wonderfully free! Very probably, in the vast swimming pool at Kim McClusky's, on a beautiful warm May night, Patty had given Ethan Post a mistaken impression. She was far too agreeable even when she wasn't drunk. In the pool, she must have been giddy with agreeability. Altogether, there was much to blame herself for. Her notions of romance were like Gilligan's Island: "as primitive as can be." They fell somewhere between Snow White and Nancy Drew. And Ethan undeniably had the arrogant look that attracted her at that point in time. He resembled the love interest from a girls' novel with sailboats on the cover. After he raped Patty, he said he was sorry "it" had been rougher than he'd meant "it" to be, he was sorry about that.

It was only after the piña coladas wore off, early the next morning, in the bedroom that Patty shared with her littler sister so that their middle sister could have her own room to be Creative in: only then did she get indignant. The indignity was that Ethan had considered her such a nothing that he could just rape her and then take her home. And she was not such a nothing. She was, among other things, already, as a junior, the all-time single-season record holder for assists at Horace Greeley High School. A record she would demolish the following year! She was also first-team all-state in a state that included Brooklyn and the Bronx. And yet a golfing boy she hardly even knew had thought it was O.K. to rape her.

To avoid waking her little sister, she went and cried in the shower. This was, without exaggeration, the most wretched hour of her life. Things that had never occurred to her before — such as the injustice of an oldest daughter having to share a room (instead of being given Eulalie's old room in the basement, which was now filled floor to ceiling with outdated campaign paraphernalia), also the injustice of her mother being so enthralled about her middle daughter's thespian performances but never going to any of Patty's games — occurred to her now. She was so indignant that she almost felt like talking to somebody. But she was afraid to let her coach or teammates know she'd been drinking.

How the story came out, in spite of her best efforts to keep it buried, was that Coach Nagel got suspicious and spied on her in the locker room after the next day's game. Sat Patty down in her office and confronted her regarding her bruises and unhappy demeanor. Patty humiliated herself by immediately and sobbingly confessing to all. To her total shock, Coach then proposed taking her to the hospital and notifying the police. Patty had just gone three-for-four with two runs scored and several outstanding defensive plays. She obviously wasn't greatly harmed. Also, her parents were political friends of Ethan's parents, so that was a nonstarter. She dared to hope that an abject apology for breaking training, combined with Coach's pity and leniency, would put the matter to rest. But, oh, how wrong she was.

Coach called Patty's house and got Patty's mother, who, as always, was running out to a meeting and had neither time to talk nor yet the moral wherewithal to admit that she didn't have time to talk. Coach spoke these indelible words into the P.E. department's beige telephone: "Your daughter just told me that she was raped last night by a boy named Ethan Post." Coach then listened to the phone for a minute before saying, "No, she just now told me. . . . That's right. . . . Just last night . . . Yes, she is." And handed Patty the telephone.

"Patty?" her mother said. "Are you — all right?"

"I'm fine."

"Mrs. Nagel says there was an incident last night?"

"The incident was I was raped."

"Oh dear, oh dear, oh dear. Last night?"

"Yes."

"I was home this morning. Why didn't you say something?"

"I don't know."

"Why, why, why? Why didn't you say something to me?"

"Maybe it just didn't seem like such a big deal right then."
"So but then you did tell Mrs. Nagel."
"No," Patty said. "She's just more observant than you are."
"I hardly saw you this morning."
"I'm not blaming you. I'm just saying."
"And you think you might have been . . . It might have been . . ."
"Raped."
"I can't believe this," her mother said. "I'm going to come and get you."
"Coach Nagel wants me to go to the hospital."
"Are you not all right?"
"I already said. I'm fine."
"Then just stay put, and don't either of you do anything until I get there."
Patty hung up the phone and told Coach that her mother was coming.
"We're going to put that boy in jail for a long, long time," Coach said.
"Oh no no no no no," Patty said. "No, we're not."
"Patty."
"It's just not going to happen."
"It will if you want it to."
"No, actually, it won't. My parents and the Posts are political friends."
"Listen to me," Coach said. "That has nothing to do with anything. Do you understand?"

Patty was quite certain that Coach was wrong about this. Dr. Post was a cardiologist, and his wife was from big money. They had one of the houses that people such as Teddy Kennedy and Ed Muskie and Walter Mondale made visits to when they were short of funds. Over the years, Patty had heard much tell of the Posts' "back yard" from her parents. This back yard was apparently about the size of Central Park but nicer. Conceivably one of Patty's straight-A, grade-skipping, Arts-doing sisters could have brought trouble down on the Posts, but it was absurd to imagine the hulking B-student family jock making a dent in the Posts' armor.

"I'm just never going to drink again," she said, "and that will solve the problem."
"Maybe for you," Coach said, "but not for somebody else. Look at your arms. Look what he did. He'll do that to somebody else if you don't stop him."
"It's just bruises and scratches."

Coach here made a motivational speech about standing up for your teammates, which in this case meant all the young women Ethan might ever meet. The upshot was that Patty was supposed to press charges and let Coach inform the New Hampshire prep school where Ethan was a student, so that he could be expelled and denied a diploma, and that if Patty didn't do this she would be letting down her team.

Patty began to cry again, because she would almost rather have died than let a team down. Earlier in the winter, she'd played most of a half of basketball with the flu, before fainting on the sideline and getting fluids intravenously. The problem now was that she hadn't been with her own team the night before. She'd gone to the party with her field-hockey friend Amanda, whose soul was apparently never going to be at rest until she'd induced Patty to sample piña coladas, vast buckets of which had been promised at the McCluskys'. El ron me puso loca. None of the other girls at the McCluskys' swimming pool were jocks. Almost just by showing up there, Patty had betrayed her true team. And now she'd been punished for it. Ethan hadn't raped one of the fast girls, he'd raped Patty, because she didn't belong there; she didn't even know how to drink.

She promised Coach to give the matter some thought.

It was shocking to see her mother in the gym and obviously shocking to her mother to find herself there. She was wearing her everyday pumps and resembled Goldilocks in daunting woods as she peered around uncertainly at the naked metal equipment and the fungal floors and the clustered balls in mesh bags. Patty went to her and submitted to embrace. Her mother being much smaller of frame, Patty felt somewhat like a grandfather clock that Joyce was endeavoring to lift and move. She broke away and led Joyce into Coach's little glass-walled office so that the necessary conference could be had.

"Hi, I'm Jane Nagel," Coach said. 65

"Yes, we've — met," Joyce said.

"Oh, you're right, we did meet once," Coach said.

In addition to her strenuous elocution, Joyce had strenuously proper posture and a masklike Pleasant Smile suitable for nearly all occasions public and private. Because she never raised her voice, not even in anger (her voice just got more strained when she was mad), her Pleasant Smile could be worn even at moments of excruciating conflict.

"No, it was more than once," she said now. "It was several times."

"Really?" 70

"I'll be outside," Patty said, closing the door behind her.

The parent-coach conference didn't last long. Joyce soon came out on clicking heels and said, "Let's go."

Coach, standing in the doorway behind Joyce, gave Patty a significant look. The look meant Don't forget what I said about teamwork.

Joyce's car was the last one left in its quadrant of the visitor lot. She put the key in the ignition but didn't turn it. Patty asked what was going to happen now.

"Your father's at his office," Joyce said. "We'll go straight there." 75

But she didn't turn the key.

"I'm sorry about this," Patty said.

"What I don't understand," her mother burst out, "is how such an outstanding athlete as you are — I mean, how could Ethan, or whoever it was —"

"Ethan. It was Ethan."

"How could anybody — or Ethan," she said. "You say it's pretty definitely Ethan. 80 How could — if it's Ethan — how could he have . . . ?" Her mother hid her mouth with her fingers. "Oh, I wish it had been almost anybody else. Dr. and Mrs. Post are such good friends of — good friends of so many good things. And I don't know Ethan well, but —"

"I hardly know him at all!"

"Well then how could this happen!"

"Let's just go home."

"No. You have to tell me. I'm your mother."

Hearing herself say this, Joyce looked embarrassed. She seemed to realize how peculiar it was to have to remind Patty who her mother was. And Patty, for one, was glad to finally have this doubt out in the open. If Joyce was her mother, then how had it happened that she hadn't come to the first round of the state tournament, when Patty had broken the all-time Horace Greeley girls' tournament scoring record with thirty-two points? Somehow everybody else's mother had found time to come to that game. 85

She showed Joyce her wrists.

"This is what happened," she said. "I mean, part of what happened."

Joyce looked once at the bruises, shuddered, and then turned away as if respecting Patty's privacy. "This is terrible," she said. "You're right. This is terrible."

"Coach Nagel says I should go to the emergency room and tell the police and tell Ethan's headmaster."

"Yes, I know what your coach wants. She seems to feel that castration might be an appropriate punishment. What I want to know is what you think." 90

"I don't know what I think."

"If you want to go to the police now," Joyce said, "we'll go to the police. Just tell me if that's what you want."

"I guess we should tell Dad first."

So down the Saw Mill they went. Joyce was always driving Patty's siblings to Painting, Guitar, Ballet, Japanese, Debate, Drama, Piano, Fencing, and Mock Court, but Patty herself seldom rode with Joyce anymore. Most weekdays she came home very late on the jock bus. If she had a game, somebody else's mom or dad dropped her off. If she and her friends were ever stranded, she knew not to bother calling her parents but to go ahead and use the Westchester Cab dispatcher's number and one of the twenty-dollar bills that her mother made her always carry. It never occurred to her to use the twenties for anything but cabs, or to go anywhere after a game except straight home, where she peeled aluminum foil off her dinner at ten or eleven o'clock and went down to the basement to wash her uniform while she ate and watched reruns. She often fell asleep down there.

"Here's a hypothetical question," Joyce said, driving. "Do you think it might be enough if Ethan formally apologized to you?" 95

"He already apologized."

"For—"

"For being rough."

"And what did you say?"

"I didn't say anything. I said I wanted to go home." 100

"But he did apologize for being rough."

"It wasn't a real apology."

"All right. I'll take your word for it."

"I just want him to know I still exist."

"Whatever you want—sweetie." 105

Joyce pronounced this "sweetie" like the first word of a foreign language she was learning.

As a test or a punishment, Patty said, "Maybe, I guess, if he apologized in a really sincere way, that might be enough." And she looked carefully at her mother, who was struggling (it seemed to Patty) to contain her excitement.

"That sounds to me like a nearly ideal solution," Joyce said. "But only if you really think it would be enough for you."

"It wouldn't," Patty said.

"I'm sorry?"

"I said it wouldn't be enough."

"I thought you just said it would be."

Patty began to cry again very desolately.

"I'm sorry," Joyce said. "Did I misunderstand?"

"He raped me like it was nothing. I'm probably not even the first."

"You don't know that, Patty."

"I want to go to the hospital."

"Look, here, we're almost at Daddy's office. Unless you're actually hurt, we might as well—"

"But I already know what he'll say. I know what he'll want me to do."

"He'll want to do whatever's best for you. Sometimes it's hard for him to express it, but he loves you more than anything."

Joyce could hardly have made a statement that Patty more fervently longed to believe was true. Wished, with her whole being, were true. Didn't her dad tease her and ridicule her in ways that would have been simply cruel if he didn't secretly love her more than anything? But she was seventeen now and not actually dumb. She knew that you could love somebody more than anything and still not love the person all that much, if you were busy with other things.

There was a smell of mothballs in her father's inner sanctum, which he'd taken over from his now deceased senior partner without redoing the carpeting or the curtains. Where exactly the mothball smell came from was one of those mysteries.

"What a rotten little shit!" was Ray's response to the tidings his daughter and wife brought of Ethan Post's crime.

"Not so little, unfortunately," Joyce said with a dry laugh.

"He's a rotten little shit punk," Ray said. "He's a bad seed!"

"So do we go to the hospital now?" Patty said. "Or to the police?"

Her father told her mother to call Dr. Sipperstein, her old pediatrician, who'd been involved in Democratic politics since Roosevelt, and see if he was available for an emergency. While Joyce made this call, Ray asked Patty if she knew what rape was.

She stared at him.

"Just checking," he said. "You do know the actual legal definition."

"He had sex with me against my will."

"Did you actually say no?"

"'No,' 'don't,' 'stop.' Anyway, it was obvious. I was trying to scratch him and push him off me."

"Then he is a despicable piece of shit."

She'd never heard her father talk this way, and she appreciated it, but only abstractly, because it didn't sound like him.

"Dave Sipperstein says he can meet us at five at his office," Joyce reported. "He's so fond of Patty I think he would have cancelled his dinner plans if he'd had to."

"Right," Patty said. "I'm sure I'm number one among his twelve thousand patients." She then told her dad her story, and her dad explained to her why Coach Nagel was wrong and she couldn't go to the police.

"Chester Post is not an easy person," Ray said, "but he does a lot of good in the county. Given his, uh, given his position, an accusation like this is going to generate extraordinary publicity. Everyone will know who the accuser is. Everyone. Now, what's bad for the Posts is not your concern. But it's virtually certain you'll end up feeling more violated by the pretrial and the trial and the publicity than you do right now. Even if it's pleaded out. Even with a suspended sentence, even with a gag order. There's still a court record."

Joyce said, "But this is all for her to decide, not —"

"Joyce." Ray stilled her with a raised hand. "The Posts can afford any lawyer in the country. And as soon as the accusation is made public the worst of the damage to the defendant is over. He has no incentive to speed things along. In fact, it's to his advantage to see that your reputation suffers as much as possible before a plea or a trial."

Patty bowed her head and asked what her father thought she should do.

"I'm going to call Chester now," he said. "You go see Dr. Sipperstein and make sure you're O.K."

"And get him as a witness," Patty said.

"Yes, he could testify if need be. But there isn't going to be a trial, Patty."

"So he just gets away with it? And does it to somebody else next weekend?"

Ray raised both hands. "Let me, ah. Let me talk to Mr. Post. He might be amenable to a deferred prosecution. Kind of a quiet probation. Sword over Ethan's head."

"But that's nothing."

"Actually, Pattycakes, it's quite a lot. It'd be your guarantee that he won't do this to someone else. Requires an admission of guilt, too."

It did seem absurd to imagine Ethan wearing an orange jumpsuit and sitting in a jail cell for inflicting a harm that was mostly in her head anyway. She'd done wind sprints that hurt as bad as being raped. She felt more beaten up after a tough basketball game than she did now. Plus, as a jock you got used to having other people's hands on you — kneading a cramped muscle, playing tight defense, scrambling for a loose ball, taping an ankle, correcting a stance, stretching a hamstring.

And yet: the feeling of injustice itself turned out to be strangely physical. Even realer, in a way, than her hurting, smelling, sweating body. Injustice had a shape, and a weight, and a temperature, and a texture, and a very bad taste.

In Dr. Sipperstein's office she submitted to examination like a good jock. After she'd put her clothes back on, he asked if she'd ever had intercourse before.

"No."

"I didn't think so. What about contraception? Did the other person use it?"

She nodded. "That's when I tried to get away. When I saw what he had."

"A condom."

"Yes."

All this and more Dr. Sipperstein jotted down on her chart. Then he took off his glasses and said, "You're going to have a good life, Patty. Sex is a great thing, and you'll enjoy it all your life. But this was not a good day, was it?"

At home, one of her siblings was in the back yard doing something like juggling with screwdrivers of different sizes. Another was reading Gibbon unabridged. The one who'd been subsisting on Yoplait and radishes was in the bathroom, changing her hair color again. Patty's true home amid all this brilliant eccentricity was a foam-cushioned, mildewed, built-in bench in the TV corner of the basement. The fragrance of Eulalie's hair oil still lingered on the bench years after Eulalie had been let go. Patty took a carton of butter-pecan ice cream down to the bench and answered no when her mother called down to ask if she was coming up for dinner.

Mary Tyler Moore was just starting when her father came down after his Martini and his own dinner and suggested that he and Patty go for a drive.

"Can I watch this show first?" she said.

"Patty."

Feeling cruelly deprived, she turned off the television. Her dad drove them over to the high school and stopped under a bright light in the parking lot. They unrolled their windows, letting in the smell of spring lawns like the one she'd been raped on not many hours earlier.

"So," she said.

"So Ethan denies it," her dad said. "He says it was just roughhousing and consensual."

Patty's tears came on like a rain that starts unnoticeably but surprisingly soon soaks everything. She asked if her dad had spoken to Ethan directly.

"No, just his father, twice," he said. "I'd be lying if I said the conversation went well."

"So obviously Mr. Post doesn't believe me."

"Well, Patty, Ethan's his son. He doesn't know you as well as we do."

"Do you believe me?"

"Yes, I do."

"Does Mommy?"

"Of course she does."

"Then what do I do?"

Her dad turned to her like an attorney. Like an adult addressing another adult. "You drop it," he said. "Forget about it. Move on."

"What?"

"You shake it off. Move on. Learn to be more careful."

"Like it never even happened?"

"Patty, the people at the party were all friends of his. They're going to say they saw you get drunk and be aggressive with him. They'll say you were behind a shed that wasn't more than thirty feet from the pool, and they didn't hear anything untoward."

"It was really noisy. There was music and shouting."

"They'll also say they saw the two of you leaving later in the evening and getting into his car. And the world will see an Exeter boy who's going to Princeton and was responsible enough to use contraceptives, and gentleman enough to leave the party and drive you home."

The deceptive little rain was wetting the collar of Patty's T-shirt.

"You're not really on my side, are you," she said.

"Of course I am."

"You keep saying 'Of course,' 'Of course.' "

"Listen to me. The P.A. is going to want to know why you didn't scream."

"I was embarrassed! Those weren't my friends!"

"But do you see that this is going to be hard for a judge or a jury to understand? All you had to do was scream, and you would have been safe."

Patty couldn't remember why she hadn't screamed. She had to admit that, in hindsight, it seemed bizarrely agreeable of her.

"I fought, though."

"Yes, but you're a top-tier student athlete. Shortstops get scratched and bruised all the time, don't they? On the arms? On the thighs?"

"Did you tell Mr. Post I'm a virgin? I mean, was?"

"I didn't consider that any of his business."

"Maybe you should call him back and tell him that."

"Look," her dad said. "Honey. I know it's horrendously unfair. I feel terrible for you. But sometimes the best thing is just to learn your lesson and make sure you never get in the same position again. To say to yourself, 'I made a mistake, and I had some bad luck,' and then let it. Let it, ah. Let it drop."

He turned the ignition halfway, so that the panel lights came on. He kept his hand on the key.

"But he committed a crime," Patty said.

"Yes, but better to, uh. Life's not always fair, Pattycakes. Mr. Post said he thought Ethan might be willing to apologize for not being more gentlemanly, but. Well. Would you like that?"

"No."

"I didn't think so."

"Coach Nagel says I should go to the police."

"Coach Nagel should stick to her dribbling," her dad said.

"Softball," Patty said. "It's softball season now."

"Unless you want to spend your entire senior year being publicly humiliated."

"Basketball is in the winter. Softball is in the spring, when the weather's warmer?"

"I'm asking you: is that really how you want to spend your senior year?"

"Coach Carver is basketball," Patty said. "Coach Nagel is softball. Are you getting this?"

Her dad started the engine.

As a senior, instead of being publicly humiliated Patty became a real player, not just a talent. She all but resided in the field house. She got a three-game basketball suspension for putting a shoulder in the back of a New Rochelle forward who'd elbowed one of her teammates, and she still broke every school record she'd set the previous year, plus nearly broke the scoring record. Augmenting her reliable perimeter shooting was a growing taste for driving to the basket. She was no longer on speaking terms with physical pain.

In the spring, when the local state assemblyman stepped down after long service and the Party leadership chose Patty's mother to run as his replacement, the Posts offered to co-host a fund-raiser in the green luxury of their back yard. Joyce sought Patty's permission before she accepted the offer, saying she wouldn't do anything that Patty wasn't comfortable with, but by then Patty was beyond caring what Joyce did, and told her so. When the candidate's family stood for the obligatory family photo, no grief was given to Patty for absenting herself. Her look of bitterness would not have helped Joyce's cause.

(2010)

Exploring the Text

1. The story's first 22 paragraphs offer quite a bit of exposition — things we need to know before the story starts. Do you think that much exposition is necessary? Explain why or why not. How would you describe the tone of the exposition, especially the first paragraph?
2. Compare and contrast the conversation Patty has with her mother (pars. 28–48) with the conversation she has with her coach (pars. 50–60). How is Patty's role different in each? What is her internal reaction to each conversation? Which adult evokes a stronger response in her? Explain your answer.
3. In what ways is this a story about politics? What are the politics of Patty's parents? How do their actions reflect — or contradict — their politics? How does politics figure into the way Patty's rape is handled?
4. How is the suburban setting important in "Agreeable"? If you have read other writers who set their work in suburbia, such as John Cheever, Ann Beattie, or Rick Moody, compare Jonathan Franzen's take with theirs.
5. Were you surprised at the direction this story's plot took? Did you find it believable? What do you make of the fact that Patty seems to feel somewhat responsible for what happened to her? Were you surprised at the reactions of Ethan's and Patty's parents? Explain your answer.
6. We learn that Patty becomes a star athlete — though very physically aggressive. The story ends with Joyce asking Patty's permission to hold a fundraiser in the Posts' backyard. Patty replies that she is "beyond caring" and absents herself from the family portrait. Do you find this ending satisfying or frustrating? Explain. Where do you think Patty goes from here? (Read Franzen's Freedom to find out.)
7. Why do you think Franzen titled this story "Agreeable"? What are some of the ways the characters in the story exemplify agreeableness? Do you think Franzen considers it a good quality? Do you? Explain your answer.

Brian Turner

Born in 1967 in California, Brian Turner earned an MFA in poetry at the University of Oregon before enlisting in the army at the age of twenty-nine. During the seven years he spent as a soldier, Turner was deployed to Bosnia and Herzegovina and served as an infantry team leader with the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team in Iraq in 2003. His work has been published in various journals as well as in Voices in Wartime: The Anthology—published in 2005 in conjunction with the feature-length documentary film of the same name. His first collection of poems, Here, Bullet (2005), was a New York Times Editors' Choice selection. In 2007, Turner received a National Endowment for the Arts Literature Fellowship in poetry. He currently lives in Fresno, California, where he teaches poetry at Fresno State.

At Lowe's Home Improvement Center

This poem appeared in Turner's 2010 collection, Phantom Noise.

Standing in aisle 16, the hammer and anchor aisle,
I bust a 50 pound box of double-headed nails open by accident, their oily bright shanks and diamond points like firing pins from M-4s and M-16s.
In a steady stream
they pour onto the tile floor, constant as shells falling south of Baghdad last night, where Bosch kneeled under the chain guns of helicopters stationed above, their tracer-fire a synaptic geometry of light.
At dawn, when the shelling stops, hundreds of bandages will not be enough.

Bosch walks down aisle 16 now, in full combat gear, improbable, worn out from fatigue, a rifle slung at his side, his left hand guiding a ten-year-old boy who sees what war is and will never clear it from his head.

Here, Bosch says, Take care of him.
I'm going back in for more.

Sheets of plywood drop with the airy breath of mortars the moment they crack open in shrapnel. Mower blades are just mower blades and the Troy-Bilt Self-Propelled Mower doesn't resemble a Blackhawk or an Apache. In fact, no one seems to notice the casualty collection center Doc High marks out in ceiling fans, aisle 15. Wounded Iraqis with IVs sit propped against boxes as 92 sample Paradiso fans hover in a slow revolution of blades.

The forklift driver over-adjusts, swinging the tines until they slice open gallons and gallons of paint, Sienna Dust and Lemon Sorbet and Ship's Harbor Blue pooling in the aisle where Sgt. Rampley walks through — carrying someone's blown-off arm cradled like an infant, handing it to me, saying, Hold this, Turner,
we might find who it belongs to.

Cash registers open and slide shut with a sound of machine guns being charged.
Dead soldiers are laid out at the registers, on the black conveyor belts, and people in line still reach for their wallets. Should I stand at the magazine rack, reading
Landscaping with Stone or The Complete
Home Improvement Repair Book?
What difference does it make if I choose tumbled travertine tile, Botticino marble, or Black Absolute granite. Outside, palm trees line the asphalt boulevards, restaurants cool their patrons who will enjoy fireworks exploding over Bass Lake in July.

Aisle number 7 is a corridor of lights.
Each dead Iraqi walks amazed by Tiffany posts and Bavarian pole lights.
Motion-activated incandescents switch on as they pass by, reverent sentinels of light, Fleur De Lis and Luminaire Mural Extérieur welcoming them to Lowe's Home Improvement Center, aisle number 7, where I stand in mute shock, someone's arm cradled in my own.
The Iraqi boy beside me reaches down to slide his fingertip in Retro Colonial Blue, an interior latex, before writing
T, for Tourniquet, on my forehead.

(2010)

Exploring the Text

1. The epigraph of Brian Turner's collection in which this poem appears is from the Iraqi poet Al-Bayati: "I embrace the frightful and the beautiful." How does "At Lowe's Home Improvement Center" embrace the frightful and the beautiful?
2. Why do you think Turner set this poem in a Lowe's Home Improvement Center? How is it both a literal setting and also, perhaps, a play on words?
3. Modern American warfare is said to differ from warfare of the past in that soldiers now spend more time patrolling and identifying enemies than they do fighting. How does this poem reflect that distinction?
4. Trace the ways that Turner moves from the safety of the home improvement center to the danger of the speaker's war experience. How does he make those transitions? What is the effect of the transitions?
5. Turner has said that he believes "the poem finishes in the reader." How does this poem finish in you?

John Jeremiah Sullivan

John Jeremiah Sullivan was born in Louisville, Kentucky, in 1974 and raised in Indiana. Son of a sportswriter father and English teacher mother, Sullivan is known for his "long-form" writing (long, deeply researched nonfiction pieces) and was highly praised for his collection Pulphead: Essays (2011). He has written for GQ, Harper's, New York Magazine, New York Times Magazine, and the Paris Review.

Michael

"Michael," an essay in Pulphead, was inspired by interviews that Michael Jackson gave to Ebony and Jet magazines, publications aimed largely at African American audiences, during a time when he rarely spoke to the mainstream media.

How do you talk about Michael Jackson except that you mention Prince Screws? Prince Screws was an Alabama cotton-plantation slave who became a tenant farmer after the Civil War, likely on his former master's land. His son, Prince Screws, Jr., bought a small farm. And that man's son, Prince Screws III, left home for Indiana, where he found work as a Pullman porter, part of the exodus of Southern blacks to the Northern industrial cities.

There came a disruption in the line. This last Prince Screws, the one who went north, would have no sons. He had two daughters, Kattie and Hattie. Kattie gave birth to ten children, the eighth a boy, Michael — who would name his sons Prince, to honor his mother, whom he adored, and to signal a restoration. So the ridiculous moniker given by a white man to his black slave, the way you might name a dog, was bestowed by a black king upon his pale-skinned sons and heirs.

We took the name for an affectation and mocked it.

Not to imply that it was above mockery, but of all the things that make Michael unknowable, thinking we knew him is maybe the most deceptive. Let's suspend it.

Begin not with the miniseries childhood of Joseph's endless family practice sessions but with the later and, it seems, just as formative Motown childhood, from, say, eleven to fourteen — years spent, when not on the road, most often alone, behind security walls, with private tutors and secret sketchbooks. A cloud-headed child, he likes rainbows and reading. He starts collecting exotic animals.

His eldest brothers had at one time been children who dreamed of child stardom. Michael never knows this sensation. By the time he achieves something like self-awareness, he is a child star. The child star dreams of being an artist.

Alone, he puts on classical records, because he finds they soothe his mind. He also likes the old Southern stuff his uncle Luther sings. His uncle looks back at him and thinks he seems sad for his age. This is in California, so poor, brown Gary, with its poisonous air you could smell from leagues away — a decade's exposure to which may already have damaged his immune system in fateful ways — is the past.

He thinks about things and sometimes talks them over with his friends Marvin Gaye and Diana Ross when they are hanging out. He listens to albums and compares. The albums he and his brothers make have a few nice tunes, to sell records, then a lot of consciously second-rate numbers, to satisfy the format. Whereas Tchaikovsky and people like that, they didn't handle slack material. But you have to write your own songs. Michael has always made melodies in his head, little riffs and beats, but that isn't the same. The way Motown deals with the Jackson 5, finished songs are delivered to the group from songwriting teams in various cities. The brothers are brought in to sing and add accents.

Michael wants access to the "anatomy" of the music. That's the word he uses repeatedly. Anatomy. What's inside its structure that makes it move?

When he's seventeen, he asks Stevie Wonder to let him spy while Songs in the Key of Life gets made. There's Michael, self-consciously shy and deferential, flattening himself mothlike against the Motown studio wall. Somehow Stevie's blindness becomes moving in this context. No doubt he is for long stretches unaware of Michael's presence. Never asks him to play a shaker or anything. Never mentions Michael. But Michael hears him. Most of the Jackson siblings are leaving Motown at this moment, for another label, where they've leveraged a bit more creative sway. The first thing Michael does is write "Blues Away," an unfairly forgotten song, fated to become one of the least-dated-sounding tracks the Jacksons do together. A nice rolling piano riff with strings and a breathy chorus — Burt Bacharach doing Stevie doing early disco, and some other factor that was Michael's own, that dwelled in his introverted-sounding vocal rhythms. Sweet, slightly cryptic lyrics that contain an early notion of melancholy as final, inviolable retreat: "I'd like to be yours tomorrow, so I'm giving you some time to get over today / But you can't take my blues away."

By 1978, the year of "Shake Your Body (Down to the Ground)" — cowritten by Michael and little Randy — Michael's methods have gelled. He starts with tape recorders. He sings and beatboxes the little things he hears, the parts. Where do they come from? Above. He claims to drop to his knees and thank Jehovah after he snatches one. His voice coach tells the story of Michael one day raising his hands in the air during practice and starting to mutter. The coach, Seth Riggs, decides to leave him alone. When he comes back half an hour later, it's to Michael whispering, "Thank you for my talent."

Some of the things Michael hears in his head he exports to another instrument, to the piano (which he plays not well but passably) or to the bass. The melody and a few percussive elements remain with his vocal. The rest he assembles around it. He has his brothers and sisters with him. He conducts.

His art will come to depend on his ability to stay in touch with that childlike inner instrument, keeping near enough to himself to heed his own melodic promptings. If you've listened to toddlers making up songs, the things they invent are often bafflingly catchy and ingenious. They compose to biorhythms somehow. The vocal from Michael's earlier, Off the Wall–era demo of the eventual Thriller hit "Wanna Be Startin' Somethin'" sounds like nothing so much as playful schoolyard taunting. He will always be at his worst when making what he thinks of as "big" music, which he invariably associates with military imagery.

Nineteen seventy-nine, the year of Off the Wall and his first nose job, marks an 15 obscure crisis. Around the start of that year, they offer him the gay lead in the film version of A Chorus Line, but he declines the role, explaining, "I'm excited about it, but if I do it, people will link me with the part. Because of my voice, some people already think I'm that way — homo — though I'm actually not at all."

People want to know, Why, when you became a man, did your voice not change? Rather, it did change, but what did it change into? Listening to clips of his interviews through the seventies, you can hear how he goes about changing it himself. First it deepens slightly, around 1972–73 or so. (Listen to him on The Dating Game in 1972 and you'll hear that his voice was lower at fourteen than it will be at thirty.) This potentially catastrophic event has perhaps been vaguely dreaded by the family and label for years. Michael Jackson without his falsetto is not the commodity on which their collective dream depends. But Michael has never known a reality that wasn't susceptible on some level to his creative powers. He works to develop something, not a falsetto, which is a way of singing above your range, but instead a higher range. He isolates totally different configurations of his vocal cords, finding their crevices, cultivating the flexibility there. Vocal teachers will tell you this can be done, though it's considered an extreme practice. Whether the process is conscious in Michael's case is unknowable. He probably evolves it in order to keep singing Jackson 5 songs every night through puberty. The startling effect is of his having imaginatively not so much castrated himself as womanized himself. He essentially evolves a drag voice. On the early demo for "Don't Stop 'Til You Get Enough," recorded at home with Randy and Janet helping, you can actually hear him work his way into this voice. It is a character, really. "We're gonna be startin' now, baby," he says in a relaxed, moderately high-pitched man's voice. Then he intones the title, "Don't stop 'til you get enough," in a softer, quieter version of basically the same voice. He repeats the line in a still higher register, almost purring. Finally — in a full-on girlish peal — he sings.

A source will later claim that Michael once, in a moment of anger, broke into a deep, gruff voice she'd never heard before. Liza Minnelli also claims to have heard this other voice.

Interesting that these out-flashings of his "natural" voice occurred at moments when he was, as we would say, not himself.

On the Internet, you can see a picture of him near the end of his life, juxtaposed with a digital projection of what he would have looked like at the same age without the surgeries and makeup and wigs. A smiling middle-aged black guy, handsome in an everyday way. We are meant, of course, to feel a connection with this lost neverbeing, and pity for the strange, self-mutilated creature beside him. I can't be alone, however, in feeling just the opposite, that there's something metaphysically revolting about the mock-up. It's an abomination. Michael chose his true face. What is, is natural.

His physical body is arguably, even inarguably, the single greatest piece of post- 20 modern American sculpture. It must be carefully preserved.

It's fascinating to read the interviews he gave to Ebony and Jet over the past thirty years. I confess myself disoriented by them, as a white person. During whole stretches of years when the big media were reporting endlessly on his bizarreness and reclusiveness, he was every so often granting these intimate and illuminating sit-downs to those magazines, never forgetting to remind them that he trusted only them, would speak only to them. The articles make me realize that about the only Michael Jackson I've ever known, personality-wise, is a Michael Jackson who's defending himself against white people who are passive-aggressively accusing him of child molestation. He spoke differently to black people, was more at ease. The language and grain of detail are different. Not that the scenario was any more journalistically pure. The John H. Johnson publishing family, which puts out Jet and Ebony, had Michael's back, faithfully repairing and maintaining his complicated relations with the community, assuring readers that, in the presence of Michael, "you quickly look past the enigmatic icon's light, almost translucent skin and realize that this African American legend is more than just skin deep." At times, especially when the "homo" issue came up, the straining required could turn comical, as in Ebony in 1982, talking about his obsessive male fans:

> Michael: They come after us every way they can, and the guys are just as bad as the girls. Guys jump up on the stage and usually go for me and Randy.
> Ebony: But that means nothing except that they admire you, doesn't it?

Even so, to hear Michael laid-back and talking unpretentiously about art, the thing he most loved — that is a new Michael, a person utterly absent from, for example, Martin Bashir's infamous documentary, Living with Michael Jackson, in which Michael admitted sharing his bedroom with children. It's only after reading Jet and Ebony that one can understand how otherwise straightforward-seeming people of all races have stayed good friends with Michael Jackson these many years. He is charming; his mind is alive. What a pleasure to find him listening to early "writing version" demos of his own compositions and saying, "Listen to that, that's at home, Janet, Randy, me . . . You're hearing four basses on there . . ." Or to hear him tell less prepackaged anecdotes, such as the one about a beautiful black girl who froze in the aisle and pissed all down her legs after spotting him on a plane, or the blond girl who kissed him in an airport and, when he didn't respond, asked, "What's wrong, you fag?" He grows tired of reminding people, "There's a reason why I was created male. I'm not a girl." He leaves the reason unspoken.

When Michael and Quincy Jones run into each other on the set of The Wiz, Michael remembers a moment from years before when Sammy Davis, Jr., had taken Jones aside backstage somewhere and whispered, "This guy is something; he's amazing." Michael had "tucked it away." He knows Jones's name from the sleeves of his father's jazz albums, knows Jones is a serious man. He waits till the movie is done to call him up. It's the fact that Jones intimidates him slightly that draws Jackson to him. He yearns for some competition larger than the old intrafamilial one, which he has long dominated. That was checkers; he wants chess. Fading child stars can easily insulate themselves from further motivation, if they wish, and most do. It's the more human path. Michael seeks pressure instead, at this moment. He recruits people who can drive him to, as he puts it, "higher effort."

Quincy Jones's nickname for him is Smelly. It comes from Michael's habit of constantly touching and covering his nose with the fingers of his left hand, a tic that becomes pronounced in news clips from this time. He feels embarrassed about his broad nose. Several surgeries later — after, one assumes, it had been deemed impolitic inside the Jackson camp to mention the earlier facial self-consciousness — the story is altered. We are told that when Michael liked a track in the studio, he would call it "the smelly jelly." Both stories may be true. "Smelly jelly" has the whiff of Jackson's weird, infantile sayings. Later in life, when feeling weak, he'd say to his people, "I'm hurting . . . blanket me," which could mean, among other things, time for my medicine.

Michael knows he won't really have gone solo until his own songwriting finds the 25 next level. He doesn't want inclusion; he wants awe. Jones has a trusted songwriter in his stable, the Englishman Rod Temperton, of Heatwave fame, who brings in a song, "Rock with You." It's very good. Michael hears it and knows it's a hit. He's not even worried about hits at this point, though, except as a kind of by-product of perfection. He goes home and writes "Don't Stop 'Til You Get Enough." Janet tinks on a glass bottle. Trusted Randy plays guitar. These are the two siblings whom Michael brings with him into the Quincy Jones adventure, to the innermost zone where he writes. We don't think of the family as having anything to do, musically, with his solo career, except by way of guilt favors. But he feels confident with these two, needs to keep them woven into his nest. They are both younger than he. His baby sister.

From the perspective of thirty years, "Don't Stop 'Til You Get Enough" is a much better track than "Rock with You." One admires "Rock with You," but melodically Michael's song comes from a more distinctive place. You hear not slickness but sophisticated instincts.

Michael feels disappointed with Off the Wall. It wins a Grammy, spawns multiple number one singles, dramatically raises Jackson's already colossal level of fame, redeems disco in the very hour and flash of disco's dying. Diana Ross, who once helped out the Jacksons by putting her lovely arm around them, wants Michael to be at her shows again, not for his sake now but for hers. She isn't desperate by any means, but something has shifted. Quincy Jones and Bruce Swedien, the recording guru who works with him, both take to be absurd the mere idea of "following up" Off the Wall in terms of success. You do your best, but that kind of thing just happens, if it happens. Jones knows that. Not Michael. All he can see of Off the Wall is that the year had bigger records. He wants to make something, he says, that "refuse[s] to be ignored."

At home he demos "Billie Jean" with Randy and Janet. When what will be the immortal part comes around, she and Michael go, "Whoo whoo / Whoo whoo."

From Michael's brain, then, through a portable tape recorder, on into the home studio. Bruce Swedien comes over. Being Michael Jackson working on the follow-up to Off the Wall means sometimes your demos are recorded at your home by the greatest audio engineer in the world. But for all that, the team works in a stripped-down fashion, with no noise reduction. "That's usually the best stuff," Michael says, "when you strip it down to the bare minimum and go inside yourself and invent."

On this home demo, made between the "writing version" and the album version, you get to hear Michael's early, mystical placeholder vocals, laid down before he'd written the verses. We hear him say, "More kick and stuff in the 'phones . . . I need, uh . . . more bottom and kick in the 'phones." 30

Then the music. And what sounds like:

[Mumble mumble mum] oh, to say
On the phone to stay . . .
Oh, born out of time.
All the while I see other eyes.
One at a time
We'll go where the winds unwind

She told me her voice belonged to me
And I'm here to see
She called my name, then you said, Hello
Oh, then I died
And said, Gotta go in a ride

Seems that you knew my mind, now live
On that day got it made
Oh, mercy, it does care of what you do
Take care of what you do
Lord, they're coming down

Billie Jean is not my lover
She just a girl that says that I am the one
You know, the kid is not my son

A big round warm Scandinavian type, Swedien comes from Minnesota, made his mark doing classical, but with classical engineering it's all about fidelity, he knew, and he wants to be part of the making, to help shape the songs. So, a frustrated anatomist himself, coming down from high to low formally and meeting Michael on his way up. Quincy, in the middle with his jazz cool, calls Swedien "Svensk." The white man has the endearing habit of lifting both hands to massage the gray walrus wings of his mustache. He has a condition called synesthesia. It means that when he listens to sound, he sees colors. He knows the mix is right only when he sees the right colors. Michael likes singing for him.

In a seminar room in Seattle, at a 1993 Audio Pro recording-geek conference, Swedien talks about his craft. He plays his recording of Michael's flawless one-take vocal from "The Way You Make Me Feel," sans effects of any kind, to let the engineers in the audience hear the straight dope, a great mike on a great voice with as little interference as possible, the right angle, the right deck, everything.

Someone in the audience raises a hand and asks if it's hard recording Michael's voice, given that, as Swedien mentioned before, Michael is very "physical." At first, Swedien doesn't cotton. "Yeah, that is a bit of a problem," he answers, "but I've never had an incident where the microphone has been damaged. One time, though . . ."

The guy interrupts, "Not to do damage, just the proximity thing." 35

"Oh!" Swedien says, suddenly understanding. His voice drops to a whisper, "He's unbelievable."

He gives the most beautiful description. "Michael records in the dark," he says, "and he'll dance. And picture this: You're looking through the glass. And it's dark. With a little pin spot on him." Swedien lifts his hand to suggest a narrow cone of light shining directly down from overhead. "And you'll see the mike here. And he'll sing his lines. And then he disappears."

In the outer dark he is dancing, fluttering. That's all Quincy and Swedien know.

"And he's"—Swedien punches the air—"right back in front of the mike at the precise instant."

Swedien invents a special zippered covering for miking the bass drum on "Billie 40
Jean." A muffled enclosure. It gives the song that mummified-heartbeat intensity, which you have seen make a dance floor come to life. The layered bass sounds on the one and the three lend a lurching feline throb. Bass drum, bass guitar, double synthesizer bass, the "four basses," all hitting together, doing the part that started as Michael and Janet going whoo whoo whoo whoo, that came from Jehovah. Its tempo is like the pulse of a sleeping person.

Michael finds himself back in the old Motown building for a day, doing some video mixing, when Berry Gordy approaches and asks him to be in the twenty-fifth-anniversary special on NBC. Michael demurs. A claustrophobic moment for him. All that business, his brothers, Motown, the Jackson 5, the past: that's all a cocoon he's been writhing inside of, finally chewing through. He knows that "Billie Jean" has exploded; he's becoming something else. But the animal inside him that is his ambition senses the opportunity. He strikes his legendary deal with Gordy, that he'll perform with his brothers if he's allowed to do one of his own solo, post-Motown hits as well. Gordy agrees.

What Michael does with his moment, given the context, given that his brothers have just left the stage and that the stage belongs to Mr. Berry Gordy, is outrageous. In the by-now totemic YouTube clips of this performance, Michael's preamble is usually cut off. That makes it worth watching the disc (which also happens to include one of Marvin Gaye's last appearances before his murder).

Michael is sweaty and strutting. "Thank you . . . Oh, you're beautiful . . . Thank you," he says, almost slurring with sexiness. You can tell he's worked out all his nerves on the Jackson 5 songs. Now he owns the space as if it were the inside of his cage. Millions upon millions of eyes.

"I have to say, those were the good old days," he rambles on. "I love those songs, those were magic moments, with all my brothers, including Jermaine." (The Jackson family's penchant for high passive-aggression at watershed moments is extraordinary; at Michael's funeral, Jermaine will say: "I was his voice and his backbone, I had his back." And then, as if remembering to thank his agent, "So did the family.")

"Those were good songs," Michael says. "I like those songs a lot, but especially, I like" — his voice fades from the mike for a second, ramifying the liveness till the meters almost spike — "the new songs." 45

Uncontrollable shrieking. He's grabbing the mike stand like James Brown used to grab it, like if it had a neck he'd be choking it. People in the seats are yelling, " 'Billie Jean'! 'Billie Jean'!"

I won't cloud the uniqueness of what he does next with words except to mention one potentially missable (because it's so obvious) aspect: that he does it so entirely alone. The stage is profoundly empty. Silhouettes of the orchestra members are clapping back in the dark. But unless you count the dazzling glove — conceived, according to one source, to hide the advancing vitiligo that discolors his left hand — Michael holds only one prop: a black hat. He tosses that away almost immediately. Stage, dancer, spotlight. The microphone isn't even on. He snatches it back from the stand as if from the hands of a maddening child.

With a mime's tools he proceeds to do possibly the most captivating thing a person's ever been captured doing onstage. Richard Pryor, who was not in any account I have ever read a suck-up, approaches Michael afterward and says simply, "That was the greatest performance I've ever seen." Fred Astaire calls him "the greatest living natural dancer."

Michael tells Ebony, "I remember doing the performance so clearly, and I remember that I was so upset with myself, 'cause it wasn't what I wanted. I wanted it to be more." It's said he intended to hold the crouching en pointe at the end of the moonwalk longer. But if you watch, he falls off his toes, when he falls, in perfect time, and makes it part of the turn. Much as, closer to the end, he wipes sweat from under his nose in time.

The intensity behind his face looks unbearable. 50

Quincy always tells him, "Smelly . . . get out of the way and leave room so that God can walk in."

A god moves through him. The god enters, the god leaves.

It's odd to write about a person knowing he may have been, but not if he was, a serial child molester. Whether or not Michael did it, the suggestion of it shadowed him for so long and finally killed his soul. It's said that toward the end, he was having himself put under — with the same anesthesia that may have finished him — not for hours but for days. As though being snuffed. Witnesses to his body on the morgue table report that his prosthetic nose was missing. There were only holes in his face. A mummy. Two separate complete autopsies: they cut him to pieces. As of this writing, no one outside the Jackson camp knows for certain the whereabouts of his body.

I have read a stack of books about him in the past month, more than I ever imagined I would — though not more than I wanted. He warrants and will no doubt one day receive a serious, objective biography: all the great cultural strains of American music came together in him. We have yet to accept that his very racial in-betweenness made him more and not less of an essential figure in our tradition. He grasped this and used it. His marriage to Elvis's daughter was in part an art piece.

Of all those books, the one that troubles and sticks with me is the celebrity journalist Ian Halperin's Unmasked: The Final Years of Michael Jackson. Most famous for a book and movie suggesting dubiously that Kurt Cobain's suicide was a disguised murder, Halperin is not an ideal source but neither is he a useless one. Indeed, he accurately predicted Michael's death six months before it happened and seems to have burrowed his way into the Jackson world in several places. 55

In the beginning, Halperin claims, he'd set out mainly to prove that Michael had sexually molested young boys and used his money to get away with it. I believe him about this original motivation, since any such proof would have generated the most sensational publicity, sold the most copies, and so on. But Halperin finds, in the end, after exhaustively pursuing leads, that every so-called thread of evidence becomes a rope of sand. Somebody, even if it's a family member, wants money, or has accused other people before, or is patently insane. It usually comes down to a tale someone else knows about an alleged secret payoff. Meanwhile, you have these boys, like Macaulay Culkin (whom Michael was once accused of fondling), who have come forth and stated that nothing untoward ever happened with Michael. When he stood trial and got off, that was a just verdict.

That's the first half of the Halperin Thesis. The second half is that Michael was a fully functioning gay man, who took secret male lovers his entire adult life. Halperin says he met two of them and saw pictures of one with Michael. They were young but perfectly legal. One told Halperin that Michael was an insatiable bottom.

As for Michael's interest in children, it's hard to imagine that lacking an erotic dimension of some kind, but it may well have been thoroughly nonsexual. Michael was a frozen adolescent — about the age of those first dreamy striped-sweater years in California — and he wanted to hang out with the people he saw as his peers. Have pillow fights, call each other doo-doo head. It's creepy as hell, if you like, but victimless. It would make him — in rough clinical terms — a partial passive fixated pedophile. Not a crime yet, not until they get the mind-reader machines going.

I don't ask that you agree with Halperin, merely that you admit, as I feel compelled to do, that the psychological picture he conjures up is not less and perhaps just slightly more plausible than the one in which Michael uses Neverland Ranch as a spiderweb, luring boys to his bed. If you're like me, you've been subconsciously presuming the latter to be basically the case for most of your life. But there's a good chance it was never true and that Michael loved children with a weird but not immoral love.

If you want a disturbing thought experiment, allow these — I won't say facts, but feasibility structures — let them digest, and then go back again to Martin Bashir's 2003 documentary. There's no point adding here to the demonization of Bashir for having more or less manipulated Michael through kindness into declaring himself a complete Fruit of the Loom–collecting fiend, especially when you consider that Bashir was representing us fairly well in the ideas he appears to have carried regarding Michael, that it was probably true about him and kids. 60

But when you put on the not-so glasses and watch, and see Michael protesting his innocence, asking, "What's wrong with sharing love?" as he holds hands with that twelve-year-old cancer survivor — or many years earlier, in that strange self-released statement, where he describes with barely suppressed rage the humiliation of having his penis examined by the police — dammit if the whole life doesn't look a lot different. There appears to exist a nondismissible chance that Michael was some kind of martyr.

We won't pity him. That he embraced his own destiny, knowing beforehand how fame would warp him, is precisely what frees us to revere him.

We have, in any case, a pathology of pathologization in this country. It's a bourgeois disease, and we do right to call bullshit on it. We moan that Michael changed his face out of self-loathing. He may have loved what he became.

Ebony caught up with him in Africa in the nineties. He had just been crowned king of Sani by villagers in the Ivory Coast. "You know I don't give interviews," he tells Robert E. Johnson there in the village. "You're the only person I trust to give interviews to: Deep inside I feel that this world we live in is really a big, huge, monumental symphonic orchestra. I believe that in its primordial form, all of creation is sound and that it's not just random sound, that it's music."

May they have been his last thoughts. 65

(2011)

Exploring the Text

1. What is John Jeremiah Sullivan's claim about Michael Jackson? Find and analyze at least three different types of evidence that Sullivan uses to support his claim.
2. How does Sullivan establish ethos in this essay?
3. Sullivan traces Michael Jackson's career and image through his songs. Listen to them or watch them on YouTube. Do you agree with Sullivan's assessment? Do they reveal something different to you? Explain your answer.
4. Sullivan is considered a practitioner of New Journalism, a term coined in the 1960s to describe writing characterized by the use of elements of fiction to get at the story behind the story. How does Sullivan get at the story behind the story in "Michael"?
5. Critic James Wood of the New Yorker said of Sullivan's prose that it "bend[s] itself around its subject . . . [he] lets his subjects muss and alter his prose." Find examples in "Michael" where the subject of his essay has an effect on his prose style. Hint: look for places where the essay sounds more like a novel.
6. In an online interview with Shona Sanzgirl for the SF Weekly, Sullivan was asked what he meant when he said that Michael Jackson's body was the "greatest piece of postmodern American sculpture" (par. 20). He answered that he meant it literally, saying, "[I]t's hard to imagine a piece of art that more thoroughly transmitted the anxieties and contradictions of his time." What anxieties and contradictions do you think Sullivan is talking about?
7. Did reading "Michael" change any of your views about pop icon Michael Jackson? Explain why or why not.

Chris Hedges and Joe Sacco

Chris Hedges (b. 1956) is a Pulitzer Prize–winning journalist who worked for more than fifteen years at the New York Times and spent nearly twenty years as a foreign correspondent in Central America, the Middle East, Africa, and the Balkans. He is the author of four best-selling nonfiction books, and his articles and essays have appeared in numerous publications, including Harper's, New York Review of Books, Granta, and Mother Jones.

Joe Sacco (b. 1960) is a world-renowned cartoonist and the author of eleven books. His journalistic comics have appeared in Details, the New York Times Magazine, Time, and Harper's.

from Days of Destruction, Days of Revolt

In 2012, Hedges and Sacco published Days of Destruction, Days of Revolt, a collaboration of illustrations and stories that expose the "sacrifice zones" of postcapitalist America — from Native American reservations to deserted manufacturing towns to Occupy Wall Street demonstrations. The excerpt here is from "Days of Siege," the chapter on Camden, New Jersey, a dying city that used to be full of industry and manufacturing and is now impoverished and crime ridden. The main character is seventy-six-year-old Joe Bolzano, who is described as one of a "handful of white citizens who never left the city [of Camden]."

RUTGERS
MY DAD WAS BORN IN ITALY... [AND] WHEN HE CAME... HE DIDN'T COME IN THROUGH ELLIS ISLAND.
HE JUMPED OFF A SHIP.
AND AS THE STORY GOES...THEY CAUGHT HIM, BUT HIS DAD MUST HAVE BEEN HERE ALSO, AND HIS DAD WENT BACK IN HIS PLACE WITH THE SAME NAME.

HE TALKED IN BROKEN ENGLISH BUT WOULD DO SO WELL IN ANY CONVERSATION.
AND ALMOST—AND I THINK I HAVE THE SAME TRAIT
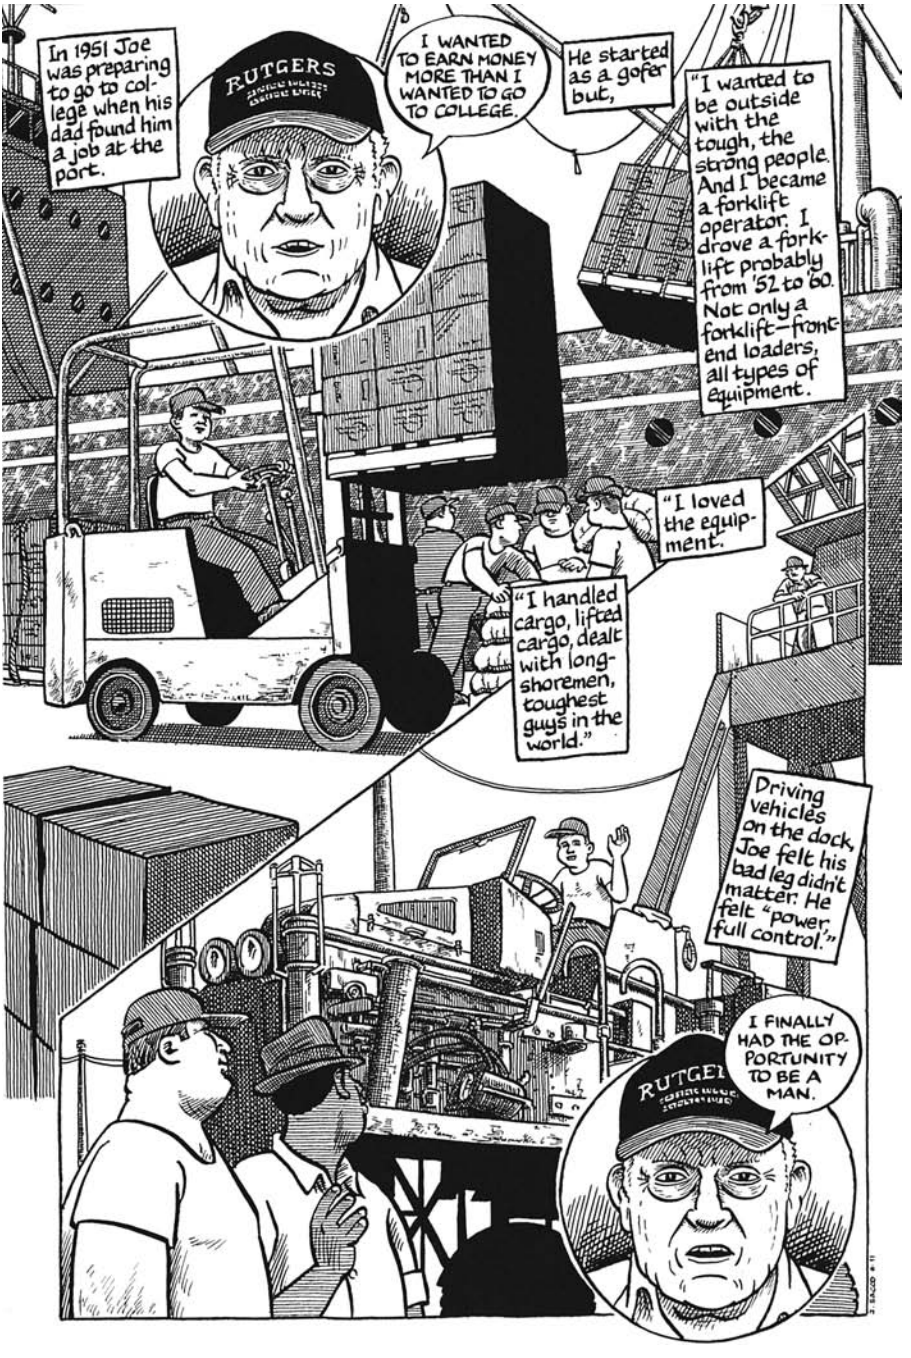
—HE DEPENDED ON BODY LANGUAGE, AND HE KNEW WHAT HE COULD DO AND HE COULDN'T DO.
"He was a longshoreman in New York harbor; and for some reason, and it's only hearsay, he mighta had a problem with some of the people up there.
"And he had to leave New York, and he came to Camden."
Joe's dad found a job at the bustling port.
"He was noted for being able to load cargo ships and knowing exactly how much space it would take for cargo.
"But his big reputation was the fact that he always wanted people to work."
And when the stevedores were idle, "when the cargo wasn't moving, he would yell,
THE HOOK SHE HANGS!
THE HOOK SHE HANGS!

"My mother was born in this country, a very soft-spoken woman. Had tuberculosis more times than we could think about...
"From the age of about 12, I worried about my mother dying every day."
Joe grew up poor with his brothers and a sister in the Italian-American community around the Our Lady of Mt. Carmel church.
His eldest brother Anthony, "a beautiful-looking kid," had epilepsy and died when Joe was four.
"And in those days, because the houses were built in such a way you couldn't get the coffin through the parlor, so you had to take the window route ... And it was like a procession of some kind with some musical instruments... I can remember that so well."
Joe used to tune in to hear Kate Smith singing 'God Bless America' every Sunday at noon and recalls a Camden where at the end of the workweek "you could walk up and down the street and everyone had the Friday Night fights on...
THERE'S JERSEY JOE WITH A LEFT!
JERSEY JOE WITH A RIGHT!

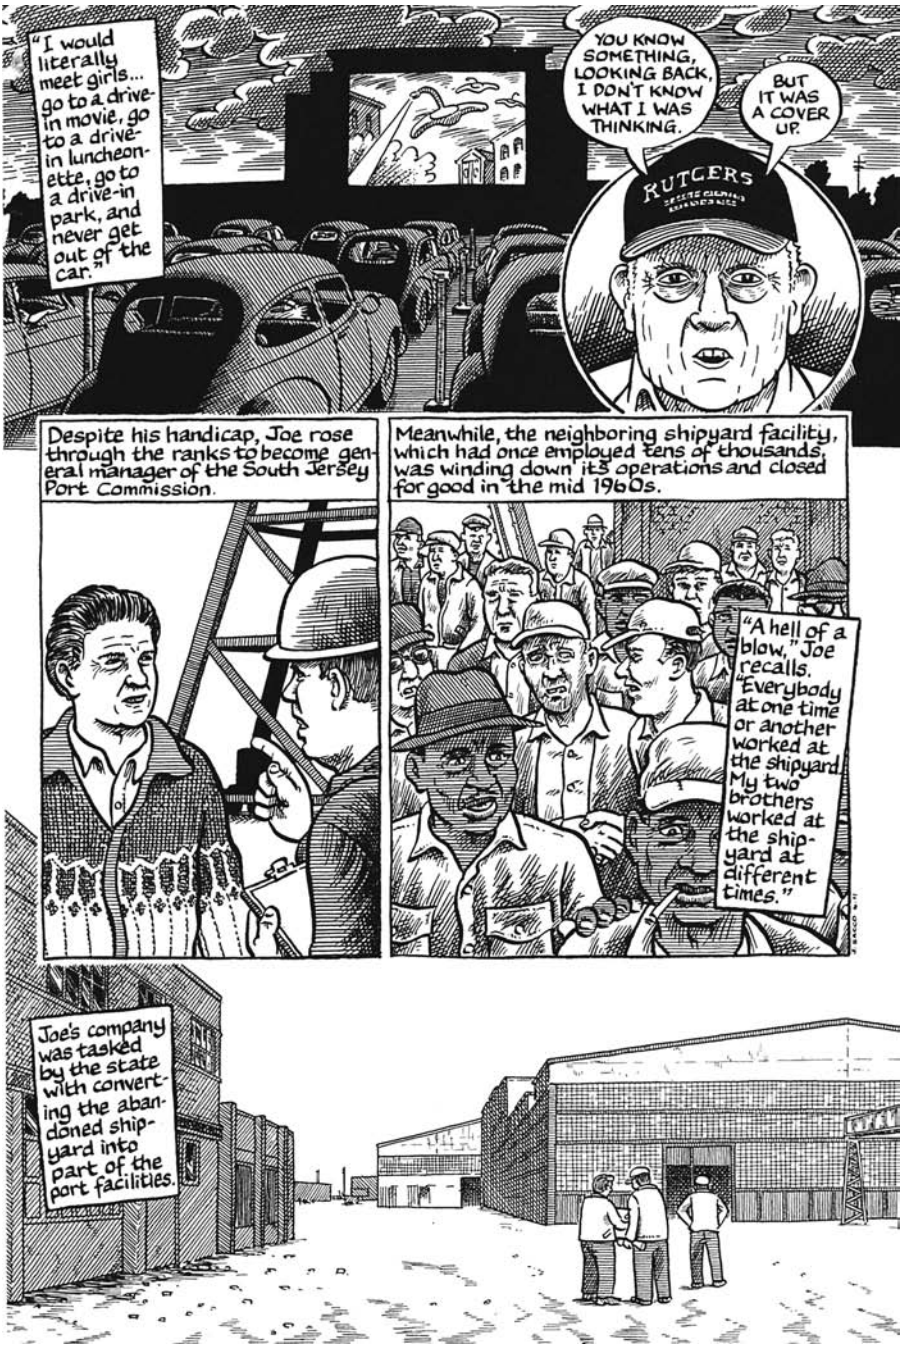
"We would go to the movies on Saturday at 10 o'clock in the morning and probably not get out until 5 o'clock at night. We would look at the double-features..."
"We would come home. Mom would have a stew, which was delicious."
MY BROTHER JOHNNY, THE SECOND BORN, WAS A SPECIAL CHILD, OKAY.
AND THE THIRD CHILD, WHO WAS MYSELF, WAS SIMPLY PERFECT— UNTIL I GOT SCREWED UP WHEN I WAS ABOUT TEN YEARS OLD.
Joe had kept the shoes belonging to his dead brother Anthony.
"And they were beautiful shoes, and we were playing...soccer or what[ever]... and the shoe had such a point. I loved it. But evidently the shoe...had a nail in it [and] I got an infection in the right foot."

Joe developed blood poisoning, which traveled to one of his fingers and into his hip, impairing his ability to walk.
Watched over by his mother, he spent two months in the hospital.
Despite the adversity,
"somehow I won an award in 1945: Camden's outstanding young citizen."
This brought Joe to the notice of New Jersey state Supreme Court Judge Ralph W. Donges.
[HE] MUST HAVE TAKEN A LIKING TO ME...
I THINK HE SEES A POOR KID, AND HE WANTED TO REACH OUT...
AND HE MADE CERTAIN THAT I HAD AN OPERATION AT THE COOPER HOSPITAL, WHERE THEY STRAIGHTENED MY LEG OUT AND CUT MY [DISEASED] FINGER OFF.
"He had an apartment in the Walt Whitman Hotel, and he would occasionally have me go to dinner with him and his wife... It was probably like going to a big hotel today – elevators, and people would come in, and they had the table.
"It was beautiful..."

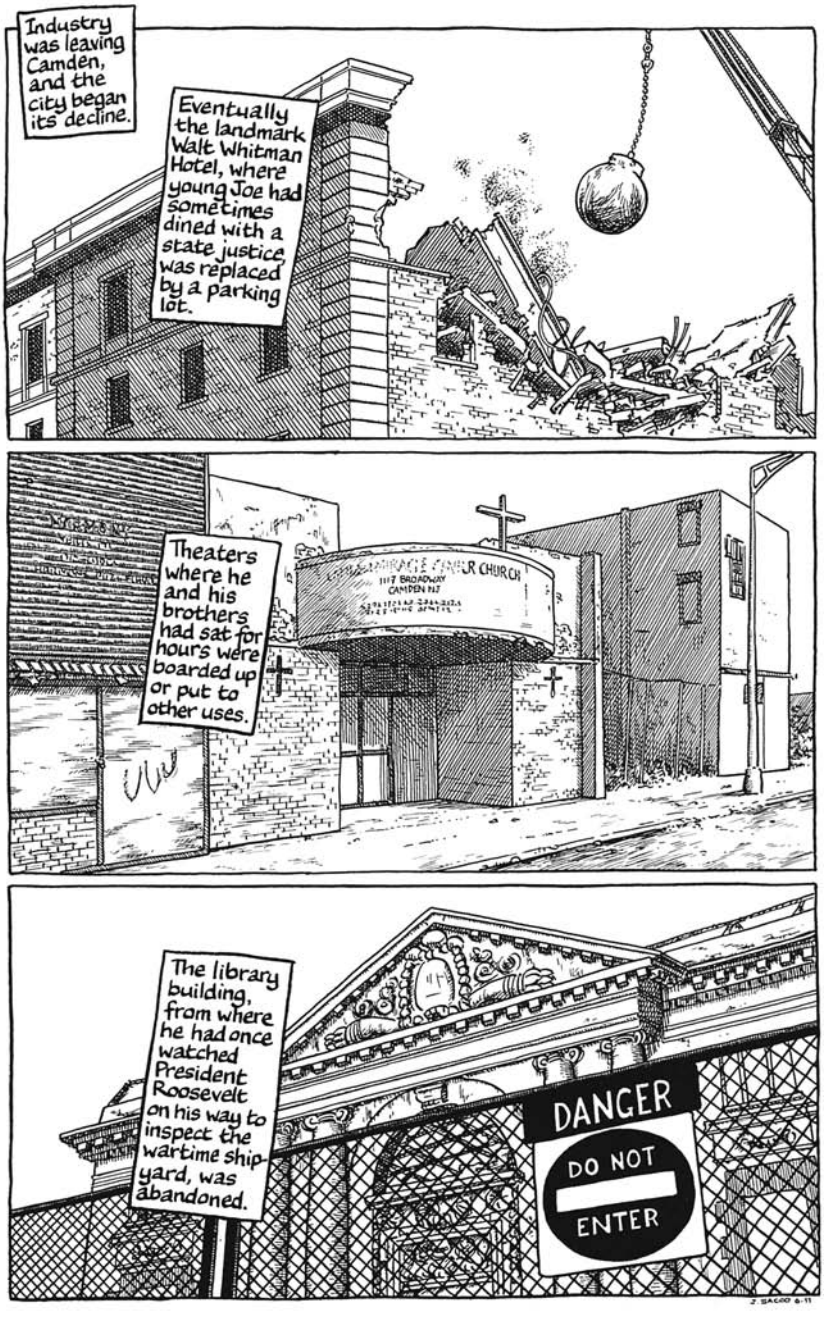


In 1951 Joe was preparing to go to college when his dad found him a job at the port.
RUTGERS
I WANTED TO EARN MONEY MORE THAN I WANTED TO GO TO COLLEGE.
He started as a gofer but,
"I wanted to be outside with the tough, the strong people. And I became a forklift operator. I drove a forklift probably from '52 to '60. Not only a forklift—front-end loaders, all types of equipment.
"I loved the equipment.
"I handled cargo, lifted cargo, dealt with longshoremen, toughest guys in the world."
Driving vehicles on the dock, Joe felt his bad leg didn't matter. He felt "powerfull control."
I FINALLY HAD THE OPPORTUNITY TO BE A MAN.

With the money he was making, Joe bought his first car, and he could now cruise Broadway, Camden's main drag.
He likens those days to the movie 'American Graffiti.'
"When [I] watch that movie, it plays in my mind... I can tell you it was a fun time."
He would start at the Star movie theater—
"then you'd go up to the Walt Whitman Hotel, make a U-turn, and you'd go again."
Still self-conscious of his limp, Joe found he never really had to leave his car.
"You know, you would say,
YO! JANE!
MY NAME'S NOT JANE. IT'S ALICE.
OH, I THOUGHT...
"and they'd come over to the car, and you're talking.
Z. SACCO 4-11



"I would literally meet girls... go to a drive-in movie, go to a drive-in luncheonette, go to a drive-in park, and never get out of the car."
YOU KNOW SOMETHING, LOOKING BACK, I DON'T KNOW WHAT I WAS THINKING.
BUT IT WAS A COVER UP.
RUTGERS
Despite his handicap, Joe rose through the ranks to become general manager of the South Jersey Port Commission.
Meanwhile, the neighboring shipyard facility, which had once employed tens of thousands, was winding down its operations and closed for good in the mid 1960s.
"A hell of a blow," Joe recalls. "Everybody at one time or another worked at the shipyard. My two brothers worked at the shipyard at different times."
Joe's company was tasked by the state with converting the abandoned shipyard into part of the port facilities.



Industry was leaving Camden, and the city began its decline.
Eventually the landmark Walt Whitman Hotel, where young Joe had sometimes dined with a state justice, was replaced by a parking lot.
Theaters where he and his brothers had sat for hours were boarded up or put to other uses.
1117 BROADWAY
CAMDEN NJ
The library building, from where he had once watched President Roosevelt on his way to inspect the wartime shipyard, was abandoned.
DANGER
DO NOT ENTER
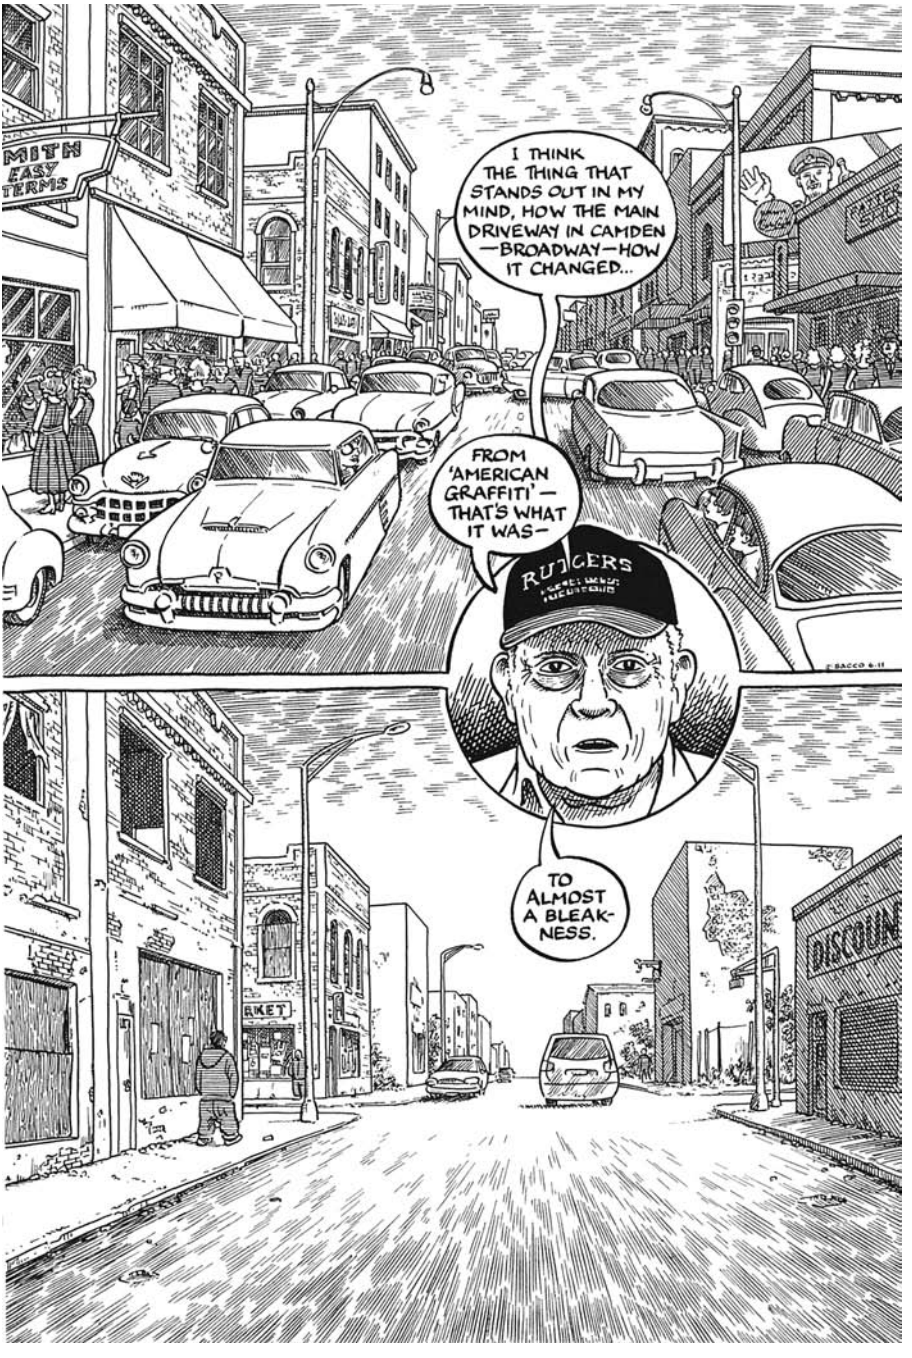
J. SACCO 6-11



I THINK THE THING THAT STANDS OUT IN MY MIND, HOW THE MAIN DRIVEWAY IN CAMDEN —BROADWAY—HOW IT CHANGED...
FROM 'AMERICAN GRAFFITI'— THAT'S WHAT IT WAS—RUTGERS TO ALMOST A BLEAK-NESS.
DISCOUN
EASY TERMS

Exploring the Text

1. What is your first impression of Joe Bolzano, whose picture begins the excerpt? How do you feel about him after you finish the excerpt? Does it match your first impression? Explain.
2. How does Bolzano characterize his father? What does he consider his father's most important trait? How do the drawings build on that characterization?
3. What picture do the drawings of the funeral of Joe's younger brother and the Walt Whitman Hotel paint of the Camden of the past?
4. What is it that Bolzano thinks makes him a man? How does that differ from the idea of manhood in Camden today or in any other place that is plagued by poverty and gang warfare?
5. In the introduction to Days of Destruction, Days of Revolt, Chris Hedges writes:

> Joe Sacco and I set out . . . to take a look at the sacrifice zones, those areas in the country that have been offered up for exploitation in the name of profit, progress, and technological advancement. We wanted to show in words and drawings what life looks like when the marketplace rules without constraints, where human beings and the natural world are used and then discarded to maximize profit. We wanted to look at what the ideology of unfettered capitalism means for families, communities, workers, and the ecosystem.

Why do you think they thought the combination of words and pictures would be effective in developing their argument? How has it helped them achieve the purpose stated above? Explain your answer.

Conversation

The Atomic Age

The following ten selections are related to the consequences of the atomic age, a period that began with the detonation of the first atomic bomb in 1945 and that most people consider to have ended with the fall of the Soviet Union in 1991, though nuclear weapons and nuclear power continue to be the subject of both fear and optimism. Atomic power exemplified technological progress in the early to mid-twentieth century, giving rise to elaborate fantasies of nuclear cars, an atomic reactor in every house supplying unlimited free energy, and sci-fi weaponry. While most of the domestic uses of nuclear technology failed to live up to their futuristic promise, the atomic bomb became a stark reality, making nuclear technology less a symbol of hope and progress than one of geopolitical, social, and psychological anxiety. In 1949, the Soviet Union tested its first atomic bomb and an arms race began that would result in the Soviet Union and the United States stockpiling and testing thousands of nuclear weapons, each more powerful than the ones used to destroy Hiroshima and Nagasaki. This tense atmosphere of danger and distrust between the United States and the Soviet Union resulted in the so-called Red Scare: scientists, artists, writers, filmmakers, and more were brought before the House Un-American Activities Committee, as well as a similar Senate committee run by Senator Joseph McCarthy, and questioned about their ties to the Communist Party, often becoming blacklisted if they took the Fifth Amendment to avoid incriminating themselves or refused to cooperate by naming names. There was some basis for this paranoia. Tipped off that the Soviets may have been aided by spies within the American nuclear facility at Los Alamos, the FBI launched an investigation that netted a group of Communist sympathizers, most famously Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, who had relayed information from Ethel's brother David Greenglass, a scientist at Los Alamos, to the Soviets. The Rosenbergs were convicted of conspiracy to commit espionage and executed in 1953. Since 1945, nuclear fears have risen and fallen but have never disappeared. The immense power of atomic energy, for good and for evil, continues to fascinate and frighten.

Sources

Ace Comics, Atomic War! (1952)
Office of Civil Defense, Duck and Cover (1952)
Lillian Hellman, I Cannot and Will Not Cut My Conscience to Fit This Year's Fashions (1952)
John F. Kennedy, Cuban Missile Crisis Speech (1962)
Nikita Khrushchev, Letter to John F. Kennedy (1962)
Julia Alvarez, Snow (1991)
Arthur Miller, from Why I Wrote The Crucible (1996)
Michael Scheibach, from Atomic Narratives and American Youth: Coming of Age with the Atom, 1945–55 (2003)
Ronald Radosh, Case Closed: The Rosenbergs Were Soviet Spies (2008)
Spencer R. Weart, from The Rise of Nuclear Fear (2012)

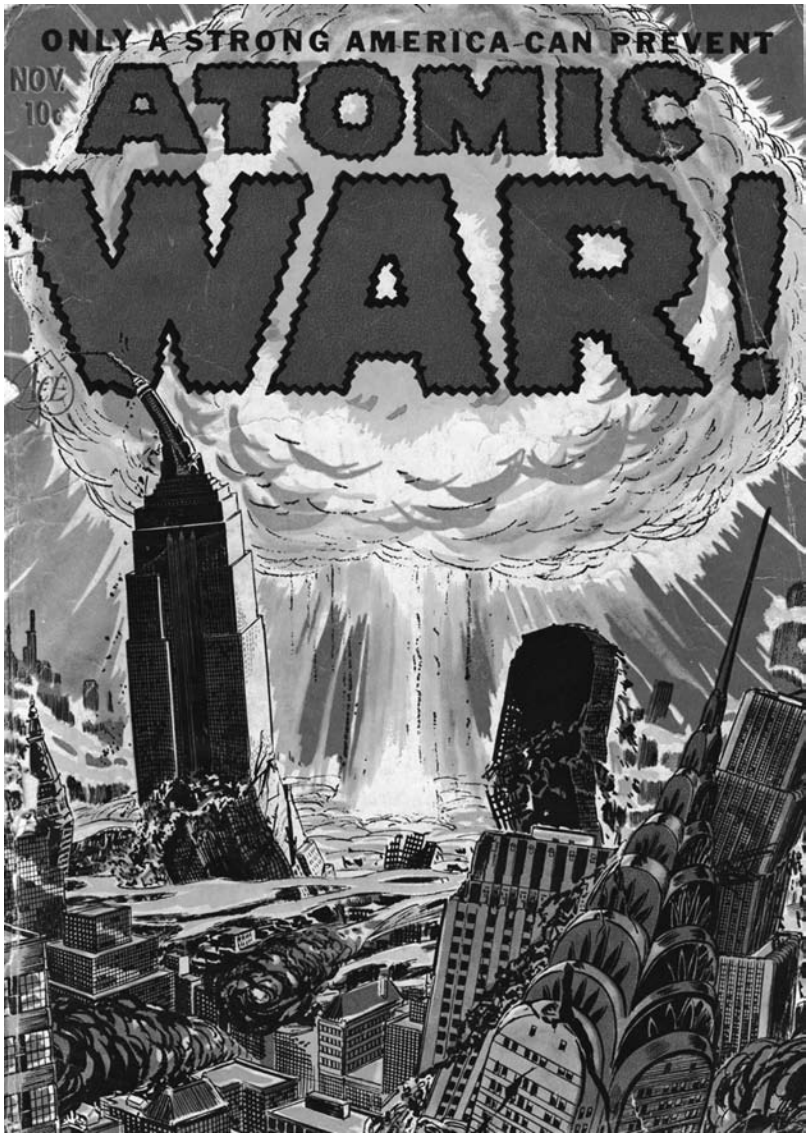
Atomic War!

Ace Comics

This is the cover of the first issue of a series of comic books, published between 1952 and 1953, about a fictional war between Russia and the United States.



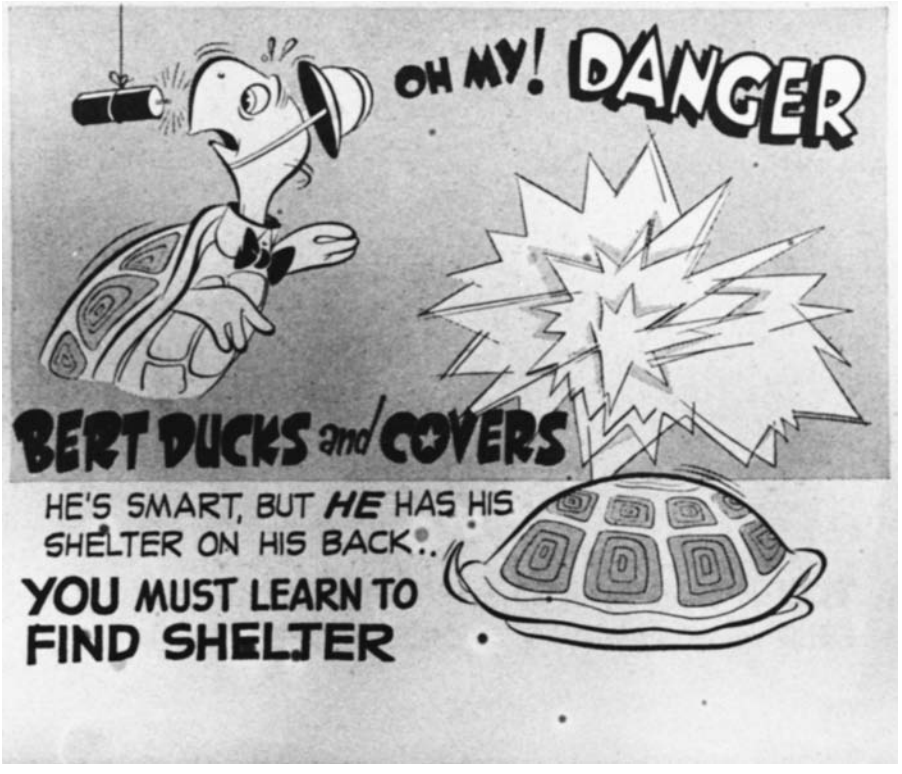
Questions

1. This cover, one of many that appeared on comic books published during the Korean War, reflects the national paranoia about the atomic bomb. What buttons does it push? Be sure to consider the format (a comic book for children), the style (color, shape, line, for example), and the iconography (what is represented in the picture).
2. What message does the comic book cover send about the United States?

Duck and Cover

Office of Civil Defense

This is a public service announcement poster from 1952 featuring Bert the Turtle, a character from Duck and Cover, a civil defense film produced by the U.S. government that suggested that nuclear war could happen at any time and that certain actions would protect citizens from its effects.



Questions

1. How do the two different views of "Bert" express the purpose of the poster?
2. The character on this poster appears in the animated opening of the film Duck and Cover; the rest of the ten-minute film features real people, with a narrator making suggestions for staying safe. Why do you think the film begins with animation?
3. Duck and Cover was seen by millions of schoolchildren in the early 1950s. What do you think its effects were?

I Cannot and Will Not Cut My Conscience to Fit This Year's Fashions

Lillian Hellman

In May 1952, playwright and screenwriter Lillian Hellman (1905–1984) was called to testify before the House Un-American Activities Committee, which was investigating Communist activity in Hollywood. She wrote the following letter to the committee chair, Congressman John Wood, asking to testify without being forced to inform on others. When her request was denied by the committee, she invoked the Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination. She was subsequently blacklisted from work in the entertainment business.

Dear Mr. Wood:

As you know, I am under subpoena to appear before your committee on May 21, 1952.

I am most willing to answer all questions about myself. I have nothing to hide from your committee and there is nothing in my life of which I am ashamed. I have been advised by counsel that under the fifth amendment I have a constitutional privilege to decline to answer any questions about my political opinions, activities, and associations, on the grounds of self-incrimination. I do not wish to claim this privilege. I am ready and willing to testify before the representatives of our Government as to my own opinions and my own actions, regardless of any risks or consequences to myself.

But I am advised by counsel that if I answer the committee's questions about myself, I must also answer questions about other people and that if I refuse to do so, I can be cited for contempt. My counsel tells me that if I answer questions about myself, I will have waived my rights under the fifth amendment and could be forced legally to answer questions about others. This is very difficult for a layman to understand. But there is one principle that I do understand: I am not willing, now or in the future, to bring bad trouble to people who, in my past association with them, were completely innocent of any talk or any action that was disloyal or subversive. I do not like subversion or disloyalty in any form and if I had ever seen any I would have considered it my duty to have reported it to the proper authorities. But to hurt innocent people whom I knew many years ago in order to save myself is, to me, inhuman and indecent and dishonorable. I cannot and will not cut my conscience to fit this year's fashions, even though I long ago came to the conclusion that I was not a political person and could have no comfortable place in any political group.

I was raised in an old-fashioned American tradition and there were certain homely things that were taught to me: To try to tell the truth, not to bear false witness, not to harm my neighbor, to be loyal to my country, and so on. In general, I respected these ideals of Christian honor and did as well with them as I knew how. It is my belief that you will agree with these simple rules of human decency and will not expect me to violate the good American tradition from which they spring. I would, therefore, like to come before you and speak of myself.

I am prepared to waive the privilege against self-incrimination and to tell you everything you wish to know about my views or actions if your committee will agree to refrain from asking me to name other people. If the committee is unwilling to give me this assurance, I will be forced to plead the privilege of the fifth amendment at the hearing. 5

A reply to this letter would be appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

Lillian Hellman
(1952)

Questions

1. How does Lillian Hellman establish ethos — her credibility — in this letter?
2. Why do you think that the political connections of a writer would be of interest to the House Un-American Activities Committee?
3. This letter became famous for the phrase "I cannot and will not cut my conscience to fit this year's fashions." Why do you think it resonates?

Cuban Missile Crisis Speech

John F. Kennedy

The Cuban missile crisis was a thirteen-day standoff between the United States and Russia. It was the point at which the Cold War came closest to turning into a nuclear war. President John F. Kennedy (1917–1963) spoke to the American people on October 22, 1962, explaining how and why the Soviets would be prevented from arming Cuba with nuclear weapons.

Good evening my fellow citizens:

This Government, as promised, has maintained the closest surveillance of the Soviet military buildup on the island of Cuba. Within the past week, unmistakable evidence has established the fact that a series of offensive missile sites is now in preparation on that imprisoned island. The purpose of these bases can be none other than to provide a nuclear strike capability against the Western Hemisphere.

Upon receiving the first preliminary hard information of this nature last Tuesday morning at 9 A.M., I directed that our surveillance be stepped up. And having now confirmed and completed our evaluation of the evidence and our decision on a course of action, this Government feels obliged to report this new crisis to you in fullest detail.

The characteristics of these new missile sites indicate two distinct types of installations. Several of them include medium range ballistic missiles capable of carrying a nuclear warhead for a distance of more than 1,000 nautical miles. Each of these missiles, in short, is capable of striking Washington, D.C., the Panama Canal, Cape Canaveral, Mexico City, or any other city in the southeastern part of the United States, in Central America, or in the Caribbean area.

Additional sites not yet completed appear to be designed for intermediate range ballistic missiles — capable of traveling more than twice as far — and thus capable of striking most of the major cities in the Western Hemisphere, ranging as far north as Hudson Bay, Canada, and as far south as Lima, Peru. In addition, jet bombers, capable of carrying nuclear weapons, are now being uncrated and assembled in Cuba, while the necessary air bases are being prepared.

This urgent transformation of Cuba into an important strategic base — by the presence of these large, long range, and clearly offensive weapons of sudden mass destruction — constitutes an explicit threat to the peace and security of all the Americas, in flagrant and deliberate defiance of the Rio Pact of 1947, the traditions of this nation and hemisphere, the joint resolution of the 87th Congress, the Charter of the United Nations, and my own public warnings to the Soviets on September 4 and 13. This action also contradicts the repeated assurances of Soviet spokesmen, both publicly and privately delivered, that the arms buildup in Cuba would retain its original defensive character, and that the Soviet Union had no need or desire to station strategic missiles on the territory of any other nation.

The size of this undertaking makes clear that it has been planned for some months. Yet only last month, after I had made clear the distinction between any introduction of ground-to-ground missiles and the existence of defensive antiaircraft missiles, the Soviet Government publicly stated on September 11, and I quote, "the armaments and military equipment sent to Cuba are designed exclusively for defensive purposes," that, and I quote the Soviet Government, "there is no need for the Soviet Government to shift its weapons . . . for a retaliatory blow to any other country, for instance Cuba," and that, and I quote their government, "the Soviet Union has so powerful rockets to carry these nuclear warheads that there is no need to search for sites for them beyond the boundaries of the Soviet Union." That statement was false.

Only last Thursday, as evidence of this rapid offensive buildup was already in my hand, Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko told me in my office that he was instructed to make it clear once again, as he said his government had already done, that Soviet assistance to Cuba, and I quote, "pursued solely the purpose of contributing to the defense capabilities of Cuba," that, and I quote him, "training by Soviet specialists of Cuban nationals in handling defensive armaments was by no means offensive, and if it were otherwise," Mr. Gromyko went on, "the Soviet Government would never become involved in rendering such assistance." That statement also was false.

Neither the United States of America nor the world community of nations can tolerate deliberate deception and offensive threats on the part of any nation, large or small. We no longer live in a world where only the actual firing of weapons represents a sufficient challenge to a nation's security to constitute maximum peril. Nuclear weapons are so destructive and ballistic missiles are so swift, that any substantially increased possibility of their use or any sudden change in their deployment may well be regarded as a definite threat to peace.

For many years both the Soviet Union and the United States, recognizing this fact, have deployed strategic nuclear weapons with great care, never upsetting the precarious status quo which insured that these weapons would not be used in the absence of some vital challenge. Our own strategic missiles have never been transferred to the territory of any other nation under a cloak of secrecy and deception; and our history — unlike that of the Soviets since the end of World War II — demonstrates that we have no desire to dominate or conquer any other nation or impose our system upon its people. Nevertheless, American citizens have become adjusted to living daily on the bull's-eye of Soviet missiles located inside the U.S.S.R. or in submarines.

In that sense, missiles in Cuba add to an already clear and present danger — although it should be noted the nations of Latin America have never previously been subjected to a potential nuclear threat.

But this secret, swift, and extraordinary buildup of Communist missiles — in an area well known to have a special and historical relationship to the United States and the nations of the Western Hemisphere, in violation of Soviet assurances, and in defiance of American and hemispheric policy — this sudden, clandestine decision to station strategic weapons for the first time outside of Soviet soil — is a deliberately provocative and unjustified change in the status quo which cannot be accepted by this country, if our courage and our commitments are ever to be trusted again by either friend or foe.

The 1930's taught us a clear lesson: aggressive conduct, if allowed to go unchecked and unchallenged, ultimately leads to war. This nation is opposed to war. We are also true to our word. Our unswerving objective, therefore, must be to prevent the use of these missiles against this or any other country, and to secure their withdrawal or elimination from the Western Hemisphere.

Our policy has been one of patience and restraint, as befits a peaceful and powerful nation, which leads a worldwide alliance. We have been determined not to be diverted from our central concerns by mere irritants and fanatics. But now further action is required — and it is under way; and these actions may only be the beginning. We will not prematurely or unnecessarily risk the costs of worldwide nuclear war in which even the fruits of victory would be ashes in our mouth — but neither will we shrink from that risk at any time it must be faced.

Acting, therefore, in the defense of our own security and of the entire Western Hemisphere, and under the authority entrusted to me by the Constitution as endorsed by the resolution of the Congress, I have directed that the following initial steps be taken immediately:

First: To halt this offensive buildup, a strict quarantine on all offensive military equipment under shipment to Cuba is being initiated. All ships of any kind bound for Cuba from whatever nation or port will, if found to contain cargoes of offensive weapons, be turned back. This quarantine will be extended, if needed, to other types of cargo and carriers. We are not at this time, however, denying the necessities of life as the Soviets attempted to do in their Berlin blockade of 1948.

Second: I have directed the continued and increased close surveillance of Cuba and its military buildup. The foreign ministers of the OAS, in their communiqué of October 6, rejected secrecy in such matters in this hemisphere. Should these offensive military preparations continue, thus increasing the threat to the hemisphere, further action will be justified. I have directed the Armed Forces to prepare for any eventualities; and I trust that in the interest of both the Cuban people and the Soviet technicians at the sites, the hazards to all concerned in continuing this threat will be recognized.

Third: It shall be the policy of this Nation to regard any nuclear missile launched from Cuba against any nation in the Western Hemisphere as an attack by the Soviet Union on the United States, requiring a full retaliatory response upon the Soviet Union.

Fourth: As a necessary military precaution, I have reinforced our base at Guantanamo, evacuated today the dependents of our personnel there, and ordered additional military units to be on a standby alert basis.

Fifth: We are calling tonight for an immediate meeting of the Organ of Consultation under the Organization of American States, to consider this threat to hemispheric security and to invoke articles 6 and 8 of the Rio Treaty in support of all necessary action. The United Nations Charter allows for regional security arrangements — and the nations of this hemisphere decided long ago against the military presence of outside powers. Our other allies around the world have also been alerted.

Sixth: Under the Charter of the United Nations, we are asking tonight that an 20 emergency meeting of the Security Council be convoked without delay to take action against this latest Soviet threat to world peace. Our resolution will call for the prompt dismantling and withdrawal of all offensive weapons in Cuba, under the supervision of U.N. observers, before the quarantine can be lifted.

Seventh and finally: I call upon Chairman Khrushchev to halt and eliminate this clandestine, reckless, and provocative threat to world peace and to stable relations between our two nations. I call upon him further to abandon this course of world domination, and to join in an historic effort to end the perilous arms race and to transform the history of man. He has an opportunity now to move the world back from the abyss of destruction — by returning to his government's own words that it had no need to station missiles outside its own territory, and withdrawing these weapons from Cuba — by refraining from any action which will widen or deepen the present crisis — and then by participating in a search for peaceful and permanent solutions.

This Nation is prepared to present its case against the Soviet threat to peace, and our own proposals for a peaceful world, at any time and in any forum — in the OAS, in the United Nations, or in any other meeting that could be useful — without limiting our freedom of action. We have in the past made strenuous efforts to limit the spread of nuclear weapons. We have proposed the elimination of all arms and military bases in a fair and effective disarmament treaty. We are prepared to discuss new proposals for the removal of tensions on both sides — including the possibility of a genuinely independent Cuba, free to determine its own destiny. We have no wish to war with the Soviet Union — for we are a peaceful people who desire to live in peace with all other peoples.

But it is difficult to settle or even discuss these problems in an atmosphere of intimidation. That is why this latest Soviet threat — or any other threat which is made independently or in response to our actions this week — must and will be met with determination. Any hostile move anywhere in the world against the safety and freedom of peoples to whom we are committed — including in particular the brave people of West Berlin — will be met by whatever action is needed.

Finally, I want to say a few words to the captive people of Cuba, to whom this speech is being directly carried by special radio facilities. I speak to you as a friend, as one who knows of your deep attachment to your fatherland, as one who shares your aspirations for liberty and justice for all. And I have watched and the American people have watched with deep sorrow how your nationalist revolution was betrayed — and how your fatherland fell under foreign domination. Now your leaders are no longer Cuban leaders inspired by Cuban ideals. They are puppets and agents of an international conspiracy which has turned Cuba against your friends and neighbors in the Americas — and turned it into the first Latin American country to become a target for nuclear war — the first Latin American country to have these weapons on its soil.

These new weapons are not in your interest. They contribute nothing to your peace and well-being. They can only undermine it. But this country has no wish to cause you to suffer or to impose any system upon you. We know that your lives and land are being used as pawns by those who deny your freedom.

Many times in the past, the Cuban people have risen to throw out tyrants who destroyed their liberty. And I have no doubt that most Cubans today look forward to the time when they will be truly free — free from foreign domination, free to choose their own leaders, free to select their own system, free to own their own land, free to speak and write and worship without fear or degradation. And then shall Cuba be welcomed back to the society of free nations and to the associations of this hemisphere.

My fellow citizens: let no one doubt that this is a difficult and dangerous effort on which we have set out. No one can see precisely what course it will take or what costs or casualties will be incurred. Many months of sacrifice and self-discipline lie ahead — months in which our patience and our will will be tested — months in which many threats and denunciations will keep us aware of our dangers. But the greatest danger of all would be to do nothing.

The path we have chosen for the present is full of hazards, as all paths are — but it is the one most consistent with our character and courage as a nation and our commitments around the world. The cost of freedom is always high — and Americans have always paid it. And one path we shall never choose, and that is the path of surrender or submission.

Our goal is not the victory of might, but the vindication of right — not peace at the expense of freedom, but both peace and freedom, here in this hemisphere, and, we hope, around the world. God willing, that goal will be achieved.

Thank you and good night.

(1962)

Questions

1. What distinctions does John F. Kennedy make between the behavior of the United States and the behavior of Russia?
2. What evidence does Kennedy provide to support his claim that the purpose of the Soviet military buildup in Cuba can be "none other than to provide a nuclear strike capability against the Western Hemisphere" (par. 1)?

3. How would you describe the tone of Kennedy's speech? Remember that many people — including Kennedy's advisors — thought we were on the brink of World War III.
4. What particular message does Kennedy send to Cuba in this speech? How does he structure his argument? What claims does he make? What rhetorical appeals does he make?

Letter to John F. Kennedy

Nikita Khrushchev

Nikita Khrushchev (1894–1971) was the premier of Soviet Russia from 1958 to 1964. This letter was a response to Kennedy's speech. Eventually he and Kennedy met behind closed doors and came to an agreement by which Russian missiles were withdrawn from Cuba and, secretly, American missiles were withdrawn from Turkey.

Moscow, October 23, 1962

Mr. President:

I have just received your letter, and have also acquainted myself with the text of your speech of October 22 regarding Cuba.

I must say frankly, that the measures indicated in your statement constitute a serious threat to peace and to the security of nations. The United States has openly taken the path of grossly violating the United Nations Charter, the path of violating international norms of freedom of navigation on the high seas, the path of aggressive actions both against Cuba and against the Soviet Union. The statement by the Government of the United States of America can only be regarded as undisguised interference in the internal affairs of the Republic of Cuba, the Soviet Union and other states. The United Nations Charter and international norms give no right to any state to institute in international waters the inspection of vessels bound for the shores of the Republic of Cuba. And naturally, neither can we recognize the right of the United States to establish control over armaments which are necessary for the Republic of Cuba to strengthen its defense capability.

We reaffirm that the armaments which are in Cuba, regardless of the classification to which they may belong, are intended solely for defensive purposes in order to secure the Republic of Cuba against the attack of an aggressor.

I hope that the United States Government will display wisdom and renounce the actions pursued by you, which may lead to catastrophic consequences for world peace.

The viewpoint of the Soviet Government with regard to your statement of October 22 is set forth in a Statement of the Soviet Government, which is being transmitted to you through your Ambassador at Moscow.

(s) N. Khrushchev
(1962)

Questions

1. How would you describe the tone of Nikita Khrushchev's letter?
2. How many and which points in Kennedy's speech does Khrushchev respond to?
3. On October 28, Khrushchev agreed to remove Russian missiles from Cuba in return for a promise from the United States to respect Cuba's territorial sovereignty. In what ways does this letter lead you to expect that outcome? In what ways doesn't it?

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

This selection has been omitted intentionally in this electronic version.

from Why I Wrote The Crucible

Arthur Miller

This excerpt is from a piece published in the New Yorker magazine in October 1996, just before the film version of The Crucible was released. Arthur Miller (1915–2005) wrote the screenplay for the film based on his 1953 play.

As I watched The Crucible taking shape as a movie over much of the past year, the sheer depth of time that it represents for me kept returning to mind. As those powerful actors blossomed on the screen, and the children and the horses, and the crowds and the wagons, I thought again about how I came to cook all this up nearly fifty years ago, in an America almost nobody I know seems to remember clearly. . . .

I remember those years — they formed The Crucible's skeleton — but I have lost the dead weight of the fear I had then. Fear doesn't travel well; just as it can warp judgment, its absence can diminish memory's truth. What terrifies one generation is likely to bring only a puzzled smile to the next. . . .

[Senator] McCarthy's power to stir fears of creeping Communism was not entirely based on illusion, of course. . . . From being our wartime ally, the Soviet Union rapidly became an expanding empire. In 1949, Mao Zedong took power in China. Western Europe also seemed ready to become Red, especially Italy, where the Communist Party was the largest outside Russia, and was growing. . . . McCarthy — brash and ill-mannered but to many authentic and true — boiled it all down to what anyone could understand: We had "lost China" and would soon lose Europe as well, because the State Department — staffed, of course, under Democratic presidents — was full of treasonous pro-Soviet intellectuals. It was as simple as that. . . .

The Crucible was an act of desperation. . . . By 1950 when I began to think of writing about the hunt for Reds in America, I was motivated in some great part by the paralysis that had set in among many liberals who, despite their discomfort with the inquisitors' violations of civil rights, were fearful, and with good reason, of being identified as covert Communists if they should protest too strongly. . . .

I visited Salem for the first time on a dismal spring day in 1952. . . . In the gloomy courthouse there I read the transcripts of the witchcraft trials of 1692, as taken down in a primitive shorthand by ministers who were spelling each other. But there was one entry in Upham in which the thousands of pieces I had come across were jogged into place. It was from a report written by the Reverend Samuel Parris, who was one of the chief instigators of the witch-hunt. "During the examination of Elizabeth Proctor, Abigail Williams, and Ann Putnam" — the two were "afflicted" teen-age accusers, and Abigail was Parris's niece — "both made offer to strike at said Proctor; but when Abigail's hand came near, it opened, whereas it was made up, into a fist before, and came down exceeding lightly as it drew near to said Proctor, and at length, with open and extended fingers, touched Proctor's hood very lightly. Immediately Abigail cried out her fingers, her fingers, her fingers burned. . . ." 5

In this remarkably observed gesture of a troubled young girl, I believed, a play became possible. Elizabeth Proctor had been the orphaned Abigail's mistress, and they had lived together in the same small house until Elizabeth fired the girl. By this time, I was sure, John Proctor had bedded Abigail, who had to be dismissed most likely to appease Elizabeth. There was bad blood between the two women now. That Abigail started, in effect, to condemn Elizabeth to death with her touch, then stopped her hand, then went through with it, was quite suddenly the human center of all this turmoil.

All this I understood. I had not approached the witchcraft out of nowhere or from purely social and political considerations. My own marriage of twelve years was teetering and I knew more than I wished to know about where the blame lay. That John Proctor the sinner might overturn his paralyzing personal guilt and become the most forthright voice against the madness around him was a reassurance to me, and, I suppose, an inspiration: It demonstrated that a clear moral outcry could still spring even from an ambiguously unblemished soul. Moving crabwise across the profusion of evidence, I sensed that I had at last found something of myself in it, and a play began to accumulate around this man.

(1996)

Questions

1. In this excerpt from an essay subtitled "An Artist's Answer to Politics," how does Arthur Miller provide the background and context for the political backdrop of The Crucible?
2. Miller says that "[f]ear doesn't travel well" (par. 2) and provides a couple of examples: fear of "creeping Communism" (par. 3) and liberals' fears of "being identified as covert Communists if they should protest too strongly" (par. 4). Why do you think his "answer to politics" begins with acknowledging these fears?
3. How does Miller make the political personal? Do his comments on how The Crucible was to some degree a personal reaction to his own failings change the way you think about the play?

from Atomic Narratives and American Youth
Coming of Age with the Atom, 1945–55

Michael Scheibach

The epilogue from Atomic Narratives and American Youth: Coming of Age with the Atom, 1945–55, this piece connects the threads that Michael Scheibach examined in his 2003 work on the effects of the atomic age on America's youth.

Epilogue: 1955

We're gonna rock, rock, rock. . . .

— Bill Haley and His Comets

By 1955, more than 30 million families tuned in each evening to watch game shows and situation comedies, original dramas and adaptations, news updates and lighthearted fare for the entire family. Television not only entertained an ever-expanding audience and reflected the country's hopes and fears; it also began to alter the social landscape — to shape a more mainstream society while heightening awareness of America's blemishes.

In May of that year, Americans received the news that the Supreme Court had finally issued its instructions in the Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas, desegregation case heard the previous year. Justice Earl Warren ordered the district court to take "deliberate speed" in its efforts to implement the landmark ruling on the integration of public schools. That December, Rosa Parks sparked a bus boycott in Birmingham, Alabama, placing the plight of Southern blacks in the national limelight, this time aided by television, and introducing a young minister, Martin Luther King, Jr., to a national audience. The exigency for racial harmony, a theme often encountered in postwar atomic narratives, had been acted upon.[1]

Atomic survival, yet another theme, had become an everyday dimension of American life. Schools and communities conducted civil-defense drills on a regular basis, and the federal government did its part by sponsoring the annual Operation Alert. A girl graduating from high school in 1955 wrote, "[L]iving has been a difficult and insecure thing; at worst, an insurmountable wall of bewilderment and frustration . . . we've never lived a minute of our lives without war or the threat of war."[2] A senior boy wrote the same year, "We of today's graduating class are on the threshold of a new world. It is a world of possible destruction. It is also, we hope, a world of peace."[3] Remembers sociologist Todd Gitlin, president of SDS* in the early 1960s: "For us, the future was necessarily more salient than the past. The Bomb threatened that future, and therefore undermined the ground on which affluence was built. Rather than feel grateful for the Bomb, we felt menaced. The Bomb was the shadow hanging over all human endeavor. It threatened all the prizes."[4]

---

*Students for a Democratic Society, a left-wing student activist movement of the 1960s. — Eds.

Self-reliance became synonymous with self-preservation, as Americans built bomb shelters at an explosive rate. Film historian Andrew Dowdy, nineteen years old in 1955, remembers, "Some of us were going underground, immediately and literally, digging in from bomb shelter instructions available in two-dollar booklets." But the ability to withstand the force of a hydrogen bomb was questionable at best, which led Time magazine to ask in June 1955 whether the best defense against the bomb was prayer. Not long after, the prayer was seemingly answered for many youth as the new Mad magazine, which had evolved from comic-book status to a 25-cent, bimonthly compendium of social satire, adopted the "What, Me Worry?" kid as its official mascot. Alfred E. Neuman, as the kid would later be known, became America's quintessential fatalistic youth — and future "new man." A poll taken the previous year by the American Institute of Public Opinion, in fact, found that 95 percent of respondents would not move to escape a hydrogen bomb, even though most believed one would be used against the United States. Why worry?[5]

On October 13, 1955, the young stalwarts of the Beat Generation — Gary Snyder, Jack Kerouac, Michael McClure, and Lawrence Ferlinghetti — gathered at San Francisco's Six Gallery to hear poet Allen Ginsberg read his new work, "Howl." Ginsberg, articulating the viewpoint of postwar rebels without a cause, lamented, "I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by madness, starving hysterical naked, / dragging themselves through the negro streets at dawn looking for an angry fix, / angelheaded hipsters burning for the ancient heavenly connection to the starry dynamo in the machinery of night / . . . who distributed Supercommunist pamphlets in Union Square weeping and undressing while the sirens of Los Alamos wailed them down, and wailed down Wall, and the Staten Island ferry also wailed, . . ." The voice of youth beat down by the finality of the atomic bomb was being heard.[6] 5

In 1954, Cashbox commented that white high school and college students in the South — largely "youthful hillbilly fans rather than the pop bobbysoxers" — were frantically buying rhythm-and-blues songs. White youth had been listening and dancing to black R&B for several years, assisted by disc jockeys like Cleveland's Alan Freed. But when Billboard proclaimed in a banner headline, "1955 — THE YEAR R&B TOOK OVER POP FIELD," it marked the final explosion of rock 'n' roll — the fusing of black R&B and white rockabilly that crossed geographic, racial, and socioeconomic boundaries. This also was the year "(We're Gonna) Rock Around the Clock" by Bill Haley and His Comets became the first rock 'n' roll record to hit number one on Billboard's pop chart.[7] Jerry Lee Lewis, Fats Domino, Buddy Holly, Chuck Berry, Elvis, Little Richard, and many others followed quickly: black and white performers covering the same tunes for the same audiences.

The deaths of actor James Dean and bop jazz improviser Charlie Parker occurred in 1955: one setting the style for white youth; the other setting the tone for African American youth. And R&B singer Johnny Ace took his life just a few days before 1955 began. That year saw the release of Rebel Without a Cause and Blackboard Jungle, movies that created the young rebel as an icon fighting against a hostile, uncaring society. At the same time, teen-oriented radio and television programs, like Dick Clark's American Bandstand in Philadelphia, were being joined by new magazines aimed at the burgeoning youth culture: Hep Cats, Teenager, Teen-Age Confessions, Teenage Rock and Roll Review, Teen Digest, 'Teen, Dig, and Modern Teen.[8]

By the mid-1950s, youth had solidified its place — its role — in society. "Youth culture," historian W. T. Llamon, Jr., has written, "became largely the main culture; it became the atmosphere of American life."[9] This largely high-school–based, adolescent culture had taken form replete with a unique style and attitude. In the years that followed, this culture ultimately created its own social narrative to be interpreted by those coming of age in the 1960s, a new era of uncertainty.

Notes

1. W. T. Lhamon, Jr., Deliberate Speed: The Origins of a Cultural Style in the American 1950s (Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1990) 32–33; Fred Powledge, Free at Last? The Civil Rights Movement and the People Who Made It (New York: Little, Brown and Co., 1991).
2. Elizabeth Evans, "In Defense of My Generation," Journal of the National Education Association 44 (March 1955): 140.
3. Robert Piper, "Where Do We Go from Here?," American Mercury 81 (August 1955): 82–84.
4. Todd Gitlin, The Sixties: Years of Hope, Days of Rage (New York: Bantam Books, 1987) 22–23.
5. Andrew Dowdy, The Films of the Fifties: The American State of Mind (New York: William Morrow and Co., 1975) 60; "Civil Defense: Best Defense? Prayer," Time, 27 June 1955: 17; Maria Reidelbach, Completely Mad: A History of the Comic Book and Magazine (Boston: Little, Brown and Co., 1991) 32, 136–140; Allan Winkler, Life Under a Cloud (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993) 5.
6. Barry Miles, Ginsberg (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989) 195–197; Allen Ginsberg, Howl and Other Poems (San Francisco: City Light Books, 1956).
7. Rock 'n' roll did not magically appear in 1955, far from it. As Nick Tosches has discussed in his book, Unsung Heroes of Rock 'n' Roll: The Birth of Rock in the Wild Years Before Elvis (New York: Harmony Books, 1984), white and black teenagers were listening to the sounds of rock 'n' roll in the early 1950s, primarily on the jukebox and records. But it was not until 1955, with the emergence of Top 40 radio, transistors, 45-rpm records, a well-defined youth culture, and the recognition of the youth consumer market, that this music began to cross white and black boundaries. Also see Tom McCourt, "Bright Lights, Big City: A Brief History of Rhythm and Blues 1945–1957," in Timothy E. Scheurer, editor, The Age of Rock (Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1989) 46–62; Michael Bane, White Boy Singin' the Blues: The Black Roots of White Rock (New York: Da Capo Press, 1982); N. K. Cohn, Rock: From the Beginning (New York: Stein & Day, 1969); and Charlie Gillett, The Sound of the City: The Rise of Rock and Roll (New York: Outerbridge and Dienstfrey, 1970).
8. New Serial Titles 1950–1970 (Washington, D.C.: R.R. Bowker Co., 1973). For more on media and youth, see James Gilbert, A Cycle of Outrage: America's Reaction to the Juvenile Delinquent in the 1950s (New York: Oxford University Press, 1986).
9. Lhamon, Deliberate Speed, 8.

(2003)

Questions

1. What does Michael Scheibach think is the effect of the nuclear age on youth culture? Do his connections surprise you? Explain your answer.
2. Describe the evidence that Scheibach uses to comment on youth culture.

Case Closed: The Rosenbergs Were Soviet Spies

Ronald Radosh

This opinion piece was published in the Los Angeles Times in September 2008 in response to the admission by one of the codefendants in the Rosenberg trial that Julius Rosenberg was, in fact, spying for Russia. Ronald Radosh, an emeritus professor of history at City University of New York and an adjunct senior fellow at the Hudson Institute, is the coauthor of The Rosenberg File (1983).

Julius and Ethel Rosenberg were executed 55 years ago, on June 19, 1953. But last week, they were back in the headlines when Morton Sobell, the co-defendant in their famous espionage trial, finally admitted that he and his friend, Julius, had both been Soviet agents.

It was a stunning admission; Sobell, now 91 years old, had adamantly maintained his innocence for more than half a century. After his comments were published, even the Rosenbergs' children, Robert and Michael Meeropol, were left with little hope to hang on to — and this week, in comments unlike any they've made previously, the brothers acknowledged having reached the difficult conclusion that their father was, indeed, a spy. "I don't have any reason to doubt Morty," Michael Meeropol told Sam Roberts of the New York Times.

With these latest events, the end has arrived for the legions of the American left wing that have argued relentlessly for more than half a century that the Rosenbergs were victims, framed by a hostile, fear-mongering U.S. government. Since the couple's trial, the left has portrayed them as martyrs for civil liberties, righteous dissenters whose chief crime was to express their constitutionally protected political beliefs. In the end, the left has argued, the two communists were put to death not for spying but for their unpopular opinions, at a time when the Truman and Eisenhower administrations were seeking to stem opposition to their anti-Soviet foreign policy during the Cold War.

To this day, this received wisdom permeates our educational system. A recent study by historian Larry Schweikart of the University of Dayton has found that very few college history textbooks say simply that the Rosenbergs were guilty; according to Schweikart, most either state that the couple were innocent or that the trial was "controversial," or they "excuse what [the Rosenbergs] did by saying, 'It wasn't that bad. What they provided wasn't important.' "

Indeed, Columbia University professor Eric Foner once wrote that the Rosenbergs 5 were prosecuted out of a "determined effort to root out dissent," part of a broader pattern of "shattered careers and suppressed civil liberties." In other words, it was part of the postwar McCarthyite "witch hunt."

But, in fact, Schweikart is right, and Foner is wrong. The Rosenbergs were Soviet spies, and not minor ones either. Not only did they try their best to give the Soviets top atomic secrets from the Manhattan Project, they succeeded in handing over top military data on sonar and on radar that was used by the Russians to shoot down American planes in the Korean and Vietnam wars. That's long been known, and Sobell confirmed it again last week.

To many Americans, Cold War espionage cases like the Rosenberg and Alger Hiss cases that once riveted the country seem irrelevant today, something out of the distant past. But they're not irrelevant. They're a crucial part of the ongoing dispute between right and left in this country. For the left, it has long been an article of faith that these prosecutions showed the essentially repressive nature of the U.S. government. Even as the guilt of the accused has become more and more clear (especially since the fall of the Soviet Union and the release of reams of historical Cold War documents), these "anti anti-communists" of the intellectual left have continued to argue that the prosecutions were overzealous, or that the crimes were minor, or that the punishments were disproportionate.

The left has consistently defended spies such as Hiss, the Rosenbergs and Sobell as victims of contrived frame-ups. Because a demagogue like Sen. Joseph McCarthy cast a wide swath with indiscriminate attacks on genuine liberals as "reds" (and even though McCarthy made some charges that were accurate), the anti anti-communists came to argue that anyone accused by McCarthy or Richard Nixon or J. Edgar Hoover should be assumed to be entirely innocent. People like Hiss (a former State Department official who was accused of spying) cleverly hid their true espionage work by gaining sympathy as just another victim of a smear attack.

But now, with Sobell's confession of guilt, that worldview has been demolished.

In the 1990s, when it was more than clear that the Rosenbergs had been real Soviet spies — not simply a pair of idealistic left-wingers working innocently for peace with the Russians — one of the Rosenberg's sons, Michael, expressed the view that the reason his parents stayed firm and did not cooperate with the government was because they wanted to keep the government from creating "a massive spy show trial," thereby earning "the thanks of generations of resisters to government repression." 10

Today, he and his brother Robert run a fund giving grants to the children of those they deem "political prisoners," such as convicted cop killer Mumia Abu-Jamal. Ironically, if there was any government that staged show trials for political ends, it was the government for which the Rosenbergs gave up their lives, that of the former Soviet Union.

This week, the Meeropols made it clear to the New York Times that they still believe the information their father passed to the Russians was not terribly significant, that the judge and the prosecutors in their parents' case were guilty of misconduct, and that neither Julius nor Ethel should have been given the death penalty for their crimes.

On the subject of their mother, the Meeropols have a point. In another development last week, a federal court judge in New York released previously sealed grand jury testimony of key witnesses in the case, including that of Ruth Greenglass, Julius' sister-in-law. It turns out that a key part of her testimony for the prosecution — that Ethel had typed up notes for her husband to hand to the Soviets — was most likely concocted.

That doesn't mean that Ethel was innocent — indeed, the preponderance of the evidence suggests she was not. But what is clear is that in seeking to get the defendants to confess to Soviet espionage, the prosecutors overstepped bounds and enhanced testimony to guarantee a conviction. Americans should have no problem acknowledging when such judicial transgressions take place, and in concluding that the execution of Ethel was a miscarriage of justice.

Nevertheless, after Sobell's confession of guilt, all other conspiracy theories about 15 the Rosenberg case should come to an end. A pillar of the left-wing culture of grievance has been finally shattered. The Rosenbergs were actual and dangerous Soviet spies. It is time the ranks of the left acknowledge that the United States had (and has) real enemies and that finding and prosecuting them is not evidence of repression.

(2008)

Questions

1. What evidence does Ronald Radosh use to prove his point that "our educational system" (par. 4) teaches that the Rosenbergs were executed because of their unpopular opinions? Why do you think it is important to him?
2. Why does Radosh think that Cold War espionage cases are still relevant today?
3. Why do you think Radosh concedes that Ethel Rosenberg probably should not have been executed?

from The Rise of Nuclear Fear

Spencer R. Weart

Spencer R. Weart (b. 1942) is a physicist and historian. Until 2009, he was director of the Center for History of Physics at the American Institute of Physics. Weart first wrote Nuclear Fear in 1988 but revised and updated the book in 2012. The selection found here is from a new chapter, titled "Tyrants and Terrorists," added in the 2012 edition.

It was only one bomb, small enough to fit in the trunk of a car. A band of fanatics stole it from the Israelis, smuggled it into the United States, and exploded it in a football stadium to kill tens of thousands. That was the centerpiece of a best-selling 1991 novel and popular 2002 movie, The Sum of All Fears.[1] Between the book and the movie the terrorist band changed from Palestinians to neo-Nazis while the stadium moved from Denver to Baltimore, but the details hardly mattered. In the many stories with a similar plot, bomb materials could be stolen from Americans or Russians; the catastrophe could be planned for Los Angeles or Miami. What did matter were two familiar themes: the proliferation of bombs in nations around the world, and evildoers intent on blowing things up. These themes were becoming inseparably entangled. The Second Nuclear Age had begun with a decade of release from the anxieties of the Cold War, but by the late 1990s nuclear fear was on the rise again.[2]

From 1945 through the 1980s, when people worried about the proliferation of nuclear weapons their main concern had been that nations would use the bombs in war. If Argentina or South Africa showed an interest in getting nuclear bombs, its aim would be to threaten, deter, or defeat neighboring states. These, it was presumed, would hasten to get their own bombs in turn. But it didn't happen. Proliferation, as one scholar pointed out in 2009, proceeded "at a far more leisurely pace than generations of alarmists have routinely and urgently anticipated." And careful study showed that aside from the United States and the Soviet Union, the few cases in which a nation did get its own bombs turned out "to have had remarkably limited, perhaps even imperceptible, consequences." Nobody was successfully threatened, deterred, or defeated by the bombs.[3]

Despite this reassuring history, many worried that one or another dictator must certainly want to possess nuclear weapons — and if he got them he would drop them on a neighbor. Could such a regional atrocity trigger a world war? Everyone understood that thanks to the horror of all things nuclear, objections to any use of nuclear weapons had become something like a sacred taboo. Once the line was crossed (for example, in the Near East, where the great powers had vital interests), would the conflict escalate into a general exchange of missiles that would annihilate everything? Fear of violating the nuclear taboo — a dread of everything "the Bomb" represented — was arguably a main reason that in all the tense crises and vicious regional conflicts since 1945, nobody came near to using even a single bomb.

But what if some evildoer set out on purpose to provoke a nuclear exchange? "You get Russia and America to fight each other," the Sum of All Fears villain declared as his aim, "and destroy each other!" The scenario of triggering mass missile attacks with a single explosion became less plausible with the end of the Cold War, yet it never vanished entirely from people's thinking. It was as if every bomb contained within itself the entire apocalypse.

Meanwhile events stimulated a new variety of fear. The world was shocked when 5
United Nations inspectors, scouring Iraq in 1991 after the nation's defeat in the Gulf War, discovered that the Iraqis had secretly got well along toward building a few bombs. Worse, their bomb material was not plutonium but uranium-235 produced in a battery of centrifuges, easier to build and hide than a reactor. When the Iraqi program was forcibly dismantled, the issue faded from public consciousness. But not for long.

Proliferation worries began to revive in the late 1990s when Iraq obstructed the United Nations inspectors, raising suspicions it meant to try again. And in 1998, after twenty-four years of silence, India conducted its second bomb test, followed by more. Pakistan reacted swiftly with its own series of plutonium explosions. Worried talk about proliferation rose enough around 2002 to bring a third peak in the articles mentioning "nuclear war" in the Google News Archive, albeit much smaller than the peaks of the early 1960s and early 1980s. Adding to anxieties were reports of a massive Iranian effort to extract uranium-235 with centrifuges. In 2006 came an actual explosion of a North Korean device using plutonium from a reactor.

It was rare for more than 20 percent of Americans to be aware of a given news story (they notoriously do not pay much attention to foreign news), but since the late 1980s surveys recorded awareness well above that level for stories about nuclear weapon proliferation in Pakistan, Iraq, Iran, and North Korea. Significantly, after the U.S.-Soviet arms reduction agreement of 1991 the only nuclear-related news, civilian or military, that showed up in the surveys consisted of stories about weapons in third-world states.[4]

The nuclear ambitions that these regimes pursued were particularly worrisome because each was infected with some combination of irrationality, fanaticism, and tyranny. These elements featured in news accounts of the so-called rogue states — a term that rose to prominence during the 1990s, evoking the image of a vicious, solitary, uncontrollable beast — Libya, Iran, Iraq, and North Korea. Each of these favored certain terrorist organizations. If one of these states ever got a good stock of nuclear bombs, might it not give one to its protégés? Worse, each of these states was itself a brutish terrorist, as personified by its ruler. What would hold back Iraq's murderous tyrant Saddam Hussein from obliterating Tel Aviv if he had the means, or the bizarre North Korean dictator Kim Jong-Il from sneaking a bomb into Seoul or Washington?

Irrationality and fanaticism have been fundamental to images of terrorism for centuries. The third element, tyranny, is more modern. The anarchist bombmakers of the 1890s and the 1960s claimed to fight for democratic or socialist ideals. Some of the more recent murderers, like the right-wing extremist who blew up a federal government building in Oklahoma City in 1995, similarly imagined they were striking out on behalf of the suppressed individual. But by the start of the twenty-first century terrorists were mostly associated with repressive, authoritarian systems, such as Islamic fundamentalism or the fascism of the criminals in the movie The Sum of All Fears. It now seemed appropriate for dictators to sponsor terrorist groups.

In 1993 Islamic extremists attempted to blow up the World Trade Center in New 10
York City with conventional explosives, followed in 1995 by the blast that killed 168 people in Oklahoma City. Soon after, a poll of Americans found that nearly three-quarters of them believed there was a chance that terrorists could attack an American city with a "weapon of mass destruction." Another poll in 1998 found that half of all Americans believed that terrorists would explode a nuclear bomb in the United States within the next ten years. Experts wrote entire books discussing nuclear terrorism; columnists and politicians exclaimed that modern society faced a peril of vast dimensions. Nevertheless, the majority of people in the 1990s did not feel a deep personal concern. If they suspected a bombing might happen somewhere, unlike in the Cold War they thought the bomb was unlikely to strike just where they happened to live.[5]

The September 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington, D.C., did not initiate any new anxiety, then, so much as activate existing ones. The appalling pictures and stories that everyone saw and heard brought a visceral intensification of fears. What had been an abstract concern became almost a personal trauma. A series of Gallup polls found that the fraction of Americans who worried seriously about terrorism in general had been one in four in 2000. After the September 11 attacks the number leaped to six in ten, and after a few years leveled off at a relatively high four in ten. A more specific 2003 Gallup poll found four in ten Americans said they "often" worried that terrorists might attack the United States with nuclear weapons.

These were serious fears, though milder than the gripping dread of war that large majorities of Americans had felt during the tensest phases of the Cold War. In other developed countries, majorities usually rated terrorism as a second-rank concern like the environment and education, well below economic worries. People in most of the developing countries were even less likely to mention terrorism as a concern.[6]

In sum, in the early twenty-first century fear of terrorists with nuclear bombs stood on the shelf along with the other nuclear fears, but now it had moved to the front. Like fallout and reactor hazards in earlier decades, the threat satisfied the requirements for a risk whose likelihood people would tend to exaggerate by comparison with familiar risks like home accidents or fires. The image of a mushroom cloud rising over an American city was dreadful and memorable; the risk of harm was involuntary and unjust; the danger was novel and depended on unknowable secrets. Above all the idea was available in the mind, easily pictured by anyone raised on tales of nuclear weapons. Small wonder that the idea was popular with writers of thriller novels and television shows.

Notes

1. Tom Clancy, The Sum of All Fears (New York: Putnam, 1991).
2. Among the few who notice two separate post–Cold War periods without specifying the 9/11/2001 events as a crucial division is William J. Kinsella, "One Hundred Years of Nuclear Discourse: Four Master Themes and Their Implications for Environmental Communication," in The Environmental Communication Yearbook, vol. 2, ed. Susan L. Senecah (Mahwah, N.J.: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, 2005), 49–72. For novels 1960s–early 1980s featuring terrorist attempts at bombing or extortion see Paul Brians, Nuclear Holocausts: Atomic War in Fiction, 1895–1984 (Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1987), 37–38, 151, 178, 189, 201, 267, 275, 293; online version at http://www.wsu.edu/~brians/nuclear/.
3. John Mueller, Atomic Obsession: Nuclear Alarmism from Hiroshima to Al-Qaeda (New York: Oxford University Press, 2009), 95; see 90–95.
4. Pew Research Center for the People & the Press, search of data on the terms "nuclear," "atomic," "weapon," "reactor." http://people-press.org/nii/bydate.php.
5. 1996 poll: Pew Research Center for the People & the Press, "Public Apathetic about Nuclear Terrorism," 11 April 1996, http://people-press.org/reports/display.php3?ReportID=128, accessed 8 Jan. 2007. 1998 poll: Keating Holland/CNN, "Poll: Many Americans Worry about Nuclear Terrorism," http://www.cnn.com/ALLPOLITICS/1998/06/16/poll/, accessed 3 Jan. 2007. Jessica Stern, The Ultimate Terrorists (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1999); Gary Ackerman and William C. Potter, "Catastrophic Nuclear Terrorism: A Preventable Peril," in Global Catastrophic Risks, ed. Nick Bostrom and Milan M. Cirkovic (New York: Oxford University Press, 2008), 402–449; see 404–406. Nadine Gurr and Benjamin Cole, The New Face of Nuclear Terrorism: Threats from Weapons of Mass Destruction (London: I. B. Tauris, 2002), 3–8.
6. Gallup polls from http://brain.gallup.com. Pew Research Center for People & the Press, "Two Years Later, the Fear Lingers," 4 Sept. 2003, people-press.org/reports/print.php3?PageID=735. World survey: http://globescan.com/rf_gi_first_01.htm. Further polls can readily be turned up with Web searches.

(2012)

Questions

1. What does Spencer R. Weart mean by the "nuclear taboo" (par. 3)? What do some people fear would violate it?
2. What recent events have added a new element to what Weart describes as "fundamental to images of terrorism" (par. 9)?
3. What evidence does Weart use to support his analysis of the rise of nuclear fear?
4. According to Weart, what effect did the 9/11 attacks have on the rise in nuclear fear among Americans?

Making Connections

1. Both Lillian Hellman (p. 1471) and Arthur Miller (p. 1479) testified before the House Un-American Activities Committee, and both refused to "name names" and were scornful of those, such as director Elia Kazan, who did. What is your view of those who, fearful of prison and blacklisting, did name the names of their film-business coworkers who had been members of the Communist Party? Imagine how Ronald Radosh (p. 1484) might present a counterargument to Hellman and Miller.
2. Accounts of the days leading up to the Cuban missile crisis describe President John F. Kennedy standing up to his military advisors, who favored a full-scale attack on the missiles and an invasion of Cuba. What evidence of Kennedy's efforts do we see in his speech of October 22 (p. 1472)? Do you think he gambled on how Khrushchev would respond? Explain your answer.
3. Trace the path from the visual icons of the atomic age (pp. 1469 and 1470) to Michael Scheibach's (p. 1481) view that the youth culture that began to blossom in the second half of the 1950s was the result of Mad magazine's Alfred E. Neuman's "What, me worry?" attitude toward the possibility of nuclear annihilation. What connections do you see?
4. The excerpt from Spencer R. Weart's The Rise of Nuclear Fear (p. 1486) begins and ends with examples of how nuclear fear is imagined in pop culture. Compare the way Julia Alvarez's story "Snow" (p. 1478) reflects the anxieties of the atomic age to the way Weart presents them. Which do you think is more effective? More believable? Explain your answer.

Entering the Conversation

As you respond to each of the following prompts, support your position with appropriate evidence, including at least three sources in this Conversation on the atomic age, unless otherwise indicated.

1. In an interview with Scheibach, Cindy Hoedel of the Kansas City Star asked what studying the atomic age told him about the American family. He said the bombing of Hiroshima was a demarcation line in the same way that 9/11 is a demarcation line for people living now. He adds, however, that it is fear of nuclear attack that underlies even the present terrorist attacks. Write an essay in which you compare and contrast the effects of terrorist attacks on the American family of today with the effects of the threat of nuclear war on the American family of the 1950s.

2. Radosh says that the United States "had (and has) real enemies and . . . finding and prosecuting them is not evidence of repression" (par. 15). Write an essay in which you discuss the issue of the need for national security versus the individual's rights to free speech and privacy.

3. Graham Allison, the author of the 1971 Essence of Decision, is credited with the creation of the discipline of public policy. His doctoral thesis in political science was a study of the decision making during the Cuban missile crisis. He imagined what must have happened:

   > There was Kennedy looking over the cliff thinking, "Oh my God, we might really have a nuclear war." He judged the chances were between one and three and even of us going to war. And then he's thinking as he did empathetically of this poor guy Khrushchev who's sitting over there also worrying about this. It seemed to me implausible that he wouldn't give him something, especially if he could give it privately.

   Allison said that studying these frightening events shows that the roads to war are "paths of misperceptions, accidents, and unanticipated consequences." He says that understanding the importance of the many possible paths can help prevent not only war but also "institutional and bureaucratic disasters." Research the planning of the response to a potential disaster or the response to an actual disaster that you remember. Then write an essay in which you examine the decision making involved. Make sure, as Kennedy asked his military advisors to do, that you analyze the consequences of each decision, at least two or three steps down the line.

4. Scheibach and Weart both use images from and references to pop culture to discuss the consequences of the atomic age. Write an essay in which you discuss the ways that popular culture has portrayed the atomic bomb. Be sure to use visual texts as support and illustrations.

5. In an essay, support, dispute, or qualify this statement by science-fiction writer Ursula K. LeGuin:

   > It is only when science asks why, instead of simply describing how, that it becomes more than technology. When it asks why, it discovers Relativity. When it only shows how, it invents the atom bomb, and then puts its hands over its eye and says, "My God what have I done?"

6. Several singers and songwriters from the early 1960s to the present—Bob Dylan, most notably—have addressed the fears of the atomic age. Put together a song list of music inspired by anxiety about the atomic bomb and create cover art for an album using the visual icons of the atomic age. Write liner notes that explain your choices.

Conversation

The American Middle Class

In a country that generally views itself as classless, why is it that we hear so much about the American "middle class"? The concept of upper and lower classes comes from nineteenth-century British society, and we Americans, with our fundamental belief in equality for all, resist such designations. Beyond the promise of life itself, our democracy also proclaims the rights of liberty and "the pursuit of happiness." We believe that anyone can become president and that in the United States people can succeed by "pulling themselves up by their bootstraps." Does the American myth of the self-made man (which now includes woman), as promulgated by Benjamin Franklin and Horatio Alger, still resonate today?

In 1951, sociologist C. Wright Mills wrote about distributions of property and income for the "new middle-class." "Everything," he stated, "from the chance to stay alive during the first year after birth to the chance to view fine art; the chance to remain healthy and if sick to get well again quickly; the chance to avoid becoming a juvenile delinquent; and very crucially, the chance to complete an intermediary or higher educational grade—these are among the chances that are crucially influenced by one's position in the class structure of a modern society."

We look back to post–World War II, and especially to the 1950s, as the birth of the middle class, a period when the American Dream became a reality for more Americans than ever before. It was a time of great expansion through the construction of highways, the growth of the suburbs as exemplified by such developments as Levittown, New York, and the wide availability of consumer goods. Even families of relatively modest means could have two cars in the driveway, laundry in the washer, an apple pie in the oven, and Ed Sullivan or Lucille Ball on the TV in the living room—all on one income, no less. Of course, the reality wasn't that rosy for everyone, but that idyllic picture still captures our national imagination.

Recent decades have seen a dramatic shrinking of the middle class as the nation's wealth has become more concentrated in the hands of the very rich. Is the American Dream still alive and well? Is America still the land of upward mobility? Does the term middle class still have meaning?

Sources

Horatio Alger, from Ragged Dick, or Street Life in New York with the Boot Blacks (1867)

Harlon L. Dalton, Horatio Alger (1995)
Alan Brinkley, from The Fifties (2012)
Holly Sklar, The Growing Gulf between the Rich and the Rest of Us (2005)
Paul Krugman, from The Conscience of a Liberal (2007)
Thomas Sowell, Income Confusion (2007)
Hedrick Smith, from Who Stole the American Dream? (2012)
Isabel V. Sawhill, Scott Winship, and Kerry Searle Grannis, from Pathways to the Middle Class: Balancing Personal and Public Responsibilities (2012)
Sally Edelstein, Mutually Assured Consumption (collage, 2012)

from Ragged Dick, or Street Life in New York with the Boot Blacks

Horatio Alger

Horatio Alger (1832–1899) was a prolific American writer, famous for his "rags to riches" novels that depict the rise to success of his young impoverished heroes. Among the most famous are Ragged Dick (1867), Mark the Match Boy (1869), and Rough and Ready; or Life Among the New York Newsboys (1869). The following excerpt is from Ragged Dick. At the end of the previous chapter, Dick, the protagonist, recognizes the con man who has swindled a "countryman."

Chapter XI: Dick as a Detective

Dick's ready identification of the rogue who had cheated the countryman, surprised Frank.

"What makes you think it is he?" he asked.

"Because I've seen him before, and I know he's up to them kind of tricks. When I heard how he looked, I was sure I knowed him."

"Our recognizing him won't be of much use," said Frank. "It won't give back the countryman his money."

"I don't know," said Dick thoughtfully. "Maybe I can get it."

"How?" asked Frank, incredulously.

"Wait a minute, and you'll see."

Dick left his companion, and went up to the man whom he suspected.

"Ephraim Smith," said Dick, in a low voice.

The man turned suddenly, and looked at Dick uneasily.

"What did you say?" he asked.

"I believe your name is Ephraim Smith," continued Dick.

"You're mistaken," said the man, and was about to move off.

"Stop a minute," said Dick. "Don't you keep your money in the Washington Bank?"

"I don't know any such bank. I'm in a hurry, young man, and I can't stop to answer any foolish questions."

The boat had by this time reached the Brooklyn pier, and Mr. Ephraim Smith seemed in a hurry to land.

"Look here," said Dick, significantly; "you'd better not go on shore unless you want to jump into the arms of a policeman."

"What do you mean?" asked the man, startled.

"That little affair of yours is known to the police," said Dick; "about how you got fifty dollars out of a greenhorn on a false check, and it mayn't be safe for you to go ashore."

"I don't know what you are talking about," said the swindler with affected boldness, though Dick could see that he was ill at ease.

"Yes you do," said Dick. "There isn't but one thing to do. Just give me back that money, and I'll see that you're not touched. If you don't, I'll give you up to the first p'liceman we meet."

Dick looked so determined, and spoke so confidently, that the other, overcome by his fears, no longer hesitated, but passed a roll of bills to Dick and hastily left the boat.

All this Frank witnessed with great amazement, not understanding what influence Dick could have obtained over the swindler sufficient to compel restitution.

"How did you do it?" he asked eagerly.

"I told him I'd exert my influence with the president to have him tried by habeas corpus," said Dick.

"And of course that frightened him. But tell me, without joking, how you managed."

Dick gave a truthful account of what occurred, and then said, "Now we'll go back and carry the money."

"Suppose we don't find the poor countryman?"

"Then the p'lice will take care of it."

They remained on board the boat, and in five minutes were again in New York. Going up Wall Street, they met the countryman a little distance from the Custom House. His face was marked with the traces of deep anguish; but in his case even grief could not subdue the cravings of appetite. He had purchased some cakes of the old women who spread out for the benefit of passers-by an array of apples and seed-cakes, and was munching them with melancholy satisfaction.

"Hilloa!" said Dick. "Have you found your money?"

"No," ejaculated the young man, with a convulsive gasp. "I shan't ever see it again. The mean skunk's cheated me out of it. Consarn his picter! It took me most six months to save it up. I was workin' for Deacon Pinkham in our place. Oh, I wish I'd never come to New York! The deacon, he told me he'd keep it for me; but I wanted to put it in the bank, and now it's all gone, boo hoo!"

And the miserable youth, having despatched his cakes, was so overcome by the thought of his loss that he burst into tears.

"I say," said Dick, "dry up, and see what I've got here."

The youth no sooner saw the roll of bills, and comprehended that it was indeed his lost treasure, than from the depths of anguish he was exalted to the most ecstatic joy. He seized Dick's hand, and shook it with so much energy that our hero began to feel rather alarmed for its safety.

"'Pears to me you take my arm for a pump-handle," said he. "Couldn't you show your gratitood some other way? It's just possible I may want to use my arm ag'in some time."

The young man desisted, but invited Dick most cordially to come up and stop a week with him at his country home, assuring him that he wouldn't charge him anything for board.

"All right!" said Dick. "If you don't mind I'll bring my wife along, too. She's delicate, and the country air might do her good."

Jonathan stared at him in amazement, uncertain whether to credit the fact of his marriage. Dick walked on with Frank, leaving him in an apparent state of stupefaction, and it is possible that he has not yet settled the affair to his satisfaction.

"Now," said Frank, "I think I'll go back to the Astor House. Uncle has probably got through his business and returned." 40

"All right," said Dick.

The two boys walked up to Broadway, just where the tall steeple of Trinity faces the street of bankers and brokers, and walked leisurely to the hotel. When they arrived at the Astor House, Dick said, "Good-by, Frank."

"Not yet," said Frank; "I want you to come in with me."

Dick followed his young patron up the steps. Frank went to the reading-room, where, as he had thought probable, he found his uncle already arrived, and reading a copy of "The Evening Post," which he had just purchased outside.

"Well, boys," he said, looking up, "have you had a pleasant jaunt?" 45

"Yes, sir," said Frank. "Dick's a capital guide."

"So this is Dick," said Mr. Whitney, surveying him with a smile. "Upon my word, I should hardly have known him. I must congratulate him on his improved appearance."

"Frank's been very kind to me," said Dick, who, rough street-boy as he was, had a heart easily touched by kindness, of which he had never experienced much. "He's a tip-top fellow."

"I believe he is a good boy," said Mr. Whitney. "I hope, my lad, you will prosper and rise in the world. You know in this free country poverty in early life is no bar to a man's advancement. I haven't risen very high myself," he added, with a smile, "but have met with moderate success in life; yet there was a time when I was as poor as you."

"Were you, sir?" asked Dick, eagerly. 50

"Yes, my boy, I have known the time when I have been obliged to go without my dinner because I didn't have enough money to pay for it."

"How did you get up in the world?" asked Dick, anxiously.

"I entered a printing-office as an apprentice, and worked for some years. Then my eyes gave out and I was obliged to give that up. Not knowing what else to do, I went into the country, and worked on a farm. After a while I was lucky enough to invent a machine, which has brought me in a great deal of money. But there was one thing I got while I was in the printing-office which I value more than money."

"What was that, sir?"

"A taste for reading and study. During my leisure hours I improved myself by study, and acquired a large part of the knowledge which I now possess. Indeed, it was one of my books that first put me on the track of the invention, which I afterwards 55 made. So you see, my lad, that my studious habits paid me in money as well as in another way."

"I'm awful ignorant," said Dick, soberly.

"But you are young, and, I judge, a smart boy. If you try to learn, you can, and if you ever expect to do anything in the world, you must know something of books."

"I will," said Dick, resolutely. "I ain't always goin' to black boots for a livin'."

"All labor is respectable, my lad, and you have no cause to be ashamed of any honest business; yet when you can get something to do that promises better for your future prospects, I advise you to do so. Till then earn your living in the way you are accustomed to, avoid extravagance, and save up a little money if you can."

"Thank you for your advice," said our hero. "There ain't many that takes an interest in Ragged Dick."

"So that's your name," said Mr. Whitney. "If I judge you rightly, it won't be long before you change it. Save your money, my lad, buy books, and determine to be somebody, and you may yet fill an honorable position."

"I'll try," said Dick. "Good-night, sir."

"Wait a minute, Dick," said Frank. "Your blacking-box and old clothes are upstairs. You may want them."

"In course," said Dick. "I couldn't get along without my best clothes, and my stock in trade."

"You may go up to the room with him, Frank," said Mr. Whitney. "The clerk will give you the key. I want to see you, Dick, before you go."

"Yes, sir," said Dick.

"Where are you going to sleep to-night, Dick?" asked Frank, as they went upstairs together.

"P'r'aps at the Fifth Avenue Hotel — on the outside," said Dick.

"Haven't you any place to sleep, then?"

"I slept in a box, last night."

"In a box?"

"Yes, on Spruce Street."

"Poor fellow!" said Frank, compassionately.

"Oh, 'twas a bully bed — full of straw! I slept like a top."

"Don't you earn enough to pay for a room, Dick?"

"Yes," said Dick; "only I spend my money foolish, goin' to the Old Bowery, and Tony Pastor's, and sometimes gamblin' in Baxter Street."

"You won't gamble any more, — will you, Dick?" said Frank, laying his hand persuasively on his companion's shoulder.

"No, I won't," said Dick.

"You'll promise?"

"Yes, and I'll keep it. You're a good feller. I wish you was goin' to be in New York."

"I am going to a boarding-school in Connecticut. The name of the town is Barnton. Will you write to me, Dick?"

"My writing would look like hens' tracks," said our hero.

"Never mind. I want you to write. When you write you can tell me how to direct, and I will send you a letter."

"I wish you would," said Dick. "I wish I was more like you."

"I hope you will make a much better boy, Dick. Now we'll go in to my uncle. He wishes to see you before you go." 85

They went into the reading-room. Dick had wrapped up his blacking-brush in a newspaper with which Frank had supplied him, feeling that a guest of the Astor House should hardly be seen coming out of the hotel displaying such a professional sign.

"Uncle, Dick's ready to go," said Frank.

"Good-by, my lad," said Mr. Whitney. "I hope to hear good accounts of you sometime. Don't forget what I have told you. Remember that your future position depends mainly upon yourself, and that it will be high or low as you choose to make it."

He held out his hand, in which was a five-dollar bill. Dick shrunk back.

"I don't like to take it," he said. "I haven't earned it." 90

"Perhaps not," said Mr. Whitney; "but I give it to you because I remember my own friendless youth. I hope it may be of service to you. Sometime when you are a prosperous man, you can repay it in the form of aid to some poor boy, who is struggling upward as you are now."

"I will, sir," said Dick, manfully.

He no longer refused the money, but took it gratefully, and, bidding Frank and his uncle good-by, went out into the street. A feeling of loneliness came over him as he left the presence of Frank, for whom he had formed a strong attachment in the few hours he had known him.

(1867)

Questions

1. Horatio Alger characterizes Dick as thoughtful, shrewd, kind, humorous, and honest. Find specific support for each. Which trait do you think is most important?
2. Mr. Whitney characterizes what we have come to refer to as the path to the American Dream. What are its four components? Do they still hold true today? Explain.
3. What has become known as the "Horatio Alger myth" still grips the American imagination. Why do you think that is so?

Horatio Alger

Harlon L. Dalton

Harlon L. Dalton is a professor at Yale Law School. The following essay, taken from his 1995 book, Racial Healing: Confronting the Fear between Blacks and Whites, interrogates the Horatio Alger myth.

Ah, Horatio Alger, whose name more than any other is associated with the classic American hero. A writer of mediocre fiction, Alger had a formula for commercial success that was simple and straightforward: his lead characters, young boys born into poverty, invariably managed to transcend their station in life by dint of hard work, persistence, initiative, and daring.[1] Nice story line. There is just one problem — it is a myth. Not just in the sense that it is fictional, but more fundamentally because the lesson Alger conveys is a false one. To be sure, many myths are perfectly benign, and more than a few are salutary, but on balance Alger's myth is socially destructive.

The Horatio Alger myth conveys three basic messages: (1) each of us is judged solely on her or his own merits; (2) we each have a fair opportunity to develop those merits; and (3) ultimately, merit will out. Each of them is, to be charitable, problematic. The first message is a variant on the rugged individualism ethos. . . . In this form, it suggests that success in life has nothing to do with pedigree, race, class background, gender, national origin, sexual orientation — in short, with anything beyond our individual control. Those variables may exist, but they play no appreciable role in how our actions are appraised.

This simply flies in the face of reality. There are doubtless circumstances — the hiring of a letter carrier in a large metropolitan post office, for example — where none of this may matter, but that is the exception rather than the rule. Black folk certainly know what it is like to be favored, disfavored, scrutinized, and ignored all on the basis of our race. Sometimes we are judged on a different scale altogether. Stephen Carter has written movingly about what he calls "the best black syndrome," the tendency of White folk to judge successful Black people only in relation to each other rather than against all comers. Thus, when Carter earned the second-highest score in his high school on the National Merit Scholarship qualifying test, he was readily recognized as "the best Black" around, but somehow not seen as one of the best students, period.[2]

Although I would like to think that things are much different now, I know better. Not long ago a student sought my advice regarding how to deal with the fact that a liberal colleague of mine (and of Stephen Carter's) had written a judicial clerkship recommendation for her in which he described her as the best Black student to have ever taken his class. Apparently the letter caused a mild stir among current law clerks in several courthouses, one of whom saw fit to inform the student. "What was the professor [whom she declined to name] thinking of?" she wondered aloud. "What does his comment mean? What is a judge supposed to make of it? 'If for some reason you think you have to hire one of them, then she's the way to go'? I could understand if he said I was one of the top ten students or even the top thousand, but what does the 'best Black' mean?"

Black folk also know what it is like to be underestimated because of the color of 5 their skin. For example, those of us who communicate in standard English are often praised unduly for how well we speak. This is, I might add, an experience all too familiar to Asian-Americans, including those born and bred in the U.S.A. And we know what it is like to be feared, pitied, admired, and scorned on account of our race, before we even have a chance to say boo! We, in turn, view White people through the prism of our own race-based expectations. I honestly am surprised every time I see a White man who can play basketball above the rim, just as Puerto Ricans and Cubans tend to be surprised to discover "Americans" who salsa truly well. All of which is to say that the notion that every individual is judged solely on personal merit, without regard for sociological wrapping, is mythical at best.

---

[1]Edwin P. Hoyt, Horatio's Boys: The Life and Works of Horatio Alger, Jr. (Radnor, Penn.: Chilton Book Company, 1974).

[2]Stephen L. Carter, Reflections of an Affirmative Action Baby (New York: Basic Books, 1991), 47–49.

The second message conveyed by Horatio Alger is that we all have a shot at reaching our true potential. To be fair, neither Alger nor the myth he underwrote suggests that we start out equal. Nor does the myth necessarily require that we be given an equal opportunity to succeed. Rather, Alger's point is that each of us has the power to create our own opportunities. That turns out to be a difficult proposition to completely disprove, for no matter what evidence is offered up to show that a particular group of people have not fared well, it can always be argued that they did not try hard enough, or that they spent too much time wallowing in their predicament and not enough figuring out how to rise above it. Besides, there are always up-by-the-bootstraps examples to point to, like Colin Powell, whose name has so frequently been linked with that of Horatio Alger's that he must think they are related.[3] Nevertheless, it is by now generally agreed that there is a large category of Americans — some have called it the underclass — for whom upward mobility is practically impossible without massive changes in the structure of the economy and in the allocation of public resources.

As for the notion that merit will out, it assumes not only a commitment to merit-based decision making but also the existence of standards for measuring merit that do not unfairly favor one individual over another. Such standards, of course, must come from somewhere. They must be decided upon by somebody. And that somebody is rarely without a point of view. Ask a devotee of West Coast basketball what skills you should look for in recruiting talent and near the top of his list will be the ability to "get out on the break," to "be creative in the open court," and "to finish the play." On the other hand, ask someone who prefers East Coast basketball and her list will rank highly the ability "to d-up [play defense]," "to board [rebound]," and "to maintain focus and intensity."

Or, to take another example, what makes a great Supreme Court justice? Brains to spare? Common sense? Proper judicial temperament? Political savvy? Extensive lawyering experience? A well-developed ability to abstract? Vision? Well-honed rhetorical skills? A reverence for our rich legal heritage? The capacity to adapt to changing times?

---

[3]Sandy Grady, "Will He or Won't He?: Win or Lose, Presidential Pursuit by Colin Powell Would Do America a Necessary Service," Kansas City Star, 24 April 1995; Thomas B. Edsall, "For Powell, Timing Could be Crucial: As Gulf War Hero Hints at 1996 Bid, Associates Look into Details," Washington Post, 6 April 1995; J. F. O. McAllister, "The Candidate of Dreams," Time, 13 March 1995; Deroy Murdock, "Colin Powell: Many Things to Many People," Washington Times, 16 January 1995; Doug Fischer, "U.S. Politics: War Hero Well-Placed to Become First Black President," Ottawa Citizen, 8 October 1994; "General Nice Guy: Profile Colin Powell," Sunday Telegraph, 25 September 1994; Otto Kreisher, "As a Civilian, Powell's Options Are Enviable," San Diego Union-Tribune, 26 September 1993.

Even if one is tempted to say "all of the above," how should these (or any other set of characteristics) be ranked? Measured? Evaluated?

The answers depend in part on whom you ask. Practicing lawyers, for example, are probably likely to rank extensive lawyering experience more highly than, say, brains. They are also likely to pay close attention to judicial temperament, which for them means whether the prospective justice would be inclined to treat them with respect during a court appearance. Sitting judges are also likely to rank judicial temperament highly, meaning whether the prospective justice would be a good colleague. In choosing among the other characteristics, they might each favor the ones that they happen to possess in abundance. Politicians might well see more merit in political savvy than would, say, academics, who could be expected to favor brains, the ability to abstract, and perhaps rhetorical skills.

All of these relevant actors might be honestly trying to come up with appropriate standards for measuring merit, but they would arrive at markedly different results. And any given result would screen out people who would succeed under another, equally plausible set of standards. Thus, if there is a genuine commitment to merit-based decision making it is possible that merit will out, but only for those who have the right kind of merit. 10

Which brings us to the prior question: is merit all we care about in deciding who gets what share of life's goodies? Clearly not. Does anyone, for example, honestly believe that any Supreme Court justice in recent memory was nominated solely on the basis of merit (however defined)? Any President? Any member of Congress? Does anyone believe that America's health-care resources are distributed solely on merit? That tax breaks are distributed solely on merit? That baseball club owners are selected solely on merit?

As I suggested earlier, the mere fact that a myth is based on false premises or conveys a false image of the world does not necessarily make it undesirable. Indeed, I place great stock in the idea that some illusions are, or at least can be, positive. As social psychologist Shelley Taylor has observed, "[normal] people who are confronted with the normal rebuffs of everyday life seem to construe their experience [so] as to develop and maintain an exaggeratedly positive view of their own attributes, an unrealistic optimism about the future, and a distorted faith in their ability to control what goes on around them."[4] Taylor's research suggests that, up to a point, such self-aggrandizement actually improves one's chances of worldly success.[5]

This may well explain the deep appeal of the Horatio Alger myth. True or not, it can help to pull people in the direction they want to go. After all, in order to succeed in life, especially when the odds are stacked against you, it is often necessary to first convince yourself that there is a reason to get up in the morning. So what is my beef? Where is the harm?

---

[4]Shelley E. Taylor, Positive Illusions: Creative Self-Deception and the Healthy Mind (New York: Basic Books, 1989), xi.

[5]Ibid., xi, 7, 228–46.

In a nutshell, my objection to the Alger myth is that it serves to maintain the racial pecking order. It does so by mentally bypassing the role of race in American society. And it does so by fostering beliefs that themselves serve to trivialize, if not erase, the social meaning of race. The Alger myth encourages people to blink at the many barriers to racial equality (historical, structural, and institutional) that litter the social landscape. Yes, slavery was built on the notion that Africans were property and not persons; yes, even after that "peculiar institution" collapsed, it continued to shape the life prospects of those who previously were enslaved; yes, the enforced illiteracy and cultural disruption of slavery, together with the collapse of Reconstruction, virtually assured that the vast majority of "freedmen" and "freedwomen" would not be successfully integrated into society; yes, Jim Crow laws, segregation, and a separate and unequal social reality severely undermined the prospects for Black achievement; yes, these and other features of our national life created a racial caste system that persists to this day; yes, the short-lived civil rights era of the 1950s and 1960s was undone by a broad and sustained White backlash; yes, the majority of Black people in America are mired in poverty; yes, economic mobility is not what it used to be, given the decline in our manufacturing and industrial base; yes, the siting of the illicit drug industry in our inner cities has had pernicious effects on Black and Latino neighborhoods; yes, yes, yes, BUT (drumroll) "all it takes to make it in America is initiative, hard work, persistence, and pluck." After all, just look at Colin Powell!

There is a fundamental tension between the promise of opportunity enshrined in the Alger myth and the realities of a racial caste system. The main point of such a system is to promote and maintain inequality. The main point of the Alger myth is to proclaim that everyone can rise above her station in life. Despite this tension, it is possible for the myth to coexist with social reality. To quote Shelley Taylor once again: 15

> [T]he normal human mind is oriented toward mental health and . . . at every turn it construes events in a manner that promotes benign fictions about the self, the world, and the future. The mind is, with some significant exceptions, intrinsically adaptive, oriented toward overcoming rather than succumbing to the adverse events of life. . . . At one level, it constructs beneficent interpretations of threatening events that raise self-esteem and promote motivation; yet at another level, it recognizes the threat or challenge that is posed by these events.[6]

Not surprisingly, then, there are lots of Black folk who subscribe to the Alger myth and at the same time understand it to be deeply false. They live with the dissonance between myth and reality because both are helpful and healthful in dealing with "the adverse events of life." Many Whites, however, have a strong interest in resolving the dissonance in favor of the myth. Far from needing to be on guard against racial "threat[s] or challenge[s]," they would just as soon put the ugliness of racism out of mind. For them, the Horatio Alger myth provides them the opportunity to do just that.[7] Quite apart from the general way in which the myth works to submerge the social realities of race, each of the messages it projects is also incompatible with the idea of race-based advantage or disadvantage. If, as the myth suggests, we are judged solely on our individual merits, then caste has little practical meaning. If we all can acquire the tools needed to reach our full potential, then how important can the disadvantage of race be? If merit will eventually carry the day, then shouldn't we be directing our energies toward encouraging Black initiative and follow-through rather than worrying about questions of power and privilege?

[6]Ibid., xi.

By interring the myth of Horatio Alger, or at least forcing it to coexist with social reality, we can accomplish two important goals. First, we can give the lie to the idea that Black people can simply lift themselves up by their own bootstraps. With that pesky idea out of the way, it is easier to see why White folk need to take joint ownership of the nation's race problem. Second, the realization that hard work and individual merit, while certainly critical, are not guarantors of success should lead at least some White people to reflect on whether their own achievements have been helped along by their preferred social position.

Finally, quite apart from race, it is in our national interest to give the Horatio Alger myth a rest, for it broadcasts a fourth message no less false than the first three — that we live in a land of unlimited potential. Although that belief may have served us well in the past, we live today in an era of diminished possibilities. We need to make a series of hard choices, followed by yet more hard choices regarding how to live with the promise of less. Confronting that reality is made that much harder by a mythology that assures us we can have it all.

(1995)

Questions

1. Harlon L. Dalton delineates three features of what has come to be called the "Horatio Alger myth." What are they? How do they compare with Mr. Whitney's statements in the excerpt from Ragged Dick (p. 1493)? Do they hold true today? Explain.
2. Dalton argues against the validity of the Horatio Alger myth. How persuasive are his arguments?
3. Dalton specifically addresses the Horatio Alger myth as it applies to African Americans. Does his analysis of the myth apply to other Americans as well? Explain.
4. Do you agree with Dalton's questioning of the power of merit in our society?
5. What is the rhetorical effect of mentioning Colin Powell twice, in paragraphs 6 and 14?

---

[7]Robert T. Carter, et al., "White Racial Identity Development and Work Values," Journal of Vocational Behavior, Special Issue: Racial Identity and Vocational Behavior 44, no. 2 (April 1994): 185–97.

6. In the concluding paragraph, Dalton says, "we live today in an era of diminished possibilities." How much does your assessment of Dalton's argument depend on whether or not you agree with that assertion?

from The Fifties

Alan Brinkley

The following is an excerpt from an essay written for the Gilder Lehrman Institute of American History by Alan Brinkley (b. 1949), a professor of American history at Columbia University and the author of several books, including Franklin D. Roosevelt (2009), John F. Kennedy (2012), and Voices of Protest: Huey Long, Father Coughlin, and the Great Depression (1982), which received the National Book Award for History.

The Affluent Society

The performance of the American economy in the decades after World War II appeared to many contemporaries to be, as one historian wrote at the time, "the crossing of a great divide in the history of humanity." It was often described as an "economic miracle." The GNP was growing fourteen times as fast as the population and seven times the rate of inflation. The average family income grew as much in the ten years after World War II as it had grown in the previous fifty years combined. Between 1940 and 1965, average income grew from about $2,200 per family per year to just under $8,000; when adjusted for inflation, that means average family incomes almost tripled.

These years also saw a significant decrease in (although not a disappearance of) poverty in America. The percentage of families below the official poverty line in 1950 was 30 percent. By 1960 it had dropped to 22 percent and by the 1960s, it had dropped to under 14 percent. Between 1950 and 1970, in other words, poverty declined by over 60 percent.

There were many claims at the time that not only was America becoming wealthier, but that it was becoming more "equal," that wealth was being redistributed at the same time it was increasing. That was not true. There was no significant redistribution of wealth in the 1950s and 1960s, up or down, simply an increase in the total amount of wealth. But significantly—and in sharp contrast to the period since the mid-1970s—while there was no downward redistribution of wealth, neither was there an upward distribution of wealth. Distribution patterns, in other words, remained unchanged—the wealthy and the poor experienced roughly the same rates of growth. The gap between them remained the same.

What caused this remarkable growth? One important cause was government spending, which was clearly the major factor in ending the Depression in the early 1940s. Government expenditures in 1929 were 1 percent of GNP; in 1955, they were 17 percent. The bulk of this increase in the early 1950s came from military spending until the end of the Korean War. After that, highway and home construction picked up much of the slack. Veterans' benefits (mortgage and education assistance), government-sponsored research (military and space), and other sources of growth helped fuel the economy. Another cause of postwar economic growth was population growth: the tremendous increase in the birth rate in the decade after World War II ("postwar baby boom"). Population grew in the 1940s and 1950s at twice the rate it had grown in the 1930s. Increased population was also responsible for increased demand and increased consumption, a spur to economic growth.

The growth of suburbs after World War II was one of the great population movements in American history. Eighteen million people — 10 percent of the population — moved to suburbs in the 1950s. The American population as a whole grew 19 percent in the 1950s; suburban population grew 47 percent. Suburbs created a vast new market and provided an important boost to several of the most important sectors of the economy: the housing industry, the automobile industry, highway construction, and a wide range of consumer industries. And another element of growth was the transformation in labor relations. The growing power of unions allowed workers to receive better wages and benefits.

The cumulative economic effect of all these changes was a radical change in American life — the birth of an economy (and thus a society) in which many Americans came to consider affluence a norm; in which the ability not just to subsist, but greatly to enhance the quality of one's life came to seem a basic right; in which material abundance became one of the ways in which many, probably most, Americans defined their world.

Economic growth affected both popular and elite ideas about capitalism. Gradually it became possible to believe that there were few limits to economic growth. Capitalism, many Americans came to believe, was capable of much greater feats than most Americans had once believed possible.

John Kenneth Galbraith, the famous Harvard economist, hardly an uncritical defender of capitalism, published a small book in 1952 entitled American Capitalism. In it, he expressed some of the wonder and enthusiasm of this new discovery. About capitalism, he wrote simply: "It works!" And he went on to say:

> In the United States alone there need not lurk behind modern programs of social betterment that fundamental dilemma that everywhere paralyzes the will of every responsible man, the dilemma between economic progress and immediate increase of the real income of the masses. . . .

The growth of affluence also provided an opportunity to improve the lives of Americans and to meet social needs. Galbraith urged a major increase in public spending on such things as schools, parks, hospitals, urban renewal, and scientific research. The 1957 launching of Sputnik, the Soviet satellite that was the first to be launched into orbit (before the United States had managed to do so), was a tremendous event in American politics and culture. It too persuaded many Americans, and the government, to ask for massive social investment in an effort to catch up — particularly in science, technology, and education.

Fifties Society

Many Americans in the 1950s considered their era as a time of affluence, community, and unity. Today — a half century later — many people still see those years as a golden era that has now been lost. Even the most sophisticated chroniclers of its time believed in the great successes of the 1950s. The renowned historian Richard Hofstadter wrote at the time: 10

> The jobless, distracted and bewildered men of 1933 have in the course of the years found substantial places in society for themselves, have become homeowners, suburbanites, and solid citizens.

The French writer Simone de Beauvoir said of America in the 1950s:

> Class barriers disappear or become porous; the factory worker is an economic aristocrat in comparison with the middle-class clerk; even segregation is diminishing; consumption replaces acquisition as an incentive. America . . . as a country of vast inequalities and dramatic contrasts is ceasing to exist.

Many middle-class Americans in these years believed in the idea that the American people, for all their diversity, were becoming more and more alike — and could expect to continue to do so in the future. Few ideas became more pervasive in popular culture than the sense that America was becoming a middle-class nation — a society in which everyone was either already part of the middle class, soon to become part of it, or aspiring to become part of it. And there was some evidence for this powerful idea.

There was rapid growth in the number of people able to afford what the government defined as a "middle-class" standard of living — 60 percent of the American people. Home ownership rose from 40 percent in 1945 to 60 percent in 1960. By 1960, 75 percent of all families owned cars; 87 percent owned televisions; 75 percent owned washing machines. But these figures also show the survival of a substantial minority (25 to 40 percent) that remained outside the middle class. More than 23 percent of Americans still lived in poverty, and African American poverty was far higher.

American politics in the 1950s was dominated by Dwight D. Eisenhower, who emerged from the war as the military man with the most political appeal, largely because of his personality. There were other generals who had performed with at least equal brilliance and effectiveness. But none of them had Eisenhower's personal qualities: his public warmth and friendliness and geniality; his dazzling, highly photogenic smile, which became his political trademark; his comforting, unthreatening public image. It helped him become president in 1953, and it helped him remain popular until he left the White House in 1961.

But Eisenhower was also appealing because he seemed to embody the stability and the desire for unity that characterized so many other areas of American culture in the 1950s. Eisenhower's approach to leadership was based on two fairly simple assumptions. He had a deep aversion to conflict and confrontation. He leaned instinctively toward consensus and conciliation; and he tried to avoid doing anything that would disrupt the harmony that he liked to believe prevailed in American society. And he was deeply committed to capitalism, and to capitalists; a champion of free enterprise; a cheerleader for the business community in this hour of its great economic triumph. Eisenhower's presidency was an embodiment of the middle-class yearning for stability and consensus.

Eisenhower became, in effect, the cautious, prudent, conciliatory paternal figure 15 presiding over the heyday of middle-class dominance of American life. He seemed to embody the era's apparent stability and unity and homogeneity. He epitomized the American middle class's idealized image of itself. And not incidentally, he presided over an era of almost unbroken prosperity and unbroken peace that reinforced the power of the stable, consensual public culture of the time.

(2012)

Questions

1. In the third paragraph, Alan Brinkley addresses a misconception that he thinks many hold regarding 1950s America. What might be the reason many people have that misconception? Did you before you read this selection? Brinkley suggests that the conditions he describes began to change in the 1970s. What might have been some of the causes? Explain.
2. How does Brinkley characterize American life in paragraphs 6 and 7? Do you agree with that characterization? Do people today still define their world as he says they did then? Explain.
3. Brinkley quotes Richard Hofstadter and Simone de Beauvoir on their perceptions of the 1950s. How accurately might their comments apply to American society today?
4. Brinkley characterizes President Dwight D. Eisenhower as the ideal leader for his time. Choose a more recent American president whom you see as similar in stature. How did/does that leader embody the ethos of the American middle class for his time?
5. Of the 1950s, Brinkley says, "Today — a half century later — many people still see those years as a golden era that has now been lost" (par. 10). What evidence do you see in American politics and culture to support Brinkley's claim?

The Growing Gulf between the Rich and the Rest of Us

Holly Sklar

Holly Sklar, a syndicated columnist and policy analyst, is the author of the 2001 book Raise the Floor: Wages and Policies That Work for All of Us. The following syndicated editorial first appeared in September 2005 on the Web site CommonDreams.org, a nonprofit news site dedicated to "progressive values of social justice, human rights, equity and peace."

Guess which country the CIA World Factbook describes when it says, "Since 1975, practically all the gains in household income have gone to the top 20 percent of households."

If you guessed the United States, you're right.

The United States has rising levels of poverty and inequality not found in other rich democracies. It also has less mobility out of poverty.

Since 2000, America's billionaire club has gained 76 more members while the typical household has lost income and the poverty count has grown by more than 5 million people.

Poverty and inequality take a daily toll seldom seen on television. "The infant mortality rate in the United States compares with that in Malaysia — a country with a quarter the income," says the 2005 Human Development Report. "Infant death rates are higher for [black] children in Washington, D.C., than for children in Kerala, India."

Income and wealth in America are increasingly concentrated at the very top — the realm of the Forbes 400.

You could have banked $1 million a day every day for the last two years and still have far to go to make the new Forbes list of the 400 richest Americans.

It took a minimum of $900 million to get on the Forbes 400 this year. That's up $150 million from 2004.

"Surging real estate and oil prices drove up several fortunes and helped pave the way for 33 new members," Forbes notes.

Middle-class households, meanwhile, are a medical crisis or outsourced job away from bankruptcy.

With 374 billionaires, the Forbes 400 will soon be billionaires only.

Bill Gates remains No. 1 on the Forbes 400 with $51 billion. Low-paid Wal-Mart workers can find Walton family heirs in five of the top 10 spots; another Wal-Mart heir ranks No. 116.

Former Bechtel president Stephen Bechtel Jr. and his son, CEO Riley Bechtel, tie for No. 109 on the Forbes 400 with $2.4 billion apiece. The politically powerful Bechtel has gotten a no-bid contract for hurricane reconstruction despite a pattern of cost overruns and shoddy work from Iraq to Boston's leaky "Big Dig" tunnel/highway project.

The Forbes 400 is a group so small they could have watched this year's Sugar Bowl from the private boxes of the Superdome.

Yet combined Forbes 400 wealth totals more than $1.1 trillion — an amount greater than the gross domestic product of Spain or Canada, the world's eighth- and ninth-largest economies.

The number of Americans in poverty is a group so large it would take the combined populations of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Texas, plus Arkansas to match it. That's according to the Census Bureau's latest count of 37 million people below the poverty line.

Millions more Americans can't afford adequate health care, housing, child care, food, transportation and other basic expenses above the official poverty thresholds, which are set too low. The poverty threshold for a single person under age 65 was just $9,827 in 2004. For a two-adult, two-child family, it was just $19,157.

By contrast, the Economic Policy Institute's Basic Family Budget Calculator says the national median basic needs budget (including taxes and tax credits) for a two-parent, two-child family was $39,984 in 2004. It was $38,136 in New Orleans and $33,636 in Biloxi, Mississippi.

America is becoming a downwardly mobile society instead of an upwardly mobile society. Median household income fell for the fifth year in a row to $44,389 in 2004 — down from $46,129 in 1999, adjusting for inflation. The Bush administration is using hurricane "recovery" to camouflage policies that will deepen inequality and poverty. They are bringing windfall profits to companies like Bechtel while suspending regulations that shore up wages for workers.

More tax cuts are in the pipeline for wealthy Americans who can afford the $17,000 watch, $160,000 coat and $10 million helicopter on the Forbes Cost of Living Extremely Well Index. 20

More budget cuts are in the pipeline for Medicaid, Food Stamps and other safety nets for Americans whose wages don't even cover the cost of necessities.

Without a change in course, the gulf between the rich and the rest of America will continue to widen, weakening our economy and our democracy. The American Dream will be history instead of poverty.

(2005)

Questions

1. Holly Sklar begins by quoting the CIA World Factbook, an almanac published by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency that contains information about countries of the world. How does this source affect her ethos?
2. What is the effect of the many statistics that Sklar includes in her short piece? Which of them do you find most compelling or startling?
3. Paragraph 13 consists of two sentences, the first of which delivers objective, factual information. In the second sentence, Sklar makes implications. What are they? How do they support her argument?
4. In paragraphs 20 and 21, Sklar juxtaposes tax cuts with budget cuts. What, according to her, are their relative effects?
5. Writing in 2005, Sklar concludes, "the gulf between the rich and the rest of America will continue to widen, weakening our economy and our democracy." Was she correct in her assessment? Explain.

from The Conscience of a Liberal

Paul Krugman

Paul Krugman is a professor at Princeton University, an op-ed columnist for the New York Times, and the author of several books, including The Age of Diminished

Expectations (1989) and The Great Unraveling: Losing Our Way in the New Century (2003). He was awarded the 2008 Nobel Prize in Economics. The following excerpt from Krugman's 2007 book is from Chapter 12, "Confronting Inequality."

Americans still tend to say, when asked, that individuals can make their own place in society. According to one survey 61 percent of Americans agree with the statement that "people get rewarded for their effort," compared with 49 percent in Canada and only 23 percent in France.[1] In reality, however, America has vast inequality of opportunity as well as results. We may believe that anyone can succeed through hard work and determination, but the facts say otherwise.

There are many pieces of evidence showing that Horatio Alger stories are very rare in real life. One of the most striking comes from a study published by the National Center for Education Statistics, which tracked the educational experience of Americans who were eighth graders in 1988. Those eighth graders were sorted both by apparent talent, as measured by a mathematics test, and by the socioeconomic status of their parents, as measured by occupations, incomes, and education.

The key result is shown in Table 1. Not surprisingly, both getting a high test score and having high-status parents increased a student's chance of finishing college. But family status mattered more. Students who scored in the bottom fourth on the exam, but came from families whose status put them in the top fourth — what we used to call RDKs, for "rich dumb kids," when I was a teenager — were more likely to finish college than students who scored in the top fourth but whose parents were in the bottom fourth. What this tells us is that the idea that we have anything close to equality of opportunity is clearly a fantasy. It would be closer to the truth, though not the whole truth, to say that in modern America, class — inherited class — usually trumps talent.

Isn't that true everywhere? Not to the same extent. International comparisons of "intergenerational mobility," the extent to which people can achieve higher status than their parents, are tricky because countries don't collect perfectly comparable data.

TABLE 1

Percentage of 1988 Eighth Graders Finishing College

	SCORE IN BOTTOM QUARTILE	SCORE IN TOP QUARTILE
Parents in Bottom Quartile	3	29
Parents in Top Quartile	30	74

SOURCE: NATIONAL CENTER FOR EDUCATION STATISTICS, THE CONDITION OF EDUCATION 2003, P. 47.

Nonetheless it's clear that Horatio Alger has moved to someplace in Europe: Mobility is highest in the Scandinavian countries, and most results suggest that mobility is lower in the United States than it is in France, Canada, and maybe even Britain. Not only don't Americans have equal opportunity, opportunity is less equal here than elsewhere in the West.

It's not hard to understand why. Our unique lack of universal health care, all by itself, puts Americans who are unlucky in their parents at a disadvantage: Because American children from low-income families are often uninsured, they're more likely to have health problems that derail their life chances. Poor nutrition, thanks to low income and a lack of social support, can have the same effect. Life disruptions that affect a child's parents can also make upward mobility hard — and the weakness of the U.S. social safety net makes such disruptions more likely and worse if they happen. Then there's the highly uneven quality of U.S. basic education, and so on. What it all comes down to is that although the principle of "equality of opportunity, not equality of results" sounds fine, it's a largely fictitious distinction. A society with highly unequal results is, more or less inevitably, a society with highly unequal opportunity, too. If you truly believe that all Americans are entitled to an equal chance at the starting line, that's an argument for doing something to reduce inequality. 5

America's high inequality, then, imposes serious costs on our society that go beyond the way it holds down the purchasing power of most families. And there's another way in which inequality damages us: It corrupts our politics. "If there are men in this country big enough to own the government of the United States," said Woodrow Wilson in 1913, in words that would be almost inconceivable from a modern president, "they are going to own it."[2] Well, now there are, and they do. Not completely, of course, but hardly a week goes by without the disclosure of a case in which the influence of money has grotesquely distorted U.S. government policy.

As this book went to press, there was a spectacular example: The way even some Democrats rallied to the support of hedge fund managers, who receive an unconscionable tax break. Through a quirk in the way the tax laws have been interpreted, these managers — some of whom make more than a billion dollars a year — get to have most of their earnings taxed at the capital gains rate, which is only 15 percent, even as other high earners pay a 35 percent rate. The hedge fund tax loophole costs the government more than $6 billion a year in lost revenue, roughly the cost of providing health care to three million children.[3] Almost $2 billion of the total goes to just twenty-five individuals. Even conservative economists believe that the tax break is unjustified, and should be eliminated.[4]

Yet the tax break has powerful political support — and not just from Republicans. In July 2007 Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, the head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, let it be known that he would favor eliminating the hedge fund loophole only if other, deeply entrenched tax breaks were eliminated at the same time. As everyone understood, this was a "poison pill," a way of blocking reform without explicitly saying no. And although Schumer denied it, everyone also suspected that his position was driven by the large sums hedge funds contribute to Democratic political campaigns.[5]

The hedge fund loophole is a classic example of how the concentration of income in a few hands corrupts politics. Beyond that is the bigger story of how income inequality has reinforced the rise of movement conservatism, a fundamentally undemocratic force. As I argued [earlier in the book], rising inequality has to an important extent been caused by the rightward shift of our politics, but the causation also runs the other way. The new wealth of the rich has increased their influence, sustaining the institutions of movement conservatism and pulling the Republican Party even further into the movement's orbit. The ugliness of our politics is in large part a reflection of the inequality of our income distribution.

More broadly still, high levels of inequality strain the bonds that hold us together as a society. There has been a long-term downward trend in the extent to which Americans trust either the government or one another. In the sixties, most Americans agreed with the proposition that "most people can be trusted"; today most disagree.[6] In the sixties, most Americans believed that the government is run "for the benefit of all"; today, most believe that it's run for "a few big interests."[7] And there's convincing evidence that growing inequality is behind our growing cynicism, which is making the United States seem increasingly like a Latin American country. As the political scientists Eric Uslaner and Mitchell Brown point out (and support with extensive data), "In a world of haves and have-nots, those at either end of the economic spectrum have little reason to believe that 'most people can be trusted' . . . social trust rests on a foundation of economic equality."[8] 10

(2007)

Notes

1. Tom Hertz, Understanding Mobility in America (Center for American Progress, 2006) <http://www.americanprogress.org/issues/2006/04/b1579981.html>.
2. Woodrow Wilson, The New Freedom (Doubleday, 1913), Project Gutenberg <http://www.gutenberg.org/files/14811/14811-h/14811-h.html>.
3. "Tax Breaks for Billionaires," Economic Policy Institute Policy Memorandum no. 120 <http://www.epi.org/content.cfm/pm120>.
4. See, for example, Jessica Holzer, "Conservatives Break with GOP Leaders on a Tax Bill," The Hill 18 July 2007 <http://thehill.com/leading-the-news/conservatives-break-with-gop-leaders-on-a-tax-bill-2007-07-18.html>.
5. "In Opposing Tax Plan, Schumer Supports Wall Street Over Party," New York Times 30 July 2007: A1.
6. Eric M. Uslaner and Mitchell Brown, "Inequality, Trust, and Civic Engagement," American Politics Research 33.6 (2005): 868–94.
7. The ANES Guide to Public Opinion and Electoral Behavior, table 5A.2 <http://electionsstudies.org/nesguide/toptable/tab5a_htm>.
8. Uslaner and Brown, "Inequality, Trust, and Civic Engagement."

Questions

1. In the first four paragraphs, Paul Krugman questions the validity of "Horatio Alger stories." Having read Alger (p. 1493) and Harlon L. Dalton (p. 1497), how persuasive do you find Krugman's argument?
2. According to Krugman, what are the chief consequences of growing economic inequality? What implications do they have for our society as a whole?

3. Krugman, who teaches economics at Princeton University, was awarded the Nobel Prize in Economics in 2008. How does that establish his ethos? How does knowing that affect your reading of his argument?
4. What is the rhetorical effect of the information in the endnotes? Explain by making specific reference to at least two of them.

Income Confusion

Thomas Sowell

Thomas Sowell (b. 1930) is an economist and a nationally syndicated columnist whose work appears in Forbes magazine and the Wall Street Journal, among other publications. A former U.S. marine, he was educated at Harvard and Columbia Universities and at the University of Chicago. He is a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford University. "Income Confusion" is a syndicated op-ed that appeared in newspapers across the country.

Anyone who follows the media has probably heard many times that the rich are getting richer, the poor are getting poorer, and incomes of the population in general are stagnating. Moreover, those who say such things can produce many statistics, including data from the Census Bureau, which seem to indicate that.

On the other hand, income tax data recently released by the Internal Revenue Service seem to show the exact opposite: People in the bottom fifth of income-tax filers in 1996 had their incomes increase by 91 percent by 2005.

The top one percent — "the rich" who are supposed to be monopolizing the money, according to the left — saw their incomes decline by a whopping 26 percent.

Meanwhile, the average taxpayers' real income increased by 24 percent between 1996 and 2005.

How can all this be? How can official statistics from different agencies of the same government — the Census Bureau and the IRS — lead to such radically different conclusions? 5

There are wild cards in such data that need to be kept in mind when you hear income statistics thrown around — especially when they are thrown around by people who are trying to prove something for political purposes.

One of these wild cards is that most Americans do not stay in the same income brackets throughout their lives. Millions of people move from one bracket to another in just a few years.

What that means statistically is that comparing the top income bracket with the bottom income bracket over a period of years tells you nothing about what is happening to the actual flesh-and-blood human beings who are moving between brackets during those years.

That is why the IRS data, which are for people 25 years old and older, and which follow the same individuals over time, find those in the bottom 20 percent of incometax filers almost doubling their income in a decade. That is why they are no longer in the same bracket.

That is also why the share of income going to the bottom 20 percent bracket can be going down, as the Census Bureau data show, while the income going to the people who began the decade in that bracket is going up by large amounts. Unfortunately, most income statistics, including those from the Census Bureau, do not follow individuals over time. The Internal Revenue Service does that and so does a study at the University of Michigan, but they are the exceptions rather than the rule.

Following trends among income brackets over the years creates the illusion of following people over time. But the only way to follow people is to follow people.

Another wild card in income statistics is that many such statistics are about households or families — whose sizes vary over time, vary between one racial or ethnic group and another, and vary between one income bracket and another.

That is why household or family income can remain virtually unchanged for decades while per capita income is going up by very large amounts. The number of people per household and per family is declining.

Differences in the number of people per household from one ethnic group to another is why Hispanics have higher household incomes than blacks, while blacks have higher individual incomes than Hispanics.

Considering the millions of dollars being paid to each of the anchors who broadcast network news, surely these networks can afford to hire a few statisticians to check the statistics being thrown around, before these numbers are broadcast across the land as facts on which we are supposed to base policies and elect presidents.

Now that the Internal Revenue data show the opposite of what the media and the politicians have been saying for years, should we expect either to change? Not bloody likely.

The University of Michigan study, which has been going on for decades, shows patterns very similar to those of the IRS data. Those patterns have been ignored for decades.

Too many in the media and in politics choose whatever statistics fit their preconceptions.

(2007)

Questions

1. What statistics does Thomas Sowell use to support his claims? What are the two "wild cards" (par. 6) that he refers to? Why does he call them "wild cards"?
2. Whom does Sowell blame for what he characterizes as misconceptions regarding the economy? What does he imply about their motives? How might they respond to his implications?
3. Identify a major claim that Sowell makes and analyze his argument according to the Toulmin model (p. 126). How persuasive do you find his argument? Explain.

from Who Stole the American Dream?

Hedrick Smith

Hedrick Smith is a reporter and editor for the New York Times and an Emmy Award–winning producer for Frontline, on PBS. He was awarded the Pulitzer Prize for International Reporting in 1974. Among his books are The Russians (1975) and The Power Game (1996). The following excerpt from Smith's 2012 book is taken from Chapter 6, "The Stolen Dream: From Middle Class to the New Poor."

The world of opportunities that greeted Pam Scholl coming out of high school in Chillicothe, Ohio, in 1971 was a universe apart from the tough economic world that lies in wait for average high school graduates today.

On the Monday after graduation, Pam went to work full-time for the RCA television tube plant that was opening in nearby Circleville. Pam was a well-organized, gregarious teenager, a five-foot-five bundle of energy with a quick smile. In her senior year, she had worked half-time for RCA as a co-op secretarial student. After her graduation, RCA hired Pam for human relations to help build a workforce that grew to fifteen hundred.

"I got $1.75 an hour," Pam recalled. "I didn't have a car my first year. But about a year later, I bought me a Vega, a new little brown Chevrolet. It was cheap — $2,500. My car payment was $50 a month and I could fill it up for $5, and run two weeks on that. I thought I was hot. I had a new car and I had a job. I was in HR and I met all the guys."[1]

One guy she helped was her classmate Mike Hughes. One Sunday afternoon, Pam tipped Mike off to apply for a job the next day. "Mike came in, he took a test and got hired," she said. "We took just about anybody who was healthy and could lift things."

Living The American Dream: 1970s–2000

"The early seventies were a good time around here," remembered Roy Wunsch, for thirty-five years a chemical engineer at the local DuPont plant and, later, the Republican mayor of Circleville. "Living standards were going up. Everyone was growing or expanding — all the local plants." High school graduates were in demand.[2] 5

Circleville (pop: 12,000) calls itself "the Pumpkin Capital of the World." It lies at the heart of the Pickaway Plains, the rich farmlands of south-central Ohio honed smooth by prehistoric glaciers. But despite its small-town façade, Circleville was a magnet for brand-name U.S. corporations because it was close to major transportation arteries. RCA, DuPont, General Electric, Pittsburgh Plate Glass, Owens-Illinois, and Container Corporation all had factories there. Purina processed the local crops.

So towns like Circleville rode the escalator of American economic growth from the 1970s into the 2000s, and middle-class people like Pam Scholl and Mike Hughes lived the American Dream. Each bought a home, raised a family, and moved up the ladder at RCA, enjoying steady pay, good benefits, five weeks of paid vacation a year, and a company-financed retirement plan. From secretary, Pam rose to a $47,000-a-year job as stockroom supervisor. Mike got good technical training and promotions. By 2000, he was a senior quality control inspector making $50,000 to $60,000 a year.[3]

"I liked working there," Pam Scholl said, speaking for both of them. "It was great. I knew everybody. It was wonderful."

Wonderful, but it didn't last.

2004: The Bottom Falls Out

The bottom fell out in 2004, even though the U.S. economy was then on the upswing. 10
Facing lower-cost competition from China, RCA sold the plant to the French firm Thomson, which cut back production in 2003 and finally shut down the plant in July 2004. Mike Hughes sensed it coming: The plant was not bringing in as much raw material as it had during boom times.

Even so, the shutdown was a body blow. Suddenly cast adrift in his early fifties, Hughes could not find steady work. He tried changing careers. With federal displaced worker assistance, he was able to take a year's course in industrial maintenance. But even that did not lead to a job. Hughes pumped out scores of job inquiries but kept being told that despite his long technical experience at RCA, he wasn't qualified for entry-level manual labor.

Eventually, he took a night job as part-time custodian at a local high school for $13,000 a year. A second part-time job at a local glass company earned him another $4,000. Only his wife's public sector job at Head Start kept Hughes from sinking below the poverty line.

"What made it difficult for us, we had children coming out of high school wanting to get a college education," Mike explained. "That's where my thirty-one years of severance pay went. All of it went to college tuition. I had to choose between my kids' future and our future."[4]

Talking about his predicament, Mike Hughes put on a brave front, papering over his hurt and anger. "I've got a home. I got a good pension. I somewhat lived the American Dream," he said. "They just cut me off. They cut off the dream."

"The Hardest Thing — Not Being Wanted"

At first, Pam Scholl fared better than Mike. She found a job as office and traffic manager 15 for a small American Wood Fibers plant. The pay was good, $47,000 a year, until — until they downsized her out of a job in May 2009. Then life went black. By then, she was a single mom, carrying the costs of a home all by herself. For the next eighteen months, the only work Pam could find was three months as a census taker in 2010. Otherwise, she ran through her savings and had to live on unemployment benefits and rising credit card debt.

"The hardest thing is not being wanted — not feeling worthy," she told me. "I didn't realize how bad I felt about it, until I got the census job. Even though it didn't pay that well, it was uplifting to have something to do. I felt like I was contributing to society.

The hardest thing is everybody looking at my résumé and saying, 'What a wonderful résumé you have — all this experience.' But I have no job. I know I have completed over five hundred applications and I have had only four job interviews, all for much less money than I was making."

Taking tests for public sector jobs, Pam Scholl ran into other people who had been laid off with her at the RCA plant in 2004. Like Pam, they were still hunting for a steady job. "The same 200 people are there," she noticed. "We are all taking the test for the same job. The very first test I took was for water meter reader for the city of Chillicothe. That was in June 2009. The job paid $14 an hour, and there were 250 people. The bottom line was, there was not even a job. The job was filled internally."

A year later, still without a job, she said it was a nightmare not knowing what to do or where to turn. "Oh, it's horrible," Scholl told me. "I never dreamed that I would be unemployed for a year. Right now, I am about to sink." She gave an uneasy laugh that betrayed her anxiety and too many sleepless nights. "I barely stay afloat between charge cards and unemployment benefits. I have depleted my savings at this point, just surviving. . . . This terrifies me to death."[5]

The New Poor — Middle-Class Dropouts of Opportunity

Pam Scholl and Mike Hughes represent a new phenomenon in America: the New Poor. They have become what might be called "middle-class dropouts" — middle-class Americans sliding downscale, people slipping backward late in life, which is the exact opposite of the American Dream. In six short years, those two fell from the middle of the American middle class, the middle 20 percent of all income brackets, into the bottom 20 percent or barely above it, and their stories mirror wide trends in American society.

As a nation, we have just been through the worst decade in seventy years, with 20 fewer jobs at the end of 2011 than ten years earlier and with the income of the typical middle-class family winding up lower than in the late 1990s.[6, 7] But the story begins far earlier than this past decade. Millions of middle-class Americans like Pam Scholl and Mike Hughes started their economic decline before the Great Recession of 2008.

Their lives reflect "the long arc" of our economic history. They and millions like them are victims of the long-term stagnation of middle-class living standards since the 1970s. The squeeze they feel marks the long, slow erosion of America's claim as the land of opportunity. Blacks have been harder hit than whites — roughly 45 percent of blacks born into solid middle-class families had lower incomes than their parents by 2007.[8]

Their experience has been happening all across America, to real estate agents in Florida, to bank tellers in New York, to computer programmers in Colorado, even to people with Ph.D. degrees. The numbers of New Poor are legion, certainly among the nation's 6 million long-term unemployed. In 2010, the Census Bureau reported, another 2.6 million Americans slipped below the official poverty line, bringing the total to 46.2 million people — the highest number in fifty-two years.[9] "We think of America as a place where every generation is doing better," commented Harvard economist Lawrence Katz, "but we're looking at a period when the median family is in worse shape than it was in the late 1990s."[10]

Baby boomers in their late fifties and early sixties, like Pam Scholl and Mike Hughes, have been especially hard hit. By late 2011, 4.3 million of them, roughly one in six Americans age fifty-five to sixty-four, were unable to find full-time work, and half of them have been looking for more than two years. As a group, joblessness or contingent work has cost them roughly $100 billion a year in lost wages. "This is new. . . . It is worse than we have experienced before and it is very widespread," asserts Carl Van Horn, head of the John J. Heldrich Center for Workforce Development at Rutgers University. "It is going to get worse. You are going to have a higher level of poverty among older Americans."[11]

The United States: Low Mobility in a New "Caste Society"

There is growing, and disturbing, evidence that America has evolved into a caste society, increasingly stratified in terms of wealth and income, with people at the bottom almost frozen there, generation after generation, and people at the top more and more frequently passing on the self-fulfilling advantages of high status to their children and grandchildren. Increasingly, privilege sustains privilege; poverty begets poverty.

"Children born to parents in the top [income] quintile have the highest likelihood of attaining the top," asserts social scientist Julia Isaacs. "And children born to parents in the bottom quintile have the highest likelihood of being in the bottom themselves."[12] 25

Several countries in Scandinavia and continental Europe, which we used to mock as class-bound hierarchies, have now surpassed us as places where people can move up the social and economic ladder. To gauge such things, experts track how near or far the apple falls from the tree or, in economic terms, how closely the incomes of sons match those of fathers and grandfathers. In those terms, evidence shows that countries like Norway, Finland, Denmark, and Canada offer young people the greatest chances of breaking out of the family mold, and even France, Germany, and Sweden offer young people better chances than America for moving up.[13]

In fact, America is now classified as "a low-mobility country in which about half of parental earnings advantages are passed onto sons," reports economist Isabel Sawhill.[14] Isaacs adds that "starting at the bottom of the earnings ladder is more of a handicap in the United States than in other countries."[15]

One major reason that a caste society is emerging in the United States is that education is no longer the great social leveler that it once was. Just the opposite. Recent academic studies have found that the educational attainment gap between affluent and low-income families has grown by 40 percent since the 1960s, even as the educational gap between blacks and whites has narrowed. "We have moved from a society in the 1950s and 1960s in which race was more consequential than family income to one today in which family income appears more determinative of educational success than race," reports Stanford sociologist Sean Reardon.[16] At the college level, one-half of the children from high-income families completed college in 2007 versus only 9 percent of low-income families — again a wider gap than existed in 1989.[17]

An important driver of these radically different educational outcomes, scholars have determined, is the significant additional time and money that affluent families invest in extracurricular learning and tutoring for their children compared with what low-income families can afford — a spending gap that has been increasing.[18] In addition, the quadrupling of average college tuition and room fees from the late 1970s to the early 2000s has put teenage children of average middle-class families at a large financial disadvantage compared with children of wealthy and affluent families in the basic ability to pay for a college education.[19]

America can still point to individual rags-to-riches stories of self-made men and women who leapfrog to success. But for all the glitz of sudden stardom on American Idol, for all the hoop stars and gridiron heroes from the inner city, and for every surprise Wall Street billionaire, the unpleasant truth is that a typical child born at the bottom of the heap in America has far less chance of rising into the middle class or above than one born in France, Germany, or Scandinavia. In fact, one study found that it would take five or six generations, 125 to 150 years, for a child from America's poverty caste to rise to the middle of the middle class.[20] 30

"Being born in the elite in the U.S. gives you a constellation of privileges that very few people in the world have ever experienced," explained David I. Levine, an economist at the University of California at Berkeley. "Being born poor in the U.S. gives you disadvantages unlike anything in Western Europe and Japan and Canada."[21]

Three Decades of Getting Nowhere

Even people who have kept their middle-class status have been stuck in a rut. While the U.S. economy had growth cycles in the 1980s, 1990s, and 2000s, the average middle-class family made almost no headway. The rising tide did not lift all boats, or even most boats. That dichotomy, between the nation's growth and stagnant middle-class incomes, is captured in a few stark statistics:

- From 1948 to 1973, the productivity of all nonfarm U.S. workers grew by 96.8 percent and the hourly compensation of the average worker rose by 93.7 percent.[22] In short, as America enjoyed booming economic growth in the postwar period, middle-class workers got a solid share of the nation's gains in productivity.
- From 1973 to 2011, the productivity of the U.S. workforce rose 80.1 percent, but the wages of the average worker rose only 4.2 percent, and hourly compensation — wages plus benefits — rose only 10 percent.[23] So while productivity was rising close to 3 percent a year, hourly wages of the average worker, adjusted for inflation, were essentially flat, the same in 2011 as in 1978.[24] Three decades of getting nowhere.
- The living standards of middle-class Americans have fallen behind a dozen countries in Europe. Americans worked longer hours, often for lower pay and benefits, and made up the difference with the highest ratio of two-income households of any advanced economy.[25]

- Despite economic ups and downs since 1975, corporate profits have trended upward while workers' wages stagnated. In 2007, before the Great Recession, corporate profits garnered the largest share of national income since 1943, while the share of national income going to wages sank to its lowest level since 1929.[26]
- Gaping inequalities in wealth and income now characterize the U.S. economy. While the middle class stagnated, the ultra-rich (the top 0.01 percent) jumped from an annual average income of $4 million in 1979 to $24.3 million in 2006 — a 600 percent gain per family.[27] The super-rich (the top 1 percent) gained so much that they captured 23.4 percent of the national economic pie in 2007, more than 2½ times their share in 1979.[28]

Inequalities are inevitable under capitalism, but no other advanced economy has such a hyperconcentration of wealth. In fact, as we've seen, America looks far different from its own past. The contrast between America in the era of the New Economy and America in our earlier era of middle-class prosperity is stark. Business leaders contend the fault lies with technology and globalization, but as we've seen, other countries such as Germany enjoy more widely shared prosperity than the United States. . . .

Notes

1. Pam Scholl, interview, November 7, 2010.
2. Roy Wunsch, interviews, October 27 and November 7, 2010.
3. Mike Hughes, interview, June 23, 2010.
4. Ibid., June 28, 2010.
5. Pam Scholl, interview, June 23, 2010.
6. U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, "The Employment Situation, December 2001," January 7, 2002, http://www.bls.gov; U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, "The Employment Situation, September 2011," October 7, 2011, http://www.bls.gov. BLS figures show 132.2 million nonfarm jobs in 2001 vs. 131.3 million in September 2011.
7. Census Bureau, "Income, Poverty, and Health Insurance Coverage in the United States: 2010"; "Income Slides to 1996 Levels," The Wall Street Journal, September 4, 2011.
8. Isaacs, "Economic Mobility of Black and White Families," in Isaacs, Sawhill, and Haskins, Getting Ahead or Losing Ground: Economic Mobility in America (Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 2008), 71–80.
9. Census Bureau, "Income, Poverty, and Health Insurance Coverage in the United States: 2010."
10. "Soaring Poverty Casts Spotlight on 'Lost Decade,'" The New York Times, September 14, 2011.
11. E. S. Browning, "Oldest Baby Boomers Face Jobs Bust," The Wall Street Journal, December 19, 2011.
12. Isaacs, "Economic Mobility of Families Across Generations," in Isaacs, Sawhill, and Haskins, Getting Ahead, 19.
13. Isaacs, "International Comparisons of Economic Mobility," in Isaacs, Sawhill, and Haskins, Getting Ahead, 37–44.

14. Sawhill, "Trends in Intergenerational Mobility," in Isaacs, Sawhill, and Haskins, Getting Ahead, 9, italics added; Thomas DeLeire and Leonard M. Lopoo, "Family Structure and the Economic Mobility of Children," Pew Charitable Trusts, April 2010, http://www.economicmobility.org; Jason DeParle, "Harder for Americans to Rise from Economy's Lower Rungs," The New York Times, January 5, 2012.
15. Isaacs, "Economic Mobility of Families Across Generations," in Isaacs, Sawhill, and Haskins, Getting Ahead, 19.
16. Sean F. Reardon, "The Widening Academic Achievement Gap Between the Rich and the Poor: New Evidence and Possible Explanations," in Whither Opportunity? Rising Inequality, Schools, and Children's Life Chances (New York: Russell Sage Foundation, 2011); "Poor Dropping Further Behind Rich in School," The New York Times, February 10, 2012.
17. Martha J. Bailey and Susan M. Dynarski, "Gains and Gaps: Changing Inequality in U.S. College Entry and Completion," Working Paper 17633, National Bureau of Economic Research, December 2011, http://www.nber.org.
18. Study by Sabino Kornrich, Center for Advanced Studies, Juan March Institute, Madrid, and Frank F. Furstenberg, University of Pennsylvania, cited in "Poor Dropping Further Behind Rich in School," The New York Times, February 10, 2012.
19. Will Hutton, "Log Cabin to White House? Not Any More," The Observer, April 28, 2002, http://www.observer.co.uk/comment/story/0,6903,706484,00.html.
20. Bhashkar Mazumder, "Fortunate Sons: New Estimates of Intergenerational Mobility in the United States Using Social Security Earnings Data," for Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, July 6, 2004, published in The Review of Economics and Statistics 87, no. 2 (2005): 235–55.
21. Janny Scott and David Leonhardt, "Class in America: Shadowy Lines That Still Divide," The New York Times, May 15, 2005.
22. Lawrence Mishel, Joshua Bivens, and Heidi Shierholz, The State of Working America, 2012/2013 (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2012), figure 4U, "Hourly Compensation for Production/Non-Supervisory Workers and Total Economy Productivity, 1948–2011"; Mishel, emails, March 29 and April 9, 2012.
23. Ibid. The contrast is sharper when comparing productivity growth and hourly wages only in the private sector. Over this period, private sector productivity grew by 92.6 percent while the average hourly wage rose by only 4.2 percent. This difference is dampened when figures cover the overall economy, because that data includes government workers, whose productivity is assumed not to grow while their salaries rise.
24. Census Bureau, "Income, Poverty, and Health Insurance Coverage in the United States: 2010," September 2011.
25. Phillips, Wealth and Democracy, 112, 163.
26. Aviva Aron-Dine and Isaac Shapiro, "Share of National Income Going to Wages and Salaries at Record Low in 2006," Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, March 29, 2007, http://www.cbpp.org.
27. Study by Emmanuel Saez, University of California at Berkeley, cited in "It's the Inequality, Stupid," Mother Jones, March–April 2011, http://www.motherjones.com.
28. During recession, the share of the top 1 percent fell, but with recovery that share has been moving back up toward previous highs. Emmanuel Saez, "Striking It Richer: The Evolution of Top Incomes in the United States," Pathways Magazine, Stanford Center for the Study of Poverty and Inequality (Winter 2008), and updated version of same paper to include estimates for 2009 and 2010, March 7, 2012, http://elsa.berkeley.edu/~saez/saez-UStopincomes-2010.pdf. Also see Thomas Piketty and Emmanuel Saez, "Income Inequality in the United States, 1913–1998, updated," table A-3, "Top Fractiles Income Shares (Including Capital Gains) in the United States," http://elsa.berkeley.edu/~saez/TabFig2010.

(2012)

Questions

1. To illustrate his argument, Hedrick Smith uses the personal stories of two Americans, Pam Scholl and Mike Hughes, as well as statistical information. How effective is this strategy?
2. Smith quotes economist Isabel Sawhill, who states that America has become "a low-mobility country" compared with others (par. 27). Is this true? Do you find Smith's assessment convincing? What are the implications for the United States if Sawhill is correct?
3. In the section titled "Three Decades of Getting Nowhere," Smith offers five bulleted assertions backed by data and endnotes. Which do you find most surprising? Which is most alarming? Why?
4. If Smith's assessment of the American economy is accurate, what does it portend for the future of American society? Explain.
5. How do endnotes 23 and 28 differ from the others? Be specific as you explain. What is the overall rhetorical effect of Smith's notes?

from Pathways to the Middle Class
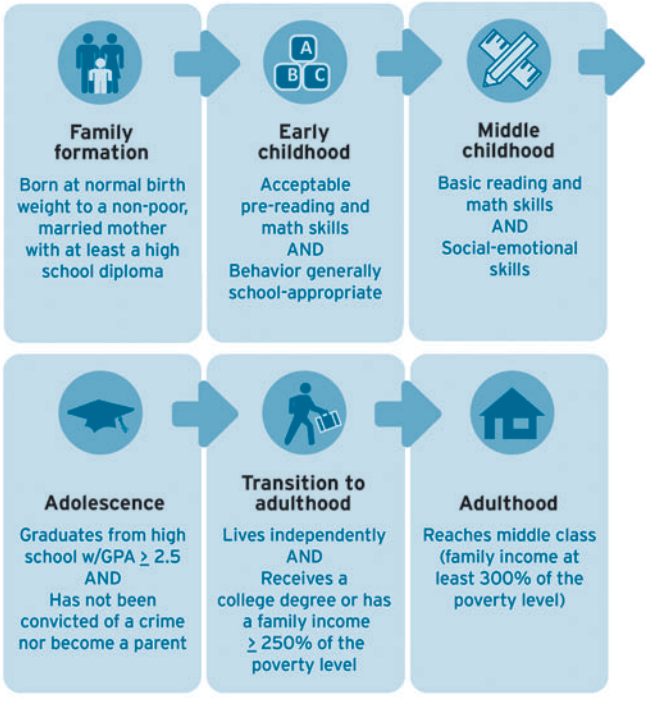
Balancing Personal and Public Responsibilities

Isabel V. Sawhill, Scott Winship, and Kerry Searle Grannis

Isabel V. Sawhill is codirector of the Center on Children and Families and the Budgeting for National Priorities Project at the Brookings Institution, a nonprofit public-policy organization based in Washington, D.C. Scott Winship is a fellow and research director at the Brookings Center's Social Genome Project. Kelly Searle Grannis is the associate director of the Social Genome Project. The following excerpt is from the 2012 Social Genome Project of the Brookings Institution.

Findings

- The majority (61%) of Americans achieve the American Dream by reaching the middle class by middle age, but there are large gaps by race, gender, and children's circumstances at birth.
- Success begets further success. Children who are successful at each life stage from early childhood to young adulthood are much more likely to achieve the American Dream.



Family formation
Born at normal birth weight to a non-poor, married mother with at least a high school diploma
Early childhood
Acceptable pre-reading and math skills AND Behavior generally school-appropriate Middle childhood
Basic reading and math skills AND Social-emotional skills
Adolescence
Graduates from high school w/GPA ≥ 2.5 AND Has not been convicted of a crime nor become a parent
Transition to adulthood
Lives independently AND Receives a college degree or has a family income ≥ 250% of the poverty level
Adulthood
Reaches middle class (family income at least 300% of the poverty level)

Figure 1

- Children from less advantaged families tend to fall behind at every stage. They are less likely to be ready for school at age 5 (59% vs 72%), to achieve core academic and social competencies at the end of elementary school (60% vs 77%), to graduate from high school with decent grades and no involvement with crime or teen pregnancy (41% vs 70%), and to graduate from college or achieve the equivalent income in their twenties (48% vs 70%).
- Racial gaps are large from the start and never narrow significantly, especially for African Americans, who trail by an average of 25 percentage points for the identified benchmarks.
- Girls travel through childhood doing better than boys only to find their prospects diminished during the adult years.
- The proportion of children who successfully navigate through adolescence is strikingly low: only 57%.
- For the small proportion of disadvantaged children who do succeed throughout school and early adulthood (17%), their chances of being middle class by middle age are almost as great as for their more advantaged peers (75% vs 83%).

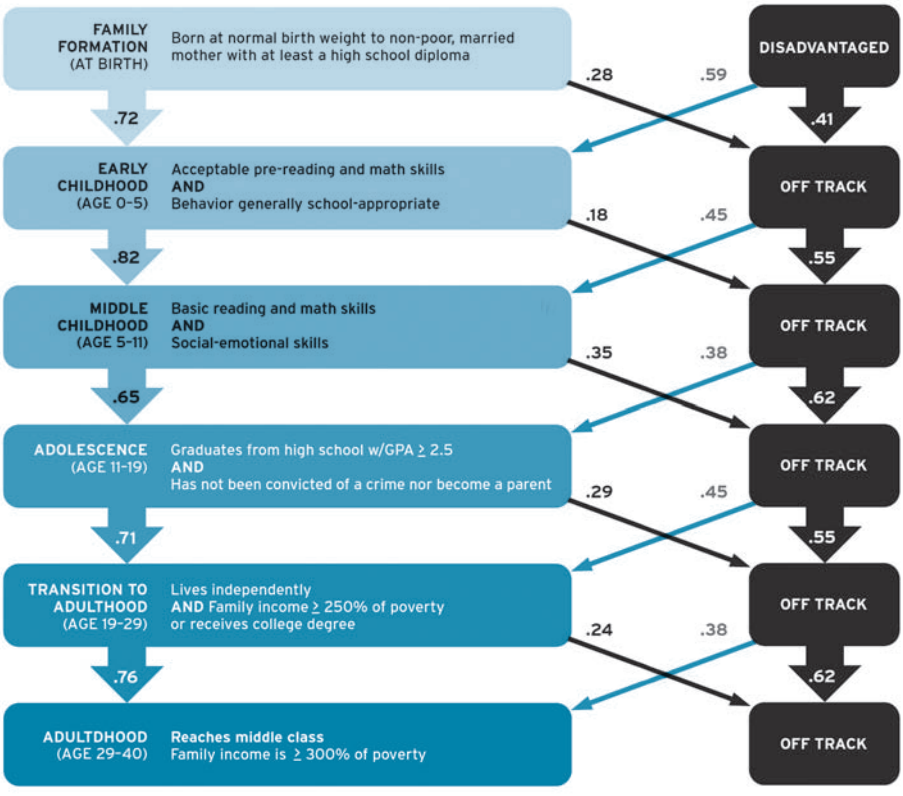

Figure 2

- Keeping less advantaged children on track at each and every life stage is the right strategy for building a stronger middle class. Early interventions may prevent the need for later ones. As the data . . . make abundantly clear, success is a cumulative process. One-time interventions may not be enough to keep less advantaged children on track.
- It's never too late to intervene — people who succeed in their twenties, despite earlier struggles, still have a good chance of making it to the middle class.

Recommendations

- Creating more opportunity will require a combination of greater personal responsibility and societal interventions that have proven effective at helping people climb the ladder. Neither alone is sufficient. Government does not raise children, parents do. But government can lend a helping hand.

- If one believes that good behavior and good policy must go hand in hand, programs should be designed to encourage personal responsibility and opportunity-enhancing behaviors.
- There are not just large, but widening gaps by socioeconomic status in family formation patterns, test scores, college-going, and adult earnings. These gaps should be addressed or the nation risks becoming increasingly divided over time.
- Budget cuts necessitated by the nation's fiscal condition should discriminate between more and less effective programs. The evidence now exists to make these discriminations. Some programs actually save taxpayer money.
- Too little attention has been given to ensuring that more children are born to parents who are ready to raise a child. Unplanned pregnancies, abortions, and unwed births are way too high and childbearing within marriage is no longer the norm for women in their twenties, except among the college-educated. Government has a role to play here, but culture is at least as important.
- As many have noted, a high-quality preschool experience for less advantaged children and reform of K–12 schooling could not be more important.
- Increasing the number of young people who enroll in college is important, but increasing the proportion who actually graduate is critical. Graduation rates have lagged enrollment. A major problem is poor earlier preparation. In addition, disparities in ability to afford the cost of college mean that even equally qualified students from low- and high-income families do not have the same college-going opportunities.

(2012)

Questions

1. Among the "Findings" that the authors report, how do the last three differ from the rest? Explain.
2. Which of the "Recommendations" seem most reasonable to you? Which are less so? Why?
3. The authors offer benchmarks for success in Figure 1. Which of them can we as a society most likely ensure? Which would be the most challenging? Do you agree that these would be benchmarks for success in the United States?
4. What does Figure 2 show about the chances for successful entry into the middle class for those who are disadvantaged as opposed to those with a good start in life? Which stage of development seems most crucial for determining the path a person will take? Why do you think this is so?
5. What implications does this chart suggest about the present state of the middle class in America? What implications does it suggest for citizens, educators, and policy makers? Explain.

Mutually Assured Consumption

SALLY EDELSTEIN

Sally Edelstein is an award-winning artist who uses collage "as a means of examining social fictions" by "dissociating the images from their original use to better reevaluate . . . [the] original message." The following collage appeared in 2012 as part of "Envisioning the American Dream," "a visual remix of the American Dream as pictured in mid-century media."

Collage by Sally Edelstein, sallyedelsteincollage.com.

Questions

1. Describe the consumer items you see in this picture. What does the presentation of items suggest about the time period depicted?
2. How would you describe the people depicted? Are they representative of the American population at the time? How does Sally Edelstein present them? What is her attitude toward them? Explain.

3. Describe what you see in the background. What is the effect of the juxtaposition of images in the foreground with those in the background? Why do you think Edelstein arranged this piece in this way?
4. This image could be viewed as either an advertisement for the splendid promise of the American Dream or a critique of American consumerism. Which do you see? Explain. What is the "social fiction" that Edelstein examines?
5. In his 1951 essay, "The Sociology of Stratification," sociologist C. Wright Mills based his definitions of social classes in America on the "chances to gain the things and experiences that are generally valued, whatever they may be: things like cars, money, toys, houses, etc.; experiences, like being given respect, being educated to certain levels, being treated kindly, etc." What does Mills suggest about American values? How might Edelstein regard Mills's statement? What might Mills say, looking at Edelstein's collage?

Making Connections

1. The Horatio Alger myth is referred to by both Harlon L. Dalton (p. 1497) and Paul Krugman (p. 1505). What does each of these selections say about the Horatio Alger myth? Why does the myth persist in America? To what American beliefs and values does it appeal?
2. Alan Brinkley (p. 1510) writes that, in the 1950s, "material abundance became one of the ways in which many, probably most, Americans defined their world" (par. 6). What does Sally Edelstein's collage (p. 1525) suggest about Brinkley's remark? Would she agree?
3. What are some of the implications that go beyond economics in the pieces by Krugman and by Isabel V. Sawhill, Scott Winship, and Kerry Searle Grannis (p. 1521)?
4. How effectively does the use of statistics support the positions of Holly Sklar (p. 1503), Thomas Sowell (p. 1508), and Hedrick Smith (p. 1514)?
5. What perspectives regarding "meritocracy" do we find in the article by Dalton and the study by Sawhill, Winship, and Grannis? Which do you find more persuasive? Explain.
6. Which of the selections portrays a middle class in contemporary America that most resembles the one described by Brinkley? Which describes a middle class least like the one described by Brinkley? Explain.

Entering the Conversation

As you respond to each of the following prompts, support your position with appropriate evidence, including at least three sources in this Conversation on the American middle class, unless otherwise indicated.

1. Sawhill, Winship, and Grannis in 2012 conclude "Pathways to the Middle Class" by saying:

> In previous research, Haskins and Sawhill found that if individuals graduate from high school, work full-time, and wait until they're married and over 21 to become parents, they have a very good chance of joining the middle class. These data have been cited by Senator Rick Santorum and also by Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney as showing that individuals who work hard, avoid pitfalls, and make responsible choices greatly improve their odds of success. We would add that children from less advantaged backgrounds often see little reason to make these responsible choices, given the environments in which they live and the opportunities that are available to them. Indeed, by the time children can be reasonably held accountable for their choices, many are already behind because of choices their parents made for them. And of course, as the Great Recession has shown, working full-time is only partly a choice. Putting the full responsibility on government to close these gaps is unreasonable, but so is a heroic assumption that everyone can be a Horatio Alger with no help from society.

   Does the Horatio Alger myth continue to live? Is it obsolete? Write an essay that examines the extent to which the Horatio Alger myth is still viable today.

2. Several writers in this Conversation discuss the growing gap between the upper and middle classes in America. Has the gap continued to widen since the pieces were written? Have our economy and our democracy been weakened? Is the American Dream a thing of the past? In an essay, answer the following question: Is the American middle class in decline?

3. In his 2012 book, The Great Divergence, Timothy Noah asks, "Why do Americans tolerate this troubling state of affairs?" He answers, "The biggest likely reason is our enduring belief in upward mobility. Economic inequality is less troubling if you live in a country where any child, no matter how humble his or her origins, can grow up to be president. This idea lies at the heart of American exceptionalism. It defines the American Dream." Write an essay that explores this reflection on dreams, belief, and reality in America.

4. Write an essay that defends, challenges, or qualifies the following statement: The United States of America is a classless society.

5. Each of the following quotations presents a whimsical observation about money, success, or class. Which one appeals to you? Which one relates best to the readings in this Conversation? Using one of the quotations as an epigraph, write an essay about one or more of those topics.

> Early to bed and early to rise makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise.
>
> — Benjamin Franklin

> Formula for success: rise early, work hard, strike oil. — J. Paul Getty

I'd like to live as a poor man with lots of money. — Pablo Picasso

I am opposed to millionaires, but it would be dangerous to offer me the position. — Mark Twain

Conversation

America's Romance with the Automobile

The invention of the automobile has probably had the most long-reaching effects of any technological advance in American history. The earliest cars were electric, often playthings of the rich, but advances in internal combustion engines made the car more powerful, less expensive, and quicker to refuel than its battery-powered competition. The mass production of automobiles by companies like Oldsmobile and Ford enabled the middle class to become car owners, which in turn freed them from the need to live near rail stations. As long as there were roads, they could live anywhere. And so began America's romance with the car, which parallels, to a large degree, the birth of suburbia.

In 1956, President Dwight D. Eisenhower signed into law the National Interstate and Defense Highways Act, which authorized $25 billion for the construction of 41,000 miles of the interstate highway system. Meant to eliminate unsafe and inefficient routes, as well as traffic jams, the interstate system was also developed to provide evacuation routes in case of nuclear attack. Most Americans supported the act, which was paid for largely by taxes on gasoline. There was some backlash, as the new highways threatened neighborhoods, and some cities, like San Francisco, put the brakes on their construction. Nevertheless, most of the highways were built, and the second half of the twentieth century was the high point of America's "automobile society."

Since its earliest days, the automobile has been viewed as a threat and as a blessing. Both romanticized and demonized in popular and high culture alike, it is a curse on the environment and a boon to personal freedom. It represents economic opportunity at the same time that it hinders it. It is considered both an equalizer and a creator of class difference. Today, we are questioning the automobile's place in American life, as we begin to feel the impact of urban congestion and suburban sprawl. Can America's love affair with the car be rekindled? Can the problems of our car culture be solved? Will virtual mobility ever take the place of actual mobility? The following ten selections ask you to ponder these questions and more, as you consider whether America's long love affair with the automobile is finally over.

Sources

Ohio Electric Car Company, The Ohio Electric (1916)
E. B. White, Farewell, My Lovely! (1936)
John Updike, from Rabbit, Run (1960)
Tom Wolfe, from The Kandy-Kolored Tangerine-Flake Streamline Baby (1963)
Stephen Dunn, The Sacred (1989)
Heather McHugh, Auto (1994)
Pew Research Center, Americans and Their Cars: Is the Romance on the Skids? (2006)
P. J. O'Rourke, The End of the Affair (2009)
Allison Linn, Carmakers' Next Problem: Generation Y (2010)
Frank DeFord, Americans Hit the Brakes on NASCAR (2012)

The Ohio Electric

Ohio Electric Car Company

This 1916 ad appeared in Literary Digest, a general-interest magazine that circulated between 1890 and 1938 and was known for its large and upscale readership.

The Ohio Electric
SATISFYING every sense of physical comfort, mental ease and artistic appreciation, driving an Ohio Electric brings to the fortunate owner a vivid realization of the real luxury of motion.
No other car can fill its place; it may even be said that no other car, today, attempts to do so.
This season's models surpass all previous Ohio achievements. See them at the nearest Ohio distributors—or write for literature.
The Ohio Electric Car Company
Toledo, Ohio
Chicago Branch, 2634 Michigan Ave.
OHIO

Questions

1. Who is the audience for this ad? What assumptions does the Ohio Electric Car Company and its advertising agency make about the audience?
2. What visual elements set the tone for this advertisement? Consider the frame of the ad, the figures in it, even the direction in which the characters are looking. What messages does the art convey?
3. With electric cars perpetually on the verge of a revival, consider how they would be marketed today. Do you think any aspect of this ad would be evoked today? Explain your answer.

Farewell, My Lovely!

E. B. White

E. B. White (1899–1985) was an editor, an essayist, and a writer of children's books who lived in New York and Maine. He is best known for his essay "Once More to the Lake," his children's books Stuart Little (1945) and Charlotte's Web (1952), and his revision of William Strunk Jr.'s The Elements of Style (1959). Published in the New Yorker in May 1936, "Farewell, My Lovely!" was one of the hundreds of pieces White wrote for the magazine in the six decades he worked there.

I see by the new Sears Roebuck catalogue that it is still possible to buy an axle for a 1909 Model T Ford, but I am not deceived. The great days have faded, the end is in sight. Only one page in the current catalogue is devoted to parts and accessories for the Model T; yet everyone remembers springtimes when the Ford gadget section was larger than men's clothing, almost as large as household furnishings. The last Model T was built in 1927, and the car is fading from what scholars call the American scene — which is an understatement, because to a few million people who grew up with it, the old Ford practically was the American scene.

It was the miracle God had wrought. And it was patently the sort of thing that could only happen once. Mechanically uncanny, it was like nothing that had ever come to the world before. Flourishing industries rose and fell with it. As a vehicle, it was hard-working, commonplace, heroic; and it often seemed to transmit those qualities to the persons who rode in it. My own generation identifies it with Youth, with its gaudy, irretrievable excitements; before it fades into the mist, I would like to pay it the tribute of the sigh that is not a sob, and set down random entries in a shape somewhat less cumbersome than a Sears Roebuck catalogue.

The Model T was distinguished from all other makes of cars by the fact that its transmission was of a type known as planetary — which was half metaphysics, half sheer friction. Engineers accepted the word "planetary" in its epicyclic sense, but I was always conscious that it also meant "wandering," "erratic." Because of the peculiar nature of this planetary element, there was always, in Model T, a certain dull rapport between engine and wheels, and even when the car was in a state known as neutral, it trembled with a deep imperative and tended to inch forward. There was never a moment when the bands were not faintly egging the machine on. In this respect it was like a horse, rolling the bit on its tongue, and country people brought to it the same technique they used with draft animals.

Its most remarkable quality was its rate of acceleration. In its palmy days the Model T could take off faster than anything on the road. The reason was simple. To get under way, you simply hooked the third finger of the right hand around a lever on the steering column, pulled down hard, and shoved your left foot forcibly against the low-speed pedal. These were simple, positive motions; the car responded by lunging forward with a roar. After a few seconds of this turmoil, you took your toe off the pedal, eased up a mite on the throttle, and the car, possessed of only two forward speeds, catapulted directly into high with a series of ugly jerks and was off on its glorious errand. The abruptness of this departure was never equalled in other cars of the period. The human leg was (and still is) incapable of letting in a clutch with anything like the forthright abandon that used to send Model T on its way. Letting in a clutch is a negative, hesitant motion, depending on delicate nervous control; pushing down the Ford pedal was a simple, country motion — an expansive act, which came as natural as kicking an old door to make it budge.

The driver of the old Model T was a man enthroned. The car, with top up, stood 5 seven feet high. The driver sat on top of the gas tank, brooding it with his own body. When he wanted gasoline, he alighted, along with everything else in the front seat; the seat was pulled off, the metal cap unscrewed, and a wooden stick thrust down to sound the liquid in the well. There were always a couple of these sounding sticks kicking around in the ratty sub-cushion regions of a flivver. Refuelling was more of a social function then, because the driver had to unbend, whether he wanted to or not. Directly in front of the driver was the windshield — high, uncompromisingly erect. Nobody talked about air resistance, and the four cylinders pushed the car through the atmosphere with a simple disregard of physical law.

There was this about a Model T: the purchaser never regarded his purchase as a complete, finished product. When you bought a Ford, you figured you had a start — a vibrant, spirited framework to which could be screwed an almost limitless assortment of decorative and functional hardware. Driving away from the agency, hugging the new wheel between your knees, you were already full of creative worry. A Ford was born naked as a baby, and a flourishing industry grew up out of correcting its rare deficiencies and combatting its fascinating diseases. Those were the great days of lily-painting. I have been looking at some old Sears Roebuck catalogues, and they bring everything back so clear.

First you bought a Ruby Safety Reflector for the rear, so that your posterior would glow in another car's brilliance. Then you invested thirty-nine cents in some radiator Moto Wings, a popular ornament which gave the Pegasus touch to the machine and did something godlike to the owner. For nine cents you bought a fan-belt guide to keep the belt from slipping off the pulley.

You bought a radiator compound to stop leaks. This was as much a part of everybody's equipment as aspirin tablets are of a medicine cabinet. You bought special oil to prevent chattering, a clamp-on dash light, a patching outfit, a tool box which you bolted to the running board, a sun visor, a steering-column brace to keep the column rigid, and a set of emergency containers for gas, oil, and water — three thin, disc-like cans which reposed in a case on the running board during long, important journeys — red for gas, gray for water, green for oil. It was only a beginning. After the car was about a year old, steps were taken to check the alarming disintegration. (Model T was full of tumors, but they were benign.) A set of anti-rattlers (98c) was a popular panacea. You hooked them on to the gas and spark rods, to the brake pull rod, and to the steering-rod connections. Hood silencers, of black rubber, were applied to the fluttering hood. Shock-absorbers and snubbers gave "complete relaxation." Some people bought rubber pedal pads, to fit over the standard metal pedals. (I didn't like these, I remember.) Persons of a suspicious or pugnacious turn of mind bought a rear-view mirror; but most Model T owners weren't worried by what was coming from behind because they would soon enough see it out in front. They rode in a state of cheerful catalepsy. Quite a large mutinous clique among Ford owners went over to a foot accelerator (you could buy one and screw it to the floor board), but there was a certain madness in these people, because the Model T, just as she stood, had a choice of three foot pedals to push, and there were plenty of moments when both feet were occupied in the routine performance of duty and when the only way to speed up the engine was with the hand throttle.

Gadget bred gadget. Owners not only bought ready-made gadgets, they invented gadgets to meet special needs. I myself drove my car directly from the agency to the blacksmith's, and had the smith affix two enormous iron brackets to the port running board to support an army trunk.

People who owned closed models builded along different lines: they bought ball 10 grip handles for opening doors, window anti-rattlers, and de-luxe flower vases of the cut-glass anti-splash type. People with delicate sensibilities garnished their car with a device called the Donna Lee Automobile Disseminator — a porous vase guaranteed, according to Sears, to fill the car with a "faint clean odor of lavender." The gap between open cars and closed cars was not as great then as it is now: for $11.95, Sears Roebuck converted your touring car into a sedan and you went forth renewed. One agreeable quality of the old Fords was that they had no bumpers, and their fenders softened and wilted with the years and permitted driver to squeeze in and out of tight places.

Tires were 30 × 3½, cost about twelve dollars, and punctured readily. Everybody carried a Jiffy patching set, with a nutmeg grater to roughen the tube before the goo was spread on. Everybody was capable of putting on a patch, expected to have to, and did have to.

During my association with Model T's, self-starters were not a prevalent accessory. They were expensive and under suspicion. Your car came equipped with a serviceable crank, and the first thing you learned was how to Get Results. It was a special trick, and until you learned it (usually from another Ford owner, but sometimes by a period of appalling experimentation) you might as well have been winding up an awning. The trick was to leave the ignition switch off, proceed to the animal's head, pull the choke (which was a little wire protruding through the radiator), and give the crank two or three nonchalant upward lifts. Then, whistling as though thinking about something else, you would saunter back to the driver's cabin, turn the ignition on, return to the crank, and this time, catching it on the down stroke, give it a quick spin with plenty of That. If this procedure was followed, the engine almost always responded — first with a few scattered explosions, then with a tumultuous gunfire, which you checked by racing around to the driver's seat and retarding the throttle. Often, if the emergency brake hadn't been pulled all the way back, the car advanced on you the instant the first explosion occurred and you would hold it back by leaning your weight against it. I can still feel my old Ford nuzzling me at the curb, as though looking for an apple in my pocket.

In zero weather, ordinary cranking became an impossibility, except for giants. The oil thickened, and it became necessary to jack up the rear wheels, which, for some planetary reason, eased the throw.

The lore and legend that governed the Ford were boundless. Owners had their own theories about everything; they discussed mutual problems in that wise, infinitely resourceful way old women discuss rheumatism. Exact knowledge was pretty scarce, and often proved less effective than superstition. Dropping a camphor ball into the gas tank was a popular expedient; it seemed to have a tonic effect on both man and machine. There wasn't much to base exact knowledge on. The Ford driver flew blind. He didn't know the temperature of his engine, the speed of his car, the amount of his fuel or the pressure of his oil (the old Ford lubricated itself by what was amiably described as the "splash system"). A speedometer cost money and was an extra, like a windshield-wiper. The dashboard of the early models was bare save for an ignition key; later models, grown effete, boasted an ammeter which pulsated alarmingly with the throbbing of the car. Under the dash was a box of coils, with vibrators which you adjusted, or thought you adjusted. Whatever the driver learned of his motor, he learned not through instruments but through sudden developments. I remember that the timer was one of the vital organs about which there was ample doctrine. When everything else had been checked, you "had a look" at the timer. It was an extravagantly odd little device, simple in construction, mysterious in function. It contained a roller, held by a spring, and there were four contact points on the inside of the case against which, many people believed, the roller rolled. I have had a timer apart on a sick Ford many times, but I never really knew what I was up to — I was just showing off before God. There were almost as many schools of thought as there were timers. Some people, when things went wrong, just clenched their teeth and gave the timer a smart crack with a wrench. Other people opened it up and blew on it. There was a school that held that the timer needed large amounts of oil; they fixed it by frequent baptism. And there was a school that was positive it was meant to run dry as a bone; these people were continually taking it off and wiping it. I remember once spitting into a timer; not in anger, but in a spirit of research. You see, the Model T driver moved in the realm of metaphysics. He believed his car could be hexed.

One reason the Ford anatomy was never reduced to an exact science was that, having "fixed" it, the owner couldn't honestly claim that the treatment had brought about the cure. There were too many authenticated cases of Fords fixing themselves — restored naturally to health after a short rest. Farmers soon discovered this, and it fitted nicely with their draft-horse philosophy: "Let 'er cool off and she'll snap into it again." 15

A Ford owner had Number One Bearing constantly in mind. This bearing, being at the front end of the motor, was the one that always burned out, because the oil didn't reach it when the car was climbing hills. (That's what I was always told, anyway.) The oil used to recede and leave Number One dry as a clam flat; you had to watch that bearing like a hawk. It was like a weak heart — you could hear it start knocking, and that was when you stopped and let her cool off. Try as you would to keep the oil supply right, in the end Number One always went out. "Number One Bearing burned out on me and I had to have her replaced," you would say, wisely; and your companions always had a lot to tell about how to protect and pamper Number One to keep her alive.

Sprinkled not too liberally among the millions of amateur witch doctors who drove Fords and applied their own abominable cures were the heaven-sent mechanics who could really make the car talk. These professionals turned up in undreamed-of spots. One time, on the banks of the Columbia River in Washington, I heard the rear end go out of my Model T when I was trying to whip it up a steep incline onto the deck of a ferry. Something snapped; the car slid backward into the mud. It seemed to me like the end of the trail. But the captain of the ferry, observing the withered remnant, spoke up.

"What's got her?" he asked.

"I guess it's the rear end," I replied, listlessly. The captain leaned over the rail and stared. Then I saw that there was a hunger in his eyes that set him off from other men.

"'Tell you what," he said, carelessly, trying to cover up his eagerness, "let's pull the son of a bitch up onto the boat, and I'll help you fix her while we're going back and forth on the river." 20

We did just this. All that day I plied between the towns of Pasco and Kennewick, while the skipper (who had once worked in a Ford garage) directed the amazing work of resetting the bones of my car.

Springtime in the heyday of the Model T was a delirious season. Owning a car was still a major excitement, roads were still wonderful and bad. The Fords were obviously conceived in madness: any car which was capable of going from forward into reverse without any perceptible mechanical hiatus was bound to be a mighty challenging thing to the human imagination. Boys used to veer them off the highway into a level pasture and run wild with them, as though they were cutting up with a girl. Most everybody used the reverse pedal quite as much as the regular foot brake — it distributed the wear over the bands and wore them all down evenly. That was the big trick, to wear all the bands down evenly, so that the final chattering would be total and the whole unit scream for renewal.

The days were golden, the nights were dim and strange. I still recall with trembling those loud, nocturnal crises when you drew up to a signpost and raced the engine so the lights would be bright enough to read destinations by. I have never been really planetary since. I suppose it's time to say goodbye. Farewell, my lovely!

(1936)

Questions

1. What do you think is the purpose of "Farewell, My Lovely!"? Who is its audience? Describe the tone and explain how it helps E. B. White achieve his purpose.
2. Why do you think White says, "The great days have faded, the end is in sight" (par. 1)? How does the rest of the essay support the idea of great days having faded? Are there ways in which White might also be happy to see them go?
3. What statement is White making about the American relationship with the automobile? Find examples of White's language that suggest mixed feelings.

from Rabbit, Run

John Updike

John Updike (1932–2009) grew up in Philadelphia and attended Harvard University on a full scholarship, graduating summa cum laude and serving as president of the Harvard Lampoon. He is known for his careful craftsmanship and for writing about the world of the Protestant middle class. The first novel in Updike's Rabbit series, Rabbit, Run (1960), tells the story of the early years of former high-school basketball star Harry (Rabbit) Angstrom's marriage to Janice Stringer. In this excerpt, Harry has taken off, looking, as always, for something more — a longing he can never quite fulfill.

The rich earth seems to cast its darkness upward into the air. The farm country is somber at night. He is grateful when the lights of Lancaster merge with his dim beams. He stops at a diner whose clock says 8:04. He hadn't intended to eat until he got out of the state. He takes a map from the rack by the door and while eating two hamburgers at the counter studies his position. He is in Lancaster, surrounded by funny names, Bird in Hand, Paradise, Intercourse, Mt. Airy, Mascot. They probably didn't seem funny if you lived in them. Like Mt. Judge. You get used. A town has to be called something.

Bird in Hand, Paradise: his eyes keep going back to this dainty lettering on the map. He has an impulse, amid the oil-filmed shimmer of this synthetic and desultory diner, to drive there. Little plump women, toy dogs in the street, candy houses in lemon sunshine.

But no, his goal is the white sun of the south like a great big pillow in the sky. And from the map he's been travelling more west than south; if the dirtdigger back there had had a map he could have gone due south on 10. Now the only thing to do is go into the heart of Lancaster and take 222 out and take it all the way down into Maryland and then catch 1. He remembers reading in the Saturday Evening Post how 1 goes from Florida to Maine through the most beautiful scenery in the world. He asks for a glass of milk and to go with it a piece of apple pie; the crust is crisp and bubbled and they've had the sense to use cinnamon. His mother's pies always had cinnamon. He pays by cracking a ten and goes out into the parking lot feeling pleased. The hamburgers had been fatter and warmer than the ones you get in Brewer, and the buns had seemed steamed. Things are better already.

It takes him a half-hour to pick his way through Lancaster. On 222 he drives south through Refton, Hessdale, New Providence, and Quarryville, through Mechanics Grove and Unicorn and then a long stretch so dull and unmarked he doesn't know he's entered Maryland until he hits Oakwood. On the radio he hears "No Other Arms, No Other Lips," "Stagger Lee," a commercial for Rayco Clear Plastic Seat Covers, "If I Didn't Care" by Connie Francis, a commercial for Radio-Controlled Garage Door Operators, "I Ran All the Way Home Just to Say I'm Sorry," "That Old Feeling" by Mel Torme, a commercial for Big Screen Westinghouse TV Set with One-finger Automatic Tuning, "needle-sharp pictures a nose away from the screen," "The Italian Cowboy Song," "Yep" by Duane Eddy, a commercial for Papermate Pens, "Almost Grown," a commercial for Tame Cream Rinse, "Let's Stroll," news (President Eisenhower and Prime Minister Harold Macmillan begin a series of talks in Gettysburg, Tibetans battle Chinese Communists in Lhasa, the whereabouts of the Dalai Lama, spiritual ruler of this remote and backward land, are unknown, a $250,000 trust fund has been left to a Park Avenue maid, Spring scheduled to arrive tomorrow), sports news (Yanks over Braves in Miami, somebody tied with somebody in St. Petersburg Open, scores in a local basketball tournament), weather (fair and seasonably warm), "The Happy Organ," "Turn Me Loose," a commercial for Schuylkill Life Insurance, "Rocksville, P-A" (Rabbit loves it), "A Picture No Artist Could Paint," a commercial for New Formula Barbasol Presto-Lather, whose daily cleansing action tends to prevent skin blemishes and emulsifies something, "Pink Shoe Laces" by Dody Stevens, a word about a little boy called Billy Tessman who was hit by a car and would appreciate cards or letters, "Petit Fleur," "Fungo" (great), a commercial for Wool-Tex All-Wool Suits, "Fall Out" by Henry Mancini, "Everybody Likes to Do the Cha Cha Cha," a commercial for Lord's Grace Table Napkins and the gorgeous Last Supper Tablecloth, "The Beat of My Heart," a commercial for Speed-Shine Wax and Lanolin Clay, "Venus," and then the same news again. Where is the Dalai Lama?

Shortly after Oakwood he comes to Route 1, which with its hot-dog stands and Calso signs and roadside taverns aping log cabins is unexpectedly discouraging. The farther he drives the more he feels some great confused system, Baltimore now instead of Philadelphia, reaching for him. He stops at a gas station for two dollars' worth of regular. What he really wants is another map. He unfolds it standing by a Coke machine and reads it in the light coming through a window stained green by stacked cans of liquid wax. 5

His problem is to get west and free of Baltimore-Washington, which like a two-headed dog guards the coastal route to the south. He doesn't want to go down along the water anyway; his image is of himself going right down the middle, right into the broad soft belly of the land, surprising the dawn cottonfields with his northern plates.

Now he is somewhere here. Further on, then, a road numbered 23 will go off to his left — no, his right. That goes up and over and back into Pennsylvania but at this place, Shawsville, he can take a little narrow blue road without a number. Then go down a little and over again on 137. There is a ragged curve then that this road makes with 482 and then 31. Rabbit can feel himself swinging up and through that curve into the red line numbered 26 and down that into another numbered 340. Red, too; he is really gliding and suddenly sees where he wants to go. Over on the left three red roads stream parallel northeast to southwest; Rabbit can just feel them sliding down through the valleys of the Appalachians. Get on one of them it would be a chute dumping you into sweet low cottonland in the morning. Yes. Once he gets on that he can shake all thoughts of the mess behind him.

(1960)

Questions

1. You might notice that John Updike writes in the present tense. What mood does it create in this excerpt?
2. How does home keep a hold on Rabbit? In what ways does he feel as if he's escaped?
3. What is the effect of paragraph 4, which is, essentially, a list of everything Rabbit hears on the car radio?
4. In what ways might Rabbit's journey help him find what he's looking for? Are there hints that the answers he is looking for are out of reach?
5. How does this excerpt illustrate Americans' relationship with the automobile in the early 1960s?

from The Kandy-Kolored Tangerine-Flake Streamline Baby

Tom Wolfe

Tom Wolfe was born in Richmond, Virginia, in 1935. He studied at Washington and Lee University and Yale and worked as a newspaper reporter for many years. Wolfe is considered one of the most influential of the New Journalists, writers who use the tools of fiction in journalism. Adapted from an essay that first appeared in Esquire magazine in 1963 and then became the title piece of Wolfe's first collection of articles and essays, this selection takes a look at the world of custom cars.

The first good look I had at customized cars was at an event called a "Teen Fair," held in Burbank, a suburb of Los Angeles beyond Hollywood. This was a wild place to be taking a look at art objects — eventually, I should say, you have to reach the conclusion that these customized cars are art objects, at least if you use the standards applied in a civilized society. But I will get to that in a moment. Anyway, about noon you drive up to a place that looks like an outdoor amusement park, and there are three serious-looking kids, like the cafeteria committee in high school, taking tickets, but the scene inside is quite mad. Inside, two things hit you. The first is a huge platform a good seven feet off the ground with a hully-gully band — everything is electrified, the bass, the guitars, the saxophones — and then behind the band, on the platform, about two hundred kids are doing frantic dances called the hully-gully, the bird, and the shampoo. As I said, it's noontime. The dances the kids are doing are very jerky. The boys and girls don't touch, not even with their hands. They just ricochet around. Then you notice that all the girls are dressed exactly alike. They have bouffant hairdos — all of them — and slacks that are, well, skin-tight does not get the idea across; it's more the conformation than how tight the slacks are. It's as if some lecherous old tailor with a gluteus-maximus fixation designed them, striation by striation. About the time you've managed to focus on this, you notice that out in the middle of the park is a huge, perfectly round swimming pool: really rather enormous. And there is a Chris-Craft cabin cruiser in the pool, going around and around, sending up big waves, with more of these bouffant babies bunched in the back of it. In the water, suspended like plankton, are kids in scuba-diving outfits: others are tooling around underwater, breathing through a snorkel. And all over the place are booths, put up by shoe companies and guitar companies and God knows who else, and there are kids dancing in all of them — dancing the bird, the hully-gully, and the shampoo — with the music of the hully-gully hand piped all over the park through loudspeakers.

All this time, Tex Smith, from Hot Rod Magazine, who brought me over to the place, is trying to lead me to the customized-car exhibit — "Tom, I want you to see this car that Bill Cushenberry built, The Silhouette" — which is to say, here are two hundred kids ricocheting over a platform at high noon, and a speedy little boat barreling around and around and around in a round swimming pool, and I seem to be the only person who is distracted. The customized-car exhibit turns out to be the Ford Custom Car Caravan, which Ford is sending all over the country. At first, with the noise and peripheral motion and the inchoate leching you are liable to be doing, what with bouffant nymphets rocketing all over the place, these customized cars do not strike you as anything very special. Obviously they are very special, but the first thing you think of is the usual — you know, that the kids who own these cars are probably skinny little hoods who wear T shirts and carry their cigarette packs by winding them around in the T shirt up near the shoulder.

But after a while, I was glad I had seen the cars in this natural setting, which was, after all, a kind of Plato's Republic for teen-agers. Because if you watched anything at this fair very long, you kept noticing the same thing. These kids are absolutely maniacal about form. They are practically religious about it. For example, the dancers: none of them ever smiled. They stared at each other's legs and feet, concentrating. The dances had no grace about them at all, they were more in the nature of a hoedown, but everybody was concentrating to do them exactly right. And the bouffant kids all had form, wild form, but form with rigid standards, one gathers. Even the boys. Their dress was prosaic — Levi's, Slim Jims, sport shirts, T shirts, polo shirts — but the form was consistent: a stove-pipe silhouette. And they all had the same hairstyle: some wore it long, some short, but none of them had a part; all that hair was brushed back straight from the hairline. I went by one of the guitar booths, and there was a little kid in there, about thirteen, playing the hell out of an electric guitar. The kid was named Cranston something or other. He looked like he ought to be named Kermet or Herschel; all his genes were kind of horribly Okie. Cranston was playing away and a big crowd was watching. But Cranston was slouched back with his spine bent like a sapling up against a table, looking gloriously bored. At thirteen, this kid was being fanatically cool. They all were. They were all wonderful slaves to form. They have created their own style of life, and they are much more authoritarian about enforcing it than are adults. Not only that, but today these kids — especially in California — have money, which, needless to say, is why all these shoe merchants and guitar sellers and the Ford Motor Company were at a Teen Fair in the first place. I don't mind observing that it is this same combination — money plus slavish devotion to form — that accounts for Versailles or St. Mark's Square. Naturally, most of the artifacts that these kids' money-plus-form produce are of a pretty ghastly order. But so was most of the paraphernalia that developed in England during the Regency. I mean, most of it was on the order of starched cravats. A man could walk into Beau Brummel's house at 11 A.M., and here would come the butler with a tray of wilted linen. "These were some of our failures," he confides. But then Brummel comes downstairs wearing one perfect starched cravat. Like one perfect iris, the flower of Mayfair civilization. But the Regency period did see some tremendous formal architecture. And the kids' formal society has also brought at least one substantial thing to a formal development of a high order — the customized cars. I don't have to dwell on the point that cars mean more to these kids than architecture did in Europe's great formal century, say, 1750 to 1850. They are freedom, style, sex, power, motion, color — everything is right there.

Things have been going on in the development of the kids' formal attitude toward cars since 1945, things of great sophistication that adults have not been even remotely aware of, mainly because the kids are so inarticulate about it, especially the ones most hipped on the subject. They are not from the levels of society that produce children who write sensitive analytical prose at age seventeen, or if they do, they soon fall into the hands of English instructors who put them onto Hemingway or a lot of goddamn-and-hungry-breast writers. If they ever write about a highway again, it's a rain-slicked highway and the sound of the automobiles passing over it is like the sound of tearing silk, not that one household in ten thousand has heard the sound of tearing silk since 1945.

Anyway, we are back at the Teen Fair and I am talking to Tex Smith and to Don 5 Beebe, a portly young guy with a white sport shirt and Cuban sunglasses. As they tell me about the Ford Custom Car Caravan, I can see that Ford has begun to comprehend this teen-age style of life and its potential. The way Ford appears to figure it is this: Thousands of kids are getting hold of cars and either hopping them up for speed or customizing them to some extent, usually a little of both. Before they get married they pour all their money into this. If Ford can get them hooked on Fords now, after the kids are married they'll buy new Fords. Even the kids who aren't full-time car nuts themselves will be influenced by which car is considered "boss." They use that word a lot, "boss." The kids used to consider Ford the hot car, but then, from 1955 to 1962, Chevrolet became the favorite. They had big engines and were easy to hop up, the styling was simple, and the kids could customize them easily. In 1959, and more so in 1960, Plymouth became a hot car, too. In 1961 and 1962, it was all Chevrolet and Plymouth. Now Ford is making a big push. A lot of the professional hot-rod and custom-car people, adults, will tell you that now Ford is the hot car, but you have to discount some of it, because Ford is laying money on everybody right and left, in one form or another. In the Custom Car Caravan, all the cars have been fashioned out of Ford bodies except the ones that are completely handmade, like the aforementioned Silhouette.

Anyway, Don Beebe is saying, over a loudspeaker, "I hate to break up that dancing, but let's have a little drag racing." He has a phonograph hooked up to the loudspeaker, and he puts on a record, produced by Riverside Records, of drag-strip sounds, mainly dragsters blasting off and squealing from the starting line. Well, he doesn't really break up the dancing, but a hundred kids come over, when they hear the drag-strip sounds, to where Beebe has a slot-racing stand. Slot racing is a model-train-type game in which two model drag racers, each about five inches long, powered by electricity, run down a model drag strip. Beebe takes a microphone and announces that Dick Dale, the singer, is here, and anybody who will race Dick at the slot-racing stand will get one of his records. Dick Dale is pretty popular among the kids out here because he sings a lot of "surfing" songs. The surfers — surfboard riders — are a cult much admired by all the kids. They have their own argot, with adjectives like "hang ten," meaning the best there is. They also go in for one particular brand of customizing: they take old wood-bodied station wagons, which they call "woodies," and fix them up for riding, sleeping and hauling surfing equipment for their weekends at the beach. The surfers also get a hell of a bang out of slot racing for some reason, so with Dick Dale slot racing at the Teen Fair, you have about three areas of the arcane teen world all rolled into one.

(1963)

Questions

1. Why do you think Tom Wolfe considers the Burbank "Teen Fair" a "natural setting" for a car show (par. 3)? Why do you think he calls it "a kind of Plato's Republic [a utopian setting] for teen-agers" (par. 3)?
2. Wolfe is writing about a visit to a custom-car show. What are his other subjects?
3. Wolfe is known for his almost obsessive attention to detail and his rapid-fire delivery of images that create vivid pictures of people and events. He has, however, been criticized for a lack of analysis or reflection. Do you agree? What do you think the many details in this piece say about American society? Do you think Wolfe should have supplied more analysis or do the images speak for themselves? Explain your answer.
4. Why does Wolfe think it's important that "Ford has begun to comprehend this teenage style of life and its potential" (par. 5)? What does he see as the connections between the teenage lifestyle and the American car?

The Sacred

STEPHEN DUNN

Born in New York City in 1939 and educated at Hofstra University, Stephen Dunn briefly played professional basketball and worked as a copywriter before receiving his MFA in poetry from Syracuse University. Dunn won the Pulitzer Prize for Poetry in 2001. This poem is from his 1989 collection, Between Angels.

After the teacher asked if anyone had a sacred place and the students fidgeted and shrank in their chairs, the most serious of them all said it was his car, being in it alone, his tape deck playing things he'd chosen, and others knew the truth had been spoken and began speaking about their rooms, their hiding places, but the car kept coming up,

  the car in motion,
music filling it, and sometimes one other person who understood the bright altar of the dashboard and how far away

a car could take him from the need to speak, or to answer, the key in having a key and putting it in, and going.

(1989)

Questions

1. "The Sacred" seems to have several subjects. What do you think they are, and how does Stephen Dunn link them?
2. Why do you think Dunn chose to lay out the poem the way he does — no capitals, line breaks in the midst of ideas, a period only at the end of the poem? What is the effect of these choices?
3. How does Dunn romanticize the automobile? How do you think the teacher, whose question frames the poem, feels about the car?
4. Does this poem resonate with you? Explain your answer.

Auto

Heather McHugh

Heather McHugh was born in San Diego in 1948 and raised in Virginia. She studied at Harvard University. McHugh was awarded a MacArthur Foundation "Genius" Grant in 2009 for her work as a poet, an essayist, and a translator. "Auto" is from her collection Hinge and Sign, published in 1994.

At first, the mobiles were for multitudes—the horse was doubled, then redoubled;

way and station made for social arts, within which conversations, trains of thought, held sway. Today

I drive morosely and alone, like half a billion others, each in a glassed-in, speakered-up contraption, each with a brain she thinks she can control (it goes off on its own, on detours

now and then; it dreams of cable-cars and smoking-cars and Volkses that can spill unthinkable powers of ten in clownface) unlike this poor hollowed-out sedation of sedan I pull off the throughway, up to the pump marked SELF, and fill.

(1994)

Questions

1. What do you think is Heather McHugh's main theme in "Auto"?
2. What is the effect of the poem's plays on words, such as "trains of thought" (l. 5), "the horse was doubled, then redoubled" (l. 2), and "the pump / marked SELF" (ll. 19–20)? What do the lines "in a glassed-in, / speakered-up" (ll. 9–10) evoke?

3. Why do you think McHugh breaks lines where she does? How does it affect the rhythm of the poem?
4. What do you think McHugh's view of the automobile is? Is it like or unlike your view? Explain your answer.

Americans and Their Cars

Is the Romance on the Skids?

PEW RESEARCH CENTER

The Pew Research Center Social and Demographic Trends Project studies cultural changes, combining original public-opinion survey research with social, economic, and demographic data analysis, and reports the findings on its Web site.

I. Overview

Any nation with more passenger vehicles than licensed drivers has a pretty serious love affair with the automobile. But the romance seems to be cooling off a bit—a casualty of its own intensity.

Today 69% of American drivers say they like to drive, down from 79% in a 1991 Gallup survey. And just 23% say they consider their car "something special—more than just a way to get around," barely half of the 43% who felt this way in 1991.

The biggest reason for the cooling of the affair isn't the recent spike in gas prices. Rather, it appears to be the result of a longer term trend—the growing hassle of traffic congestion, according to a Pew Research Center telephone survey among a nationally representative sample of 1,182 adults (including 1,048 drivers) conducted from June 20 through July 16, 2006.

When asked whether they like to drive or consider it a chore, 69% of drivers in the Pew survey said the former, while 28% said the latter. When the "chore" respondents were asked why they felt this way, traffic congestion (23%) and "other drivers" (14%) topped the list of reasons. Just 3% cited the expense.

Among the still sizable majority who say they like to drive, the biggest reasons 5 offered were the relaxation (21%), the scenery (19%), the freedom (14%) and the ability to get around (12%).

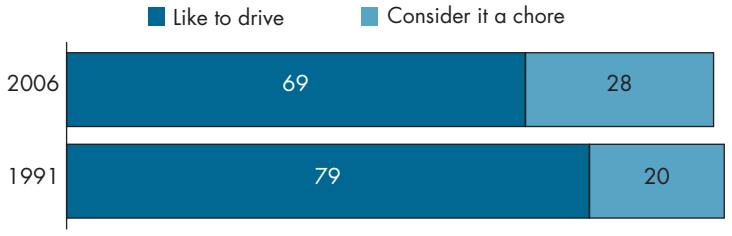
A Plague of Traffic

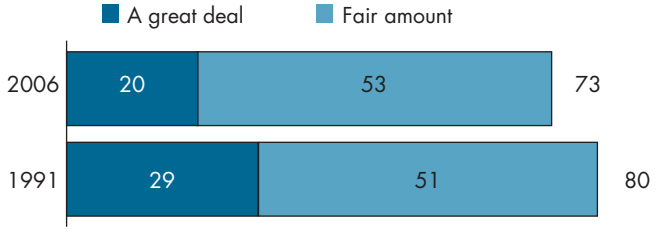
Trends from the U.S. Bureau of Transportation Statistics and the National Center for Transit Research show why, for a growing number of Americans, cars and driving seem to have become too-much-of-a-good-thing.

Driving Has Become Less Enjoyable...

Percent of drivers who..



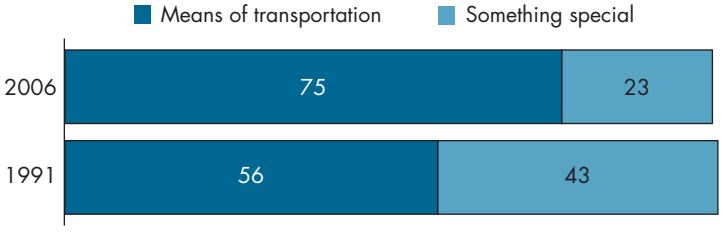
How much do you like to drive?



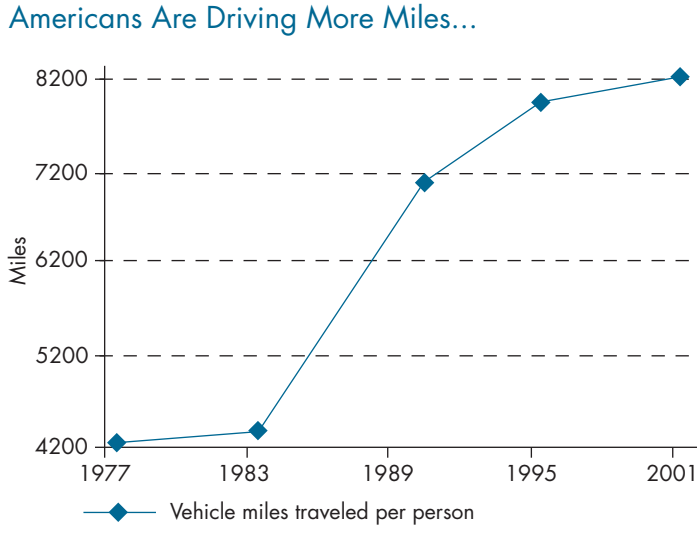
SOURCE: 1991 FROM GALLUP
NOTE: QUESTIONS ASKED OF DRIVERS

...And Cars Have Lost Some Luster

How do you think of your car?



SOURCE: 1991 FROM GALLUP
NOTE: QUESTIONS ASKED OF DRIVERS



SOURCE: CENTER FOR URBAN TRANSPORTATION RESEARCH. RESULTS FROM THE 2001 NATIONAL HOUSEHOLD TRAVEL SURVEY; EARLIER YEARS FROM THE NATIONWIDE PERSONAL TRANSPORTATION SURVEY. MORE RECENT DATA NOT YET AVAILABLE.

The National Household Travel Survey found in 2001 that, for the first time since such studies have been conducted, there were more personal vehicles (204 million) than licensed drviers (191 million) in this country. With all those cars, trucks, minivans and SUVs at their disposal, Americans have been making more trips and traveling more miles, thereby generating more of the very thing that has made them enjoy driving less — traffic jams.[1] From 1991 to 2003, the amount of time per year that the typical American spent stuck in traffic grew by 56%, according to the Bureau of Transportation Statistics.

The Car: Where Life Happens

However, despite the growing hassles of traffic, many drivers have strong feelings of intimacy toward their cars — 31%, for example, say they think of their car as having a personality. And despite the high price of gas, more than a quarter (27%) say they went driving "just for the fun of it" in the past week.

Moreover, most people see driving as a chance to take care of many of the other routines and amusements of daily living. Here is a (slightly scary) list of things people report having done in the past year while they were behind the wheel:

---

[1]Polzin, Steven E. 2006. "The Case for Moderate Growth in Vehicle Miles of Travel: A Critical Juncture in U.S. Travel Behavior Trends." Report prepared for the U.S. Department of Transportation.

...And Spending More Time in Traffic Jams

	1991	2003	PERCENTAGE INCREASE
Average annual hours of traffic delay per person	16 hrs	25 hrs	+56%

SOURCE: BUREAU OF TRANSPORTATION STATISTICS

- More than two-thirds (68%) of drivers say they have sung aloud while driving.
- Roughly six-in-ten (58%) have talked on a handheld phone while driving.
- More than four-in-ten (41%) have eaten a meal while driving.
- One-in-six (16%) have combed their hair or applied makeup while driving.
- Some 6% have read a paper, book or magazine while driving.
- Some 6% have fallen asleep while driving.
- And 38% have cursed at another driver.

About the Survey

Results for this survey are based on telephone interviews conducted with a nationally representative sample of adults, ages 18 years and older, living in continental U.S. telephone households. 10

- Interviews conducted June 20–July 16, 2006.
- 1,182 interviews of which 1,048 were conducted with drivers.
- Margin of sampling error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points for results based on the total sample at the 95% confidence level and 3.3 percentage points for results based on all drivers. The margin of sampling error is higher for results based on subgroups of respondents.

Survey interviews conducted under the direction of Princeton Survey Research Associates International. Interviews were conducted in English and Spanish.

Bear in mind that question wording and practical difficulties in conducting surveys can introduce error or bias in the findings of opinion polls.

(2006)

Questions

1. What surprised you about the results of this survey? What did you expect?
2. What are some of the reasons people still enjoy driving?
3. How does this survey explain the increase in traffic jams? Can you think of ways to solve that problem? Explain your ideas.

The End of the Affair

P. J. O'Rourke

Patrick Jake O'Rourke (b. 1947) is a political satirist, journalist, writer, and frequent guest on NPR's quiz show Wait, Wait . . . Don't Tell Me. This piece appeared in the Wall Street Journal in 2009.

The phrase "bankrupt General Motors," which we expect to hear uttered on Monday, leaves Americans my age in economic shock. The words are as melodramatic as "Mom's nude photos." And, indeed, if we want to understand what doomed the American automobile, we should give up on economics and turn to melodrama.

Politicians, journalists, financial analysts and other purveyors of banality have been looking at cars as if a convertible were a business. Fire the MBAs and hire a poet. The fate of Detroit isn't a matter of financial crisis, foreign competition, corporate greed, union intransigence, energy costs or measuring the shoe size of the footprints in the carbon. It's a tragic romance — unleashed passions, titanic clashes, lost love and wild horses.

Foremost are the horses. Cars can't be comprehended without them. A hundred and some years ago Rudyard Kipling wrote "The Ballad of the King's Jest," in which an Afghan tribesman avers: "Four things greater than all things are, — Women and Horses and Power and War."

Insert another "power" after the horse and the verse was as true in the suburbs of my 1950s boyhood as it was in the Khyber Pass.

Horsepower is not a quaint leftover of linguistics or a vague metaphoric anachronism. James Watt, father of the steam engine and progenitor of the industrial revolution, lacked a measurement for the movement of weight over distance in time — what we call power. (What we call power wasn't even an intellectual concept in the late 18th century — in case you think the recent collapse of global capitalism was history's most transformative moment.) Mr. Watt did research using draft animals and found that, under optimal conditions, a dray horse could lift 33,000 pounds one foot off the ground in one minute. Mr. Watt — the eponymous watt not yet existing — called this unit of power "1 horse-power." 5

In 1970 a Pontiac GTO (may the brand name rest in peace) had horsepower to the number of 370. In the time of one minute, for the space of one foot, it could move 12,210,000 pounds. And it could move those pounds down every foot of every mile of all the roads to the ends of the earth for every minute of every hour until the driver nodded off at the wheel. Forty years ago the pimply kid down the block, using $3,500 in saved-up soda-jerking money, procured might and main beyond the wildest dreams of Genghis Khan, whose hordes went forth to pillage mounted upon less oomph than is in a modern leaf blower.

Horses and horsepower alike are about status and being cool. A knight in ancient Rome was bluntly called "guy on horseback," Equesitis. Chevalier means the same, as does Cavalier. Lose the capitalization and the dictionary says, "insouciant and debonair; marked by a lofty disregard of others' interests, rights, or feelings; high-handed and arrogant and supercilious." How cool is that? Then there are cowboys — always cool — and the U.S. cavalry that coolly comes to their rescue plus the proverbially cool-handed "Man on Horseback" to whom we turn in troubled times.

Early witnesses to the automobile urged motorists to get a horse. But that, in effect, was what the automobile would do — get a horse for everybody. Once the Model T was introduced in 1908 we all became Sir Lancelot, gained a seat at the Round Table and were privileged to joust for the favors of fair maidens (at drive-in movies). The pride and prestige of a noble mount was vouchsafed to the common man. And woman, too. No one ever tried to persuade ladies to drive sidesaddle with both legs hanging out the car door.

For the purpose of ennobling us schlubs, the car is better than the horse in every way. Even more advantageous than cost, convenience and not getting kicked and smelly is how much easier it is to drive than to ride. I speak with feeling on this subject, having taken up riding when I was nearly 60 and having begun to drive when I was so small that my cousin Tommy had to lie on the transmission hump and operate the accelerator and the brake with his hands.

After the grown-ups had gone to bed, Tommy and I shifted the Buick into neutral, pushed it down the driveway and out of earshot, started the engine and toured the neighborhood. The sheer difficulty of horsemanship can be illustrated by what happened to Tommy and me next. Nothing. We maneuvered the car home, turned it off and rolled it back up the driveway. (We were raised in the blessedly flat Midwest.) During our foray the Buick's speedometer reached 30. But 30 miles per hour is a full gallop on a horse. Delete what you've seen of horse riding in movies. Possibly a kid who'd never been on a horse could ride at a gallop without killing himself. Possibly one of the Jonas Brothers could land an F-14 on a carrier deck. 10

Thus cars usurped the place of horses in our hearts. Once we'd caught a glimpse of a well-turned Goodyear, checked out the curves of the bodywork and gaped at that swell pair of headlights, well, the old gray mare was not what she used to be. We embarked upon life in the fast lane with our new paramour. It was a great love story of man and machine. The road to the future was paved with bliss.

Then we got married and moved to the suburbs. Being away from central cities meant Americans had to spend more of their time driving. Over the years away got farther away. Eventually this meant that Americans had to spend all of their time driving. The play date was 40 miles from the Chuck E. Cheese. The swim meet was 40 miles from the cello lesson. The Montessori was 40 miles from the math coach. Mom's job was 40 miles from Dad's job and the three-car garage was 40 miles from both.

The car ceased to be object of desire and equipment for adventure and turned into office, rec room, communications hub, breakfast nook and recycling bin — a motorized cup holder. Americans, the richest people on Earth, were stuck in the confines of their crossover SUVs, squeezed into less space than tech-support call-center employees in a Mumbai cubicle farm. Never mind the six-bedroom, eight-bath, pseudo-Tudor with cathedral-ceilinged great room and 1,000-bottle controlled-climate wine cellar. That was a day's walk away.

We became sick and tired of our cars and even angry at them. Pointy-headed busybodies of the environmentalist, new urbanist, utopian communitarian ilk blamed the victim. They claimed the car had forced us to live in widely scattered settlements in the great wasteland of big-box stores and the Olive Garden. If we would all just get on our Schwinns or hop a trolley, they said, America could become an archipelago of cozy gulags on the Portland, Ore., model with everyone nestled together in the most sustainably carbon-neutral, diverse and ecologically unimpactful way.

But cars didn't shape our existence; cars let us escape with our lives. We're way 15 the heck out here in Valley Bottom Heights and Trout Antler Estates because we were at war with the cities. We fought rotten public schools, idiot municipal bureaucracies, corrupt political machines, rampant criminality and the pointy-headed busybodies. Cars gave us our dragoons and hussars, lent us speed and mobility, let us scout the terrain and probe the enemy's lines. And thanks to our cars, when we lost the cities we weren't forced to surrender, we were able to retreat.

But our poor cars paid the price. They were flashing swords beaten into dull plowshares. Cars became appliances. Or worse. Nobody's ticked off at the dryer or the dishwasher, much less the fridge. We recognize these as labor-saving devices. The car, on the other hand, seems to create labor. We hold the car responsible for all the dreary errands to which it needs to be steered. Hell, a golf cart's more fun. You can ride around in a golf cart with a six-pack, safe from breathalyzers, chasing Canada geese on the fairways and taking swings at gophers with a mashie.

We've lost our love for cars and forgotten our debt to them and meanwhile the pointy-headed busybodies have been exacting their revenge. We escaped the poke of their noses once, when we lived downtown, but we won't be able to peel out so fast the next time. In the name of safety, emissions control and fuel economy, the simple mechanical elegance of the automobile has been rendered ponderous, cumbersome and incomprehensible. One might as well pry the back off an iPod as pop the hood on a contemporary motor vehicle. An aging shade-tree mechanic like myself stares aghast and sits back down in the shade. Or would if the car weren't squawking at me like a rehearsal for divorce. You left the key in. You left the door open. You left the lights on. You left your dirty socks in the middle of the bedroom floor.

I don't believe the pointy-heads give a damn about climate change or gas mileage, much less about whether I survive a head-on with one of their tax-sucking mass-transit projects. All they want is to make me hate my car. How proud and handsome would Bucephalas look, or Traveler or Rachel Alexandra, with seat and shoulder belts, air bags, 5-mph bumpers and a maze of pollution-control equipment under the tail?

And there's the end of the American automobile industry. When it comes to dull, practical, ugly things that bore and annoy me, Japanese things cost less and the cup holders are more conveniently located.

The American automobile is — that is, was — never a product of Japanese-style 20 industrialism. America's steel, coal, beer, beaver pelts and PCs may have come from our business plutocracy, but American cars have been manufactured mostly by romantic fools. David Buick, Ransom E. Olds, Louis Chevrolet, Robert and Louis Hupp of the Hupmobile, the Dodge brothers, the Studebaker brothers, the Packard brothers, the Duesenberg brothers, Charles W. Nash, E. L. Cord, John North Willys, Preston Tucker and William H. Murphy, whose Cadillac cars were designed by the young Henry Ford, all went broke making cars. The man who founded General Motors in 1908, William Crapo (really) Durant, went broke twice. Henry Ford, of course, did not go broke, nor was he a romantic, but judging by his opinions he certainly was a fool.

America's romantic foolishness with cars is finished, however, or nearly so. In the far boondocks a few good old boys haven't got the memo and still tear up the back roads. Doubtless the Obama administration's Department of Transportation is even now calculating a way to tap federal stimulus funds for mandatory OnStar installations to locate and subdue these reprobates.

Among certain youths — often first-generation Americans — there remains a vestigial fondness for Chevelle low-riders or Honda "tuners." The pointy-headed busybodies have yet to enfold these youngsters in the iron-clad conformity of cultural diversity's embrace. Soon the kids will be expressing their creative energy in a more constructive way, planting bok choy in community gardens and decorating homeless shelters with murals of Che.

I myself have something old-school under a tarp in the basement garage. I bet when my will has been probated, some child of mine will yank the dust cover and use the proceeds of the eBay sale to buy a mountain bike. Four things greater than all things are, and I'm pretty sure one of them isn't bicycles. There are those of us who have had the good fortune to meet with strength and beauty, with majestic force in which we were willing to trust our lives. Then a day comes, that strength and beauty fails, and a man does what a man has to do. I'm going downstairs to put a bullet in a V-8.

(2009)

Questions

1. P. J. O'Rourke suggests that the auto industry "[f]ire the MBAs and hire a poet" (par. 2). Explain his reasoning. Does he convince you? Explain why or why not.
2. In "The End of the Affair," O'Rourke develops an extended analogy between cars and horses. Trace the development of the analogy. How does it help him make his argument?
3. What does O'Rourke consider some of the consequences of the move to the suburbs? How do those consequences affect Americans' relationship with their cars?
4. Do you think O'Rourke blames any particular institution for the end of America's love affair with the automobile? Do you agree with him? Explain your answer.
5. How does O'Rourke explain the demise of the American auto industry?

Carmakers' Next Problem: Generation Y

Allison Linn

Allison Linn writes about the economy, consumer issues, and personal finance for NBCNews.com. She worked at newspapers in Colorado, Washington, and Oregon and as a reporter in Germany.

Meet Natalie McVeigh, the auto industry's latest headache.

At 25 years old, McVeigh lives in Denver and has two good jobs, as a research analyst and an adjunct professor of philosophy. What she doesn't have — or want — is a car.

A confluence of events — environmental worries, a preference for gadgets over wheels and the yearslong economic doldrums — is pushing some teens and twenty-somethings to opt out of what has traditionally been considered an American rite of passage: Owning a car.

"There's kind of almost every force working against the young driver right now," said Karl Brauer, senior analyst and editor-at-large at Edmunds.com, an automotive research website.

That could be a problem for automakers, which are still reeling from the Great Recession that sorely damaged their industry. Now, they may find that their youngest generation of potential customers will either purchase fewer cars, put off buying cars until later in life — or they won't end up buying cars at all. 5

"That's definitely a concern," said George Peterson, president of AutoPacific, an automotive market research firm that has been tracking young car buyers for 20 years. "They are not as engaged with cars and trucks as Gen X or Boomers before them."

The percentage of new cars sold to 21- to 34-year-olds hit a high of nearly 38 percent in 1985 but stands at around 27 percent today, according to CNW research. Over that same period, the percentage of new car buyers who are 55 or older has generally been trending up, according to the vehicle research group.

The prognosis isn't necessarily encouraging, either. In 2008, 82 percent of 20- to 24-year-olds had their driver's license, according to the Federal Highway Administration. Although that's gone up a tiny bit in the past few years, it's down from more than 87 percent in 1994.

People in their late twenties and early thirties are also slightly less likely to have a driver's license than in 1994, and it appears that more people are at least delaying getting their license. Just 31 percent of 16-year-olds had their license in 2008, down from about 42 percent in 1994, according to government data.

Brauer said one issue is economic: A combination of high unemployment among young people and economic troubles for their parents is making it harder for younger people to afford to drive. 10

But there are also other, longer-term issues at work, he said.

For one thing, many young consumers care more about new technologies, such as the latest phone, than about the latest car.

That may be for good reason — thanks to the Internet and social media, more people can connect with friends, work or even hand in schoolwork without ever leaving the house, potentially making them less dependent on cars but more dependent on gadgets.

Brauer said this generation also is thinking more than any other about the repercussions of driving, both in terms of the environment and our dependence on oil.

"They don't just wholeheartedly see a car as this cool thing to go get," he said. "There's actually some caveats."

"I Didn't Need It"

McVeigh didn't make a conscious plan not to drive. After living overseas as a teenager, she went to college in a small town and then moved to bigger cities for graduate school and work.

At first, a car seemed both prohibitively expensive and unnecessary, because she could walk or take public transportation. Then, she just decided she didn't want one.

"I just kind of came to the realization that I didn't need it," she said.

McVeigh uses public transportation to get to work and likes that she can spend her commute time reading or grading papers.

McVeigh also likes getting the extra exercise when she chooses to walk to work or to the grocery store, and is happy to be saving money and not adding any more pollution to the planet.

Although she knows other people in big East Coast cities who don't have cars, McVeigh said she remains unusual in Denver.

"It's still a Western town and everyone has a car," she said. "Everyone just thinks it's bizarre that I don't have a car."

But for now, she's happy with her decision. The only time not having a car is really inconvenient is when she wants to visit her sister in the mountain town of Breckenridge, about 80 miles away, or to go somewhere with her young nieces who live there.

Gadgets and Gas Mileage

Brauer, the Edmunds.com analyst, says carmakers are thinking about what it will take to get people like McVeigh into the showroom.

Many analysts credit Ford with doing the best job so far. The company recently released a new version of the Fiesta that has plenty to appeal to Generation Y: A sticker price starting at $13,320, combined gas mileage of around 33 miles per gallon and, perhaps most important, up-to-date technology for things like voice-activated music search and audible text messages.

Peterson, of AutoPacific, said Hyundai and Kia also are starting to offer appealing gadgetry for young car buyers, while Chrysler, General Motors, Toyota and Honda are still playing catch-up.

But will incorporating such functions be enough to persuade a young person who is on the fence to take on car payments and associated costs?

"I Was Afraid I Would Get Laid Off Again"

The weak economy and cost of car ownership is what pushed Kathryn Goffredi, 24, to give up her driving habit.

Like many suburban American teens, Goffredi got a license and a car at age 16. She drove regularly in high school but not college.

After college, she worked in the Washington, D.C. suburbs. She was considering 30 replacing her high school car when she was laid off in January. One of her first thoughts was, "Well, thank God I didn't buy that car."

Even now that she has a new job doing marketing for nonprofits, Goffredi has no plans to buy a car and has left the old car for her brother to use.

Because she lives and works in the nation's capital, she says it would be cost-prohibitive to drive to work, and not worth paying for a car she only drove a couple times a week. The uncertain economy also left her nervous about taking the plunge.

"I was afraid I would get laid off again, you know, and I would buy this car and work for three or four months and then lose my job again and then be stuck with these car payments," she said.

One big question for carmakers — and these young not-drivers — is how far public transportation will take them. Americans can get by fairly well in large cities, where buses and subways can be combined with cabs and car loan services like Zipcar. But it's a tougher slog in parts of the country better known for long stretches of highways than gleaming rail lines.

Dave Cole, chairman emeritus of the Center for Automotive Research, said 35 Generation Y may never be as excited about things like horsepower and styling as generations past. But he thinks that as this generation gets older and starts buying homes and having kids, they'll eventually buy a car, out of necessity if nothing else.

"The dependence on personal transportation in this country, outside of major urban areas, is still pretty profound, so there's really no alternative," he said.

Although Goffredi is happy with her decision not to own a car for now, she says she could definitely see herself buying a car in the future if she got a job that was far away, or had kids.

But right now she has other priorities for her extra cash.

"You have all this money, you know, and you decide you could put it all toward the car or you can put it toward other things like clothes, or your social life," she said.

(2010)

Questions

1. What do you think Allison Linn considers the number one reason that young people are not buying cars?
2. What solutions has the auto industry been working on to turn this trend around? Do you think they will be effective? Explain your answer.
3. When this article appeared, it included a questionnaire asking, "What would be the biggest motivator for you to drive less?" Possible answers were cost of gas; car payments; reducing dependence on oil; environmental concerns; better public transportation; all of the above; none of the above — I love my car. Over 12,000 people responded, with "cost of gas" and "better public transportation" receiving the most votes and "none of the above — I love my car" coming in close behind. How would you respond? What do the responses tell you about the future of Americans and their cars?

Americans Hit the Brakes on NASCAR

Frank DeFord

Frank DeFord (b. 1938), a sportswriter and novelist, has worked at Sports Illustrated for over fifty years. DeFord has a weekly spot on NPR and is a senior correspondent for Real Sports with Bryant Gumbel. This piece appeared on the NPR Web site in March 2012, where DeFord's weekly commentaries are called "Sweetness and Light."

Individual sports are always volatile, and after being the next big thing, NASCAR's popularity has stalled.

A lot had to do with the economy. In a sport that depends on sponsorships and rich owners — like those good buddies Mitt Romney kicks tires with — NASCAR was especially vulnerable.

And as for fans, when it became cutback time, they had to think twice about gassing up those big old RVs and driving a far piece to sit in those ear-shattering stadiums.

So, NASCAR invested $5 million in research to find out how to get back out of the pits. To me, the most fascinating finding was that all those old, white guys, who were the bread-and-butter NASCAR constituency, were not being replicated by their sons and grandsons. Frankly, the younger generations don't care to mess around with cars.

Ladies and gentlemen, I know this is heresy. It's been a given that Americans have what is always called "a love affair with the car." But what NASCAR found out was that it's now only a platonic relationship. No hands on. A whole cohort of our young boys — and girls — have been growing up without any interest in messing around — tinkering — with cars. It made me think that the last time I ever heard anybody talking about looking under the hood was Ross Perot, when he ran for president in '92, and he kept saying all we had to do to fix things was look under the hood. 5

Well, NASCAR found, nobody much wants to do that anymore. Sure, younger people still view automobiles as a necessary evil to get from A to B, but no less so than do Brazilians or Indians or Chinese.

In fact, Americans aren't satisfied only to drive. They otherwise want to talk on the phone, eat and drink, text, plug in their iPods, fool around with the GPS or — the best and brightest of them — listen to NPR. How many Americans would even get into cars if they couldn't be entertained while driving? There goes the demand for foreign oil right there.

Moreover, when it comes to cars, kids grow up being primarily accustomed to watching cars crashing in movies and on TV. Cars aren't for racing anymore. They're just instruments of demolition.

And tinker? Researchers at the University of Michigan found that the kids who tinker more with the Internet delay getting their driver's licenses. Not wanting a driver's license? Next to making out, that was the most important rite of passage in an American teenager's life.

Look, I wish NASCAR well. I hope it gets people back to the races, but it is going to have to do it with stars and steroids and point spreads, like all the other sports. Nobody cool wants to look under the hood anymore. They want to look at Facebook and YouTube. As of 2012, the American love affair with the car is over. Cars are so Greatest Generation. 10

(2012)

Questions

1. How does Frank DeFord explain the stalled popularity of NASCAR?
2. Characterize the audience for "Americans Hit the Brakes on NASCAR." What assumptions does DeFord make about his audience? How does he pitch his piece to them?
3. Are you convinced by DeFord that the "American love affair with the car is over"? Does he speak accurately for your generation? Explain your view.

Making Connections

1. How are the teenagers Tom Wolfe (p. 1538) writes about like or unlike the teenagers in Stephen Dunn's poem "The Sacred" (p. 1541)?
2. Imagine a conversation among P. J. O'Rourke (p. 1547), Frank DeFord (p. 1554), and E. B. White (p. 1529) on the subject of America's romance with the automobile. What aspects would they agree on? What would they disagree on?
3. What do you think the speaker in Heather McHugh's "Auto" (p. 1542) has in common with Rabbit Angstrom in the excerpt from John Updike's Rabbit, Run (p. 1535)? Explain your answer.
4. Compare and contrast the Pew Research Center study (p. 1543) with Allison Linn's report on Generation Y's attitudes toward car ownership (p. 1551). What crossovers do you see? Do they contradict each other in any way? Explain why or why not.
5. Compare the Ohio Electric advertisement (p. 1529) to a contemporary car ad. You might take a look at the Dodge Durango ad in Chapter 2 (p. 75) or the Dodge Challenger ad in Chapter 6 (p. 468), but also be sure to look at advertising for luxury cars and "smart" energy-efficient cars. Take audience, speaker, and subject into account. What are the common threads? What aspects of car marketing have changed the most? What aspects of car marketing have come full circle?

Entering the Conversation

As you respond to each of the following prompts, support your position with appropriate evidence, including at least three sources in this Conversation on America's romance with the automobile, unless otherwise indicated.

1. In a letter to the New York Times in April 2012, transportation demand researcher and author Randy Salzman suggests that Americans need to "use our cars smarter" in order to "mitigate a host of problems and prevent our grandchildren from following our children in fighting wars in the Middle East." His solution is a federal gasoline "user fee" rolled in slowly over a decade. Using the sources in this Conversation and your own reading and experience, propose a solution to America's car problem. If you don't think we have a problem, defend our use of the automobile.
2. In Jack Kerouac's On the Road, the narrator Sal Paradise asks — and answers, "What is that feeling when you're driving away from people and they recede on the plain till you see their specks dispersing? — it's the too-huge world vaulting us, and it's good-by. But we lean forward to the next crazy venture beneath the skies." Write an essay in which you examine the appeal of the automobile and the way it has figured in popular culture and literature. Use the pieces in this chapter and reading you have done on your own.
3. Several pieces in this Conversation communicate nostalgia for the romantic relationship between Americans and their cars. Write an essay in which you analyze that nostalgia, discussing what was romantic about the car, why the romance ended, and predicting the future of our relationship with the automobile.
4. In 2009, Sheryl Connelly, Ford Motor Company's manager of global consumer trends and futuring, said, "The car used to be the signal of adulthood, of freedom. It was the signal of being a grownup. Now, the signal into adulthood for teenagers is the smartphone." A survey later that year reported that 46 percent of eighteen to twenty-four-year-olds said they would choose Internet access over owning their own car. Among the baby boom generation, the people who grew up in the 1950s and 1960s, the height of the American romance with the automobile, only 15 percent would choose the Internet. Write an essay in which you analyze those trends. Use the sources in this Conversation, as well as your outside reading and experience, as evidence.
5. What is the future of the automobile in America? Can the auto industry make a comeback? Is it a regional issue rather than a national one? Rural rather than urban? Write an essay in which you analyze several directions for the car's future, choosing and defending the one you think is most promising.
6. Jeremy Hsu, in a May 2012 article in Scientific American, asserts that the American romance with the car was no coincidence. It was part of the automobile industry's "battle for hearts and minds" to "take over the streets where people had once swarmed." One strategy was the creation of the term jaywalker, "jay" being slang for an ignorant person, especially one from the country—akin to a "rube" or "hick." This term made it unsophisticated to not recognize that cars rule the road. Finally, the phrase "America's love affair with the automobile" was part of comedian Groucho Marx's narration of a TV show called Merrily We Roll Along. Given the uncertainty of America's current and future romance with the automobile, consider the kind of public relations moves that might be required to sustain it. Develop an advertising campaign for encouraging Americans to either curtail or increase their use of automobiles.

Grammar as Rhetoric and Style

Parallel Structures

Parts of a sentence are parallel when they share the same grammatical pattern. Parallelism is most often found within sentences at the level of the word, phrase, or clause, but sometimes parallelism can even extend across sentences, as in these three parallel sentences from Martin Luther King Jr.'s "Letter from Birmingham Jail":

> So I, along with several members of my staff, am here because I was invited here. I am here because I have organizational ties here. But more basically, I am in Birmingham because injustice is here. —Martin Luther King Jr.

Words

> Those who failed were ceremonially accepted by other Indians and appropriately pitied by non-Indians. —Sherman Alexie

In this sentence, the words ceremonially accepted and appropriately pitied, both adverbial phrases, precede the preposition by; ceremonially accepted and appropriately pitied are parallel.

> Because of this, the young man or woman writing today has forgotten the problems of the human heart in conflict with itself which alone can make good writing because only that is worth writing about, worth the agony and the sweat. —William Faulkner

In this sentence, the words agony and sweat, both nouns, follow worth; agony and sweat are parallel.

Phrases

> [A]nd yes, I could say, yes, these white folks without the magnolia (who are indifferent to the tree's existence), and these black folks without melons and superior racial patience, these are like the Southerners I know.
>
> — Alice Walker

To explain the Southerners she knows, Walker uses parallel prepositional phrases: without the magnolia and without melons and superior racial patience.

> It was the Lord who knew of the impossibility every parent in that room faced: how to prepare the child for the day when the child would be despised and how to create in the child — by what means? — a stronger antidote to this poison than one had found for onself.
>
> — James Baldwin

In the preceding sentence, James Baldwin uses two parallel infinitive verbs each preceded by how: to prepare and to create.

Clauses

> If the stakes ever became high enough — if the evil were evil enough, if the good were good enough — I would simply tap a secret reservoir of courage that had been accumulating inside me over the years.
>
> — Tim O'Brien

This sentence contains three parallel dependent, or subordinate, clauses; all begin with if. The repetition of enough is also part of parallelism.

> I only needed to turn a corner into a dicey situation, or crowd some frightened, armed person in a foyer somewhere, or make an errant move after being pulled over by a policeman.
>
> — Brent Staples

The preceding example contains three parallel clauses: one independent and two dependent beginning with or.

> I knew how to dress for school: at the Catholic school I attended we all wore uniforms; I knew how to dress for Sunday mass, and I knew what dresses to wear for parties at my relatives' homes.
>
> — Judith Ortiz Cofer

This example begins with two independent clauses separated by a colon. The semicolon connects two more parallel constructions each beginning with I knew.

Lack of Parallelism

To fully appreciate the power of the parallelism in the preceding examples, consider what happens when supposedly equal elements of a sentence do not follow the same grammatical or syntactical form — that is, when they are not parallel with each other.

> I only needed to turn a corner into a dicey situation, or crowding some frightened, armed person in a foyer somewhere, or making an errant move after being pulled over by a policeman.

This version of the Staples sentence that we looked at earlier moves from an independent clause to two dependent clauses that use verbals rather than simple verbs. The three phrases are not parallel, and as a result, the sentence lacks clarity and force.

Parallelism can be tricky when the elements — words, phrases, or clauses — are separated by modifiers or other syntactical elements. The following sentence may not at first glance seem to lack parallelism:

> . . . I quickly left my mother and the children to the care of those impressive women, who, in Negro communities at least, automatically appear at times of bereavement armed with lotions, proverbs, and patience, and can cook.

When you analyze carefully, you notice that lotions, proverbs, and patience are nouns, and can cook is a verb. Notice that in the actual sentence that James Baldwin wrote in "Notes of a Native Son," he makes all four words parallel nouns:

> . . . I quickly left my mother and the children to the care of those impressive women, who, in Negro communities at least, automatically appear at times of bereavement armed with lotions, proverbs, and patience, and an ability to cook.
>
> — James Baldwin

The fact that all four are nouns underscores the gifts that these women bring to a grieving home — the lotions, sayings, kindness, and cooking are all of equal weight.

Parallelism is often at its most effective at the level of the clause, but again, it may be difficult to keep track. Let's use an example from Malcolm Gladwell. Here it is without parallel structure:

> In other words, Facebook activism succeeds not by motivating people to make a real sacrifice but when people are motivated to do things even though they are not motivated enough to make a real sacrifice.

That sentence makes sense — once you've untangled all the motivations! — but the emphasis Gladwell intends is on the not: people are not motivated by x but by y. In the sentence that actually appears in his essay, he repeats the phrase by motivating and thus uses parallel structure to emphasize the contrast:

In other words, Facebook activism succeeds not by motivating people to make a real sacrifice but by motivating them to do the things that people do when they are not motivated enough to make a real sacrifice.

— Malcolm Gladwell

Rhetorical and Stylistic Strategy

Looking first at the parallel sentences at the beginning of this lesson and then at the rewrites that lack parallelism, you can see that writers use parallelism to emphasize, contrast, or connect ideas.

Following are the names, definitions, and examples of specific types of parallelism:

anaphora Repetition of a word or phrase at the beginning of successive phrases, clauses, or lines.

But when you have seen vicious mobs lynch your mothers and fathers at will and drown your sisters and brothers at whim; when you have seen hate-filled policemen curse, kick, and even kill your black brothers and sisters; . . . when you are forever fighting a degenerating sense of "nobodiness" — then you will understand why we find it difficult to wait. — Martin Luther King Jr.

In this example, form follows function. Just as King is saying that African Americans have had to endure unjust treatment as they waited for full civil rights, this series of parallel clauses makes the reader wait — and wait — for the main point in the independent clause.

antimetabole Repetition of words in reverse order.

Ask not what your country can do for you; ask what you can do for your country.

— John F. Kennedy

The example above from President Kennedy is, perhaps, his most famous quote. Part of what makes it so "quotable" is that the repetition inherent in antimetabole makes it dramatic and easy to remember. Because the pattern of the two clauses is so similar, the listener only needs to remember one pattern. Because that sentence pattern is repeated, it gives the listener two chances to understand the entire sentence and places extra emphasis on the second part. It is almost as if Kennedy is repeating a point for emphasis. Keep an eye out for antimetabole in modern political sound bites.

antithesis Opposition, or contrast, of ideas or words in a parallel construction.

[F]reedom is never voluntarily given by the oppressor; it must be demanded by the oppressed. — Martin Luther King Jr.

One has not only a legal but a moral responsibility to obey just laws. Conversely, one has a moral responsibility to disobey unjust laws. — Martin Luther King Jr.

That's one small step for man, one giant leap for mankind. — Neil Armstrong

In all three of these examples, the parallel structure creates a clear comparison between two things in order to emphasize the difference between them. Given by the oppressor is contrasted in meaning and in placement with demanded by the oppressed. Notice also how the parallel prepositional phrases by the oppressor and by the oppressed call attention to the tension between oppressor and oppressed.

zeugma Use of two different words in a grammatically similar way that produces different, often incongruous, meanings.

> O'Connor's short stories and novels are set in a rural South where people know their places, mind their manners and do horrible things to one another.
>
> — Lawrence Downes

In the example by Downes, the zeugma is created in the description of the qualities of Flannery O'Connor's South, from the expected "know their places" and "mind their manners" to the surprising "do horrible things to one another." There is a consistency in the pattern, but an inconsistency in the effect of the phrases. Downes exploits the ironic inconsistency of the zeugma to show the ways that O'Connor surprises her readers with the way she portrays the rural South.

• EXERCISE 1 •

Identify the parallel structure in words, phrases, or clauses in each of the following sentences.

1. "A penny saved is a penny earned." — Benjamin Franklin
2. Was this act the work of a genius or a lunatic?
3. This situation is a problem not only for the students but also for the teachers.
4. Heather learned to work fast, ask few questions, and generally keep a low profile.
5. After you finish your homework and before you check your e-mail, please do your chores.

• EXERCISE 2 •

Correct the faulty parallelism in the following sentences.

1. My new exercise program and going on a strict diet will help me lose the weight I gained over the holidays.
2. As part of his accounting business, Rick has private clients, does some pro bono work, and corporations.
3. Try not to focus on the mistakes that you've made; what you've learned from them should be your focus instead.

4. A new job is likely to cause a person anxiety and working extra hours to make a good impression.
5. A competent physician will assess a patient's physical symptoms, and mental attitude will also be considered.

• EXERCISE 3 •

Identify the parallel structures in the following sentences from Martin Luther King Jr.'s "Letter from Birmingham Jail," and explain their effect.

1. So I, along with several members of my staff, am here because I was invited here. I am here because I have organizational ties here. (par. 2)
2. We are caught in an inescapable network of mutuality, tied in a single garment of destiny. (par. 4)
3. Whatever affects one directly, affects all indirectly. (par. 4)
4. In any nonviolent campaign there are four basic steps: collection of the facts to determine whether injustices exist; negotiation; self-purification; and direct action. (par. 6)
5. An unjust law is a code that a numerical or power majority group compels a minority group to obey but does not make binding on itself. This is difference made legal. By the same token, a just law is a code that a majority compels a minority to follow and that it is willing to follow itself. This is sameness made legal. (par. 17)
6. Was not Jesus an extremist for love: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you." Was not Amos an extremist for justice: "Let justice roll down like waters and righteousness like an ever-flowing stream." Was not Paul an extremist for the Christian gospel: "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." Was not Martin Luther an extremist: "Here I stand; I cannot do otherwise, so help me God." And John Bunyan: "I will stay in jail to the end of my days before I make a butchery of my conscience." And Abraham Lincoln: "This nation cannot survive half slave and half free." And Thomas Jefferson: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal. . . ." (par. 31)
7. If I have said anything in this letter that overstates the truth and indicates an unreasonable impatience, I beg you to forgive me. If I have said anything that understates the truth and indicates my having a patience that allows me to settle for anything less than brotherhood, I beg God to forgive me. (par. 49)

• EXERCISE 4 •

The following paragraph is from Toni Morrison's Nobel lecture, delivered in 1993 when she won the Nobel Prize for Literature. Find examples of parallel structure; identify whether the construction is a word, clause, or phrase; and explain its effect.

The systematic looting of language can be recognized by the tendency of its users to forgo its nuanced, complex, midwifery properties for menace and subjugation. Oppressive language does more than represent violence; it is violence; does more than represent the limits of knowledge; it limits knowledge. Whether it is obscuring state language or the faux-language of mindless media; whether it is the proud but calcified language of the academy or the commodity driven language of science; whether it is the malign language of law-without-ethics, or language designed for the estrangement of minorities, hiding its racist plunder in its literary cheek — it must be rejected, altered and exposed. It is the language that drinks blood, laps vulnerabilities, tucks its fascist boots under crinolines of respectability and patriotism as it moves relentlessly toward the bottom line and the bottomed-out mind. Sexist language, racist language, theistic language — all are typical of the policing languages of mastery, and cannot, do not permit new knowledge or encourage the mutual exchange of ideas.

• EXERCISE 5 •

Each of the following sentences is an example of parallelism. Identify the type of parallelism, explain its effect, and then model a sentence of your own on the example.

1. I read books late into the night, until I could barely keep my eyes open. I read books at recess, then during lunch and in the few minutes left after I had finished my classroom assignments. I read books in the car when my family traveled to powwows or basketball games. In shopping malls, I ran to the bookstores and read bits and pieces of as many books as I could. I read the books my father brought home from the pawnshops and secondhand. I read the books I borrowed from the library. I read the backs of cereal boxes. I read the newspaper. I read the bulletins posted on the walls of the school, the clinic, the tribal offices, the post office. I read junk mail. I read auto-repair manuals. I read magazines. I read anything that had words and paragraphs. I read with equal parts joy and desperation. —Sherman Alexie
2. I will have all these little Suzettes in case you never have any babies, which looks more and more like it is going to happen.

   My mother who had me when she was thirty-three—l'âge du Christ—at the age that Christ died on the cross.

That's a blessing, believe you me, even if American doctors say by that time you can make retarded babies.

My mother, who sews lace collars on my company soft ball T-shirts when she does my laundry.

Why, you can't you look like a lady playing soft ball?

My mother, who never went to any of my Parent- Teacher Association meetings when I was in school. —Edwidge Danticat

3. It was only one bomb, small enough to fit in the trunk of a car. A band of fanatics stole it from the Israelis, smuggled it into the United States, and exploded it in a football stadium to kill tens of thousands. —Spencer R. Weart

4. But cars didn't shape our existence; cars let us escape with our lives. We're way the heck out here in Valley Bottom Heights and Trout Antler Estates because we were at war with the cities. We fought rotten public schools, idiot municipal bureaucracies, corrupt political machines, rampant criminality and the pointy-headed busybodies. Cars gave us our dragoons and hussars, lent us speed and mobility, let us scout the terrain and probe the enemy's lines. And thanks to our cars, when we lost the cities we weren't forced to surrender, we were able to retreat. —P. J. O'Rourke

5. Certain blood was being shed for uncertain reasons. —Tim O'Brien

Suggestions for Writing

Redefining America

1. In On Native Grounds, American writer and critic Alfred Kazin wrote, "the greatest single fact about our modern American writing is our writers' absorption in every detail of their American world together with their deep and subtle alienation from it." Choose at least three works from this chapter and analyze them through the lens of Kazin's observation.

2. In a piece about the essay in the New York Times, essayist Philip Lopate wrote:

> Ever since Michel de Montaigne, the founder of the modern essay, gave as a motto his befuddled "What do I know?" and put forth a vision of humanity as mentally wavering and inconstant, the essay has become a meadow inviting contradiction, paradox, irresolution, and self-doubt. The essay's job is to track consciousness; if you are fully aware of your mind you will find your thoughts doubling back, registering little peeps of ambivalence or disbelief.

Write an essay in which you examine the "contradiction, paradox, irresolution, and self-doubt" in at least three of the twentieth- and twenty-first-century American essays in this chapter.

3. Write an essay in which you trace the way writers contributed to the civil rights movement through their revelations about racial discrimination and inequality. Use pieces from this chapter as well as your other reading as evidence.

4. Is multiculturalism a better model than assimilation? Write an essay in which you evaluate the pros and cons of each and then indicate your own position on the issue. Use sources in this chapter and your outside reading as support.

5. In both Tim O'Brien's "Rainy River" (p. 1399) and Joan Didion's "On Self-Respect" (p. 1340) making or not making Phi Beta Kappa, the most recognizable reward for academic excellence, at least in part defines the speaker. What else do these two pieces have in common? Write an essay in which you create your own definition of self-respect, using these selections — and others from the chapter — as evidence for your definition.

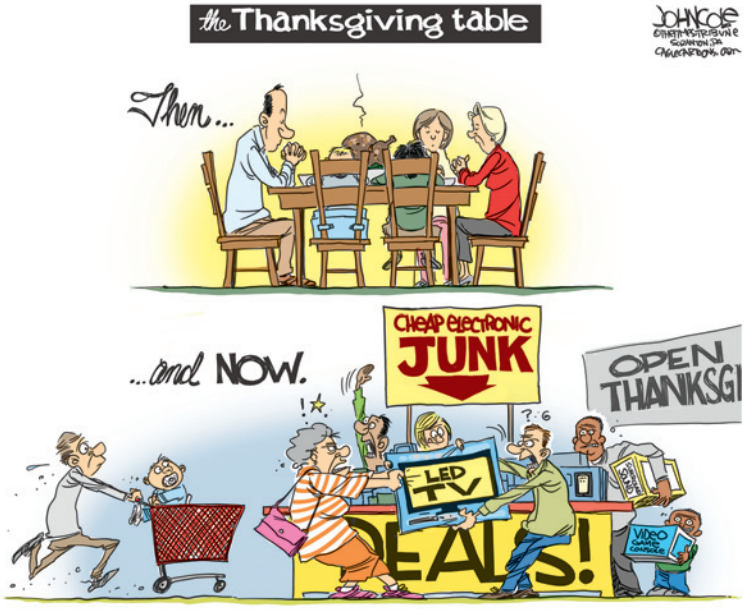
6. Three poems in this chapter relate to wars in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries — "Facing It" (p. 1397), "Letter to a Photojournalist Going-In" (p. 1429), and "At Lowe's Home Improvement Center" (p. 1445). Write an essay in which you examine how these poems portray modern warfare.

7. In 2011, the Wall Street Journal reported, "For many urban dwellers, the country conjures up images of clean air, fresh food, and physical activities. But these days, Americans residing in major cities live longer, healthier lives overall than their country cousins — a reversal from decades past." The article goes on to note that suburbanites, however, are, in most measures, the best off. Write an essay in which you discuss the positive and negative aspects of living in the city, the country, or the suburbs, as reflected in the works in this chapter, as well as in your other reading.

8. This period of American history is characterized by change, often startlingly rapid change. But think about what doesn't change, as shown in the works in this chapter, and write an essay in which you reflect on timeless American values, customs, and beliefs.

this page left intentionally blank

Image 1 (p. 15)

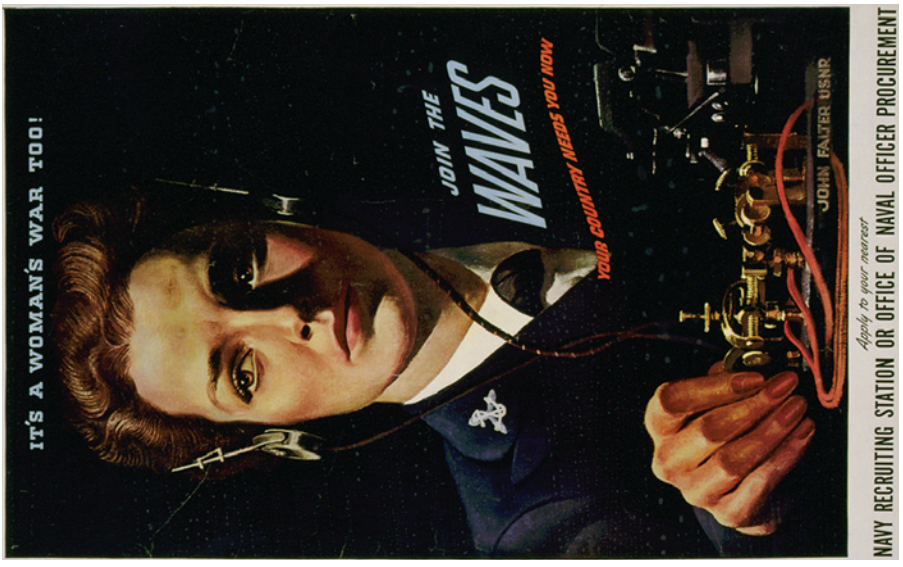


John Cole/Cagle Cartoons, Inc.

Image 2 (p. 27)

National Archives Still Picture Branch

Image 3 (p. 28)



IT'S A WOMAN'S WAR TOO!
JOIN THE WAVES
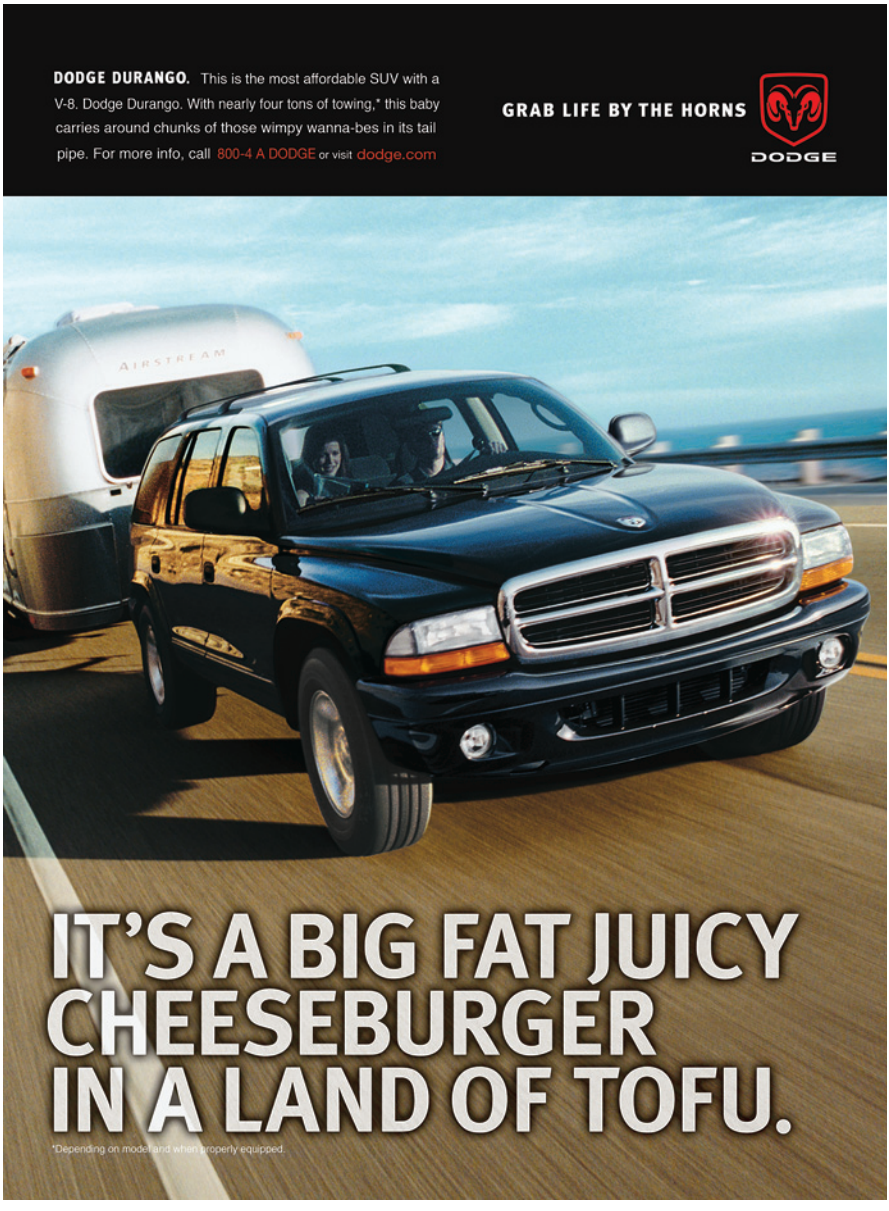
YOUR COUNTRY NEEDS YOU NOW
JOHN FALTER USNR
Apply to your nearest
NAVY RECRUITING STATION OR OFFICE OF NAVAL OFFICER PROCUREMENT

Artists Posters, Prints and Photographs Division, Library of Congress

Image 4 (p. 29)

Ad courtesy of People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, www.peta.org. Image courtesy of istock.



DODGE DURANGO. This is the most affordable SUV with a V-8. Dodge Durango. With nearly four tons of towing,* this baby carries around chunks of those wimpy wanna-bes in its tail pipe. For more info, call 800-4 A DODGE or visit dodge.com
GRAB LIFE BY THE HORNS
DODGE AIRSTREAM
IT'S A BIG FAT JUICY CHEESEBURGER IN A LAND OF TOFU.
*Depending on model and when properly equipped.

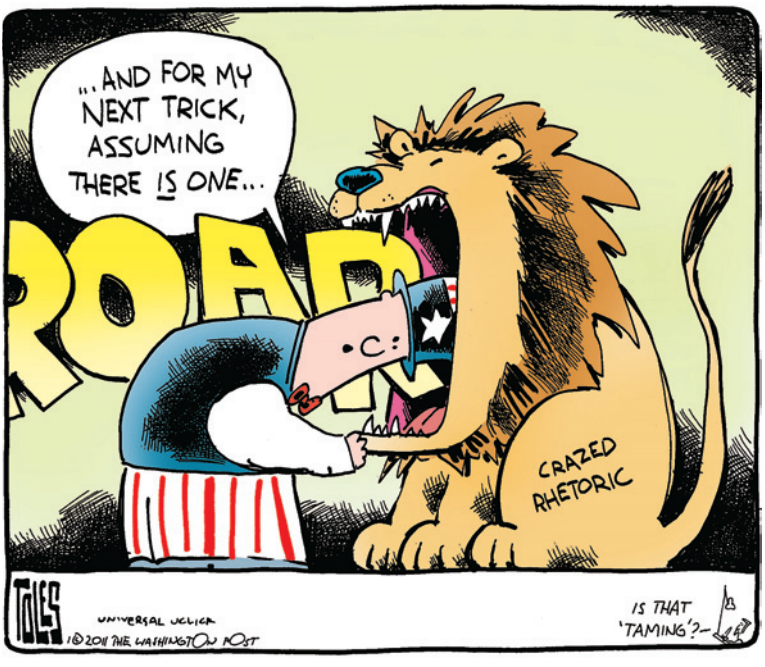
Dodge and Durango are registered trademarks of Chrysler Group LLC.

Image 6 (p. 77)

On Don't Fry Day (and Every Day)
Slip, Slop, Slap & Wrap!
A turtle has a built-in shirt.
A hippo's skin secretes oil that acts as a sunscreen.
The bumps over a camel's eyes act as a hat.
The black rings around a meerkat's eyes are sunglasses.
Slip on a shirt, Slop on sunscreen, Slap on a hat, Wrap on sunglasses, and seek shade between 10 and 4.
Don't Fry Day
EPA United States Environmental Protection Agency
SunWise

US EPA's SunWise Program, American Cancer Society

Image 7 (p. 86)



TOLES © 2011 The Washington Post. Reprinted with permission of UNIVERSAL UCLICK. All rights reserved.

Image 8 (p. 137)

HAPPINESS IS JUST AROUND THE CORNER!
WORK HARDER
GET SMOOTHER GET CLOSER
TASTE THAT SATISFIES
HAPPINESS IS JUST AROUND THE CORNER!
STAY AHEAD OF THE RACE
EARN MORE MONEY
SOFT SILKY CREAMY
HAPPINESS IS JUST AROUND THE CORNER!
THE SEXIEST PANTS ALL AROUND
BUY MORE THINGS
HAPPINESS IS JUST AROUND THE CORNER!
ESCAPE FROM IT ALL KEEP GOING

Courtesy of Polyp

Image 9 (p. 141)

Sian Kennedy/cultura/Corbis

© Mirrorpix/Splash News/Corbis

Brenda Chase/Getty Images

Image 11 (p. 161)

Printed by permission of the Norman Rockwell Family Agency. Copyright © the Norman Rockwell Family Entities, Norman Rockwell Museum Collections.

Norman Rockwell, The Problem We All Live With, 1964, oil on canvas, 36" × 58". Illustration for Look magazine, January 14, 1964.

Image 12 (p. 228)

Anonymous, Mrs. Elizabeth Freake and Baby Mary, c. 1671, oil on canvas, 42 1/2" × 36 3/4", Worcester Art Museum, Worcester, Massachusetts.

Worcester Art Museum, Massachusetts, USA/The Bridgeman Art Library

Image 13 (p. 229)

Agnolo Bronzino, Eleonora of Toledo With Her Son Giovanni, c. 1545, oil on wood, 45 1/4" × 37 7/8". Uffizi Gallery, Florence, Italy.

De Agostini Picture Library/A. Dagli Orti/The Bridgeman Art Library

Image 14 (p. 247)

© Peabody Essex Museum, Salem, Massachusetts, USA/The Bridgeman Art Library

Tompkins Harrison Matteson, The Trial of George Jacobs, 5th August, 1692, 1855, oil in canvas, Peabody Essex Museum, Salem, Massachusetts.

Sandwich.
Snack.
Arsenic.
POISON
A new report, Toxic Air: The Case for Cleaning up Coal-fired Power Plants, from the American Lung Association finds that coal-fired power plants in the U.S. expose our kids to 386,000 tons of 84 dangerous pollutants, like mercury, arsenic, hydrogen chloride and formaldehyde. Many of these pollutants trigger asthma attacks in kids.
We can put a stop to those threats. In fact, many power plants already use technology to clean up hazardous pollution before it gets in the air. It's time for the EPA to make sure all power plants do.
Then we can all breathe a little easier.
AMERICAN LUNG ASSOCIATION.
Fighting for Air
www.LungUSA.org

Courtesy of the American Lung Association

Image 16 (p. 286)

Architect of the Capitol

John Vanderlyn, Landing of Columbus, 1847, oil on canvas, 12'×18'. U.S. Capitol Rotunda, Washington, D.C.

Image 17 (p. 318)

Architect of the Capitol

John Gadsby Chapman, The Baptism of Pocahontas, 1839, oil on canvas, 12'×18', U.S. Capitol Rotunda, Washington, D.C.

Image 18 (p. 321)

Howard Chandler Christy, Pocahontas, 1911, oil on canvas, 69"×49". American Illustrators Gallery, New York.

© Copyright 2013 National Museum of American Illustration, Newport, RI. Photos courtesy Archives of the American Illustrators Gallery NYC.

Image 19 (p. 369)

Friends' House, Euston, London, UK/The Bridgeman Art Library

Benjamin West, Penn's Treaty with the Indians, 1772, oil on canvas, 75 1/2"×107 3/4". Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts.

Image 20 (p. 455)

Gilbert Stuart, George Washington—Lansdowne Portrait, 1796, oil on canvas, 8'×5', National Portrait Gallery of the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C.

National Portrait Gallery, Smithsonian Institution/Art Resource, NY

Image 21 (p. 459)

Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, USA/The Bridgeman Art Library

Emanuel Leutze, Washington Crossing the Delaware, 1851, oil on canvas, 149"×255".
Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Image 22 (p. 556)

Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, USA/Photo © Bolin Picture Library/The Bridgeman Art Library

Thomas Cole, The Oxbow, 1836, oil on canvas, 51 1/2" × 76", Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Image 23 (p. 557)

Asher B. Durand, Kindred Spirits, 1849, oil on canvas, 44" × 36". Crystal Bridges Museum of American Art, Arkansas.

Francis G. Mayer/Corbis

Image 24 (p. 688)

COME AND JOIN US BROTHERS.
PUBLISHED BY THE SUPERVISORY COMMITTEE FOR RECRUITING COLORED REGIMENTS 1210 CHESTNUT ST. PHILADELPHIA.

Division of Home and Community Life, National Museum of American History, Smithsonian Institution. Harry T. Peters, "America on Stone" Lithography Collection.

Image 25 (p. 744)

Thomas Hovenden, The Last Moments of John Brown, c. 1882, oil on canvas, 77 3/8" × 66 1/4". Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Image source: Art Resource, NY

© Robert Crumb 2013

Image 27 (p. 831)

Image copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art.
Image source: Art Resource, NY

Winslow Homer, The Veteran in a New Field, 1865, oil on canvas, 24 1/8" × 38 1/8", Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Image 28 (p. 865)

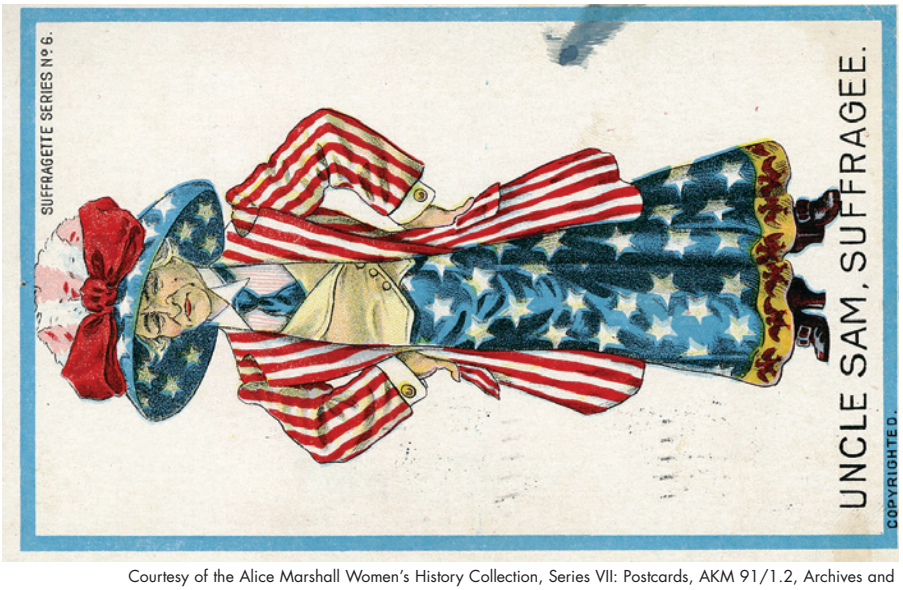
Corcoran Gallery of Art, Washington D.C., USA/Gift of Mary (Mrs. Albert) Bierstadt/The Bridgeman Art Library

Albert Bierstadt, The Last of the Buffalo, 1888, oil on canvas, 71" × 118 3/4", Corcoran Gallery, Washington, D.C.

Image 29 (p. 983)

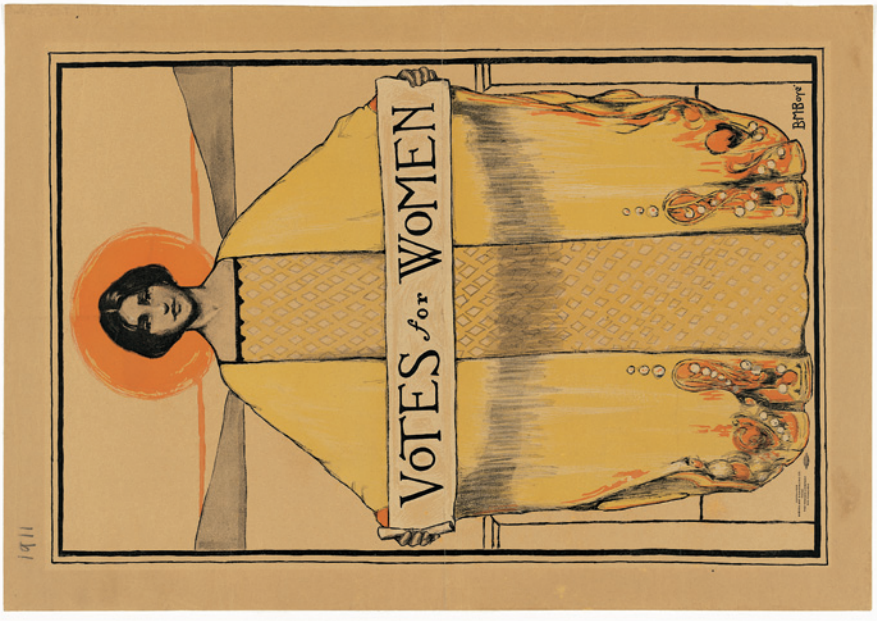
© 2013 Washington State History Society. All rights reserved. Web site by SiteCrafting.

Image 30 (p. 983)



Courtesy of the Alice Marshall Women's History Collection, Series VII: Postcards, AKM 91/1.2, Archives and Special Collections, Penn State Harrisburg Library, University Libraries, Pennsylvania State University.

Image 31 (p. 985)



Schlesinger Library, Radcliffe Institute, Harvard University

Image 32 (p. 1003)

The Art Archive at Art Resource, NY

Image 33 (p. 1018)

Copyright © Condé Nast. From The New Yorker Magazine. All rights reserved. Cover by Christoph Niemann. Reprinted by Permission.

Image 34 (p. 1028)

Amon Carter Museum of American Art, Fort Worth, Texas

Frederic S. Remington, A Dash for the Timber, 1889, oil on canvas, 84"×48", Amon Carter Museum of American Art, Fort Worth, Texas.

The Newberry Library, Chicago

Image 36 (p. 1083)

Marsden Hartley, Portrait of a German Officer, 1914, oil on canvas, 68 1/4" × 41 3/8", Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Image copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Image source: Art Resource, NY

Image 37 (p. 1108)

Charles Demuth, I Saw the Figure 5 in Gold, 1928, 35 1/2" × 30". oil on cardboard, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Image copyright © The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Image source: Art Resource, NY.

Image 38 (p. 1199)

Museum purchase with funds from the Hope Fund, Indiana University Art Museum, 42.1. Photograph by: Michael Cavanagh and Kevin Montague.

Stuart Davis, Swing Landscape, 1938, 86 3/4" × 172 7/8", oil on canvas, Indiana University Art Museum, Bloomington.

Image 39 (p. 1200)

William Henry Johnson, Jitterbugs VI, c. 1941, hand-colored screenprint, 17 1/16" × 11 1/4", Whitney Museum of American Art, New York.

Whitney Museum of American Art

ONLY A STRONG AMERICA CAN PREVENT NOV.
10¢
ATOMIC WAR!

Image 41 (p. 1525)

Collage by Sally Edelstein, sallyedelsteincollage.com.

MLA Documentation Style

The Modern Language Association (MLA) documentation style is a set of rules for citing sources in formal research essays. It is the most common style for English classes, but be aware that other disciplines follow other models. By documenting sources properly, you make it easier for readers to find the exact texts that informed your opinions and supported your claims. For a teacher grading your paper, your use of systematic citation shows that you have been conscientious in investigating the topic and have avoided plagiarism. For readers who are interested in your paper, your list of works cited can help them learn more about the topic. Rhetorically speaking, a properly documented research paper boosts your ethos and appeals to logos.

Guidelines for In-Text Citations

MLA documentation requires in-text citations that refer to a list of works cited — an alphabetized list of all the sources you've drawn from. Sometimes all the necessary information for an in-text citation fits in the body of your sentence:

> On page 162 of Aerotropolis: The Way We'll Live Next, authors John D. Kasarda and Greg Lindsay suggest that downtown Detroit was doomed as soon as automobiles made the railroads less popular.

But more often you'll include some key information in parentheses just before the period. In this second example, the writer included the book title and authors' names in her sentence and, thus, only needed to provide the page number in parentheses.

> In Aerotropolis: The Way We'll Live Next, John D. Kasarda and Greg Lindsay suggest that downtown Detroit was doomed as soon as automobiles made the railroads less popular (162).

In this third example, there is no source information embedded in the sentence itself, so the in-text citation includes both the authors' names and the page number. Note that the title isn't included. With the authors' names, the reader has enough information to find the relevant entry on the list of works cited.

Although the growth of car manufacturing brought jobs to Detroit, America's drivable network of industrial cities and residential suburbs "bled entire cities dry: starting with Detroit" (Kasarda and Lindsay 180).

Guidelines for a List of Works Cited

Print Resources

1. Book with One Author

A book with one author serves as a general model for most MLA citations. Include author, title, city of publication, publisher, date of publication, and medium.

Beavan, Colin. No Impact Man. New York: Farrar, 2009. Print.

2. Book with Multiple Authors

Kasarda, John D., and Greg Lindsay. Aerotropolis: The Way We'll Live Next. New York: Farrar, 2011. Print.

3. Two or More Works by the Same Author

Multiple entries should be arranged alphabetically by title. The author's name appears at the beginning of the first entry but is replaced by three hyphens and a period in all subsequent entries.

Gladwell, Malcolm. Outliers: The Story of Success. New York: Little, Brown, 2008. Print.

---. What the Dog Saw, and Other Adventures. New York: Little, Brown, 2009. Print.

4. Author and Editor Both Named

Vidal, Gore. The Selected Essays of Gore Vidal. Ed. Jay Parini. New York: Vintage, 2009. Print.

Alternatively, to cite the editor's contribution, start with the editor's name.

Parini, Jay, ed. The Selected Essays of Gore Vidal. By Gore Vidal. New York: Vintage, 2009. Print.

5. Anthology

Oates, Joyce Carol, ed. Telling Stories: An Anthology for Writers. New York: Norton, 1997. Print.

Selection from an anthology:

Washington Irving, "Rip Van Winkle." Conversations in American Literature: Language, Rhetoric, Culture. Ed. Robin Aufses et al. Boston: Bedford/St. Martin's, 2015. 435–48. Print.

6. Translation

Wiesel, Elie. Night. Trans. Marion Wiesel. New York: Hill-Farrar, 2006. Print.

7. Entry in a Reference Work

Because most reference works are alphabetized, you should omit page numbers.

Lounsberry, Barbara. "Joan Didion." Encyclopedia of the Essay. Ed. Tracy Chandler. Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn, 1997. Print.

For a well-known encyclopedia, use only the edition and year of publication. When an article is not attributed to an author, begin the entry with the article title.

"Gilgamesh." The Columbia Encyclopedia. 5th ed. 1993. Print.

8. Sacred Text

Unless a specific published edition is being cited, sacred texts should be omitted from the Works Cited list.

The New Testament. Trans. Richmond Lattimore. New York: North Point-Farrar, 1997. Print.

9. Article in a Journal

The title of the journal should be followed by the volume, issue, and year of the journal's publication.

de Botton, Alain. "Treasure Hunt." Lapham's Quarterly 4.2 (2011): 205–10. Print.

10. Article in a Magazine

In a weekly:

Menand, Louis. "The Unpolitical Animal: How Political Science Understands Voters." New Yorker 30 Aug. 2004: 92–96. Print.

In a monthly:

Baker, Kevin. "Barack Hoover Obama: The Best and the Brightest Blow It Again." Harper's July 2009: 29–37. Print.

11. Article in a Newspaper

If you are citing a local paper that does not contain the city name in its title, add the city name in brackets after the title. When citing an article that does not appear on consecutive pages, list the first page followed by a plus sign. The edition only needs to be included if it is listed on the paper's masthead.

Edge, John T. "Fast Food Even before Fast Food." New York Times 30 Sept. 2009, late ed.: D1+. Print.

12. Review

In a weekly:

Davis, Jordan. "Happy Thoughts!" Rev. of The Golden Age of Paraphernalia, by Kevin Davies. Nation 23 Feb. 2009: 31–34. Print.

In a monthly:

Simpson, Mona. "Imperfect Union." Rev. of Mrs. Woolf and the Servants, by Alison Light. Atlantic Monthly Jan.–Feb. 2009: 93–101. Print.

Electronic Resources

13. Article from a Database Accessed through a Subscription Service

Apply the normal rules for citing a journal article, but follow this with the name of the subscription service in italics, the medium used, and the date of access.

Morano, Michele. "Boy Eats World." Fourth Genre: Explorations in Nonfiction 13.2 (2011): 31–35. Project MUSE. Web. 19 Nov. 2013.

14. Article in an Online Magazine

Follow the author name and article title with the name of the magazine in italics, the organization hosting the Web page (usually found at the very bottom of the site), the date published, the medium, and the date accessed. If there is no host or sponsor of the site, write N.p., for "no publisher."

Yoffe, Emily. "Full Metal Racket: Metal Detecting Is the World's Worst Hobby." Slate. The Slate Group, 25 Sept. 2009. Web. 20 Nov. 2013.

15. Article in an Online Newspaper

Sisario, Ben. "Record Stores: Out of Sight, Not Obsolete." New York Times. New York Times, 29 Sept. 2009. Web. 20 Nov. 2013.

16. Online Review

Stevens, Dana. "Catcher in the MRI." Rev. of 50/50, dir. Adam Levine. Slate. The Slate Group, 30 Sept. 2011. Web. 18 Nov. 2013.

17. Entry in an Online Reference Work

"John Ruskin." Encyclopædia Britannica Online. Encyclopædia Britannica, 2013. Web. 18 July 2013.

18. Work from a Web Site

"Wallace Stevens (1879–1955)." Poetryfoundation.org. Poetry Foundation, 2013. Web. 19 Sept. 2013.

19. Entire Web Site

Web site with editor:

Goldstein, Evan, ed. Arts and Letters Daily. Chronicle of Higher Education, 2013. Web. 2 Oct. 2013.

Web site without an editor:

Poets.org. Academy of American Poets, 2013. Web. 2 May 2013.

Personal Web site:

Mendelson, Edward. Home page. Columbia U, 2013. Web. 25 Nov. 2013.

20. Entire Web Log (Blog)

If there is no host or sponsor of the site, write N.p., for "no publisher."

Holbo, John, ed. The Valve. N.p., 18 Mar. 2012. Web. 19 Nov. 2013.

21. Entry in a Wiki

"Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood." Wikipedia. Wikimedia Foundation, 12 Nov. 2013. Web. 25 Nov. 2013.

Other Sources

22. Film, Video, or DVD

Follow the title with the director, notable performers, the distribution company, the date of release, and the medium. For films viewed on the Web, follow this with the name of the Web site used to view the film, the medium (Web), and the date viewed. If citing a particular individual's work on the film, you may begin the entry with his or her name before the title.

Viewed in a theater:

The Hurt Locker. Dir. Kathryn Bigelow. Summit, 2009. Film.

Viewed on DVD or videocassette (follow the original release date with the distributor and release date of the DVD or video):

Dead Poets Society. Dir. Peter Weir. Perf. Robin Williams. 1989. Buena Vista Home Entertainment, 2006. DVD.

Viewed on the Web (use the original distributor and release date):

Lynch, David, dir. The Elephant Man. Perf. Anthony Hopkins and John Hurt. Paramount, 1980. Netflix. Web. 2 Oct. 2009.

23. Interview

Include the name of the interviewer if it is someone of note.

Personal interview:

Tripp, Lawrence. Personal interview. 14 Apr. 2014.

In print:

Dylan, Bob. "Who Is This Bob Dylan?" Esquire 23 January 2014: 124+. Print.

On the radio:

Gioia, Dana. Interview with Leonard Lopate. The Leonard Lopate Show. NPR. WNYC, New York, 19 July 2004. Radio.

On the Web:

Gioia, Dana. Interview with Leonard Lopate. The Leonard Lopate Show. NPR.org. NPR, 19 July 2004. Web. 2 Oct. 2009.

24. Lecture or Speech

Viewed in person:

Kass, Leon. "Looking for an Honest Man: Reflections of an Unlicensed Humanist." Jefferson Lecture in the Humanities. NEH. Warner Theatre, Washington, D.C. 22 May 2009. Lecture.

Viewed on the Web:

Batuman, Elif. Lowell Humanities Series. Boston College. Boston College Front Row. Trustees of Boston College, 13 Oct. 2010. Web. 2 Oct. 2011.

25. Podcast

"The Consequences to Come." Moderator Robert Silvers. Participants Darryl Pinckney, Ronald Dworkin, Joan Didion, and Mark Danner. New York Review of Books. NYREV, Inc., 24 Sept. 2008. MP3 File.

26. Work of Art or Photograph

In a museum:

Hopper, Edward. Nighthawks. 1942. Oil on canvas. Art Institute, Chicago.

On the Web:

Thiebaud, Wayne. Three Machines. 1963. De Young Museum, San Francisco. Fine Arts Museums of San Francisco. Web. 2 Oct. 2013.

In print:

Clark, Edward. Navy CPO Graham Jackson Plays "Goin' Home." 1945. Life Gallery of Photography. The Great LIFE Photographers. Eds. of Life. New York: Bulfinch, 2004. 78–79. Print.

27. Map or Chart

In print:

"U.S. Personal Savings Rate, 1929–1999." Chart. Credit Card Nation: The Consequences of America's Addiction to Credit. By Robert D. Manning. New York: Basic, 2000. 100. Print.

On the Web:

"1914 New Balkan States and Central Europe Map." Map. National Geographic. National Geographic Society, 2013. Web. 25 Oct. 2013.

28. Cartoon or Comic Strip

In print:

Vey, P. C. Cartoon. New Yorker 10 Nov. 2008: 54. Print.

On the Web:

Davis, Jim. "Garfield." Comic strip. Garfield.com. Paws, 24 July 2001. Web. 2 Oct. 2009.

29. Advertisement

In print:

Rosetta Stone. Advertisement. Harper's Aug. 2008: 21. Print.

On the Web:

Zurich. Advertisement. Wall Street Journal. Dow Jones, Inc., 2 Oct. 2009. Web. 2 Oct. 2009.

this page left intentionally blank

Glossary

ad hominem Latin for "to the man," this fallacy refers to the specific diversionary tactic of switching the argument from the issue at hand to the character of the other speaker. If you argue that a park in your community should not be renovated because the person supporting it was arrested during a domestic dispute, then you are guilty of using an ad hominem fallacy.

ad populum* (bandwagon appeal) Latin for "to the people," this fallacy occurs when evidence used to defend an argument boils down to "everybody's doing it, so it must be a good thing to do."

You should vote to elect Rachel Johnson — she has a strong lead in the polls.

Polling higher does not necessarily make Senator Johnson the "best" candidate; it only makes her the most popular.

allegory A literary work that portrays abstract ideas concretely. Characters in an allegory are frequently personifications of abstract ideas and are given names that refer to these ideas. See Washington Irving, "Rip Van Winkle," p. 435.

alliteration Repetition of the same consonant sound at the beginning of several words or syllables in sequence.

Let us go forth to lead the land we love. — John F. Kennedy allusion Brief reference to a person, an event, or a place (real or fictitious) or to a work of art.

Let both sides unite to heed in all corners of the earth the command of Isaiah.
— John F. Kennedy

analogy A comparison between two seemingly dissimilar things. Often, an analogy uses something simple or familiar to explain something complex or unfamiliar.

"My boy, you've got to know the shape of the river perfectly. It is all there is left to steer by on a very dark night. Every thing else is blotted out and gone. But mind you, it hasn't the same shape in the night that it has in the daytime."
"How on earth am I ever going to learn it, then?"

"How do you follow a hall at home in the dark? Because you know the shape of it. You can't see it." — Mark Twain anaphora Repetition of a word or phrase at the beginning of successive phrases, clauses, or lines.

. . . not as a call to bear arms, though arms we need — not as a call to battle, though embattled we are . . . — John F. Kennedy anecdote A brief story used to illustrate a point or claim.

annotation The taking of notes directly on a text. See p. 52.

antimetabole Repetition of words in reverse order.

Ask not what your country can do for you — ask what you can do for your country. — John F. Kennedy antithesis Opposition, or contrast, of ideas or words in a parallel construction.

We shall . . . support any friend, oppose any foe . . . — John F. Kennedy apostrophe A direct address to an abstraction (such as Time), a thing (the Wind), an animal, or an imaginary or absent person.

Make me, O Lord, thy Spining Wheele complete. — Edward Taylor appeal to false authority This fallacy occurs when someone who has no credibility to speak on an issue is cited as an authority. A TV star, for instance, is not a medical expert, though pharmaceutical advertisements often use such celebrities to endorse products.

According to former congressional leader Ari Miller, the Himalayas have an estimated Yeti population of between 300 and 500 individuals.

archaic diction Old-fashioned or outdated choice of words.

. . . beliefs for which our forebears fought . . . — John F. Kennedy argument A process of reasoned inquiry. A persuasive discourse resulting in a coherent and considered movement from a claim to a conclusion.

Aristotelian triangle See rhetorical triangle.

assertion A statement that presents a claim or thesis.

assonance The repetition of vowel sounds in a sequence of words.

That church so lone, the log-built one,
That echoed to many a parting groan
And natural prayer
Of dying foemen mingled there. — Herman Melville assumption See warrant.

asyndeton Omission of conjunctions between coordinate phrases, clauses, or words.

We shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe to assure the survival and the success of liberty. — John F. Kennedy audience The listener, viewer, or reader of a text. Most texts are likely to have multiple audiences.

Gehrig's audience was his teammates and the fans in the stadium that day, but it was also the teams he played against, the fans listening on the radio, and posterity — us.

backing In the Toulmin model, backing consists of further assurances or data without which the assumption lacks authority. For an example, see Toulmin model.

bandwagon appeal See ad populum* (bandwagon appeal).

begging the question A fallacy in which a claim is based on evidence or support that is in doubt. It "begs" a question whether the support itself is sound.

Giving students easy access to a wealth of facts and resources online allows them to develop critical thinking skills.

bias A prejudice or preconceived notion that prevents a person from approaching a topic in a neutral or an objective way. While you can be biased toward something, the most common usage has a negative connotation.

blank verse Unrhymed iambic pentameter. See also iambic pentameter. See Robert Frost, "Mending Wall," p. 1080.

caesura A pause within a line of poetry, sometimes punctuated, sometimes not, that often mirrors natural speech.

The apparition of these faces in the crowd;
Petals on a wet, black bough. — Ezra Pound characterization The method by which the author builds, or reveals, a character; it can be direct or indirect. Indirect characterization means that an author shows rather than tells us what a character is like through what the character says, does, or thinks or through what others say about the character. Direct characterization occurs when a narrator tells the reader who a character is by describing the background, motivation, temperament, or appearance of a character.

circular reasoning A fallacy in which the argument repeats the claim as a way to provide evidence.

You can't give me a C; I'm an A student!

claim Also called an assertion or proposition, a claim states the argument's main idea or position. A claim differs from a topic or subject in that a claim has to be arguable.

claim of fact A claim of fact asserts that something is true or not true.

The number of suicides and homicides committed by teenagers, most often young men, has exploded in the last three decades. — Anna Quindlen claim of policy A claim of policy proposes a change.

Yet one solution continues to elude us, and that is ending the ignorance about mental health, and moving it from the margins of care and into the mainstream where it belongs. — Anna Quindlen claim of value A claim of value argues that something is good or bad, right or wrong.

> There's a plague on all our houses, and since it doesn't announce itself with lumps or spots or protest marches, it has gone unremarked in the quiet suburbs and busy cities where it has been laying waste. — Anna Quindlen classical oration Five-part argument structure used by classical rhetoricians. The five parts of a classical oration are introduction (exordium) Introduces the reader to the subject under discussion.

narration (narratio) Provides factual information and background material on the subject at hand or establishes why the subject is a problem that needs addressing.

confirmation (confirmatio) Usually the major part of the text, the confirmation includes the proof needed to make the writer's case.

refutation (refutatio) Addresses the counterargument. It is a bridge between the writer's proof and conclusion.

conclusion (peroratio) Brings the essay to a satisfying close.

See Sandra Day O'Connor and Roy Romer, "Not by Math Alone," p. 117.

closed thesis A closed thesis is a statement of the main idea of the argument that also previews the major points the writer intends to make.

> The three-dimensional characters, exciting plot, and complex themes of the Harry Potter series make them not only legendary children's books but enduring literary classics.

complex sentence A sentence that includes one independent clause and at least one dependent clause.

> If a free society cannot help the many who are poor, it cannot save the few who are rich. — John F. Kennedy compound sentence A sentence that includes at least two independent clauses.

> The energy, the faith, the devotion which we bring to this endeavor will light our country and all who serve it—and the glow from that fire can truly light the world. — John F. Kennedy concession An acknowledgment that an opposing argument may be true or reasonable. In a strong argument, a concession is usually accompanied by a refutation challenging the validity of the opposing argument.

> Lou Gehrig concedes what some of his listeners may think — that his bad break is a cause for discouragement or despair.

connotation Meanings or associations that readers have with a word beyond its dictionary definition, or denotation. Connotations are often positive or negative, and they often greatly affect the author's tone. Consider the connotations of the words below, all of which mean "overweight."

> That cat is plump. That cat is fat. That cat is obese.

context The circumstances, atmosphere, attitudes, and events surrounding a text.

The context for Lou Gehrig's speech is the recent announcement of his illness and his subsequent retirement, but also the poignant contrast between his potent career and his debilitating disease.

counterargument An opposing argument to the one a writer is putting forward. Rather than ignoring a counterargument, a strong writer will usually address it through the process of concession and refutation.

Some of Lou Gehrig's listeners might have argued that his bad break was a cause for discouragement or despair.

counterargument thesis A type of thesis statement that includes a brief counterargument, usually qualified with although or but.

Although the Harry Potter series may have some literary merit, its popularity has less to do with storytelling than with merchandising.

cumulative sentence A sentence that completes the main idea at the beginning of the sentence and then builds and adds on.

But neither can two great and powerful groups of nations take comfort from our present course — both sides overburdened by the cost of modern weapons, both rightly alarmed by the steady spread of the deadly atom, yet both racing to alter that uncertain balance of terror that stays the hand of mankind's final war.
— John F. Kennedy

deduction Deduction is a logical process wherein you reach a conclusion by starting with a general principle or universal truth (a major premise) and applying it to a specific case (a minor premise). The process of deduction is usually demonstrated in the form of a syllogism:

MAJOR PREMISE Exercise contributes to better health.

MINOR PREMISE Yoga is a type of exercise.

CONCLUSION Yoga contributes to better health.

diction A speaker's choice of words. Analysis of diction looks at these choices and what they add to the speaker's message.

either/or (false dilemma) In this fallacy, the speaker presents two extreme options as the only possible choices.

Either we agree to higher taxes, or our grandchildren will be mired in debt.

ekphrasis Ekphrastic art or writing comments on another genre—for instance, a work of art that comments on a piece of music, or a poem that comments on a painting. See Stuart Davis, Swing Landscape, p. 1198, or Jayne Cortez, Jazz Fan Looks Back, p. 1207.

end rhyme See rhyme.

enjambment A poetic technique in which one line ends without a pause and continues to the next line to complete its meaning; also referred to as a "run-on line."

Icicles filled the long window
With barbaric glass. — Wallace Stevens enthymeme Essentially, a syllogism with one of the premises implied and taken for granted as true.

You should take her class because I learned so much from her last year.

(Implied premise: If you take her class, you will learn a lot too.)

epigram A short, witty statement designed to surprise an audience or a reader.

To be great is to be misunderstood. — Ralph Waldo Emerson epigraph A quotation preceding a work of literature that helps set the text's mood or suggests its themes.

Mistah Kurtz — he dead.
A penny for the Old Guy — T. S. Eliot equivocation A fallacy that uses a term with two or more meanings in an attempt to misrepresent or deceive.

We will bring our enemies to justice, or we will bring justice to them.

ethos Greek for "character." Speakers appeal to ethos to demonstrate that they are credible and trustworthy to speak on a given topic. Ethos is established by both who you are and what you say.

Lou Gehrig brings the ethos of being a legendary athlete to his speech, yet in it he establishes a different kind of ethos — that of a regular guy and a good sport who shares the audience's love of baseball and family. And like them, he has known good luck and bad breaks.

eulogy A poem, a speech, or another work written in great praise of something or someone, usually a person no longer living. See Frederick Douglass, "Reminiscences of Abraham Lincoln by Distinguished Men of His Time," p. 699, or Walt Whitman, "O Captain! My Captain!," p. 659.

eye rhyme See rhyme.

fallacy See logical fallacies.

false dilemma See either/or.

faulty analogy A fallacy that occurs when an analogy compares not comparable. For instance, to argue that we should legalize human euthanasia, since we all agree that it is humane to put terminally ill animals to sleep, ignores significant emotional and ethical differences between the ways we view humans and animals.

figurative language (figure of speech) Nonliteral language, often evoking strong imagery, sometimes referred to as a trope. Figures of speech often compare one thing to another either explicitly (using simile) or implicitly (using metaphor). Other forms of figurative language include personification, paradox, overstatement (hyperbole), understatement, metonymy, synecdoche, and irony.

first-hand evidence Evidence based on something the writer knows, whether from personal experience, observation, or general knowledge of events.

form Refers to the defining structural characteristics of a work, especially a poem (i.e., meter and rhyme scheme). Often poets work within set forms, such as the sonnet, which require adherence to fixed conventions.

hasty generalization A fallacy in which a faulty conclusion is reached because of inadequate evidence.

Smoking isn't bad for you; my great aunt smoked a pack a day and lived to be ninety.

hortative sentence Sentence that exhorts, urges, entreats, implores, or calls to action.

Let both sides explore what problems unite us instead of belaboring those problems which divide us. — John F. Kennedy hyperbole Deliberate exaggeration used for emphasis or to produce a comic or an ironic effect; an overstatement to make a point.

. . . I am the only Negro in the United States whose grandfather on the mother's side was not an Indian chief. — Zora Neale Hurston iambic pentameter An iamb, the most common metrical foot in English poetry, is made up of an unstressed syllable followed by a stressed one. Iambic pentameter, then, is a rhythmic meter containing five iambs. Unrhymed iambic pentameter is called blank verse. See also meter; blank verse.

Whĕnĕvĕr Rĭchărd Cŏry wĕnt dŏwn tŏwn,

Wĕ pĕoplĕ ŏn thĕ păvemĕnt lŏoked ăt hĭm: — E. A. Robinson imagery A description of how something looks, feels, tastes, smells, or sounds. Imagery may use literal or figurative language to appeal to the senses.

None of them knew the color of the sky. Their eyes glanced level, and were fastened upon the waves that swept toward them. These waves were of the hue of slate, save for the tops, which were of foaming white, and all of the men knew the colors of the sea. — Stephen Crane imperative sentence Sentence used to command or enjoin.

My fellow citizens of the world: ask not what America will do for you, but what together we can do for the freedom of man. — John F. Kennedy induction From the Latin inducere, "to lead into," induction is a logical process wherein you reason from particulars to universals, using specific cases in order to draw a conclusion, which is also called a generalization.

Regular exercise promotes weight loss.
Exercise lowers stress levels.
Exercise improves mood and outlook.
GENERALIZATION Exercise contributes to better health.

internal rhyme See rhyme.

inversion Inverted order of words in a sentence (deviation from the standard subject-verb-object order).

> United there is little we cannot do in a host of cooperative ventures. Divided there is little we can do. — John F. Kennedy irony, dramatic Tension created by the contrast between what a character says or thinks and what the audience or readers know to be true; as a result of this technique, some words and actions in a story or play take on a different meaning for the reader than they do for the characters. See Ambrose Bierce, "An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge," p. 875.

irony, situational A discrepancy between what is expected and what actually happens. See Jourdon Anderson, "To My Old Master," p. 829.

irony, verbal A figure of speech that occurs when a speaker or character says one thing but means something else or when what is said is the opposite of what is expected, creating a noticeable incongruity. Sarcasm involves verbal irony used derisively.

> Without a woman to rule him and think for him, [man] is a truly lamentable spectacle: a baby with whiskers, a rabbit with the frame of an aurochs, a feeble and preposterous caricature of God. — H. L. Mencken juxtaposition Placement of two things closely together to emphasize similarities or differences.

> The nations of Asia and Africa are moving at jet-like speed toward gaining political independence, but we still creep at horse-and-buggy pace toward gaining a cup of coffee at a lunch counter. — Martin Luther King Jr.

logical fallacies Logical fallacies are potential vulnerabilities or weaknesses in an argument. They often arise from a failure to make a logical connection between the claim and the evidence used to support it.

logos Greek for "embodied thought." Speakers appeal to logos, or reason, by offering clear, rational ideas and using specific details, examples, facts, statistics, or expert testimony to back them up.

> Gehrig starts with the thesis that he is "the luckiest man on the face of the earth" and supports it with two points: (1) the love and kindness he's received in his seventeen years of playing baseball and (2) a list of great people who have been his friends, family, and teammates.

metaphor Figure of speech that compares two things without using like or as.

> And if a beachhead of cooperation may push back the jungle of suspicion . . . — John F. Kennedy meter The formal, regular organization of stressed and unstressed syllables, measured in feet. A foot is distinguished by the number of syllables it contains and how stress is placed on the syllables — stressed (´) or unstressed (˘). There are five typical feet in English verse: iamb (˘ ´), trochee (´ ˘), anapest (˘ ˘ ´), dactyl (´ ˘ ˘), and spondee (´ ´). Some meters dictate the number of feet per line, the most common being tetrameter, pentameter, and hexameter, having four, five, and six feet, respectively.

metonymy Figure of speech in which something is represented by another thing that is related to it or emblematic of it.

The pen is mightier than the sword.

modernism In literature, modernism refers to a movement of writers that reached its apex between the 1920s and 1930s and expressed disillusionment with contemporary Western civilization, especially in the wake of World War I's mindless slaughter. Rejecting the conventions of the Victorian era, these writers experimented with form and used insights from recent writings by Freud and Jung about the unconscious. They viewed art as restorative and frequently ordered their writing around symbols and allusions. Some American modernist writers include T. S. Eliot (p. 1113), Wallace Stevens (p. 1084), William Carlos Williams (p. 1106), and William Faulkner (p. 1155).

modifier An adjective, an adverb, a phrase, or a clause that modifies a noun, pronoun, or verb. The purpose of a modifier is usually to describe, focus, or qualify.

. . . high above the forest wall a clean-stemmed dead tree waved a single leafy bough that glowed like a flame in the unobstructed splendor that was flowing from the sun. — Mark Twain mood The feeling or atmosphere created by a text.

narrative frame Also known as a frame story, a narrative frame is a plot device in which the author places the main narrative of his or her work within another narrative — the narrative frame. This exterior narrative usually serves to explain the main narrative in some way. See Washington Irving, "Rip Van Winkle," p. 435.

near rhyme See rhyme.

nominalization The process of changing a verb into a noun.

Discuss becomes discussion. Depend becomes dependence.

occasion The time and place a speech is given or a piece is written.

In the case of Gehrig's speech, the occasion is Lou Gehrig Appreciation Day. More specifically, his moment came at home plate between games of a doubleheader.

onomatopoeia Use of words that refer to sounds and whose pronunciations mimic those sounds.

That echoed to many a parting groan . . .
And all is hushed at Shiloh. — Herman Melville open thesis An open thesis is one that does not list all the points the writer intends to cover in the essay.

The popularity of the Harry Potter series demonstrates that simplicity trumps complexity when it comes to the taste of readers, both young and old.

oxymoron A paradox made up of two seemingly contradictory words.

But this peaceful revolution . . . — John F. Kennedy paradox A statement or situation that is seemingly contradictory on the surface but delivers an ironic truth.

A smart Indian is a dangerous person. — Sherman Alexie

We are starved before we are hungry. — Henry David Thoreau parallelism Similarity of structure in a pair or series of related words, phrases, or clauses.

Let both sides explore. . . . Let both sides, for the first time, formulate serious and precise proposals. . . . Let both sides seek to invoke. . . . Let both sides unite to heed . . . — John F. Kennedy passive voice A sentence employs passive voice when the subject doesn't act but rather is acted on.

I know not whether an Account is given of the means I used to establish the Philadelphia publick Library. — Benjamin Franklin pathos Greek for "suffering" or "experience." Speakers appeal to pathos to emotionally motivate their audience. More specific appeals to pathos might play on the audience's values, desires, and hopes, on the one hand, or fears and prejudices, on the other.

The most striking appeal to pathos is the poignant contrast between Gehrig's horrible diagnosis and his public display of courage.

periodic sentence A sentence whose main clause is withheld until the end.

To that world assembly of sovereign states, the United Nations, our last best hope in an age where the instruments of war have far outpaced the instruments of peace, we renew our pledge of support. — John F. Kennedy persona Greek for "mask." The face or character that a speaker shows to his or her audience.

Lou Gehrig is a famous baseball hero, but in his speech he presents himself as a common man who is modest and thankful for the opportunities he's had.

personification Attribution of a lifelike quality to an inanimate object or an idea.

. . . with history the final judge of our deeds . . . — John F. Kennedy poetic syntax Similar to syntax in prose, poetic syntax also includes the arrangement of words into lines of poetry — where they break and do not break, the use of enjambment or caesura, and line lengths and patterns.

polemic Greek for "hostile." An aggressive argument that tries to establish the superiority of one opinion over all others, a polemic generally does not concede that opposing opinions have any merit.

polysyndeton The deliberate use of multiple conjunctions between coordinate phrases, clauses, or words.

I paid for my plane ticket and the taxes and the fees and the charge for the checked bag and five dollars for a bottle of water.

point of view The perspective from which a work is told. The most common narrative vantage points are first person Told by a narrator who is a character in the story and who refers to him- or herself as "I." First-person narrators are sometimes unreliable narrators because they don't always see the big picture or because they might be biased.

second person Though rare, some stories are told using second-person pronouns (you). This casts the reader as a character in the story.

third-person limited omniscient Told by a narrator who relates the action using third-person pronouns (he, she, it). This narrator is usually privy to the thoughts and actions of only one character.

third-person omniscient Told by a narrator using third-person pronouns. This narrator is privy to the thoughts and actions of all the characters in the story.

post hoc ergo propter hoc This fallacy is Latin for "after which therefore because of which," meaning that it is incorrect to always claim that something is a cause just because it happened earlier. One may loosely summarize this fallacy by saying that correlation does not imply causation.

We elected Johnson as president and look where it got us: hurricanes, floods, stock market crashes.

propaganda The spread of ideas and information to further a cause. In its negative sense, propaganda is the use of rumors, lies, disinformation, and scare tactics in order to damage or promote a cause.

pun A play on words that derives its humor from the replacement of one word with another that has a similar pronunciation or spelling but a different meaning. A pun can also derive humor from the use of a single word that has more than one meaning.

Offhand, I can think of two Jacks — there was Jack of "Jack and the Beanstalk," and Jack the Ripper, who cut quite a figure in his day. — Groucho Marx purpose The goal the speaker wants to achieve.

One of Gehrig's chief purposes in delivering his farewell address is to thank his fans and his teammates, but he also wants to demonstrate that he remains positive: he emphasizes his past luck and present optimism and downplays his illness.

qualified argument An argument that is not absolute. It acknowledges the merits of an opposing view but develops a stronger case for its own position.

qualifier Qualifiers are words like usually, probably, maybe, in most cases, and most likely that are used to temper claims a bit, making them less absolute.

UNQUALIFIED Dogs are more obedient than cats.

QUALIFIED Dogs are generally more obedient than cats.

qualitative evidence Evidence supported by reason, tradition, or precedent.

quantitative evidence Quantitative evidence includes things that can be measured, cited, counted, or otherwise represented in numbers — for instance, statistics, surveys, polls, and census information.

rebuttal In the Toulmin model, a rebuttal gives voice to possible objections. For an example, see Toulmin model.

red herring A type of logical fallacy wherein the speaker relies on distraction to derail an argument, usually by skipping to a new or an irrelevant topic. The term derives from the dried fish that trainers used to distract dogs when teaching them to hunt foxes.

We can debate these regulations until the cows come home, but what the American people want to know is, when are we going to end this partisan bickering?

reservation In the Toulmin model, a reservation explains the terms and conditions necessitated by the qualifier. For an example, see Toulmin model.

rhetoric Aristotle defined rhetoric as "the faculty of observing in any given case the available means of persuasion." In other words, it is the art of finding ways of persuading an audience.

rhetorical appeals Rhetorical techniques used to persuade an audience by emphasizing what they find most important or compelling. The three major appeals are to ethos (character), logos (reason), and pathos (emotion).

rhetorical question Figure of speech in the form of a question posed for rhetorical effect rather than for the purpose of getting an answer.

Will you join in that historic effort? — John F. Kennedy rhetorical triangle (Aristotelian triangle) A diagram that illustrates the interrelationship among the speaker, audience, and subject in determining a text. See p. 3.

rhyme The poetic repetition of the same (or similar) vowel sounds or of vowel and consonant combinations. A rhyme at the end of two or more lines of poetry is called an end rhyme. A rhyme that occurs within a line is called an internal rhyme. A rhyme that pairs sounds that are similar but not exactly the same is called a near rhyme or a slant rhyme. A rhyme that only works because the words look the same is called an eye rhyme or a sight rhyme. Rhyme often follows a pattern, called a rhyme scheme.

end rhyme
Thou ill-formed offspring of my feeble brain,
Who after birth didst by my side remain, — Anne Bradstreet internal rhyme

And crown thy good with brotherhood
From sea to shining sea! — Katharine Lee Bates near rhyme or slant rhyme

Let poets and historians set these forth,
My obscure lines shall not so dim their worth. — Anne Bradstreet eye rhyme

Unmoved — she notes the Chariots — pausing —
At her low Gate —
Unmoved — an Emperor be kneeling
Upon her Mat — — Emily Dickinson

Rogerian arguments Developed by psychiatrist Carl Rogers, Rogerian arguments are based on the assumption that fully understanding an opposing position is essential to responding to it persuasively and refuting it in a way that is accommodating rather than alienating.

satire The use of irony or sarcasm as a means of critique, usually of a society or an individual.

scheme Artful syntax; a deviation from the normal order of words. Common schemes include parallelism, juxtaposition, antithesis, and antimetabole.

second-hand evidence Evidence that is accessed through research, reading, and investigation. It includes factual and historical information, expert opinion, and quantitative data.

simile A figure of speech used to explain or clarify an idea by comparing it explicitly to something else, using the words like, as, or as though.

The linear, two-dimensional action of soccer is like the rocking of a boat but without any storm and while the boat has not even left the dock. — Stephen H. Webb slant rhyme See rhyme.

SOAPS A mnemonic device that stands for Subject, Occasion, Audience, Purpose, and Speaker. It is a handy way to remember the various elements that make up the rhetorical situation.

sonnet, Petrarchan Also known as the Italian sonnet, its fourteen lines are divided into an octave and a sestet. The octave rhymes abba, abba; the sestet that follows can have a variety of different rhyme schemes: cdcdcd, cdecde, cddcdd. See Paul Laurence Dunbar, "Douglass," p. 897.

sonnet, Shakespearean Also known as the English sonnet, its fourteen lines are composed of three quatrains and a couplet, and its rhyme scheme is abab, cdcd, efef, gg. See Robert Hayden, "Frederick Douglass," p. 898.

sound The musical quality of poetry, as created through techniques such as rhyme, enjambment, caesura, alliteration, assonance, onomatopoeia, and rhythm.

speaker The person or group who creates a text. This might be a politician who delivers a speech, a commentator who writes an article, an artist who draws a political cartoon, or even a company that commissions an advertisement.

In his farewell address, the speaker is not just Lou Gehrig, but baseball hero and ALS victim Lou Gehrig, a common man who is modest and thankful for the opportunities he's had.

stance A speaker's attitude toward the audience (different from tone, which is the speaker's attitude toward the subject).

straw man A fallacy that occurs when a speaker chooses a deliberately poor or oversimplified example in order to ridicule and refute an idea.

Politician X proposes that we put astronauts on Mars in the next four years. Politician Y ridicules this proposal by saying that his opponent is looking for "little green men in outer space."

subject The topic of a text. What the text is about.

Lou Gehrig's subject in his speech is his illness, but it is also an expression of his gratitude for all the lucky breaks that preceded his diagnosis.

syllogism A logical structure that uses the major premise and minor premise to reach a necessary conclusion.

MAJOR PREMISE Exercise contributes to better health.

MINOR PREMISE Yoga is a type of exercise.

CONCLUSION Yoga contributes to better health.

symbol A setting, an object, or an event in a story that carries more than literal meaning and therefore represents something significant to understanding the meaning of a work of literature.

In "The Chrysanthemums," the flowers represent the beauty and grace the main character longs for but that elude her.

synecdoche Figure of speech that uses a part to represent the whole.

In your hands, my fellow citizens, more than mine, will rest the final success or failure of our course. — John F. Kennedy syntax The arrangement of words into phrases, clauses, and sentences. This includes word order (subject-verb-object, for instance, or an inverted structure); the length and structure of sentences (simple, compound, complex, or compound-complex); and such schemes as parallelism, juxtaposition, antithesis, and antimetabole.

synthesis Combining two or more ideas in order to create something more complex in support of a new idea.

text While this term generally refers to the written word, in the humanities it has come to mean any cultural product that can be "read" — meaning not just consumed and comprehended but also investigated. This includes fiction, nonfiction, poetry, political cartoons, fine art, photography, performances, fashion, cultural trends, and much more.

tone A speaker's attitude toward the subject as conveyed by the speaker's stylistic and rhetorical choices.

Toulmin model An approach to analyzing and constructing arguments created by British philosopher Stephen Toulmin in his book The Uses of Argument (1958). The Toulmin model can be stated as a template:

> Because (evidence as support), therefore (claim), since (warrant or assumption), on account of (backing), unless (reservation).
>
> Because it is raining, therefore I should probably take my umbrella, since it will keep me dry, on account of its waterproof material, unless, of course, there is a hole in it.

trope Artful diction; from the Greek word for "turning," a figure of speech such as metaphor, simile, hyperbole, metonymy, or synecdoche.

understatement A figure of speech in which something is presented as less important, dire, urgent, good, and so on than it actually is, often for satiric or comical effect. Also called litotes, it is the opposite of hyperbole.

> The night in prison was novel and interesting enough. — Henry David Thoreau warrant In the Toulmin model, the warrant expresses the assumption necessarily shared by the speaker and the audience.

wit In rhetoric, the use of laughter, humor, irony, and satire in the confirmation or refutation of an argument.

zeugma Use of two different words in a grammatically similar way that produces different, often incongruous, meanings.

> Now the trumpet summons us again — not as a call to bear arms, though arms we need — not as a call to battle, though embattled we are — but a call to bear the burden.
> — John F. Kennedy
>
> And Benjamin tries to shove me into a barbed wire paddock and make me grow potatoes or Chicagoes. — D. H. Lawrence

this page left intentionally blank

Aaron Abeyta. "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Tortilla." From Colcha. Copyright © 2001 by Aaron Abeyta. Reprinted by permission of University Press of Colorado.
Sherman Alexie. "Superman and Me." Originally published in The Most Wonderful Books by Milkweed Editions. Copyright © 1997 by Sherman Alexie. All rights reserved. Used by permission of Nancy Stauffer Associates. "My Heroes Have Never Been Cowboys." From The First Indian on the Moon. Copyright © 1993 by Sherman Alexie. Reprinted by permission of Hanging Loose Press.
Paula Gunn Allen. Excerpt from Pocahontas: Medicine Woman, Spy, Entrepreneur Diplomat (pp. 17–19, 54, 59–61). Copyright © 2003 by Paula Gunn Allen. Reprinted by permission of HarperCollins Publishers.
Antonio Alvarez. Excerpt from "Out of My Hands." From Underground Grads: UCLA Undocumented Immigrant Students Speak Out (pp. 52–56). Copyright © 2008 UCLA Center for Labor Research and Education. Reprinted with permission.
Julia Alvarez. "Snow." From How the Garcia Girls Lost Their Accents. Copyright © 1991 by Julia Alvarez. Published by Algonquin Books of Chapel Hill. Reprinted by permission of Susan Bergholz Literary Services, New York, NY and Lamy, NM. All rights reserved.
Benjamin Anastas. "The Foul Reign of 'Self-Reliance.'" From The New York Times, December 4, 2011. Copyright © 2011 by The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com
Anne Applebaum. "If the Japanese Can't Build a Safe Reactor, Who Can?" From The Washington Post, washingtonpost.com/opinions, March 14, 2011. Copyright © 2011 by The Washington Post Writers' Group. Reprinted by permission of The Washington Post.
Margaret Atwood. "Hello Martians. Let Moby-Dick Explain." From The New York Times, April 28, 2012. Copyright © 2012 The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com
W. H. Auden. "The Unknown Citizen." From W. H. Auden Collected Poems. Copyright © 1940 and renewed 1968 by W. H. Auden. Used by permission of Random House, an imprint of The Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission. Content without express written permission is prohibited.
James Baldwin. "Notes of a Native Son." From Notes of a Native Son by James Baldwin. Copyright © 1955, renewed 1983 by James Baldwin. Reprinted by permission of Beacon Press, Boston.
Whitney Balliett. "Daddy-O." From Collected Works: A Journal of Jazz 1954–2001. Copyright © 2001 by Whitney Balliet. Reprinted by permission of St. Martin's Press. All Rights Reserved.
Donald Barthelme. "The King of Jazz." Currently collected in Sixty Stories. Copyright © 1981, 1982 by Donald Barthelme. Used by permission of The Wylie Agency LLC.
Laurence Bergreen. Excerpt from Columbus, The Four Voyages. Copyright © 20101 by Laurence Bergreen. Used by permission of Viking Penguin, a division of Penguin Group (USA) LLC.
Ira Berlin. Excerpt from "Who Freed the Slaves? Emancipation and Its Meaning." From Union and Emancipation: Essays on Politics and Race in the Civil War Era, edited by David Blight and D. Simpson Brooks. Reprinted by permission of The Kent State University Press.
Michael S. Berliner. "The Christopher Columbus Controversy." First published in the Los Angeles Times, December 30, 1991. Copyright © 1991 by The Ayn Rand Institute. Reprinted by permission of Ayn Rand Institute.
Elizabeth Bishop. "The Fish." From Poems by Elizabeth Bishop. Copyright © 2011 by The Alice H. Methfessel Trust. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux, LLC.
Michael R. Bloomberg. August 3, 2010 Speech of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg of the City of New York is used with permission of the City of New York.
Eavan Boland. "Becoming Anne Bradstreet." From Shakespeare's Sisters: Women Writers Bridge Five Centuries, published by the Folger Shakespeare Library. Copyright © 2012 Eavan Boland. Reprinted by permission of the author.
Julian Bond and Sondra Kathryn Wilson. Excerpt from Introduction of Lift Every Voice and Sing: A Celebration of the Negro National Anthem: 100 Years, 100 Voices edited by Julian Bond and Sondra Kathryn

Wilson. Copyright © 2000 by Julian Bond and Sondra Kathryn Wilson. Used by permission of Random House, an imprint of The Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

Leon Botstein. "Let Teenagers Try Adulthood." From The New York Times, May 17, 1999. Copyright © 1999 by Leon Botstein. Reprinted with permission of Leon Botstein.

Charles Bowden. Excerpts from "Our Wall." From National Geographic Magazine, May 2007. Copyright © 2013 National Geographic Society. All rights reserved. Reprinted by permission of National Geographic Society.

Alan Brinkley. Excerpt from The Fifties, "The Affluent Society," "Fifties Society." Copyright © by Alan Brinkley. Permission granted by the author.

Ken Chowder. Excerpt from "The Father of American Terrorism." From American Heritage Magazine, February/March 2000, Volume 51, Issue 1. Reprinted by permission of the author.

Eleanor Clift. "Inside Kennedy's Inauguration, 50 Years On." From Newsweek, January 20, 2011. Copyright © 2011 The Newsweek/Daily Beast Company LLC. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited.

Lucille Clifton. "homage to my hips." Copyright © 1980 by Lucille Clifton. Now appears in The Collected Poems of Lucille Clifton 1965–2010 by Lucille Clifton, published by BOA Editions. Reprinted by permission of Curtis Brown, Ltd.

Judith Ortiz Cofer. "The Myth of the Latin Woman: I Just Met a Girl Named Maria." From The Latin Deli: Prose and Poetry by Judith Ortiz Cofer. Copyright © 1993 by Judith Ortiz Cofer. Reprinted by permission of The University of Georgia Press.

William J. Connell. "What Columbus Day Really Means." From The American Scholar, Volume 79, No. 4, Autumn 2010. Copyright © 2010 by William Connell. Reprinted by permission of The American Scholar.

Jayne Cortez. Excerpt from "Jazz Fan Looks Back." Copyright © 2002 by Jayne Cortez. Reprinted by permission of Hanging Loose Press.

Hart Crane. "Van Winkle." From The Complete Poems of Hart Crane by Hart Crane, edited by Marc Simon. Copyright © 1933, 1958, 1966 by Liveright Publishing Corporation. Copyright © 1986 by Marc Simon. Used by permission of Liveright Publishing Corporation. This selection may not be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means without the prior written permission of the publisher.

E. E. Cummings. "Buffalo Bill 's." Copyright © 1923, 1951, copyright © 1991 by the Trustees for the E.E. Cummings Trust. Copyright © 1976 by George James Firmage. "in Just-." Copyright © 1923, 1951, copyright © 1991 by the Trustees for the E.E. Cummings Trust. Copyright © 1976 by George James Firmage, from Complete Poems: 1904–1962 by E. E. Cummings, edited by George J. Firmage. Used by permission of Liveright Publishing Corporation. This selection may not be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means without the prior written permission of the publisher.

Mario Cuomo. Excerpts from "Abraham Lincoln and Our 'Unfinished Work.'" From Journal of the Abraham Lincoln Association. Copyright © 1986 by the Board of Trustees of the University of Illinois. Used with the permission of the University of Illinois Press.

Harlon L. Dalton. "Horatio Alger." From Racial Healing by Harlon Dalton. Copyright © 1995 by Harlon L. Dalton. Used by permission of Doubleday, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

Edwidge Danticat. "New York Day Women." From Krik? Krak! Copyright © 1995 by Edwidge Danticat. Reprinted by permission of Soho Press, Inc. All rights reserved.

Kenneth C. Davis. "America's True History of Religious Tolerance." Originally appeared in Smithsonian Magazine, October 2010. Copyright © by Kenneth C. Davis. Reprinted by permission of the author. Kenneth C. Davis is the New York Times Best Selling author of Don't Know Much About About © History and America's Hidden History. Visit dontknowmuch.com for more information about Davis and other titles in his Don't Know Much About © series for adults and children.

Frank Deford. "Americans Hit the Brakes on NASCAR." From NPR, March 21, 2012. Copyright © 2012 by Frank Deford. Reprinted by permission of the author.
Emily Dickinson. "Success is Counted Sweetest," "The Soul selects her own Society," "After great pain, a formal feeling comes," "My life had stood—a loaded gun," and "I heard a Fly buzz—when I died." Reprinted by permission of the publishers and the Trustees of Amherst College from The Poems of Emily Dickinson, edited by Thomas H. Johnson, Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press. Copyright © 1951, 1955, 1979, 1983 by the President and Fellows of Harvard College.
Joan Didion. "On Self-Respect" and "Santa Ana Winds" from "Los Angeles Notebook." From Slouching Towards Bethlehem by Joan Didion. Copyright © 1966, 1968, renewed 1996 by Joan Didion. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux, LLC.
Annie Dillard. "Living Like Weasels." From Teaching a Stone to Talk: Expeditions and Encounters by Annie Dillard. Copyright © 1982 by Annie Dillard. Reprinted by permission of HarperCollins Publishers.
Amy Domini. "Why Investing in Fast Food May Be a Good Thing." From Ode Magazine, March 2009. Reprinted by permission of Amy Domini.
Ross Douthat. "The Secrets of Princeton." From The New York Times, April 7, 2013. Copyright © 2013 The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com
Rita Dove. "Rosa." From On the Bus with Rosa Parks by Rita Dove. Copyright © 1999 by Rita Dove. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. This selection may not be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means without the prior written permission of the publisher.
Lawrence Downes. "In Search of Flannery O'Connor." From The New York Times, February 4, 2007. Copyright © 2007 The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com
Stephen Dunn. "The Sacred." From Between Angels by Stephen Dunn. Copyright © 1989 by Stephen Dunn. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. This selection may not be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means without the prior written permission of the publisher.
Gerald L. Early. Reprinted by permission of the publisher from A Level Playing Field: African American Athletes and The Republic of Sports by Gerald L. Early, pp. 47–49, Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. Copyright © 2011 by the President and Fellows of Harvard College. "Jazz and the African American Literary Tradition." Freedom's Story, TeacherServe. Copyright © 2013 National Humanities Center. Reprinted by permission of National Humanities Center. http://nationalhumanitiescenter.org/tserve/freedom/1917beyond/essays/jazz.htm
Roger Ebert. Review of Star Wars. From the Chicago Sun-Times, January 1, 1977.
Diana L. Eck. Excerpt from "Working It Out: The Workplace and Religious Practice" (pp. 316–321). From A New Religious America by Diana L. Eck. Copyright © 2001 by Diana L. Eck. Reprinted by permission of HarperCollins Publishers.
Gary Edgerton and Kathy Merlock Jackson. Excerpt from "Redesigning Pocahontas: Disney, the 'White Man's Indian,' and the Marketing of Dreams." From The Journal of Popular Film and Television. Reprinted by permission of Taylor & Francis Ltd. http://www.tandf.co.uk/journals.
Gretel Ehrlich. "About Men" from the Solace of Open Spaces. Copyright © 1985 by Gretel Ehrlich. Used by permission of Viking Penguin, a division of Penguin Group (USA) LLC.
Albert Einstein. Letter from Albert Einstein to Phyllis Wright, January 24, 1936. Used with permission of the Albert Einstein Archives, The Hebrew University of Jerusalem.
Blake Ellis. Excerpts from "Average student loan debt nears $27,000." From CNN Money.com, October 18, 2012. Copyright © 2012 Time Inc. Used under license.
Ralph Ellison. Excerpt from "The Invisible Man." Copyright © 1947, 1948, 1952 by Ralph Ellison. Copyright renewed 1975, 1976, 1980 by Ralph Ellison. Excerpt from "On Bird, Bird-Watching and Jazz." From Shadow and Act. Copyright © 1962 and renewed 1990 by Ralph Ellison. Used by permission of Random House, an imprint of the Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC.

All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

Louise Erdrich. "Captivity." From Jacklight by Louise Erdrich. Copyright © 2003 by Louse Erdrich. Originally appeared in Jacklight, currently collected in Original Fire. Used by permission of The Wylie Agency LLC.

William Faulkner. "Speech to accept the 1949 Nobel Prize in Literature," Stockholm, December 10, 1950. From Essays, Speeches and Public Letters. Copyright © The Nobel Foundation 1949. Reprinted by permission of The Nobel Foundation. "Barn Burning." From Collected Stories of William Faulkner by William Faulkner. Copyright © 1950 by Random House. Copyright renewed 1977 by Jill Faulkner Summers. Used by permission of Random House, an imprint of The Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

John Fea. Excerpt from Was America Founded as a Christian Nation? A Historical Introduction. Copyright © 2011 by John Fea. Reprinted by permission of Westminster John Knox Press.

F. Scott Fitzgerald. "General Resolves." Reprinted with the permission of Scribner Publishing Group from The Great Gatsby by F. Scott Fitzgerald. Copyright © 1925 by Charles Scribner's Sons. Copyright renewed © 1953 by Frances Scott Fitzgerald Lanahan. All rights reserved.

Jonathan Franzen. "Agreeble." From The New Yorker, May 31, 2010. Copyright © 2010 by Jonathan Franzen. Reprinted by permission of Susan Golomb Literary Agency.

Richard Frethorne. "Letter to Father and Mother." From Remarkable Providences: Readings on Early American History, edited by John Demos. Copyright © University Press of New England, Lebanon, NH. Pages 46–49 reprinted with permission of University Press of New England.

Robert Frost. "Reluctance," "Mending Wall," and "Fire and Ice." From The Poetry of Robert Frost, edited by Edward Connery Lathem. Copyright © 1923, 1930, 1934, 1939, 1969 by Henry Holt and Company, LLC. Copyright © 1951, 1958, 1962 by Robert Frost. Copyright © 1967 by Lesley Frost Ballantine. Used by permission of Henry Holt and Company, LLC. All rights reserved.

Henry Louis Gates. Excerpts from The Trials of Phillis Wheatley. Copyright 2003 by Henry Louis Gates. Reprinted by permission of BasicCivitas Books, a member of the Perseus Books Group, in the format Republish in a book via Copyright Clearance Center. "Ending the Slavery Blame Game" from The New York Times, April 23, 2010. Copyright © 2010 The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com

Lou Gehrig. "The Luckiest Man on the Face of the Earth," speech given on July 4, 1939. Lou Gehrig™ is a trademark of the Rip van Winkle Foundation, licensed by CMG Worldwide, Inc. Reprinted by permission of CMG Worldwide. www.LouGehrig.com

Allen Ginsberg. "A Supermarket in California" from Collected Poems 1947–1980. Copyright © 1955 by Allen Ginsberg. Reprinted by permission of HarperCollins Publishers.

Malcolm Gladwell. "Small Change—Why the Revolution Will Not Be Tweeted." Originally published in The New Yorker, October 4, 2010. Copyright © 2013 Condé Nast. All rights reserved. Reprinted by permission. Excerpt from Outliers by Malcolm Gladwell. Copyright © 2008 by Malcolm Gladwell. Reprinted by permission of Little, Brown and Company. All rights reserved.

Mary Gordon. "More Than Just a Shrine." From The New York Times, November 3, 1985. Copyright © 1985 by The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited.

Steven Jay Gould. "Women's Brains." From The Panda's Thumb: More Reflections in Natural History by Stephen Jay Gould. Copyright © 1980 by Steven Jay Gould. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. This selection may not be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means without the prior written permission of the publisher.

Rayna Green. "A Modest Proposal: The Museum of the Plains White Person." After-Feast Speech: Contemporary Indian Humor. Reprinted by permission of the author.

Daniel Harris. Excerpt from "Celebrity Bodies." First appeared in Southwest Review, Vol. 93, No. 1, 2008. Copyright © 2008 Daniel Harris. Used with permission of the Baldi Literary Agency on behalf of the author.

Robert Hayden. "Those Winter Sundays" and "Frederick Douglas." From Collected Poems of Robert Hayden by Robert Hayden, edited by Frederick Glaysher. Copyright © 1966 by Robert Hayden. Used by permission of Liveright Publishing Corporation. This selection may not be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means without the prior written permission of the publisher.

Ernest Hemingway. "A Clean Well-Lighted Place." Reprinted with the permission of Scribner Publishing Group from The Short Stories of Ernest Hemingway by Ernest Hemingway. Copyright © 1933 by Charles Scribner's Sons. Copyright renewed 1961 by Mary Hemingway. All rights reserved.

Laura Hillenbrand. Excerpt from Seabiscuit: An American Legend. Copyright © 2001 by Laura Hillenbrand. Used by permission of Random House, an imprint of The Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

Ho Chi Minh. "Declaration of Independence of the Republic of Vietnam (1945)." From Conflict in Indo-China and International Repercussions: A Documentary History, 1945–1955, (pp. 20–21), edited by Allan B. Cole. Reprinted by permission of the Estate of Allan B. Cole.

Richard Hofstadter. Excerpt from "White Servitude." From America at 1750 by Richard Hofstadter. Copyright © 1971 by Beatrice K. Hofstadter. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

Hopi. "A Satisfying Meal." From American Indian Trickster Tales by Richard Erdoes and Alfonso Ortiz. Copyright © 1998 by Richard Erdoes and the Estate of Alfonso Ortiz. Used by permission of Viking Penguin, a division of Penguin Group (USA) LLC.

Tony Horwitz. "The 9/11 of 1859." From The New York Times, December 2, 2009. Copyright © 2009 by The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com

Caroline M. Hoxby and Christopher Avery. Excerpt from "The Missing 'One-Offs': The Hidden Supply of High Achieving, Low Income Students." From NBER Working Paper, No. 18586, December 2012. Copyright © 2012 by Caroline M. Hoxby and Christopher Avery. All rights reserved.

Langston Hughes. "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain." First published in The Nation. Copyright © 1926 by Langston Hughes. Reprinted by permission of Harold Ober Associates Incorporated. "The Negro Speaks of Rivers," "Jazzonia," "Theme for English B," " Mother to Son," and " Harlem [2]." From The Collected Poems of Langston Hughes by Langston Hughes, edited by Arnold Rampersad with David Roessel, Associate Editor. Copyright © 1994 by The Estate of Langston Hughes. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC and Harold Ober Associates Incorporated. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

Ken Ilqunas. "The Van Dweller." From The New York Times, April 14, 2013. Copyright © 2013 by The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com

Jeff Jacoby. "The Role of Religion in Government: Invoking Jesus at the Inauguration." From The Boston Globe, February 1, 2001. Copyright © 2001 by The Boston Globe. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited.

Randall Jarrell. "The Death of the Ball-Turret Gunner." From The Complete Poems by Randall Jarrell. Copyright © 1969, renewed 1997 by Mary von S. Jarrell. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux, LLC.

Paulette Jiles. "Paper Matches." From The Blackwater Book by Paulette Jiles. Copyright © 1988 by Paulette Jiles. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved.
Edward P. Jones. "The First Day." From Lost in the City by Edward P. Jones. Copyright © 1992 by Edward P. Jones. Reprinted by permission of HarperCollins Publishers.
June Jordan. "The Difficult Miracle of Black Poetry in America." From Some of Us Did Not Die: New and Selected Essays of June Jordan by June Jordan. Copyright © 2002 by June Jordan. Reproduced with permission of Basic Books, a member of the Perseus Books Group, in the format Republish in a book via Copyright Clearance Center.
Joy S. Kasson. Excerpts from "Performing National Identity." From Buffalo Bill's Wild West: Celebrity, Memory, and Popular History by Joy S. Kasson. Copyright © 2000 by Joy S. Kasson. Copyright © 2000 by Joy S. Kasson. Reprinted by permission of Hill & Wang, a division of Farrar, Straus and Giroux, LLC.
Sue Monk Kidd. "Doing Nothing." Copyright © 2012 by Sue Monk Kidd. Reprinted by permission of the author.
Martin Kilson. "To the Editor." From The New York Times, September 3, 2001. Response to article by Brent Staples, "The Slave Reparations Movement Adopts the Rhetoric of Victimhood," September 2, 2001. Copyright © 2001 Martin Kilson. Reprinted by permission of Martin Kilson.
Jamaica Kincaid. "Girl." From At the Bottom of the River by Jamaica Kincaid. Copyright © 1983 by Jamaica Kincaid. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, LLC.
Martin Luther King, Jr. "Letter From Birmingham Jail." Copyright © 1963 by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., copyright renewed © 1991 by Coretta Scott King. Reprinted by arrangement with The Heirs to the Estate of Martin Luther King, Jr., c/o Writers House as agent for the proprietor New York, NY.
David L. Kirp. "The Secret to Fixing Bad Schools." From The New York Times, February 10, 2013. Copyright © 2013 The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com
Kenneth Koch. "Variations on a Theme by William Carlos Williams." From The Collected Poems of Kenneth Koch by Kenneth Koch. Copyright © 2005 by The Kenneth Koch Literary Estate. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.
Yusef Komunyakaa. "Facing It." From Neon Vernacula. Copyright © 1993 by Yusef Komunyakaa. Reprinted by permission of Wesleyan University Press.
Paul Krugman. Excerpt from "Confronting Inequality." From The Conscience of a Liberal by Paul. Copyright © 2007 by Paul Krugman. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. This selection may not be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means without the prior written permission of the publisher.
Madeleine M. Kunin. Excerpt from The New Feminist Agenda. Copyright © 2012 by Madeleine M. Kunin. Used with permission from Chelsea Green Publishing. www.chelseagreen.com Li-Young Lee. "The Hammock." From Book of My Nights by Li-Young Lee. Copyright © 2001 by Li-Young Lee. Reprinted with the permission of The Permissions Company, Inc., on behalf of BOA Editions, Ltd., www.boaeditions.org.
Edward G. Lengel. Excerpt from p. 92, Inventing George Washington by Edward G. Lengel. Copyright © 2011 by Edward G. Lengel. Reprinted by permission of HarperCollins Publishers.
Jill Lepore. Excerpt from "His Highness." Originally published in The New Yorker, September 27, 2010. Copyright © 2013 Condé Nast. All rights reserved. Reprinted by permission.
Sanford Levinson. "Our Imbecilic Constitution and Responses" from The New York Times, May 28, 2012. Copyright © 2012 The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited.
Yiyun Li. "A Clean, Well-Lighted Place." Copyright © 2011 by Yiyun Li. Originally appeared in The New Yorker. Used by permission of The Wylie Agency LLC.

Allison Linn. "Carmakers' Next Problem: Generation Y." From msnbc.com, November 4, 2010. Copyright © 2010 by NBC News Digital LLC. Reprinted by permission of NBC News Digital LLC.
Archibald MacLeish. "Voyage to the Moon." From Collected Poems, 1917–1982 by Archibald MacLeish. Copyright © 1985 by the Estate of Archibald MacLeish. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. All rights reserved.
Bernard Malamud. "The First Seven Years." From The Magic Barrel Stories by Bernard Malamud. Copyright © 1950, 1958, renewed 1977, 1986 by Bernard Malamud. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, LLC.
Ruth Marcus. "Crackberry Congress." From The Washington Post, Wednesday, December 29, 2010: A13. Copyright © 2010 by The Washington Post. Reprinted by permission of The Washington Post.
Robert E. McGlone. Excerpts from "The 'Madness' of John Brown." From Civil War Times, October 2009, Vol. 48 No. 5. Copyright © 2009 by Weider History Group. Reprinted by permission of Weider History Group.
Heather McHugh. "Auto." From Hinge & Sign. Copyright © 1994 by Heather McHugh. Reprinted by permission of Wesleyan University Press.
Bill McKibben. Excerpts from "Walden: Living Deliberately." From Lapham's Quarterly, Summer 2008. Copyright © 2008 by Bill McKibben. Reprinted by permission of the author.
James McPherson. "Who Freed the Slaves?" From Reconstruction 2 (1994). Copyright © by James McPherson. Reprinted by permission of the author.
Walter Russell Mead. "America's New Tiger Immigrants." From The Wall Street Journal, June 30, 2012. Copyright © 2012 by Walter Russell Mead. Reprinted by permission of the author.
Arthur Miller. "Why I Wrote 'The Crucible.'" Copyright © 1996 by Arthur Miller. Originally appeared in The New Yorker. Used by permission of The Wylie Agency LLC.
Toni Morrison. "Dear Senator Obama," January 28, 2008. Copyright © 2008 by Toni Morrison. Reprinted by permission of ICM Partners, Inc.
National Public Radio. "Wilma Mankiller Reflects on Columbus Day." Copyright © 2008 National Public Radio, Inc. NPR news report titled "Wilma Mankiller Reflects on Columbus Day" by NPR's Michel Martin was originally broadcast on NPR's Tell Me More on October 13, 2008, and is used with the permission of NPR. Any unauthorized duplication is strictly prohibited.
The New York Times. "Felons and the Right to Vote" from The New York Times, July 11, 2004. Copyright © 2011 The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com
Naomi Shihab Nye. "Arabic Coffee." From 19 Varieties of Gazelle: Poems of the Middle East by Naomi Shihab Nye. Copyright © 2002 by Naomi Shihab Nye. Used by permission of HarperCollins Publishers.
Joyce Carol Oates. "Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been?" From Wheel of Love and Other Stories by Joyce Carol Oates. Copyright © 1970 by Ontario Review, Inc. Reprinted by permission of John Hawkins & Associates, Inc.
Tim O'Brien. "On the Rainy River." From The Things They Carried by Tim O'Brien. Copyright © 1990 by Tim O'Brien. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. All rights reserved.
Flannery O'Connor. "Good Country People." From A Good Man Is Hard to Find and Other Stories by Flannery O'Connor. Copyright © 1953 by Flannery O'Connor, copyright © renewed 1981 by Regina O'Connor. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. All rights reserved.
Sandra Day O'Connor and Roy Romer. "Not by Math Alone." From The Washington Post, March 25, 2006, A19. Copyright © 2006. Reprinted by permission of Sandra Day O'Connor.
Charles Ogletree, Jr. "Litigating the Legacy of Slavery." From The New York Times, March 21, 2002. Copyright © 2002 The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com Frank O'Hara. "On Seeing Larry Rivers' Washington Crossing the Delaware at the Museum of Modern Art." From Meditations in an Emergency by Frank O'Hara. Copyright © 1957 by Frank O'Hara. Used by permission of Grove/Atlantic, Inc. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. All rights reserved.

Jennifer Oladipo. "Why Can't Environmentalism Be Colorblind?" From Orion Magazine, November/December 2007. Copyright © 2007 by Jennifer Oladipo. Reprinted by permission of the author.

Sharon Olds. "Rite of Passage." From The Dead and the Living by Sharon Olds. Copyright © 1987 Sharon Olds. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

Robert O'Meally. Excerpts from Seeing Jazz: Artists and Writers on Jazz by Robert O'Meally. Copyright © by Robert O'Meally. Reprinted by permission of the author.

P. J. O'Rourke. "The End of the Affair." From The Wall Street Journal, May 30, 2009. Copyright © 2009 by The Wall Street Journal by News Corporation; Dow Jones & Company. Reproduced with permission of Dow Jones Company in the format Republish in a book via Copyright Clearance Center.

Hans Ostrom. "Emily Dickinson and Elvis Presley in Heaven." From Kiss Off: Poems to Set You Free and The Coast Starlight: Collected Poems 1976–2006 by Hans Ostrom. Copyright © 1989 and 2006 by Hans Ostrom. Reprinted by permission of the author.

Julie Otsuka. Excerpt from When the Emperor Was Divine. Copyright © 2002 by Julie Otsuka, Inc. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

Benjamin Percy. "The Virginian Teaches the Merit of a Man." Copyright © 2007 by Benjamin Percy. First broadcast by National Public Radio. Reprinted by permission of Curtis Brown, Ltd.

Pew Research Center. "Driving Has Become Less Enjoyable, and Cars Have Lost Some Luster, a Plague of Traffic." From Americans and Their Cars: Is the Romance on the Skids? August 1, 2006. Pew Internet & American Life Project. Reprinted by permission of Pew Research Center. http://www.pewsocialtrends.org/2006/08/01/americans-and-their-cars-is-the-romance-on-the-skids/

Steven Pinker. Excerpt from "Words Don't Mean What They Mean." From TIME Magazine, September 6, 2007. Copyright © 2007 by Steven Pinker. Reprinted by permission of Steven Pinker.

Earl E. Pollock. "Letter to the Editor." From The New York Times, May 29, 2012 in response to article by Sanford Levinson, "Our Imbecilic Constitution." Reprinted by permission of Earl E. Pollack.

Ezra Pound. "In a Station of the Metro." From Personae. Copyright © 1926 by Ezra Pound. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp.

William Powers. Excerpt from "The Walden Zone," pp. 180–92 [2210 words] from Hamlet's Blackberry by William Powers. Copyright © 2010 by William Powers. Reprinted by permisssion of HarperCollins Publishers.

Anna Quindlen. Excerpt from "The 'C' Word in the Hallway." From Newsweek, November 28, 1999. Copyright © 1999 by Anna Quindlen. Used by permissions. All rights reserved.

Ronald Radosh. "Case Closed: The Rosenbergs Were Soviet Spies." From Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2008. Ronald Radosh, co-author of The Rosenberg File, is Professor Emeritus of History at the City University of New York, an Adjunct Fellow at The Hudson Institute, and a columnist for PF Media. Reprinted by permission of the author.

Ayn Rand. "The July 16, 1969 Launch: A Symbol of Man's Greatness." From Apollo 11: The Objectivist. Copyright © 1969 by Ayn Rand. Reprinted by permission of Ayn Rand Institute.

David S. Reynolds. "Freedom's Martyr." From The New York Times, December 2, 2009. Copyright © 2009 by The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com

Adrienne Rich. "Diving Into the Wreck." From The Fact of a Doorframe: Selected Poems 1950–2001 by Adrienne Rich. Copyright © 2002 by Adrienne Rich. Copyright © 1973 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.

Daniel K. Richter. "Living with Europeans." Reprinted by permission of the publisher from Facing East from Indian Country: A Native History of Early America by Daniel K. Richter, pp. 69–78, 268–270, Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. Copyright © 2001 by the President and Fellows of Harvard College.

Theodore Roethke. "The Waking." From Collected Poems by Theodore Roethke. Copyright © 1945 by Theodore Roethke. Used by permission of Doubleday, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

Eleanor Roosevelt. "What Libraries Mean to the Nation." Address at the District of Columbia Library Association dinner, April 1, 1936. D.C. Public Library, Washingtonia Division, District of Columbia Library Association Records.

Joe Sacco and Chris Hedges. Excerpt from "Days of Siege, Camden, NJ." From Days of Destruction, Days of Revolt. Copyright © 2012 by Chris Hedges and Joe Sacco. Reprinted by permission of Perseus Books Group in the format Republish in a book via Copyright Clearance Center.

Michael J. Sandel. Excerpts from "Justice and the Common Good." From Justice: What's the Right Thing to Do? by Michael J. Sandel. Copyright © 2009 by Michael J. Sandel. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux, LLC.

Fabiola Santiago. "In College, These American Citizens Are Not Created Equal." From The Miami Herald, October 26, 2011. Copyright © 2011 by The McClatchy Company. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.themiamiherald.com

Crispin Sartwell. "My Walden, My Walmart." From The New York Times, May 27, 2012. Copyright © 2012 by The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com

Isabel V. Sawhill, Scott Winship, Kerry Searle Grannis. Excerpts from "Pathways to Middle Class: Balancing Personal and Public Responsibilities," September 20, 2012. Social Genome Project Research/Number 47, Ref. No. 20131023. Reprinted by permission of The Brookings Institution.

Michael Scheibach. "Epilogue: 1955." From Atomic Narratives and American Youth: Coming of Age with the Atom 1945–1955. Copyright © 2003 by Michael Scheibach. Reprinted by permission of McFarland & Company, Inc., Box 611, Jefferson, NC 28640. www.mcfarlandpub.com

Jonathan Schell. Excerpt from "The Fate of the Earth." Copyright © 1982 by Jonathan Schell. Reprinted by permission of the author.

Eric Schlosser. Excerpted from "The Most Dangerous Job." From Fast Food Nation: The Dark Side of the All-American Meal by Eric Schlosser. Copyright © 2001 by Eric Schlosser. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. All rights reserved.

Michael Segell. Excerpt from The Devil's Horn: The Story of the Saxophone from Noisy Novelty to King of Cool. Copyright © 2005 Michael Segell. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux, LLC.

Michael Shaara. Excerpt from The Killer Angels: The Classic Novel of the Civil War by Michael Shaara. Copyright © 1974 by Michael Shaara; copyright renewed 2002 by Jeff M.Shaara and Lila E. Shaara. Used by permission of Ballantine Books, an imprint of The Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

Shasta. "Coyote Gets Stuck." From American Indian Trickster Tales by Richard Erdoes and Alfonso Ortiz. Copyright © 1998 by Richard Erdoes and the Estate of Alfonso Ortiz. Used by permission of Viking Penguin, a division of Penguin Group (USA) LLC.

Garry S. Sklar. "Letter to the Editor." From The New York Times, May 29, 2012 in response to article by Sanford Levinson, "Our Imbecilic Constitution." Reprinted by permission of Garry S. Sklar.

Holly Sklar. "The Growing Gulf Between the Rich and the Rest of Us." From Knight Ridder. Distributed by Knight Ridder/Tribune Information Services, September 29, 2005. Copyright © 2005 by Holly Sklar. Reprinted by permission of the author.

Frederic N. Smalkin. "Letter to the Editor" from The New York Times, May 29, 2012 in response to article by Sanford Levinson, "Our Imbecilic Constitution." Reprinted by permission of Frederic N. Smalkin.

Hedrick Smith. Excerpt from Who Stole the American Dream? Copyright © 2012 by Hedrick Smith. Used by permission of Random House, an imprint of The Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

Tracy K. Smith. "Letter to a Photojournalist Going In." From Duende: Poems. Copyright © 2007 by Tracy K. Smith. Reprinted with the permission of The Permissions Company, Inc., on behalf of Graywolf Press, Minneapolis, Minnesota, USA. www.graywolfpress.org
Thomas Sowell. "Income Confusion." From Creator's Syndicate, 2007. Copyright © 2007 by Creator's Syndicate, Inc. Reprinted by permission of Thomas Sowell and Creator's Syndicate, Inc.
William Stafford. "At the Un-National Monument Along the Canadian Border." From The Way It Is: New and Selected Poems. Copyright © 1975, 1998 by William Stafford and the Estate of William Stafford. Reprinted with the permission of The Permissions company, Inc. on behalf of Graywolf Press, Minneapolis, Minnesota, www.graywolfpress.org.
Brent Staples. "Just Walk On By: A Black Man Ponders His Power to Alter Public Space." Copyright © 1986 by Brent Staples. Reprinted by permission of the author. "The Slave Reparations Movement Adopts the Rhetoric of Victimhood." From The New York Times, September 2, 2001. Copyright © 2001 by The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited. www.nytimes.com
John Steinbeck. "The Chrysanthemums." From The Long Valley by John Steinbeck. Copyright © 1937, renewed © 1965 by John Steinbeck. Used by permission of Viking Penguin, a division of Penguin Group (USA) LLC.
Wallace Stevens. "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird." From The Collected Poems of Wallace Stevens by Wallace Stevens. Copyright © 1954 by Wallace Stevens and renewed 1982 by Holly Stevens. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.
John Jeremiah Sullivan. "Back in the Day" by John Jeremiah Sullivan. Copyright © 2009 by John Jeremiah Sullivan. Originally appeared in GQ magazine. Used by permission of The Wylie Agency LLC.
Dana Thomas. "Terror's Purse Strings" from The New York Times, August 30, 2007. Copyright © 2007 by The New York Times. All rights reserved. Used by permission and protected by the Copyright Laws of the United States. The printing, copying, redistribution, or retransmission of this Content without express written permission is prohibited.
Times of London. "Man Takes First Steps on the Moon." From The London Times, July 21, 1969. Custom. Reprinted by permission of News Syndication.
Evelyn Toynton. Excerpt from Jackson Pollock (Icons of America). Copyright © 2012 by Evelyn Toynton. Reprinted by permission of Yale University Press.
Natasha Trethewey. "Again, The Fields." From Native Guard: Poems by Natasha Trethewey. Copyright © 2006 by Natasha Trethewey. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. All rights reserved.
Brian Turner. "At Lowe's Improvement Center." From Phantom Noise by Brian Turner. Copyright © 2010 by Brian Turner. Reprinted with the permission of The Permissions Company, Inc., on behalf of Alice James Books. www.alicejamesbooks.org
John Updike. Excerpt from Rabbit, Run. Copyright © 1960, copyright renewed 1988 by John Updike. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.
Alice Walker. Excerpt from "Beyond the Peacock." In Search of Our Mothers' Gardens: Womanist Prose by Alice Walker. Copyright © 1983 by Alice Walker. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. All rights reserved.
Robert Penn Warren. Excerpt from All the King's Men by Robert Penn Warren. Copyright © 1946 and renewed 1974 by Robert Penn Warren. Reprinted by permission of Houghton Mifflin Harcourt Publishing Company. All rights reserved.

Alice Waters. "Slow Food Nation." From The Nation. Reprinted with permission from the August 24, 2006 issue of The Nation. For subscription information, call 1-800-333-8536. Portions of each week's Nation magazine can be accessed at http://www.thenation.com.

Spencer R. Weart. "The Rise of Nuclear Fear." Reprinted by permission of the publisher from The Rise of Nuclear Fear by Spencer R. Weart, pp. 265–267, 269–270, 341, Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. Copyright © 1988 by the President and Fellows of Harvard College. Copyright © 2012 by Spencer R. Weart.

Jack Weatherford. "Examining the Reputation of Christopher Columbus." Adapted from Baltimore Evening Sun, 1989. Copyright © 2002 by Jack Weatherford. Reprinted by permission of the author.

Stephen H. Webb. "How Soccer Is Ruining America: A Jeremiad." From First Things, March 5, 2009. Copyright © 2009 Stephen H. Webb. Reprinted by permission of the author.

Edith Wharton. "Roman Fever." Reprinted with the permission of Scribner Publishing Group from Roman Fever and Other Stories by Edith Wharton. Copyright © 1934 by Liberty Magazine. Copyright renewed © 1962 by William R. Tyler. All rights reserved.

Lee Strout (E. B.) White. "Farewell, My Lovely." Originally published in The New Yorker, May 16, 1936. Copyright © 2013 by Condé Nast. All rights reserved. Reprinted by permission. Excerpt from "Walden." From One Man's Meat. Text copyright © 1941 by E. B. White. Copyright renewed. Reprinted by permission of Tilbury House, Publishers, Thomaston, Maine.

George F. Will. Excerpts from "King Coal: Reigning in China." From The Washington Post, December 30, 2010; A 15. Copyright © 2010 by The Washington Post. Reprinted by permission of The Washington Post.

Florence Carlos Williams. "Reply." From The Collected Poems: Volume 1, 1909–1939. Copyright © 1938 by New Directions Publishing Corporation. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp.

William Carlos Williams. "The Great Figure" and "This Is Just To Say." from The Collected Poems: Volume I, 1909–1939. Copyright © 1938 by New Directions Publishing Corp. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp.

Edward O. Wilson. Excerpt from Prologue "A Letter to Thoreau." From The Future of Life by Edward O. Wilson. Copyright © 2002 by E. O. Wilson. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Random House LLC. All rights reserved. Any third party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited. Interested parties must apply directly to Random House LLC for permission.

Tom Wolfe. Excerpt from "The Kandy-Kolored Tangerine-Flake Streamline Baby." From The Kandy-Kolored Tangerine-Flake Streamline Baby by Tom Wolfe. Copyright © 1965, renewed 1993 by Tom Wolfe. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux, LLC; reprinted by permission of the author. Excerpt from pp. 28–31 from The New Journalism, edited by Tom Wolfe and E. W. Johnson. Copyright © 1973 by Tom Wolfe and E. W. Johnson. Reprinted by permission of HarperCollins Publishers.

Richard Wright. "The Man Who Was Almost a Man." From Eight Men by Richard Wright (pp. 3–18). Copyright © 1940, 1961 by Richard Wright; renewed © 1989 by Ellen Wright. Introduction copyright © 1996 by Paul Gilroy. Reprinted by permission of HarperCollins Publishers and John Hawkins & Associates, Inc.

Eric K. Yamamoto. Excerpts from "Racial Reparations: Japanese American Redress and African American Claims." From Boston College Third World Law Journal, Volume 19, Issue 1, Article 13. Reprinted by permission of Boston College Law School.

Kevin Young. "Homage to Phillis Wheatley" from Giant Steps: The New Generation of African American Writers.

this page left intentionally blank

Index

9/11/2001 (Spiegelman), 1426–27
"9/11 of 1859, The" (Horowitz), 753–54
"9/11 'Overreaction,' The" (Krauthammer), 109
"9/11 Speech" (Bush), 6–8

Abeyta, Aaron A., "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Tortilla," 1087–89
"Able Doctor, or America Swallowing the Bitter Draught, The" (Revere), 370–71
"About Men" (Ehrlich), 1044–46
"Abraham Lincoln and Our 'Unfinished Work'" (Cuomo), 703–6
Abraham Lincoln: The Great Emancipator (Conversation), 689–730 accuracy of evidence, 101–3
Ace Comics, "Atomic War!," 1468–69
active voice, 1273–74
Adams, Abigail, "Letter to John Adams," 386–87
Adams, John
  "Letter to Abigail Adams," 387–89
  mentioned, 345, 376
Adams, Samuel, 347, 348, 384
Addams, Jane
  mentioned, 827
  writings
    "The Subtle Problem of Charity," 927–30
    "Tribute to George Washington," 460–62
"Address to General William Henry Harrison" (Tecumseh), 430–32
"Address to the Greater Houston Ministerial Association" (Kennedy), 486–89
"Address to the Osages" (Tecumseh), 60–62 ad hominem fallacy, 102–3 ad populum (bandwagon appeal) fallacy, 111–12
Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, The (Twain), 548
"After great pain, a formal feeling comes—" (Dickinson), 836
"Again, the Fields: After Winslow Homer" (Trethewey), 832–33
Age of Reason, The (Paine), 383–84
"Agreeable" (Franzen), 1431–44
"Ain't I a Woman?" (Truth), 626
"Alarmist or Alarming Rhetoric?" (Demby), 32
Alexie, Sherman
  mentioned, 1047, 1420
  writings
    "My Heroes Have Never Been Cowboys," 1047–49
    "Superman and Me," 1420–23
Alger, Horatio, Ragged Dick, or Street Life in New York with the Boot Blacks, 1493–97
Allen, Paula Gunn
  Pocahontas: Medicine Woman, Spy, Entrepreneur, Diplomat, 330–33
  "Pocahontas to Her English Husband, John Rolfe," 321–23
Allison, Graham, 1491

All the King's Men (Warren), 71–72
Alvarez, Antonio, "Out of My Hands," 165–67
Alvarez, Julia, "Snow," 1478–79
America Guided by Wisdom (Barralet and Tanner), 349
American Cowboy, The (Conversation), 1023–58
"American Cowboy, The" (Nimmo), 1024–27
American Jeremiad, The (Conversation), 254–78
American literature, defining. See What Is American Literature? (Conversation)
"American Literature" (Lazarus), 1250–52
American Lung Association, "Sandwich. Snack. Arsenic.," 270
American Middle Class, The (Conversation), 1492–1528
American Progress (Gast), 825
"Americans and Their Cars: Is the Romance on the Skids?" (Pew Research Center), 1543–46
"Americans Hit the Brakes on NASCAR" (DeFord), 1554–55
American Spirit in Literature, The (Perry), 1260–62
"America's New Tiger Immigrants" (Mead), 1019–21
America's Romance with the Automobile (Conversation), 1528–57
"America's True History of Religious Tolerance" (Davis), 472–77
"America the Beautiful" (Bates), 932–33 analogy, faulty, 103 analysis, rhetorical. See rhetorical analysis anaphora, 1560
Anastas, Benjamin, "The Foul Reign of Emerson's 'Self-Reliance,'" 602–5 Anderson, Jourdon
  mentioned, 823, 829
  "To My Old Master," 829–30
Anderson, Sherwood, "An Apology for Crudity," 1255–56 anecdotes, 106–7
annotating, 52, 54–55
Anthony, Susan B., "Sentencing Statement," 971–73
antimetabole, 1560
"Anti-Suffrage Monologue, An" (Howe), 985–87 antithesis, 50, 1560
Apollo 11 moon landing, texts about
  "In Event of Moon Disaster" (Safire), 38
  "The July 16, 1969, Launch: A Symbol of Man's Greatness" (Rand), 38–40
  "Man Takes First Steps on the Moon" (Times), 34–36
  "Transported" (Herblock), 40
  "Voyage to the Moon" (MacLeish), 37
"Apology for Crudity, An" (Anderson), 1255–56
"Appeal from California. The Chinese Invasion. Workingman's Address" (Kearney and Knight), 999–1000 appeal to false authority, 110–11 appeals, rhetorical. See rhetorical appeals Applebaum, Anne, "If the Japanese Can't Build a Safe Reactor, Who Can?," 30–31. See also Demby, Tamar, "Alarmist or Alarming Rhetoric?"
appositives, 535–43
"Arabic Coffee" (Nye), 1392–93 arguments, analyzing claims of fact, 91
    overview, 89–90
    of policy, 94–96
    of value, 91–92
  defining argument, 85–89 literary texts, 132–36 presenting evidence first-hand evidence (see first-hand evidence) logical fallacies (see logical fallacies) relevance, accuracy, and sufficiency, 101–2 second-hand evidence (see second-hand evidence) shaping arguments
    classical oration, 116–20 induction and deduction, 120–26
    Toulmin model, 126–31

thesis statements closed, 98–99
counterargument, 99–100
open, 99
visual texts, 137–42
arguments, using sources to inform, 148–49
Aristotelian triangle, 3–4
Aristotle
definition of rhetoric, 1 rhetorical appeals, 8
assertions. See claims assumption (warrant), in Toulmin model analyzing, 127–29
defined, 126–27
using in own writing, 130
"Atlanta Exposition Address, The" (Washington), 891–94
"At Lowe's Home Improvement Center" (Turner), 1445–46
Atomic Age, The (Conversation), 1467–92
Atomic Narratives and American Youth: Coming of Age with the Atom, 1945–55 (Scheibach), 1481–83
"Atomic War!" (Ace Comics), 1468–69
"At the Un-National Monument along the Canadian Border" (Stafford), 648
Atwood, Margaret, "Hello, Martians, Let Moby-Dick Explain," 1267–69
"Auction Block Monument" (Historic Fredericksburg Foundation), 641–42
Auden, W. H., "The Unknown Citizen," 1169–70 audience
rhetorical triangle and, 4
SOAPS checklist and, 5–6, 23 using sources to appeal to, 152–55 authority appeal to false, 110–11
ethos and, 8, 10
expert opinion as second-hand evidence, 110
"Author to Her Book, The" (Bradstreet), 225
"Auto" (McHugh), 1542
Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin, The (Franklin), 352–63 automobile, America's romance with. See America's Romance with the Automobile (Conversation)
"Average Student Loan Debt Nears $27,000" (Ellis), 168–69
Avery, Christopher, "The Missing 'One-Offs': The Hidden Supply of High-Achieving, Low-Income Students" (with Caroline M. Hoxby), 174–75

Baby in a Slum Tenement (Riis), 873 backing, in Toulmin model, 126–27, 130
Baldwin, James
mentioned, 1282
Notes of a Native Son, 1324–38
Ball, Thomas, Freedman's Memorial to Abraham Lincoln, 698
Balliett, Whitney, "Daddy-O," 1202–4 bandwagon appeal (ad populum fallacy), 111–12
Banneker, Benjamin
"Letter to Thomas Jefferson," 426–29
mentioned, 348, 426
Baptism of Pocahontas, The (Chapman), 318
"Barn Burning" (Faulkner), 1156–68
Barralet, John J., America Guided by Wisdom (with Benjamin Tanner), 349
Barthelme, Donald, "The King of Jazz," 1204–7
Bates, Katharine Lee
"America the Beautiful," 932–33
mentioned, 931
Beaudrillard, Jean, 335
"Becoming Anne Bradstreet" (Boland), 226–27
"Becoming of the Native, The" (Momaday), 198–203
"Benjamin Franklin" (Lawrence), 364–67
Bercovitch, Sacvan, 254
Bergreen, Laurence, Columbus: The Four Voyages, 300–303
Berlin, Ira, "Who Freed the Slaves? Emancipation and Its Meaning," 715–24

Berliner, Michael S., "The Christopher Columbus Controversy," 291–93
Bernstein, Richard, 1298
Berry, Wendell, 758
"Beyond the Peacock: The Reconstruction of Flannery O'Connor" (Walker), 1320–21 bias, evaluating, 147
Bierce, Ambrose
  "An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge," 875–82
  mentioned, 590
Bierstadt, Albert, The Last of the Buffalo, 864–65
Billington, James, 834
Bill of Rights, 412–14
  TalkBack: "Our Imbecilic Constitution" (Levinson), 414–17
Bishop, Elizabeth, "The Fish," 1285–88
Blake, William, 1093
Block, Herb (Herblock), "Transported," 40
Bloomberg, Michael, "Ground Zero Mosque Speech," 496–98 body image, readings about
  "Celebrity Bodies" (Harris), 142–43
  "homage to my hips" (Clifton), 143–44
  "Michael Jackson with and without Plastic Surgery," 144
Boland, Eavan
  "Becoming Anne Bradstreet," 226–27
Bond, Julian, 943
"Bookmobile, Louisiana" (Works Progress Administration), 1141–42
Booth, John Wilkes, 551
"Bostonians Paying the Excise-Man, or Tarring and Feathering, The," 372
Botstein, Leon, "Let Teenagers Try Adulthood," 183–85
Bowden, Charles, "Our Wall," 1014–17
Boye, Bertha M., "Votes for Women," 984–85 Bradstreet, Anne
  mentioned, 191, 222
  TalkBack: "Becoming Anne Bradstreet" (Boland), 226–27
  writings
    "The Author to Her Book," 225
    "The Prologue," 222–24
Brinkley, Alan, "The Fifties," 1503–6
Broderick, Mackenzie, "You Gotta Fight for Your Right . . . to Education," 180–83
Bronzino, Agnolo, Eleonora of Toledo with Her Son Giovanni, 229
Brooks, Cleanth, 660
Brown, John
  mentioned, 550
  writings
    "Last Letter to His Family," 733–35
    "Last Speech," 732–33
    See also John Brown: Patriot or Terrorist? (Conversation)
Brown, Milton, 229
Bryant, William Cullen
  mentioned, 449, 548, 551
  writings
    "Thanatopsis," 551–53
    "To Cole, the Painter, Departing for Europe," 554
"Buffalo Bill 's" (Cummings), 1042
"Buffalo Bill's Wild West" (Buffalo Bill Cody), 1034–35
Buffalo Bill's Wild West: Celebrity, Memory, and Popular History (Kasson), 1050–54
Burke, Kenneth, 147
Burnett, Leo, 1044
Bush, George H. W., "Letter of Apology," 1230–31
Bush, George W., "9/11 Speech," 6–8

Cabeza de Vaca, Álvar Núñez
  mentioned, 188, 209–10
  The Relation of Cabeza de Vaca, 210–16
Cabot, John, 187
Campbell, Joseph, 335, 449
"Captivity" (Erdrich), 240–42
"Carmakers' Next Problem: Generation Y" (Linn), 1551–53
Carnegie, Andrew, "The Gospel of Wealth," 865–68
Carretta, Vincent, 508
"Case Closed: The Rosenbergs Were Soviet Spies" (Radosh), 1484–86
Cather, Willa, "The Sculptor's Funeral," 950–60 cause and effect, subordinating conjunctions indicating, 336

"Celebrity Bodies" (Harris), 142–43
"Certain Oil Refinery, A" (Dreiser), 1095–98
Changing Roles of Women, The (Conversation), 970–97
Chapman, John Gadsby, "The Baptism of Pocahontas," 318
Charles, Ray, 934
"Checkers Speech, The" (Nixon), 14
Chernow, Ron, 470
Chief Seattle
  mentioned, 548
  "Message to President Franklin Pierce," 650–53
  TalkBack: "A Modest Proposal: The Museum of the Plains White Person" (Green), 653–56
"Chieftain's Daughter, The" (Morris), 319
"Chinese Must Go, The" (McDonnell), 1001–2
Chopin, Kate, "The Story of an Hour," 888–90
Chowder, Ken, "The Father of American Terrorism," 745–47
"Christopher Columbus Controversy, The" (Berliner), 291–93
Christy, Howard Chandler, Pocahontas, 320–21
"Chrysanthemums, The" (Steinbeck), 1147–55
circular reasoning, 104
citing sources, 180
claims of fact, 91
  overview, 89–90
  of policy, 94–96
  in Toulmin model, 126–27
  of value, 91–92
Clancy, Robert H., "An Un-American Bill," 1004–7
Clark, Wesley, 470 classical oration, 116–20
clauses
  dependent and independent. See subordination in complex sentences parallelism and, 1558 restrictive and nonrestrictive, 337 subordinate. See subordination in complex sentences
Clay, Henry, 418
"Clean, Well-Lighted Place, A" (Hemingway), 1121–24
"Clean, Well-Lighted Place, A" (Li), 1125–26
Clift, Eleanor, "Inside Kennedy's Inauguration, 50 Years On," 80–83
Clifton, Lucille, "homage to my hips," 143–44 close analysis analyzing style
    determining tone, 46–47
    establishing rhetorical situation, 44–45
    introduction, 41–42
    model analysis, 45–46
  close reading fiction, 69–70, 71
    poetry, 72–73
    visual texts, 74–76
  conversation with the text annotating, 52, 54–55
    asking questions, 48–49, 50–51 close reading and, 58–60 graphic organizers, 55–58
  overview, 41
  writing a close-analysis essay introductory example, 62, 64–65 sample essay, 66–67
    thesis statement, 65 closed thesis statements, 98–99
close reading
  fiction, 69–70, 71
  moving to analysis, 58–60
  poetry, 72–73
  visual texts, 74–76
Cody, Buffalo Bill, "Buffalo Bill's Wild West," 1034–35
Cofer, Judith Ortiz
  mentioned, 1284, 1411
  "The Myth of the Latin Woman: I Just Met a Girl Named María," 1411–15
Cole, John, "The Thanksgiving Table," 15

Cole, Thomas
mentioned, 548
The Oxbow, 555–56
Collins, Gail, When Everything Changed: The Amazing Journey of American Women from 1950 to the Present, 988–91 colons, 536
Columbus, Christopher
Journal of the First Voyage to America, 279–83
mentioned, 187
See also Columbus Day Controversy, The
Columbus Day Controversy, The (Conversation), 278–305
Columbus: The Four Voyages (Bergreen), 300–303
"Come and Join Us Brothers" (Supervisory Committee for Recruiting Colored Regiments), 687–88 commas
appositives and, 536
with cumulative, periodic, and inverted sentence patterns, 814 with subordinate clauses, 337
Common Sense (Paine), 376–78 complex sentences, 50. See also subordination in complex sentences compound sentences, 50 conceding/concession counterarguments and, 11, 20
subordinating conjunctions indicating, 336 conclusion
in classical oration (peroratio), 117, 120 in deductive reasoning, 124, 126 condition, subordinating conjunctions indicating, 337
Confederate Dead before the Dunker Church (Gardner), 685 confirmation (confirmatio), in classical oration, 117, 120 conjunctions, subordinating. See subordination in complex sentences
Connell, William J., "What Columbus Day Really Means," 296–300
Connelly, Sheryl, 1556
Conscience of a Liberal, The (Krugman), 1508–12 context, rhetorical situation and, 3 contrast, subordinating conjunctions indicating, 336 coordination, as sentence pattern, 810
Cortés, Hernán, 187
Cortez, Jayne, "Jazz Fan Looks Back," 1207–8 counterarguments logos and, 11–12, 20
counterargument thesis statements, 99–100
Counts, Will, Little Rock's Central High School, 1339–40 cowboy, American (conversation). See American Cowboy, The (Conversation)
"Coyote Gets Stuck," 197–98
"Crackberry Congress" (Marcus), 16–17
Crane, Hart, 449
Crane, Stephen, "The Open Boat," 899–917
"Crazed Rhetoric" (Toles), 86
Crèvecoeur, Hector St. John de
Letters from an American Farmer, 399–402
mentioned, 348, 399
Crews, Frederick, 1315
Crisis, I, The (Paine), 378–79
"Crossing Brooklyn Ferry" (Whitman), 660–65
Crumb, Robert, "A Short History of America," 783–84
"Cuban Missile Crisis Speech" (Kennedy), 1472–76
Cummings, E. E.
"Buffalo Bill 's," 1042
"in Just-," 1099–1100
cumulative sentence patterns, 51, 811, 814 Cuomo, Mario, "Abraham Lincoln and Our 'Unfinished Work,'" 703–6
current events, 107–8
Currier, Nathaniel, The Landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, 190
"C Word in the Hallways, The" (Quindlen), 95

"Daddy-O" (Balliett), 1202–4
Dalton, Harlon L., "Horatio Alger," 1497–1502
Danticat, Edwidge, "New York Day Women," 1416–19
Darrow, Clarence, 259
Darwin, Charles, 1069, 1099 dashes, 536
Dash for the Timber, A (Remington), 1028
Davidson, Sara, 1344
Davis, Jefferson, "Inaugural Address," 668–72
Davis, Kenneth C., "America's True History of Religious Tolerance," 472–77
Davis, Miles, 1202
Davis, Ossie, 1276
Davis, Stuart, Swing Landscape, 1198–99
"Days of Destruction, Days of Revolt" (Hedges and Sacco), 1457–66
Dean, Michelle, 1344
"Death of the Ball Turret Gunner, The" (Jarrell), 1180–81
"Declaration of Independence, The" (Jefferson), 390–92
"Declaration of Sentiments" (Stanton), 393–95 deduction, 123–26
"Defense of Native American Religion" (Red Jacket), 484–86
DeFord, Frank, "Americans Hit the Brakes on NASCAR," 1554–55
DeGrazia, Ettore (Ted), Trading, Traveling, and Mosquitoes, 218
Demby, Tamar, "Alarmist or Alarming Rhetoric?," 32
Demuth, Charles
  I Saw the Figure 5 in Gold, 1108
  mentioned, 1069, 1107 dependent clauses. See subordination in complex sentences de Soto, Hernando, 187
de Tocqueville, Alexis, 656, 819, 820, 1270
Devil's Horn, The (Segell), 1209–10
Dickinson, Emily
  TalkBack: "Emily Dickinson and Elvis Presley in Heaven" (Ostrom), 840–41
  writings
    "After great pain, a formal feeling comes—," 836
    "'Hope' is the thing with feathers—," 834–35
    "I heard a Fly buzz—when I died—," 837
    "My Life had stood—a Loaded Gun—," 838–39
    "The Soul selects her own Society—," 835
    "Success is counted sweetest," 134–35 diction, analyzing, 50–51
Didion, Joan
  "On Self-Respect," 1341–44
  "The Santa Ana Winds," 52–53
"Difficult Miracle of Black Poetry in America, The" (Jordan), 517–27 Dillard, Annie
  "Living Like Weasels," 785–88
  mentioned, 758
Dirda, Michael, 882
direct verbs, 1272
"Diving into the Wreck" (Rich), 1381–84
Dodge Motor Company
  "It's a Big Fat Juicy Cheeseburger in a Land of Tofu," 75
  "This Is the Car You Buy Because You Can't Buy a Bald Eagle," 468
"Does Not Such a Meeting Make Amends?" (Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper), 841–42
"Doing Nothing" (Kidd), 793–94
Domini, Amy, "Why Investing in Fast Food May Be a Good Thing," 87–88
Donohue, Agnes, 572
Douglass, Frederick
  mentioned, 259, 549, 614, 699, 756
  writings
    Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave, Written by Himself, 614–24
    Reminiscences of Abraham Lincoln by Distinguished Men of His Time, 699–703
    "What, to the Slave, Is the Fourth of July?," 260–62

"Douglass" (Dunbar), 897
Douthat, Ross, "The Secrets of Princeton," 172–73 Dove, Rita
  mentioned, 1282, 1423
  "Rosa," 1423–24
Downes, Lawrence, "In Search of Flannery O'Connor," 1315–19
Dreiser, Theodore, "A Certain Oil Refinery," 1095–98
DuBois, W. E. B.
  mentioned, 823, 944
  "The Talented Tenth," 944–49
Duchamp, Marcel, 1069
"Duck and Cover" (Office of Civil Defense), 1470
Dunbar, Paul Laurence
  mentioned, 823, 895
  TalkBack: "Frederick Douglass" (Hayden), 898
  writings
    "Douglass," 897
    "We Wear the Mask," 895–96
Dunbar-Nelson, Alice, "I Sit and Sew," 24–25
Dunn, Stephen, "The Sacred," 1541
Dunston-Weiler Lithograph Company, Suffragette Madonna and Uncle Sam Suffragee, 982–83
Durand, Asher B.
  Kindred Spirits, 556–57
  mentioned, 548
Dylan, Bob, 674, 1381, 1492

Early, Gerald L.
  "Jazz and the African American Literary Tradition," 1189–93
  A Level Playing Field, 151
"Earth on Turtle's Back, The," 194–95
Ebert, Roger, "Star Wars," 92–94
Eck, Diane L., A New Religious America, 492–94
Eckford, Elizabeth, 1339–40
Edelstein, Sally, Mutually Assured Consumption, 1524–25
Edgerton, Gary, "Redesigning Pocahontas: Disney, the 'White Man's Indian,' and the Marketing of Dreams" (with Kathy Merlock Jackson), 324–29
Edison, Thomas, 828
Education: The Civil Rights Issue of Our Time? (Conversation), 156–75 writing a synthesis essay
    citing sources, 180
    formulating your position, 175–77 framing and integrating quotations, 178–79 sample synthesis essay, 180–82
Edwards, Jonathan, "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God," 257–59 effective and ineffective rhetoric, 29–31
Ehrlich, Gretel, "About Men," 1044–46
Einstein, Albert
  "Letter to Phyllis Wright," 5
  mentioned, 828
Eisenhower, Dwight D.
  mentioned, 1528
  "Order of the Day," 17–18 either/or (false dilemma) fallacy, 103 ekphrasis, 1109
elegy, 834
Eleonora of Toledo with Her Son Giovanni (Bronzino), 229
Eliot, T. S.
  "The Hollow Men," 1113–16
  mentioned, 1069
Ellis, Blake, "Average Student Loan Debt Nears $27,000," 168–69
Ellison, Ralph
  Invisible Man, 1201
  "On Bird, Bird-Watching and Jazz," 49–50, 51–52
"Emancipation Proclamation, The" (Lincoln), 690–91
Emerson, Ralph Waldo
  mentioned, 346, 548, 590, 758, 819, 820
  "Self-Reliance," 590–600
  TalkBack: "The Foul Reign of Emerson's 'Self-Reliance'" (Anastas), 602–5
"Emily Dickinson and Elvis Presley in Heaven" (Ostrom), 840–41
"Ending the Slavery Blame-Game" (Gates), 1243–45
"End of the Affair, The" (O'Rourke), 1547–50

"End of White America, The" (Hsu), 112–13
enjambment, 73
Enrico, Robert, 882
Environmental Protection Agency, "Slip, Slop, Slap and Wrap!," 77
Erdrich, Louise, "Captivity," 240–42
Eriksson, Lief, 187
Etcheson, Nicole, 756
ethos combining with logos and pathos, 18–20
  defined, 8–10
Etter, William M, 471
"Evacuation Order" (Western Defense Command), 1217–19 evidence, presenting first-hand evidence anecdotes, 106–7
    current events, 107–8
    personal experience, 104, 106
  logical fallacies (see logical fallacies) relevance, accuracy, and sufficiency, 101–2 second-hand evidence expert opinion, 110
    historical information, 108–9
    literary sources, 112–14
    quantitative evidence, 111
evidence (support), in Toulmin model, 126–27
"Evolutionary Social Psychology of Off-Record Indirect Speech Acts, The" (Pinker), 154–55
"Examining the Reputation of Christopher Columbus" (Weatherford), 289–91
"Executive Order No. 9066" (Roosevelt), 1215–17 exordium, 117
expert opinion, 110

"Facing It" (Komunyakaa), 1398 fact, claims of, 91
fallacies, logical. See logical fallacies
"Fall of the House of Usher, The" (Poe), 576–89 false authority, appeal to, 110–11 false dilemma (either/or fallacy), 103
Faragher, John Mack, 1057
"Farewell, My Lovely!" (White), 1530–35
"Farewell Address" (Reagan), 265–66
"Farewell Address" (Washington), 452–54
"Farewell Speech" (Gehrig), 2
Fast Food Nation (Schlosser), 965–68
Fate of the Earth, The (Schell), 1184–86
"Father of American Terrorism, The" (Chowder), 745–47
Faulkner, William
  mentioned, 1072, 1155, 1279, 1288
  writings
    "Barn Burning," 1156–68
    "Nobel Prize Acceptance Speech," 1288–89
faulty analogy, 103
Fea, John, Was America Founded As a Christian Nation?, 499–503
Federal Highway Administration, "I Was Looking Out for Other Cars," 33
"Federalist Papers, The" (Hamilton, Madison, and Jay), 404–11
"Feeding Kids Meat Is Child Abuse" (PETA), 29
"Felons and the Right to Vote" (New York Times Editorial Board), 96–98
Ferdinand of Spain, The Requierimiento, 284–85
"Few Don'ts by an Imagiste, A" (Pound), 1075–78
fiction
  close reading, 69–70, 71
  rhetorical analysis of, 21–24
"Fifties, The" (Brinkley), 1503–6 figures of speech, 50
Final Crisis, XIII, The (Paine), 380–82
"Fire and Ice" (Frost), 1081–82
"First Day, The" (Jones), 161–64
"First Fig" (Millay), 1090–91
first-hand evidence anecdotes, 106–7
  current events, 107–8
  personal experience, 104
"First Seven Years, The" (Malamud), 1290–97
"Fish, The" (Bishop), 1286–88
Fitzgerald, F. Scott, 368, 1187
Flanagan, Caitlin, 1344

Ford, Henry, 827, 1528 form, 72
"Foul Reign of Emerson's 'Self-Reliance,' The" (Anastas), 602–5 framing quotations, 178
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, "Does Not Such a Meeting Make Amends?," 841–42
Franklin, Benjamin
  mentioned, 187, 345, 349–50, 1492
  TalkBack: "Benjamin Franklin" (Lawrence), 364–67
  writings
    The Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin, 352–63
    "The Speech of Miss Polly Baker," 350–52
Franzen, Jonathan, "Agreeable," 1431–44
"Frederick Douglass" (Hayden), 898
Freedman's Memorial to Abraham Lincoln (Ball), 698
"Freedom's Martyr" (Reynolds), 750–52
Freeman, Castle, Jr., 1042
Frethorne, Richard
  "Letter to Father and Mother," 219, 221
  mentioned, 218
Freud, Sigmund, 1069
Frost, Robert
  mentioned, 808, 1078
  writings
    "Fire and Ice," 1081–82
    "Mending Wall," 1080–81
    "Reluctance," 1078–79
Fuller, Margaret
  mentioned, 549, 607
  Woman in the Nineteenth Century, 607–13
Future of Life, The (Wilson), 788–92

Gandhi, Mahatma, 758
Gardner, Alexander, Confederate Dead before the Dunker Church, 685
Gast, John, American Progress, 825
Gates, Henry Louis, Jr.
  mentioned, 895, 899
  writings
    "Ending the Slavery Blame-Game," 1243–45
    "Mr. Jefferson and the Trials of Phillis Wheatley," 528–33 Gehrig, Lou, "Farewell Speech," 2 generalization hasty, 103, 106
  in inductive reasoning, 120–21, 123
George III, 345, 370
"George Washington" (Greenough), 457–58
George Washington—Lansdowne Portrait (Stuart), 454–55
"Gettysburg Address, The" (Lincoln), 692
"Gettysburg PowerPoint Presentation, The" (Norvig), 725
Gilman, Charlotte Perkins, Women and Economics, 974–76
Ginsberg, Allen, "A Supermarket in California," 666–67
Gioia, Ted, 1214
"Girl" (Kincaid), 70–71
Gladwell, Malcolm
  mentioned, 1282, 1357–58
  writings
    Outliers, 121–23
    "Small Change: Why the Revolution Will Not Be Tweeted," 1358–66
Glass, Jennifer, "New York Times op-ed piece," 112
Goebel, Bruce, 343
"Good Country People" (O'Connor), 1300–1314
Gordon, Mary, "More than Just a Shrine," 1010–13
"Gospel of Wealth, The" (Carnegie), 866–68
Gould, Stephen Jay
  mentioned, 1285, 1385
  "Women's Brains," 1385–89
Grannis, Kerry Searle, "Pathways to the Middle Class: Balancing Personal and Public Responsibilities" (with Isabel V. Sawhill and Scott Winship), 1521–23
Grant, Ulysses S., 551, 823
graphic organizers, 55–58
"Great Figure, The" (Williams), 1106–7
Green, Alfred M., "Let Us Take Up the Sword," 673–74

Green, Rayna, "A Modest Proposal: The Museum of the Plains White Person," 653–56
Greenglass, David, 1468
Greenough, Horatio
"George Washington," 457–58
mentioned, 470
"Ground Zero Mosque Speech" (Bloomberg), 496–98
"Growing Gulf between the Rich and the Rest of Us, The" (Sklar), 1506–8

Hale, John
mentioned, 192, 248–49
A Modest Inquiry into the Nature of Witchcraft, 249–53
Halm, Cindra, 1431
Halter, Peter, 1109
Hamilton, Alexander
"The Federalist Papers" (with James Madison and John Jay), 404–11
mentioned, 347, 404, 418
Hamlet's BlackBerry (Powers), 795–800
"Hammock, The" (Lee), 1425
Hansen, Tom, 1082
"Harlem" (Hughes), 74
Harper, Frances Ellen Watkins, "Letter to John Brown," 736
Harris, Daniel, "Celebrity Bodies," 142–43
Hartley, Marsden
mentioned, 1069
Portrait of a German Officer, 1082–83
Harvest of Death, A (O'Sullivan), 685–86
hasty generalization, 103, 106
Hate Speech: The History of an American Controversy (Walker), 108–9 Hawthorne, Nathaniel
mentioned, 548, 558
"My Kinsman, Major Molineux," 558–71
Hayden, Robert
"Frederick Douglass," 898
"Those Winter Sundays," 1367–68
Hedges, Chris, "Days of Destruction, Days of Revolt" (with Joe Sacco), 1457–66
Hellman, Lillian, "I Cannot and Will Not Cut My Conscience to Fit This Year's Fashions," 1471–72
"Hello, Martians, Let Moby-Dick Explain" (Atwood), 1267–69
Hemingway, Ernest, "A Clean, Well-Lighted Place," 1121–24
TalkBack: "A Clean, Well-Lighted Place" (Li), 1125–26
Henry, Patrick
mentioned, 345, 347, 348, 373
"Speech to the Second Virginia Convention," 373–75
Herblock, "Transported," 40
Herrick, Henry W., Reading the Emancipation Proclamation in the Slaves' Cabin, 697 Hillenbrand, Laura, Seabiscuit, 148–49
Hine, Lewis Wickes, 826
"His Highness" (Lepore), 463–67
historical information, 108–9
Historic Fredericksburg Foundation, "Auction Block Monument," 641–42
History of the Life and Death, Virtues and Exploits of General George Washington, A (Weems), 456–57
Hitchens, Christopher, 379–80
Ho Chi Minh. See Minh, Ho Chi Hoedel, Cindy, 1491
Hofstadter, Richard, 221
"Hollow Men, The" (Eliot), 1113–16
"homage to my hips" (Clifton), 143–44
"Homage to Phillis Wheatley" (Young), 515–17
Homer, Winslow, The Veteran in a New Field, 831
TalkBack: "Again, the Fields: After Winslow Homer" (Trethewey), 832–33
"'Hope' is the thing with feathers—" (Dickinson), 834–35
Hopper, Edward, 1127
"Horatio Alger" (Dalton), 1497–1502
Horowitz, Tony, "The 9/11 of 1859," 753–54
"House of Mirth, The" (Wharton), 978–80

Hovenden, Thomas, The Last Moments of John Brown, 743–45
Howe, Marie Jenney, "An Anti-Suffrage Monologue," 985–87
"How It Feels to Be Colored Me" (Hurston), 1117–20
"How Soccer Is Ruining America: A Jeremiad" (Webb), 267–68
"How the World Was Made," 192–94
Hoxby, Caroline M., "The Missing 'One-Offs': The Hidden Supply of High-Achieving, Low-Income Students" (with Christopher Avery), 174–75
Hsu, Hua, "The End of White America," 112–13
Hsu, Jeremy, 1556
Hudson, Henry, 187
Hughes, Langston
  mentioned, 1071, 1100–1101, 1298
  writings
    "Harlem," 74
    "Jazzonia," 1197–98
    "Mother to Son," 135–36
    "The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain," 1102–5
    "The Negro Speaks of Rivers," 1101
    "Theme for English B," 1298–99
humor, 15–17
"Hurricane Katrina" (Kennedy), 141
Hurston, Zora Neale
  "How It Feels to Be Colored Me," 1117–20
  mentioned, 1071, 1117
"Huswifery" (Taylor), 230–31
hyperbole, 50

I Am an American (Lange), 1220
"I Cannot and Will Not Cut My Conscience to Fit This Year's Fashions" (Hellman), 1471–72
"If the Japanese Can't Build a Safe Reactor, Who Can?" (Applebaum), 30–31. See also "Alarmist or Alarming Rhetoric?" (Demby)
"If We Must Die" (McKay), 1093–94
"I heard a Fly buzz—when I died—" (Dickinson), 837
Ilgunas, Ken, "Walden on Wheels: On the Open Road from Debt to Freedom," 802–6 Illingworth, Leslie, 1280 images, pathos and, 14–15
Immigration: The Lure of America (Conversation), 997–1023 imperative sentences, 50
"Inaugural Address" (Davis), 669–72
"Inaugural Address, January 20, 1961" (Kennedy), 77–80
Inauguration of John F. Kennedy (U.S. Army Signal Corps), 84
"Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl, Written by Herself" (Jacobs), 675–84
"In College, These American Citizens Are Not Created Equal" (Santiago), 106–7
"Income Confusion" (Sowell), 1512–13
"In Defense of Women" (Mencken), 423–25 independent clauses. See subordination in complex sentences induction combined with deduction, 124–26
  defined, 120–23
"In Event of Moon Disaster" (Safire), 38
Influence of Jazz, The (Conversation), 1187–1214
Influence of Phillis Wheatley, The (Conversation), 506–34
"in Just-" (Cummings), 1099–1100
"In Search of Flannery O'Connor" (Downes), 1315–19
"Inside Kennedy's Inauguration, 50 Years On" (Clift), 80–83
insufficiency, fallacies of circular reasoning, 104
  hasty generalization, 103, 106
integrating quotations, 178–79
"In the Station of the Metro" (Pound), 1074 introduction (exordium), in classical oration, 117, 119
Inventing George Washington (Lengel), 468–69 inverted sentence patterns, 50, 813–14
Invisible Man (Ellison), 1201

Iroquois Confederacy, The Iroquois Constitution, 205–9
Iroquois Constitution, The (Iroquois Confederacy), 205–9
Irving, Washington, "Rip Van Winkle," 435–48
I Saw the Figure 5 in Gold (Demuth), 1108
"I Sit and Sew" (Dunbar-Nelson), 24–25
It Costs a Dollar a Month to Sleep in These Sheds (Riis), 871
"It's a Big Fat Juicy Cheeseburger in a Land of Tofu" (Dodge Motor Company), 75
"I Was Looking Out for Other Cars" (Federal Highway Administration), 33

Jackson, Andrew, 547
Jackson, Kathy Merlock, "Redesigning Pocahontas: Disney, the 'White Man's Indian,' and the Marketing of Dreams" (with Gary Edgerton), 324–29
Jackson Pollock (Toynton), 1210–12
Jacobs, Harriet
  "Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl, Written by Herself," 675–84
  mentioned, 549, 675
Jacoby, Jeff, "The Role of Religion in Government: Invoking Jesus at the Inauguration," 490–91
Japanese Internment and Reparations: Making It Right? (Conversation), 1214–46
Jarrell, Randall
  "The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner," 1180–81
  mentioned, 1073, 1180
Jay, John
  "The Federalist Papers" (with Alexander Hamilton and James Madison), 404–11
  mentioned, 347, 404
jazz, influence of. See Influence of Jazz, The (Conversation)
"Jazz and the African American Literary Tradition" (Early), 1189–93
"Jazz Fan Looks Back" (Cortez), 1207–8
"Jazzonia" (Hughes), 1197–98
Jefferson, Thomas
  mentioned, 345, 348, 389–90
  TalkBack: "Declaration of Sentiments" (Stanton), 393–95 TalkBack: "Proclamation of Independence of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam" (Minh), 396–98
  writings
    "The Declaration of Independence," 390–92
    "Letter to Benjamin Banneker," 429
    "The Virginia Act for Establishing Religious Freedom," 481–82
jeremiads, 192–93, 254. See also American Jeremiad, The (Conversation)
Jewett, Sarah Orne, "A White Heron," 856–63
Jiles, Paulette, "Paper Matches," 72–73
Jitterbugs VI (Johnson), 1199–1200
John Brown, Patriot or Terrorist? (Conversation), 731–57
Johnson, Andrew, 823
Johnson, James Weldon, "Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing," 941–43
Johnson, Lyndon Baines, "Speech to Congress, March 15, 1965," 9–10
Johnson, William Henry, Jitterbugs VI, 1199–1200
Jones, Edward P., "The First Day," 161–64
Jordan, June, "The Difficult Miracle of Black Poetry in America," 517–27
Journal of the First Voyage to America (Columbus), 279–83
Joyce, James, 1125
Juan, Ana
  mentioned, 1285, 1427
  Reflections, 1428
"July 16, 1969, Launch, The" (Rand), 38–40
Jungle, The (Sinclair), 960–64
Justice: What's the Right Thing to Do? (Sandel), 125

"Just Walk On By: A Black Man Ponders His Power to Alter Public Space" (Staples), 1394–97
juxtaposition, 50

Kandy-Kolored Tangerine-Flake Streamline Baby, The (Wolfe), 1537–40
Kaplan, Fred, 691
Käsebier, Gertrude, 941
Kasson, Joy, Buffalo Bill's Wild West: Celebrity, Memory, and Popular History, 1050–54
Kazan, Elia, 1490
Kazin, Alfred, 1563
Kearney, Dennis, "Appeal from California. The Chinese Invasion. Workingman's Address" (with H. L. Knight), 999–1000
Kelley, Florence, "Speech on Child Labor," 980–82
Kennedy, John F.
  inauguration of
    "Inaugural Address, January 20, 1961" (Kennedy), 77–80
    Inauguration of John F. Kennedy (U.S. Army Signal Corps), 84
    "Inside Kennedy's Inauguration, 50 Years On" (Clift), 80–83
  mentioned, 1081
  writings
    "Address to the Greater Houston Ministerial Association," 486–89
    "Cuban Missile Crisis Speech," 1472–76
    "Inaugural Address, January 20, 1961," 77–80
Kennedy, Robert F., "The Mindless Menace of Violence," 262–54
Kennedy, Sian, "Sulphur, LA," 141
Keppler, Joseph, "Looking Backward," 1003
Kerouac, Jack, 1556
Key, Francis Scott, "The Star-Spangled Banner," 433–34
Khrushchev, Nikita, "Letter to John F. Kennedy," 1477
Kidd, Sue Monk, "Doing Nothing," 793–94
Killer Angels, The (Shaara), 21–22
Kilson, Martin, 1239–40
Kincaid, Jamaica, "Girl," 70–71
Kindred Spirits (Durand), 556–57
King, Martin Luther, Jr.
  "Letter from Birmingham Jail," 1345–57
  mentioned, 758, 1282, 1283, 1345
  TalkBack: "Small Change: Why the Revolution Will Not Be Tweeted" (Gladwell), 1357–66
"King Coal: Reigning in China" (Will), 12–13
"King of Jazz, The" (Barthelme), 1204–7
Kirp, David, "The Secret to Fixing Bad Schools," 169–71
Koch, Kenneth, "Variations on a Theme by William Carlos Williams," 1111–12
Komunyakaa, Yusef
  "Facing It," 1397–98
Konnikova, Maria, 1271
Krauthammer, Charles, "The 9/11 'Overreaction'? Nonsense," 109
Krugman, Paul, The Conscience of a Liberal, 1508–12
Kunin, Madeleine M., The New Feminist Agenda, 991–94

Landing of Columbus (Vanderlyn), 285–86
Landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, The (Currier), 190
Lange, Dorothea, I Am an American, 1220
Lapham, Louis, 385
Larson, Charles, 335
"Last Letter to His Family" (Brown), 733–35
Last Moments of John Brown, The (Hovenden), 743–45
Last of the Buffalo, The (Bierstadt), 864–65
"Last Speech" (Brown), 732–33
Lawrence, D. H.
  mentioned, 364, 590, 668
  writings
    "Benjamin Franklin," 364–67
    "The Spirit of Place," 1262–63

Lazarus, Emma
"American Literature," 1250–52
"The New Colossus," 998
Lee, Harper, To Kill a Mockingbird, 132–33
Lee, Henry, 450
Lee, Li-Young
"The Hammock," 1425
mentioned, 1284, 1424
Lee, Robert E., 551
Legacy of Henry David Thoreau, The (Conversation), 758–809
LeGuin, Ursula K., 1491
Lengel, Edward G.
Inventing George Washington, 468–69
mentioned, 450
Leopold, Aldo, 758
Lepore, Jill, "His Highness," 463–67
"Let Teenagers Try Adulthood" (Botstein), 183–85
"Letter from Birmingham Jail" (King), 1345–57
"Letter of Apology" (Bush), 1230–31
Letters from an American Farmer (Crèvecoeur), 399–402
"Letter to Abigail Adams" (John Adams), 387–89
"Letter to Albert G. Hodges" (Lincoln), 693–95
"Letter to a Photojournalist Going-In" (Smith), 1429–30
"Letter to Barack Obama" (Morrison), 18–19
"Letter to Father and Mother" (Frethorne), 219, 221
"Letter to John Adams" (Abigail Adams), 386–87
"Letter to John Brown" (Harper), 736
"Letter to John F. Kennedy" (Khrushchev), 1477
"Letter to Phyllis Wright" (Einstein), 5
"Letter to Queen Anne of Great Britain" (Smith), 315–17
"Letter to Ralph Waldo Emerson" (Whitman), 1247–49
"Letter to Reverend Samson Occom" (Wheatley), 514–15
"Letter to Thomas Jefferson" (Banneker), 426–29
"Letter to Warner Brothers" (Marx), 62–64
"Let Us Take Up the Sword" (Green), 673–74
Leutze, Emanual
Washington Crossing the Delaware, 459
Westward the Course of Empire Takes Its Way, 548
Levander, Caroline, 1270
Level Playing Field, A (Early), 151
Levinson, Sanford, "Our Imbecilic Constitution," 414–17
Lewis, R. W. B., 660
Li, Yiyun, "A Clean, Well-Lighted Place," 1125–26
Life on the Mississippi (Twain), 847–55
"Lift Ev'ry Voice and Sing" (Johnson), 942–43
Lincoln, Abraham
mentioned, 550–51, 823, 1102
writings
"The Emancipation Proclamation," 690–91
"The Gettysburg Address," 692
"Letter to Albert G. Hodges," 692
"Second Inaugural Address," 695–96
See also Abraham Lincoln: The Great Emancipator (Conversation)
Lincoln at Gettysburg (Wills), 113
Linn, Allison, "Carmakers' Next Problem: Generation Y," 1551–53 literary analysis, using sources in, 149–50 literary sources, as second-hand evidence, 112–14 literary texts, analyzing, 132–36
"Litigating the Legacy of Slavery" (Ogletree), 1240–42
"Living Like Weasels" (Dillard), 785–88
"Living with Europeans" (Richter), 306–13
Locke, John, 348 logic, ethos and, 8 logical fallacies
ad hominem, 102–3
appeal to false authority, 110–11 bandwagon appeal (ad populum), 111–12
circular reasoning, 104 either/or (false dilemma), 103 logical fallacies (cont.)

faulty analogy, 103
hasty generalization, 103, 106
post hoc ergo propter hoc, 109
red herring, 102
slippery slope, 134
straw man, 103
logos combining with ethos and pathos, 18–20
defined, 11–12
Lomas, Herbert, 839
Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth
"A Psalm of Life," 573–74
"Nature," 575
"Looking Backward" (Keppler), 1003
"Loomings" (Melville), 643–46
Lopate, Philip, 1564
Lopez, Barry, 758
Louv, Richard, 758, 808
Lowell, Amy, "On 'New Poetry,'" 1257–60

MacLeish, Archibald, "Voyage to the Moon," 37
Macy, John, The Spirit of American Literature, 1252–54 Madison, James
mentioned, 347, 404
writings
"The Federalist Papers" (with Alexander Hamilton and John Jay), 404–11
"Memorial and Remonstrance against Religious Assessments," 477–80
"'Madness' of John Brown, The" (McGlone), 747–50 Magritte, René, 1426
major premise, 124, 126
Malamud, Bernard, "The First Seven Years," 1290–97
Malcolm, John, 372
Mann, Horace
mentioned, 820
Report of the Massachusetts Board of Education, 157–59
"Man Takes First Steps on the Moon" (Times), 34–36
"Man Who Was Almost a Man, The" (Wright), 1171–79
Marconi, Guglielmo, 828
Marcus, Ruth, "Crackberry Congress," 16–17
Marlboro Man (McCombe), 1043–44
Marx, Groucho, "Letter to Warner Brothers," 62–64
Marx, Karl, 1069
Mather, Cotton
mentioned, 192, 243
Wonders of the Invisible World, 243
Mather, Increase, 239
Matisse, Henri, 1069
"Matoaka als Rebecca" (van de Passe), 314–15
Matteson, Tompkins Harrison, The Trial of George Jacobs, 5th August, 1692, 247
Matthiessen, F. O., 548
McCarthy, Joseph, 1468
McCombe, Leonard, Marlboro Man, 1043–44
McDonnell, Joseph, "The Chinese Must Go," 1001–2
McFarland, Ron, 1050
McGlone, Robert E., "The 'Madness' of John Brown," 747–50
McHugh, Heather, "Auto," 1542–43
McKay, Claude, 1071
"If We Must Die," 1093–94
McKay, Nellie, 895, 899
McKibben, Bill, "Walden: Living Deliberately," 759–62
McPherson, James, "Who Freed the Slaves?," 706–14
Mead, Walter Russell, "America's New Tiger Immigrants," 1019–21
Mehl, Matthias, 91
Melville, Herman
mentioned, 548, 642–43
TalkBack: "At the Un-National Monument along the Canadian Border" (Stafford), 648
writings
"Loomings," 643–46
"Shiloh: A Requiem," 647–48

"Memorial and Remonstrance against Religious Assessments" (Madison), 477–80 Mencken, H. L.
"In Defense of Women," 423–25
mentioned, 399, 423
"Mending Wall" (Frost), 1080–81
"Message to President Franklin Pierce" (Seattle), 650–53 metaphors, 50
meter, 72
"Michael" (Sullivan), 1447–56
"Michael Jackson with and without Plastic Surgery," 144
middle class, American. See American Middle Class, The (Conversation) Millay, Edna St. Vincent, "First Fig," 1090–91 Miller, Arthur
mentioned, 1279
"Why I Wrote The Crucible," 1479–80
Mills, C. Wright, 1492, 1526
"Mindless Menace of Violence, The" (Kennedy), 263–54
Minh, Ho Chi, "Proclamation of Independence of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam," 396–98
"Miniver Cheevy" (Robinson), 920–21 minor premise, 124, 126
"Mixed Crowd, The" (Riis), 870–74
Moby-Dick (Melville), 548
"Modell of Christian Charity, A" (Winthrop), 255–56
Modest Inquiry into the Nature of Witchcraft, A (Hale), 249–53 "Modest Proposal, A" (Green), 653–56
modifiers, 1058–65
Momaday, N. Scott, "The Becoming of the Native: Man in America before Columbus," 198–203
Moore, Marianne, "Poetry," 1091–93
Moorhead, Scipio, Phillis Wheatley, 508
"More than Just a Shrine" (Gordon), 1010–13
Morley, Christopher, "On Laziness," 67–69
Morris, George P., "The Chieftain's Daughter: A Ballad," 319
Morrison, Toni, "Letter to Barack Obama," 18–19
"Mother to Son" (Hughes), 135–36
Mouly, Françoise, 1426
Mrs. Elizabeth Freake and Baby Mary (Anonymous), 228
Muir, John
mentioned, 758
"Save the Redwoods," 42–44
Murphy, Gerald, 209
Murray, Judith Sargent
mentioned, 348, 419
"On the Equality of the Sexes," 419–22
TalkBack: "The Feminine Mind" (Mencken), 423–25
Mutually Assured Consumption (Edelstein), 1524–25
"My Heroes Have Never Been Cowboys" (Alexie), 1047–49
"My Kinsman, Major Molineux" (Hawthorne), 558–71
"My Life had stood—a Loaded Gun—" (Dickinson), 838–39
Myth of George Washington, The (Conversation), 450–71
"Myth of the Latin Woman, The" (Cofer), 1411–15
"My Walden, My Walmart" (Sartwell), 801–92

narration (narratio), in classical oration, 117, 120
Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson, A (Rowlandson), 232–38
Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave, Written by Himself (Douglass), 614–24
Nast, Thomas, "Worse than Slavery," 845–46
National Public Radio, "Wilma Mankiller Reflects on Columbus Day," 293–96 native Americans origin stories
"How the World Was Made," 192–94
"Nature" (Longfellow), 575

"Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain, The" (Hughes), 1102–5
"Negro Speaks of Rivers, The" (Hughes), 1101
"New Colossus, The" (Lazarus), 998
New Feminist Agenda, The (Kunin), 991–94
New Religious America, A (Eck), 492–94
Newton, Isaac, 348
New York Times Editorial Board, "Felons and the Right to Vote," 96–98
"New York Times op-ed piece" (Glass), 112
Niemann, Christoph, "Promised Land," 1017–18
Nietzsche, Friedrich, 1069
Nimmo, Joseph, Jr., "The American Cowboy," 1024–27
Nixon, Richard, "The Checkers Speech," 14
Noah, Timothy, 1527
"Nobel Prize Acceptance Speech" (Faulkner), 1288–89
"No More Auction Block for Me" (Anonymous), 674–75 nonrestrictive appositives, 535 nonrestrictive clauses, 337
Norvig, Peter, "The Gettysburg PowerPoint Presentation," 725
"Not by Math Alone" (O'Connor and Romer), 117–19
Notes of a Native Son (Baldwin), 1324–38
Nye, Naomi Shihab
  "Arabic Coffee," 1392–93
  mentioned, 1284, 1392

Oates, Joyce Carol, "Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been?," 1368–80
Obama, Barack, "Tucson Memorial Speech," 271–76
O'Brien, Tim
  mentioned, 1283, 1399
  "On the Rainy River," 1399–1410
"O Captain! My Captain!" (Whitman), 659–60 occasion rhetorical situation and, 3
  SOAPS and, 5–6, 23
Occom, Samson, 514–15
"Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge, An" (Bierce), 875–82
O'Connor, Flannery, "Good Country People," 1300–1314
  TalkBack: "Beyond the Peacock: The Reconstruction of Flannery O'Connor" (Walker), 1320–21
  TalkBack: "In Search of Flannery O'Connor" (Downes), 1315–19
O'Connor, Sandra Day, "Not by Math Alone" (with Roy Romer), 117–19
Office of Civil Defense, "Duck and Cover," 1470
Ogletree, Charles, Jr., "Litigating the Legacy of Slavery," 1240–42
O'Hara, Frank, "On Seeing Larry Rivers' Washington Crossing the Delaware at the Museum of Modern Art," 462–63
"Ohio Electric, The" (Ohio Electric Car Company), 1529–30
Ohio Electric Car Company, "The Ohio Electric," 1529–30
O'Keefe, Georgia, Special No. 12, 1070
Oladipo, Jennifer, "Why Can't Environmentalism Be Colorblind?," 104–5
Olds, Sharon, "Rites of Passage," 1391
O'Meally, Robert, Seeing Jazz, 1194–97
"On Being Brought from Africa to America" (Wheatley), 507
"On Bird, Bird-Watching and Jazz" (Ellison), 49–50, 51–52
One: Number 31 (Pollock), 1211
"On Laziness" (Morley), 67–69
"On 'New Poetry' " (Lowell), 1257–60
"On Seeing Larry Rivers' Washington Crossing the Delaware at the Museum of Modern Art" (O'Hara), 462–63
"On Self-Respect" (Didion), 1341–44
"On the Equality of the Sexes" (Murray), 419–22
"On the Rainy River" (O'Brien), 1399–1410
"Open Boat, The" (Crane), 900–917 open thesis statements, 99

oration, classical, 116–20
"Order of the Day" (Eisenhower), 17–18
Orenstein, Peggy, "What's Wrong with Cinderella?," 110 origin stories, native American
  "How the World Was Made," 192–94
  "The Earth on Turtle's Back," 194–95
O'Rourke, P. J., "The End of the Affair," 1547–50
Ostrom, Hans, "Emily Dickinson and Elvis Presley in Heaven," 840–41
O'Sullivan, Timothy, A Harvest of Death, 685–86
Otsuka, Julie, When the Emperor Was Divine 1221–30
"Our Imbecilic Constitution" (Levinson), 414–17
"Our Wall" (Bowden), 1014–17
Outliers (Gladwell), 121–23
"Out of My Hands" (Alvarez), 165–67
Oxbow, The (Cole), 555–56

Paine, Thomas
  mentioned, 345, 346, 375–76, 378, 403, 601, 1022–23
  writings
    The Age of Reason, 383–84
    Common Sense, 376–78
    The Crisis, I, 378–79
    The Final Crisis, XIII, 380–82
Painter, Nell Irvin, 403
"Paper Matches" (Jiles), 72–73
parallelism, analyzing syntax and, 50
Parini, Jay, 758, 807
Parks, Rosa, 26, 1282
Parrington, Vernon Louis, 819–20 passive voice, 1273–74
pathos
  combining with ethos and logos, 18–20
  defined, 13–17
"Pathways to the Middle Class: Balancing Personal and Public Responsibilities" (Sawhill, Winship, and Grannis), 1521–23
Pearlston, Carl, 505
Penn's Treaty with the Indians (West), 369
Percy, Benjamin, "The Virginian Teaches the Merit of a Man," 1055–56 periodic sentence patterns, 50, 51, 812, 814 peroratio, 117
Perry, Bliss, The American Spirit in Literature, 1260–62
personal experience, 104
personification, 50
PETA (People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals), "Feeding Kids Meat Is Child Abuse," 29
Peters, John, 506
Pew Research Center, "Americans and Their Cars: Is the Romance on the Skids?," 1543–46
Philbrick, Nathaniel, 647 phrases, parallelism and, 1558
Picasso, Pablo, 1069
Pierce, Franklin, 548
Pinker, Steven
  "The Evolutionary Social Psychology of Off-Record Indirect Speech Acts," 154–55
  The Stuff of Thought, 153
  "Words Don't Mean What They Mean," 152
Pinkus, Susan, 1324
Pinsky, Robert, 1093, 1212
Pitney, David Howard, 277
Pizarro, Francisco, 187
"Plea for Captain John Brown, A" (Thoreau), 737–42
Pocahontas, 190. See also Pocahontas: A Woman, a Movie, a Myth? (Conversation)
Pocahontas (Christy), 320–21
Pocahontas: A Woman, a Movie, a Myth? (Conversation), 305–35 Poe, Edgar Allan
  mentioned, 548, 576
  "The Fall of the House of Usher," 576–89 poetic syntax, 72
poetry
  close reading, 72–73
  rhetorical analysis of, 21–24
"Poetry" (Moore), 1091–93 policy, claims of, 94–96
Pollock, Jackson, One: Number 31, 1211
Polyp, " Rat Race," 137

Portrait of a German Officer (Hartley), 1082–83
post hoc ergo propter hoc, 109
Postman, Neil, 808
Pound, Ezra
  mentioned, 1069, 1074
  writings
    "A Few Don'ts by an Imagiste," 1075–78
    "In the Station of the Metro," 1074
Powers, William, Hamlet's BlackBerry, 795–800
"Prayer of Columbus" (Whitman), 287–89
Preamble to the United States Constitution, 412
  TalkBack: "Our Imbecilic Constitution" (Levinson), 414–17
precise verbs, 1273
premises, in deductive reasoning, 124, 126
Problem We All Live With, The (Rockwell), 161
"Proclamation of Independence of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam" (Minh), 396–98
"Prologue, The" (Bradstreet), 222–24
"Promised Land" (Niemann), 1017–18 propositions. See claims
"Psalm of Life, A" (Longfellow), 573–74 punctuation
  appositives and, 535–36
  with cumulative, periodic, and inverted sentence patterns, 814 with subordinate clauses, 337 purpose
  rhetorical situation and, 3
  SOAPS checklist and, 5–6, 23

qualifier, in Toulmin model, 126–27, 130
quantitative evidence, 111
questions, asking, 48–49, 50–51
Quindlen, Anna, "The C Word in the Hallways," 95 quotations, 178–79

Rabbit, Run (Updike), 1535–37
"Racial Reparations: Japanese American Redress and African American Claims" (Yamamoto), 1231–37
Radosh, Ronald, "Case Closed: The Rosenbergs Were Soviet Spies," 1484–86
Ragged Dick, or Street Life in New York with the Boot Blacks (Alger), 1493–97
Rand, Ayn, "The July 16, 1969, Launch: A Symbol of Man's Greatness" (Rand), 38–40
Rasmussen, William M. S., 335
"Rat Race" (Polyp), 137
Ray, David, 1043
Reading the Emancipation Proclamation in the Slaves' Cabin (Herrick), 697 Reagan, Ronald
  "Farewell Address," 265–66
  mentioned, 1231
reason, subordinating conjunctions indicating, 336 reasoning circular, 104
  faulty (see logical fallacies) inductive and deductive, 120–26 rebuttal, in Toulmin model, 130
Reconstruction of the South, 824
"Recruitment poster" (U.S. Navy), 28
Red Cloud, "Speech on Indian Rights," 843–45
"Redesigning Pocahontas: Disney, the 'White Man's Indian,' and the Marketing of Dreams" (Jackson and Edgerton), 324–29 red herring fallacy, 102
Red Jacket
  "Defense of Native American Religion," 484–86
  mentioned, 348
Reflections (Juan), 1428
refutation in classical oration (refutatio), 117, 120
  counterarguments and, 11, 20
Relation of Cabeza de Vaca, The (Cabeza de Vaca), 210–16 relevance of evidence fallacies
    ad hominem, 102–3

faulty analogy, 103
red herring, 102
need for, 101
Religious Tolerance (Conversation), 472–506
"Reluctance" (Frost), 1078–79
Remington, Frederic, A Dash for the Timber, 1028
Reminiscences of Abraham Lincoln by Distinguished Men of His Time (Douglass), 699–703
Report of the Massachusetts Board of Education (Mann), 157–59
Requierimiento, The (Ferdinand of Spain), 284–85 reservation, in Toulmin model, 126–27, 130 restrictive appositives, 535 restrictive clauses, 337
Revere, Paul
mentioned, 370
works
engraving of Boston Massacre, 345
"The Able Doctor, or America Swallowing the Bitter Draught," 370–71 Reynolds, David, "Freedom's Martyr," 750–52 rhetoric, introduction to effective and ineffective rhetoric, 29–31
overview, 1
rhetorical analysis of fiction and poetry, 21–24
of visual texts, 25–26
rhetorical appeals combining ethos, logos, and pathos, 18–20
ethos, 8–10
logos, 11–12
pathos, 13–17
rhetorical situation, 2–4
SOAPS, 5–6
rhetorical analysis
of fiction and poetry, 21–24
of visual texts, 25–26
rhetorical appeals
combining ethos, logos, and pathos, 18–20
ethos, 8–10
logos, 11–12
pathos, 13–17
rhetorical situation analyzing style and, 44–45
defined, 2–4
rhetorical triangle, 3–4 rhyme, 72
Rich, Adrienne
"Diving into the Wreck," 1381–84
mentioned, 839, 1285, 1381
"Richard Cory" (Robinson), 919
Richter, Daniel
"Living with Europeans," 306–13
mentioned, 335
Riis, Jacob
mentioned, 827, 869
works
Baby in a Slum Tenement, 873
It Costs a Dollar a Month to Sleep in These Sheds, 871
"The Mixed Crowd," 870–74
"Rip Van Winkle" (Irving), 435–48
Rise of Nuclear Fear, The (Weart), 1486–89
"Rites of Passage" (Olds), 1391
Robinson, E. A.
"Miniver Cheevy," 920–21
"Richard Cory," 919
Rockwell, Norman, The Problem We All Live With, 161
Roethke, Theodore, "The Waking," 1322–23
Rogerian arguments, 85–87
"Role of Religion in Government, The" (Jacoby), 490–91
"Roman Fever" (Wharton), 1128–37
Romer, Roy, "Not by Math Alone" (with Sandra Day O'Connor), 117–19 Roosevelt, Eleanor
mentioned, 1072, 1138
"What Libraries Mean to the Nation," 1138–41
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
mentioned, 379, 1072
writings
"Executive Order No. 9066," 1215–17
"Second Inaugural Address: One-Third of a Nation," 1143–46

Roosevelt, Theodore, "The Strenuous Life," 922–25
"Rosa" (Dove), 1423–24
"Rosa Parks" (Toles), 26
Rosenberg, Julius and Ethel, 1468
Rowlandson, Mary
  mentioned, 190, 231–32
  A Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson, 232–38
  TalkBack: "Captivity" (Erdrich), 240–42
Sacco, Joe, "Days of Destruction, Days of Revolt" (with Chris Hedges), 1457–66
"Sacred, The" (Dunn), 1541–42
Safire, William, "In Event of Moon Disaster," 38
Salzman, Randy, 1556
Sandel, Michael J., Justice: What's the Right Thing to Do?, 125
"Sandwich. Snack. Arsenic." (American Lung Association), 270
"Santa Ana Winds, The" (Didion), 52–53
Santayana, George, 187
Santiago, Fabiola, "In College, These American Citizens Are Not Created Equal," 106–7
Sanzgirl, Shona, 1456
Sartwell, Crispin, "My Walden, My Walmart," 801–92
"Satisfying Meal, A," 196–97
"Save the Redwoods" (Muir), 42–44
Sawhill, Isabel V., "Pathways to the Middle Class: Balancing Personal and Public Responsibilities" (with Scott Winship and Kerry Searle Grannis), 1521–23
"Say It Ain't So, Huck: Second Thoughts on Mark Twain's Masterpiece" (Smiley), 149–50
Schama, Simon, 370
Scheibach, Michael, Atomic Narratives and American Youth: Coming of Age with the Atom, 1945–55, 1481–83
Schell, Jonathan, The Fate of the Earth, 1184–86
Schlosser, Eric, Fast Food Nation, 965–68
"School Days of an Indian Girl, The" (Zitkala-Ŝa), 935–40
"Sculptor's Funeral, The" (Cather), 950–60
Seabiscuit (Hillenbrand), 148–49
second-hand evidence expert opinion, 110
  historical information, 108–9
  literary sources, 112–14
  quantitative evidence, 111
"Second Inaugural Address" (Lincoln), 695–96
"Second Inaugural Address: One-Third of a Nation" (Roosevelt), 1143–46
"Secrets of Princeton, The" (Douthat), 172–73
"Secret to Fixing Bad Schools, The" (Kirp), 169–71
Seeing Jazz (O'Meally), 1194–97
Segell, Michael, The Devil's Horn, 1209–10
"Self-Reliance" (Emerson), 590–600 sentence patterns coordinating, 810 cumulative, 811, 814 exercises, 814–18
  inverted, 813–14
  periodic, 812, 814 simple, 809
  subordinating, 810
sentences, complex. See complex sentences sentence types, 50
"Sentencing Statement" (Anthony), 971–73
Sergeant, Winthrop, 1213
Shaara, Michael, The Killer Angels, 21–22
Shapley, Harlow, 1082 shared values, 8, 10, 20
Sherr, Lynn, 934
"Shiloh: A Requiem" (Melville), 647–48
"Short History of America, A" (Crumb), 783–84
"Shut the Door" (Smith), 1007–10
"Significance of the Frontier in American History, The" (Turner), 1029 similes, 50
simple sentence patterns, 809
Sinclair, Upton
  The Jungle, 960–64
  mentioned, 827, 960
  TalkBack: Fast Food Nation (Schlosser), 965–68

"Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God" (Edwards), 258–59 situation, rhetorical. See rhetorical situation Sklar, Holly, "The Growing Gulf between the Rich and the Rest of Us," 1506–8
"Slave Reparations Movement Adopts the Rhetoric of Victimhood, The" (Staples), 1237–39
"Slip, Slop, Slap and Wrap!" (Environmental Protection Agency), 77 slippery slope fallacy, 134
Slow Food Nation (Waters), 11–12
"Small Change: Why the Revolution Will Not Be Tweeted" (Gladwell), 1358–66
Smiley, Jane, "Say It Ain't So, Huck: Second Thoughts on Mark Twain's Masterpiece," 149–50
Smith, Ellison DuRant, "Shut the Door," 1007–10
Smith, Hedrick, Who Stole the American Dream?, 1514–21
Smith, John, "Letter to Queen Anne of Great Britain," 315–17
Smith, Tracy K., "Letter to a Photojournalist Going-In," 1429–30
"Snow" (Alvarez), 1478–79
SOAPS
  analysis of The Killer Angels (Shaara), 22–23
  defined, 5–6
so that, 336
"Soul selects her own Society—, The" (Dickinson), 835 sound, 72
sources, synthesizing. See synthesizing sources
Southern Horrors: Lynch Law in All Its Phases (Wells-Barnett), 883–87 Sowell, Thomas, "Income Confusion," 1512–13 speaker
  rhetorical triangle and, 3–4
  SOAPS checklist and, 5–6, 23
Special No. 12 (O'Keefe), 1070
"Speech at Pennsylvania Hall" (Weld), 47–48
"Speech of Miss Polly Baker, The" (Franklin), 350–52
"Speech on Child Labor" (Kelley), 980–82
"Speech on Indian Rights" (Red Cloud), 843–45
"Speech to Congress, March 15, 1965" (Johnson), 9–10
"Speech to the Second Virginia Convention" (Henry), 373–75
Spiegelman, Art
  9/11/2001, 1426–27
  mentioned, 1285, 1426
  TalkBack: Reflections (Juan), 1428
Spielberg, Steven, 730
Spirit of American Literature, The (Macy), 1252–54
"Spirit of Place, The" (Lawrence), 1262–63
Stafford, William
  "At the Un-National Monument along the Canadian Border," 648
  mentioned, 1079
Stalin, Joseph, 1280
Stanton, Elizabeth Cady, "Declaration of Sentiments," 393–95
Staples, Brent
  mentioned, 1394
  writings
    "Just Walk On By: A Black Man Ponders His Power to Alter Public Space," 1394–97
    "The Slave Reparations Movement Adopts the Rhetoric of Victimhood," 1237–39
"Star-Spangled Banner, The" (Key), 433–34
"Star Wars" (Ebert), 92–94
"Statement by the President of the United States" (Truman), 1181–84 statistics. See quantitative evidence Stazesky, Richard C., 471
Steerage, The (Stieglitz), 140
Steinbeck, John
  mentioned, 1072, 1147
  "The Chrysanthemums," 1147–55

Stephenson, Wen, 277, 278
Stevens, Wallace
  mentioned, 1069, 1084
  TalkBack: "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Tortilla" (Abeyta), 1087–89
  "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird," 1084–86
Stieglitz, Alfred
  mentioned, 1109
  The Steerage, 140
St. Marie, Buffy, 934
"Story of an Hour, The" (Chopin), 888–90
Stowe, Harriet Beecher
  mentioned, 549, 627
  Uncle Tom's Cabin, 627–40
straw man fallacy, 103
"Strenuous Life, The" (Roosevelt), 922–25
Stuart, Gilbert, George Washington—Lansdowne Portrait, 454–55 Stuff of Thought, The (Pinker), 153 style, analyzing determining tone, 46–47
  establishing rhetorical situation, 44–45
  introduction, 41–42
  model analysis, 45–46
subject
  rhetorical triangle and, 4
  SOAPS checklist and, 5–6, 23
subordination, as sentence pattern, 810 subordination in complex sentences exercises, 339–42
  overview, 336–37
  rhetorical and stylistic strategy, 338–39
"Subtle Problem of Charity, The" (Addams), 927–30
"Success is counted sweetest" (Dickinson), 134–35 sufficiency of evidence, 101, 103–4 fallacies of insufficiency
    circular reasoning, 104
    hasty generalization, 103, 106
Suffragette Madonna (Dunston-Weiler Lithograph Company), 982–83
Sullivan, John Jeremiah, "Michael," 1447–56
Sullivan, Robert, 808
"Superman and Me" (Alexie), 1420–23
"Supermarket in California, A" (Ginsberg), 667
Supervisory Committee for Recruiting Colored Regiments, "Come and Join Us Brothers," 687–88 support (evidence), in Toulmin model, 126–27
Sweet, Charles A., Jr., 1155
Swing Landscape (Davis), 1198–99 syllogisms, 123–24, 126 syntax analyzing, 50, 51 poetic, 72 synthesizing sources
  overview, 147–48
  uses of sources to appeal to an audience, 152–55 to inform an argument, 148–49 in literary analysis, 149–50
  writing a synthesis essay
    citing sources, 180
    formulating position, 175–77 framing or integrating quotations, 178–79 sample essay: "You Gotta Fight for Your Right . . . to Education (Broderick), 180–83
  See also Education: The Civil Rights Issue of Our Time? (Conversation)

"Talented Tenth, The" (DuBois), 944–49 talking with the text annotating, 52, 54–55
  asking questions, 48–49, 50–51
  close reading, 58–60
  graphic organizers, 55–58
Tanner, Benjamin, America Guided by Wisdom (with John J. Barralet), 349
Taylor, Edward
  "Huswifery," 230–31
  mentioned, 191, 230
Taylor, Paul, 1023
Tecumseh
  mentioned, 348, 430

works
"Address to General William Henry Harrison," 430–32
"Address to the Osages," 60–62
"Ten Commandments Courthouse Controversy" (Tramontina), 495–96
"Terror's Purse Strings" (Thomas), 114–16
"Thanatopsis" (Bryant), 551–53
"Thanksgiving Table, The" (Cole), 15
"Theme for English B" (Hughes), 1298–99
Theory of the Leisure Class, The (Veblen), 976–78
"There Was a Child Went Forth" (Whitman), 657–58
thesis statements for close-analysis essays, 65 closed, 98–99
counterargument, 99–100
open, 99
"Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird" (Stevens), 1084–86
"Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Tortilla" (Abeyta), 1087–89
"This Is Just to Say" (Williams), 1109–10
"This Is the Car You Buy Because You Can't Buy a Bald Eagle" (Dodge Motor Company), 468
Thomas, Dana, "Terror's Purse Strings," 114–16
Thoreau, Henry David
mentioned, 548
writings
"A Plea for Captain John Brown," 737–42
Walden, 763–77
See also The Legacy of Henry David Thoreau (Conversation)
"Those Winter Sundays" (Hayden), 1367–68
Tilton, Robert S., 335 time, subordinating conjunctions indicating, 337
Times, "Man Takes First Steps on the Moon," 34–36
"To Cole, the Painter, Departing for Europe" (Bryant), 554
"To His Excellency General Washington" (Wheatley), 512–14
To Kill a Mockingbird (Lee), 132–33
Toles, Tom
"Crazed Rhetoric," 86
"Rosa Parks cartoon," 26
"To My Old Master" (Anderson), 829–30 tone, 46–47
"To S.M., a Young African Painter on Seeing His Works" (Wheatley), 508–9
"To the Hebrew Congregation in Newport, Rhode Island" (Washington), 483
"To the University of Cambridge, in New-England" (Wheatley), 510–11
Toulmin model, 126–31
Toynton, Evelyn, Jackson Pollock, 1210–12
Trading, Traveling, and Mosquitoes (DeGrazia), 218
Tramontina, Gary, "Ten Commandments Courthouse Controversy," 495–96
"Transported" (Herblock), 40
Trial of George Jacobs, 5th August, 1692, The (Matteson), 247 triangle, rhetorical, 3–4
"Tribute to George Washington" (Addams), 460–62 trickster stories, native American
"Coyote Gets Stuck," 197–98
"A Satisfying Meal," 196–97
TalkBack: "The Becoming of the Native: Man in America before Columbus" (Momaday), 198–203
Trilling, Lionel, 572
Truman, Harry S, "Statement by the President of the United States," 1181–84
TalkBack: The Fate of the Earth (Schell), 1184–86
Truth, Sojourner
"Ain't I a Woman?," 626
mentioned, 549, 625–26
"Tucson Memorial Speech" (Obama), 271–76

Turner, Brian
"At Lowe's Home Improvement Center," 1445–46
mentioned, 1285, 1445
Turner, Frederick Jackson
mentioned, 825, 1029
"The Significance of the Frontier in American History," 1029
Twain, Mark
Life on the Mississippi, 847–55
mentioned, 548, 847

"Un-American Bill, An" (Clancy), 1004–7
Uncle Sam Suffragee (Dunston-Weiler Lithograph Company), 982–83
Uncle Tom's Cabin (Stowe), 549, 627–40
"Unknown Citizen, The" (Auden), 1169–70
Updike, John, Rabbit, Run, 1535–37
U.S. Army Nurse Corps, "Recruitment poster," 27
U.S. Army Signal Corps, "Inauguration of John F. Kennedy," 84
Uses of Argument, The (Toulmin), 126
U.S. Navy, "Recruitment poster," 28 value, claims of, 91–92 values, shared. See shared values van de Passe, Simon, "Matoaka als Rebecca," 314–15

Vanderlyn, John, Landing of Columbus, 285–86
"Van Winkle" (Crane), 449–50
"Variations on a Theme by William Carlos Williams" (Koch), 1111–12 Veblen, Thorstein, The Theory of the Leisure Class, 976–78 verbs, choice of active verbs, 1273–74
direct verbs, 1272
exercises, 1274–75
overview, 1271–72
precise verbs, 1273
Vespucci, Amerigo, 187
Veteran in a New Field, The (Homer), 831
villanelle, 1324
"Virginia Act for Establishing Religious Freedom, The" (Jefferson), 481–82
Virginian, The (Wister), 1036–41
"Virginian Teaches the Merit of a Man, The" (Percy), 1055–56
visual texts
analyzing, as arguments, 137–42
close reading, 74–76
rhetorical analysis of, 25–26
"Votes for Women" (Boye), 984–85
"Voyage to the Moon" (MacLeish), 37

"Waking, The" (Roethke), 1322–23
Walden (Thoreau), 763–77
"Walden" (White), 779–83
"Walden: Living Deliberately" (McKibben), 759–62
"Walden on Wheels: On the Open Road from Debt to Freedom" (Ilgunas), 802–6
Walker, Alice, "Beyond the Peacock: The Reconstruction of Flannery O'Connor," 1320–21
Walker, Samuel, Hate Speech: The History of an American Controversy, 108–9 Warhol, Andy, 1109 warrant (assumption), in Toulmin model analyzing, 127–29
defined, 126–27
using in own writing, 130
Warren, Robert Penn
All the King's Men, 71–72
mentioned, 660
Was America Founded As a Christian Nation? (Fea), 499–503
Washington, Booker T.
"The Atlanta Exposition Address," 891–94
mentioned, 823, 891
Washington, George
mentioned, 347, 378
writings
"Farewell Address," 452–54
"Letter to Colonel Lewis Nicola," 451–52
"Letter to Phillis Wheatley," 512–13
"To the Hebrew Congregation in Newport, Rhode Island," 483

See also Myth of George Washington, The (Conversation)
Washington Crossing the Delaware (Leutze), 459
Watson, Peter, 1276–77
Weart, Spencer R., The Rise of Nuclear Fear, 1486–89
Weatherford, Jack, "Examining the Reputation of Christopher Columbus," 289–91
Webb, Stephen H., "How Soccer Is Ruining America: A Jeremiad," 267–68
Weems, Mason Locke, A History of the Life and Death, Virtues and Exploits of General George Washington, 456–57
Weld, Angelina Grimké, "Speech at Pennsylvania Hall," 47–48
Welling, James C., 730
Wells-Barnett, Ida B.
  mentioned, 823, 883
  Southern Horrors: Lynch Law in All Its Phases, 883–87
West, Benjamin, Penn's Treaty with the Indians, 368–69
Western Defense Command, "Evacuation Order," 1217–19
Westward the Course of Empire Takes Its Way (Leutze), 548
"We Wear the Mask" (Dunbar), 895–96
Wexler, Laura, 941
Weymouth, George, 187
Wharton, Edith
  "The House of Mirth," 978–80
  "Roman Fever," 1127–37
"What, to the Slave, Is the Fourth of July?" (Douglass), 260–62
"What Columbus Day Really Means" (Connell), 296–300
What Is American Literature? (Conversation), 1247–71
"What Libraries Mean to the Nation" (Roosevelt), 1138–41
"What's Wrong with Cinderella?" (Orenstein), 110
Wheatley, Phillis
  mentioned, 348
  writings
    "Letter to Reverend Samson Occom," 514–15
    "On Being Brought from Africa to America," 507
    "To His Excellency General Washington," 512–14
    "To S.M., a Young African Painter on Seeing His Works," 508–9
    "To the University of Cambridge, in New-England," 510–11
  See also Influence of Phillis Wheatley, The (Conversation)
When Everything Changed: The Amazing Journey of American Women from 1950 to the Present (Collins), 988–91
"When I Heard the Learn'd Astronomer" (Whitman), 24
When the Emperor Was Divine (Otsuka), 1221–30
"When Will We Learn?" (Zakaria), 108, 111
"Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been?" (Oates), 1368–80
White, E. B.
  "Farewell, My Lovely!," 1530–35
  "Walden," 779–83
White, Ronald C., Jr., 729
"White Heron, A" (Jewett), 856–63
Whitman, Walt
  mentioned, 548, 657
    TalkBack: "A Supermarket in California" (Ginsberg), 667
  writings
    "Crossing Brooklyn Ferry," 660–65
    "Letter to Ralph Waldo Emerson," 1247–49
    "O Captain! My Captain!," 659–60
    "Prayer of Columbus," 287–89
    "There Was a Child Went Forth," 657–58
    "When I Heard the Learn'd Astronomer," 24
Whittier, John Greenleaf, 757
"Who Freed the Slaves?" (McPherson), 706–14

"Who Freed the Slaves? Emancipation and Its Meaning" (Berlin), 715–24
Who Stole the American Dream? (Smith), 1514–21
"Why Can't Environmentalism Be Colorblind?" (Oladipo), 104–5
"Why Investing in Fast Food May Be a Good Thing" (Domini), 87–88
"Why I Wrote The Crucible" (Miller), 1479–80
"Why They Aren't Writing the Great American Novel Anymore" (Wolfe), 1264–66
Will, George, "King Coal: Reigning in China," 12–13
Williams, Roger, 506
Williams, William Carlos
  mentioned, 1069, 1093, 1106
  TalkBack: I Saw the Figure 5 in Gold (Demuth), 1108 TalkBack: "Variations on a Theme by William Carlos Williams" (Koch), 1111–12
  writings
    "The Great Figure," 1106–7
    "This Is Just to Say," 1109–10
Wills, Gary
  Lincoln at Gettysburg, 113
  mentioned, 469, 693, 729
"Wilma Mankiller Reflects on Columbus Day" (National Public Radio), 293–96
Wilson, E. O.
  Future of Life, The 788–92
  mentioned, 758
Wilson, Sondra Kathryn, 943
Wilson, Woodrow, 828, 1069
Winship, Scott, "Pathways to the Middle Class: Balancing Personal and Public Responsibilities" (with Isabel V. Sawhill and Kerry Searle Grannis), 1521–23
Winthrop, John
  "A Modell of Christian Charity" (Winthrop), 255–56
  mentioned, 254
Wister, Owen, The Virginian: A Horseman of the Plains, 1036–41
Witchcraft at Salem Village, 191
Wolfe, Tom
  The Kandy-Kolored Tangerine-Flake Streamline Baby, 1537–40
  "Why They Aren't Writing the Great American Novel Anymore," 1264–66 Woman in the Nineteenth Century (Fuller), 607–13 women, changing roles of. See Changing Roles of Women, The (Conversation)
Women and Economics (Gilman), 974–76
"Women's Brains" (Gould), 1385–89
Wonders of the Invisible World (Mather), 243
Wood, James, 1456
words, parallelism and, 1557
"Words Don't Mean What They Mean" (Pinker), 152
Works Progress Administration, "Bookmobile, Louisiana," 1141–42
"Worse than Slavery" (Nast), 845–46
Wright, Richard
  mentioned, 1071, 1170
  "The Man Who Was Almost a Man," 1171–79
Wright Brothers, 828

Yamamoto, Eric K., "Racial Reparations: Japanese American Redress and African American Claims," 1231–37
"You Gotta Fight for Your Right . . . to Education" (Broderick), 180–83 Young, Kevin
  "Homage to Phillis Wheatley," 515–17
  mentioned, 1213

Zakaria, Fareed, "When Will We Learn?," 108, 111
zeugma, 55, 1560–61
Zitkala-Ŝa images, 941
  mentioned, 934–35
  "The School Days of an Indian Girl," 935–40

A revolution in American literature

Conversations in American Literature: Language · Rhetoric · Culture is a new kind of American literature anthology, featuring:

- A unique chronological and thematic organization that encourages students to explore how the past continues to influence the present.
- In-depth instruction in rhetoric, close reading, argument, and synthesis.
- Engaging TalkBacks that pair classic pieces with more recent responses.
- Unique thematic Conversations that explore cultural issues and literary legacies.

Now available as an e-book.

For details, visit bedfordstmartins.com/ebooks.

"This powerful new book is filled with essential questions and big ideas explored across works of literature, art, and all the great nonfiction one expects to find in an AP® Language class. These gifted teachers offer you the book so many have hoped to find: one that gets Hemingway and Hurston, presidents and poets, artists and authors talking to each other, and invites your students into the conversation." —Jim Burke, author of The English Teacher's Companion and The Common Core Companion

"This excellent text bridges the current gap between the teaching of American literature and the usual AP® Language and Composition course focusing on nonfiction. For the AP® Language teacher who is required to focus on American literature throughout the course, this text will be a godsend." —Sylvia Kranish, John F. Kennedy High School, MD

AP® is a trademark registered by the College Board, which was not involved in the production of, and does not endorse, this product.

bedford
ST. MARTIN'S bedfordstmartins.com

bfw

ISBN 978-1-4576-4676-8
90000
9 781457 646768